the Minister may make an order as he thinks reasonable as to the proper way in which the rate should be levied. That is important, for the reason that, assuming, as counsel for the ratepayer admits, that there is prima facie power in the local authority to levy differential rates as well as uniform rates, and assuming against the ratepayer that there is here no duty on the authority to levy differential rates, then there may still be a remedy if persons aggrieved think it to be unfair, namely, the remedy of application to the Minister. Indeed, it may, I think, be put more strongly. The fact that there is such a remedy obviously makes less forcible the argument that there must be found, in such a case as this, some equity compelling the authority to make differential rates unless injustice be done. Such an equity, difficult on any view, as I think it is, to extract from the circumstances, is plainly less compelling if there is found some other remedy rendered available by Parliament.

I have, I think, stated all the facts, and, I hope, all the statutory provisions to which it is necessary to allude. It, therefore, only remains to come back to the point of law which counsel for the ratepayer has made the basis of his argument, namely, that on the facts here there is an equity which compels the local authority to exercise its powers (admittedly sufficient to enable the authority in the absence of some compulsion to levy the water rates it did) so as to levy them in accordance with the principles which appealed to the county court judge. Reference was made in the course of the argument to the case in this court of Northampton Corpn. v. Ellen (1), for the purpose of showing that a water rate is something quite different in character from a general rate. In other words, the use of the word "rate" is not to be deemed to give to a water rate all the characteristics, statutory or otherwise, which properly belong to a poor rate or rates which derive their origin from the statute of Elizabeth. Passages were read from the judgment of SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R., and from that of ROMER, L.J. I will cite a few lines from the latter. At the beginning of his judgment, ROMER, L.J., says ([1904] 1 K.B. 316):

"... having heard the case fully argued, and on examination of the various Acts on which the question depends, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the words of those Acts [relating to water-rate] sufficiently strong to justify the court in saying that the charge in respect of all houses in the borough for water supplied for domestic purposes must be at an equal rate in the pound . . . I cannot find in that Act [the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847,] anything sufficiently clear to indicate that, whenever what is called a 'water rate' has to be paid in respect of dwelling-houses in a district, the amount of the charge must be arrived at by taking an equal percentage on the values of all such houses."

That was a case in which complaint was made because some premises had been charged 7½ per cent. on the rateable value and others five per cent. It was held that it was within the powers of the authority so to differentiate and that neither the word "rate" nor the phrase "water rate" imported any necessary implication of uniformity. That really has not been, as the argument has turned out, the issue in this case. In the absence of this so-called equity, it is conceded by both the learned counsel in this case that s. 126 would authorise such rates as have been levied as water rates in this case. Can it, therefore, be said, having regard to the transactions, the history of which I have described from 1898 onwards, resulting, as they have and must have done, in the parishes of Brampton and the other three parishes now getting a water supply for the most part—for I do not forget that some at any rate derive their supply from Glazier Spring—which is far less expensive to the authority than is the supply to the other parishes, and when regard is had to this special levy made on the parishes in 1908 to recover the cost of the laying of the pipes, that the rural authority cannot be permitted by these courts to take advantage of its powers otherwise than by limiting the water rate in the case of Brampton and the other three parishes to a figure relating to maintenance only?

I can well understand the feeling of grievance which has given rise to these proceedings, but it does not seem to me that the grievance can create any equity such as this court can comprehend or will enforce. This is merely a matter of discretion for the authority, and there is nothing, to my mind, which compels it to do otherwise than it has done. If the ratepayer and his colleagues have a grievance, he is not without remedy by virtue of the provisions of s. 40 of the Act of 1945, though I am not suggesting that, if he makes application, the Minister will hearken to his prayer. On that I express no view whatever. I am satisfied that there is here no such equity as these courts can comprehend and enforce. A

By way of subsidiary argument it was said the word "supply" in the phrase "who supply water" in s. 126 means on the facts of this case, and means only, or covers only, the maintenance of the pipes and other apparatus. If that is so, the only charge they can make "in respect thereof" is the charge in respect of maintenance, but, with all respect to counsel's plea, I cannot see that this water, emanating, as it does, from the Geltsdale Springs, which the council secured as the result of the statute, is any the less a supply by the local authority in accordance with its statutory duty merely because it is alleged that it now costs nothing beyond the cost of maintaining the pipes. I cannot on that ground, any more than on the other, persuade myself that the powers which have been exercised under s. 126 have been wrongly exercised. For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that the view of the learned judge cannot be supported in law, and that the appeal ought to be allowed. I gather that no question arises on the particulars, and the result will be to substitute for the figure of £9 10s. 10d., for which the learned judge gave judgment, the figure claimed in the particulars of claim of £18 13s. 0d. B C

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that this case turns primarily on the construction of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 126. Though it is unnecessary to decide it, I think it is fairly plain on the face of that section that one of the reasons why it and its predecessor or predecessors were necessary was that statutory authority was needed to enable local authorities supplying water, possibly to charge at all, but certainly to charge on the basis which is first provided for, namely, by an assessment on the net annual value of the premises. If that had been sought to be done without statutory authority, one can well understand an argument: "No, you cannot charge for water like this. You will have to show how much water has been consumed in these premises and charge accordingly." Section 126 (1), therefore, with the proviso, seems to be directed, and also sub-s. (2), to the manner in which water may be charged for, and does not seem to make any reference to the considerations which are to be taken into account or the considerations which should not be taken into account in arriving at the rate or other charge which the local authority seek to impose. D E

At one time in the course of the argument, I was inclined to think that the provisions in s. 308 dealing with expenses incurred in connection with the supply of water which fell to be treated as special expenses chargeable on that contributory place might be relevant to the construction of s. 126. It might at least, it seemed to me, have been suggested that, that being the principle with regard to expenses which fall on the general rates, a local authority, in fixing its water rate, ought to have regard to the cost of supplying water not to individual houses, but to any particular contributory place. Counsel for the ratepayer did not contend for that construction, and, indeed, owing to the fact that s. 308 has been replaced by s. 6 of the Act of 1944 which has been already cited, the question is, perhaps, an academic one. On the whole, I have come to a different conclusion from that which I suggested in argument. I think, without throwing any doubt on the power of a local authority to make differential water rates, it might well be said that the general scheme or policy contemplated by the two sections was that the water rate should be, broadly speaking, uniform, or fairly uniform, if I may put it in that way, any special differences in costs as F G H between different contributory places being left to be dealt with, not by using the power to make a differential water rate, but by using the power to charge special expenses under s. 308. But, as I have said, and as has been stated by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, that provision in s. 308 has now been replaced, in respect of that part of it with which we are concerned, by s. 6 of the Act of 1944. I think that that section places a difficulty, which did not exist before, in the way of the argument of counsel for the ratepayer that we must here find some right or equity which would enable these parishes which are specially favoured, in the sense that their water costs less than others, to get the advantage of that financial position. I think that s. 6 of the Act of 1944 indicates a policy in this area of legislation—again without throwing any doubt on the power to levy a differential rate—that in these rural areas the costs should be spread rather than dealt with parish by parish or contributory place by contributory place. Parliament having embodied that policy in that section, so far as expenses falling on the general rates are concerned, I should have thought it weakened any argument of the kind that counsel seeks to put forward in respect of the favourable position of these parishes. I also think there is great force, and I do not want to add anything to what has been said, with regard to the effect of the argument on s. 126 (4) of the Act of 1936 and s. 40 of the Act of 1945.

I would like to add a word in conclusion on the passage which counsel for the ratepayer relied on in MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, and the case to which he referred us. There are cases which show that in certain circumstances, although the word “may” is used, if the act which the authority, or whoever it may be, is given power to do is not done, process is made available to compel it to be done. The case most often quoted is Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (2), but the case to which counsel for the ratepayer drew attention was R. v. Barlow and Jeans (3) which is the authority for this sentence in MAXWELL, 9th ed., p. 250:

“But an enactment that churchwardens ‘may’ make a rate for the reimbursement of constables . . . is no mere permission to do such acts, with a corresponding liberty to abstain from doing them.”

I have altered what he writes to some extent because he deals with other cases, but that is how he describes the effect of that case and those cases. He says: “A duty is at the same time cast upon the persons empowered.” The defendants were churchwardens of the parish of St. Warburgh in Derby. They were required to make a rate for the reimbursement of constables. The court is quoted as saying (Carth. 293):

“But the court would not quash the indictment, because the defendants were blameable, it being very reasonable that the constables should be reimbursed; and, therefore, as to the first objection, viz., the inequality of the charges of the several parishes, it shall be taken reddendo singula singulis. And as to the other objection, that the words of the statute are, that they may make a rate, and so ’tis at their election, whether they will make one or not: per curiam, where a statute saith, that such a thing may be done, ’tis always understood it must be done.”

That last sentence obviously goes beyond what has been laid down. It is sufficient to say of this case that I can see no analogy between the discretion conferred on a local authority in deciding what water rate to levy and the case where a statute clearly intended that constables should be reimbursed and those who had the power to put in operation the machinery which enabled them to be reimbursed were refusing to do so. I do not think counsel for the defendants succeeds in bringing his clients within the principle which was acted on in that case. For these reasons, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, J.: The ground has been so fully covered by the judgments which have been delivered by my Lords that I hope I shall not be thought guilty of any disrespect to the learned county court judge if I do not add anything. I agree that the appeal should be allowed for the reasons given.

CHELL ENGINEERING LTD. v. UNIT TOOL AND ENGINEERING CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Denning, L.JJ.), January 23, 24, 1950.]

Costs—Claim—Counterclaim—Recovery by plaintiff of larger sum on claim than that recovered by defendant on counterclaim—Form of judgment—Amount of costs recoverable by plaintiff.

The plaintiffs claimed £909 9s. 6d. for work done under a contract between them and the defendants who denied liability and counterclaimed for damages for breach of the contract. Eight days before the day fixed for hearing the defendants paid £250 into court in full satisfaction of the claim, but the plaintiffs (who were not notified of this within the prescribed seven days) did not take this sum out of court and the action was heard. The commissioner of assize awarded the plaintiffs £350 on the claim, gave the defendants £300 1s. 9d. on the counterclaim, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the balance, £49 18s. 3d.

HELD: (i) the sum awarded to the defendants was for damages for breach of contract and should not be treated as a set off against the award to the plaintiffs.

Stooke v. Taylor (1880) (5 Q.B.D. 569), applied.

(ii) where a plaintiff succeeds on his claim and the defendant succeeds on his counterclaim the more convenient course is not to enter judgment for the balance in favour of the party entitled thereto, but to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount for which he succeeds on the claim and to enter judgment for the defendant for the amount for which he succeeds on the counterclaim. In the ordinary course, if there are costs on both claim and counterclaim, each party is entitled to the costs which he has had to incur to recover the sum recovered on the claim and counterclaim respectively.

(iii) the payment of £250 into court did not exceed the amount awarded to the plaintiffs, and the fact that it exceeded the balance of £49 18s. 3d. did not deprive the plaintiffs of costs after the date of the payment into court.

A APPEAL by the plaintiffs against an order for costs following judgment delivered on May 3, 1949, in an action on contract tried before Mr. Commissioner GENTLE, K.C., at Manchester Assizes.

The commissioner found that both the claim by the plaintiffs and a counter-claim by the defendants succeeded. He awarded the plaintiffs £350 on the claim and the defendants £300 ls. 9d. on the counterclaim, and, deducting one sum from the other, gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £49 18s. 3d., the balance, with costs. He also gave the defendants costs on a recoverability of £300 ls. 9d. It was contended that, as the plaintiffs had recovered less than £100 in the High Court in an action founded on contract, by the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 47 (1) (b) (i), they were only entitled to county court costs on scale B, and, further, that, as the defendants had paid into court the sum of £250 in satisfaction and only £49 18s. 3d. had been recovered, the plaintiffs were not entitled to costs after the date of payment into court. Leave to appeal against the order as to costs was granted by ORMEROD, J. The Court of Appeal, in allowing the appeal, held that the plaintiffs were entitled to High Court costs on their claim, including costs after the payment into court.

D Henry Burton for the plaintiffs.
Leslie Rigg for the defendants.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask SINGLETON, L.J., to give the first judgment.

E SINGLETON, L.J.: The plaintiffs sued for a sum of money being the balance of an account for work done by them as manufacturers of press tools. They claimed £909 9s. 6d., admitting that they had received from the defendants a payment of £550 on account of a total sum of over £1,400. The defendants denied that they were indebted to the plaintiffs and counterclaimed for damages for delay, work not properly done, etc. Claim and counterclaim were heard together, and Mr. Commissioner GENTLE found in favour of the plaintiffs on their claim for £350 and in favour of the defendants for £300 ls. 9d.

F He said that the defendants were entitled to set off the £300 ls. 9d. against the £350, leaving a net balance of £49 18s. 3d. in the plaintiffs' favour, for which there would be judgment with costs, and there would be judgment for the defendants on their counterclaim, with costs upon a recoverability of £300 18s. 3d., which would include all items referable to the counterclaim.

G Counsel for the plaintiffs asked for judgment on the claim for £350 and costs. The commissioner said: "No. £49 is all that is recovered." A discussion took place in which counsel pointed out that judgment for £49 would only carry county court costs, and the commissioner said: "I have given the costs, whatever they may be, on the amount recovered." Counsel for the defendants submitted that the proper order was that the plaintiffs should recover on the claim with county court costs on scale B. The commissioner said: "No special order. Just costs." In the result the order was drawn up in this way, after the recitals:

"It is adjudged that the plaintiffs recover against the defendants on the claim £49 18s. 3d. and their costs of the claim up to Mar. 17, 1949, to be taxed, and that the defendants recover against the plaintiffs their costs of the counterclaim with a recoverability of £300 0s. 0d. excluding the costs, if any, on the issues arising in paragraphs 10 and 12 of the counter-claim, to be taxed, and that the defendants further recover against the plaintiffs their costs on the claim subsequent to March 17, 1949 to be taxed."

There is a question as to costs before and after Mar. 17, 1949, arising out of the payment into court by the defendants to which I will refer later. This appeal is directed solely to the order as to costs, and leave was given by ORMEROD, J. Both sides regard the order as confining the rights of the plaintiffs to county court costs in so far as they were entitled to any costs. The defendants contended that the order meant that the commissioner had determined to penalise the plaintiffs in that way for some reason or other. I need only say as to that that the commissioner did not at any time say that he intended to penalise the plaintiffs. All that he said was: "No special order as to costs." In other words, he left the law to take its course.

The first thing to determine is what was the nature of the counterclaim? Counsel for the defendants submitted that it was a set-off, or that, in any event, the defendants were entitled to treat it as a set-off. It appears clear that the sums which were recovered by way of counterclaim were awarded as damages and that they were recovered on a counterclaim and in no other way. It is true that at the end of the defence and counterclaim it is pleaded that the defendants "claim to set-off an equal sum parcel thereof against the amount (if any) found due" to the plaintiffs, but the counterclaim ended by counter-claiming damages. The question of counterclaim is dealt with in R.S.C., Ord. 21, r. 17, which provides:

"Where in any action a set-off or counterclaim is established as a defence against the plaintiff's claim, the court or a judge may, if the balance is in favour of the defendant, give judgment for the defendant for such balance, or may otherwise adjudge to the defendant such relief as he may be entitled to upon the merits of the case."

The notes in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, p. 410, set out the practice:

"After the Judicature Act came into operation, it was the practice when the plaintiff recovered a sum of money on his claim and the defendant on his counterclaim, to enter one judgment only for the balance . . . This rule is still adopted in some cases. But the court may give the plaintiff judgment on the claim for £—— and costs of the claim, and the defendant judgment on the counterclaim for £—— and the costs of the counterclaim. And this course was approved by the Court of Appeal in Provincial Bill Posting Co. v. Low Moor Iron Co. (1) . . . In the case of a pure set-off . . . it is still proper to enter judgment solely for the balance."

I have always thought that where there is a claim and a counterclaim and the plaintiff succeeds on the claim and the defendant on the counterclaim the more convenient course is to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount for which he succeeds on the claim and to enter judgment for the defendant for the amount for which he succeeds on the counterclaim, and in the ordinary course, if there are costs both on the claim and on the counterclaim, each party is entitled to the costs which he has had to incur to recover the sum recovered on the claim and on the counterclaim respectively.

It should be made clear that on this appeal we are dealing with a counterclaim only, and no question of set-off arises. That distinction has been pointed out many times. It was dealt with very fully in Stooke v. Taylor (2), in the judgment of SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., and in the judgment of MANISTY, J., who said (5 Q.B.D. 587):

"A counterclaim, properly so called, is the creature of the Judicature Act, 1873. It is an independent suit, which, for the sake of convenience of procedure may be tried at the same time as the claim (see per BRETT, L.J., in Winterfield v. Bradnum (3)). It differs essentially from a pure set-off.

Assuming a plaintiff to have a good claim, founded either in contract or tort, for a sum exceeding £50 he cannot, by giving credit for an amount not the subject of set-off, but which can only be recovered by way of counterclaim or cross action, get relief in a county court—therefore, notwithstanding the defendant by a counterclaim recovers a sum which, when the verdicts on the claim and counterclaim come to be set-off one against the other, leaves a balance due to the plaintiff of less than £20 or £10 as the case may be, and for which he obtains judgment, still the plaintiff is entitled to his costs of and relating to his claim, and why ? because he has recovered by verdict (see s. 5 of the County Court Act, 1867) more than £20 or £10, as the case may be; and in like manner the defendant in such case is entitled to his costs of and relating to his counterclaim.”

B Later he said (ibid., 591):

“I am at a loss to see any principle upon which such a result could be justified. Take the case of a plaintiff bringing an action for goods sold and delivered, in which he gets a verdict for, say, £100, and the defendant counterclaims for a libel and gets a verdict for, say, £105, so that judgment would be given for the defendant for £5. If the defendant’s contention in the present case be right, the defendant in the supposed case would be entitled to his costs, but the plaintiff would not be entitled to any. Surely that would not be just, and I do not believe it is the law.”

C

That case was followed nearly 30 years later by Provincial Bill Posting Company v. Low Moor Iron Company (1), where KENNEDY, L.J., said this ([1909] 2 K.B. 351):

D

“Now, however, a counterclaim may in ordinary cases be established, and if it exceeds the amount recovered on the claim the court has power to give judgment for the defendant for the balance, if it thinks it right to do so; and similarly judgment for the balance may be given for the plaintiff if the amount recovered on the claim exceeds that recovered on the counterclaim. But the court must consider in each case whether it would be right to give judgment for the balance, and if it would not be reasonable or right to deal with the claim and counterclaim by a judgment for the balance, then judgment should be given for the plaintiff on the claim and for the defendant on the counterclaim, costs following in each case.”

F

I respectfully point out that if judgment is given for the plaintiff for the amount to which he is entitled on the claim with costs and judgment is given for the defendant for the amount to which he is entitled on the counterclaim with costs—if the court thinks it right to give costs in each case—questions such as arise on the present appeal would be avoided. This dispute arises in part out of a misunderstanding as to the meaning of s. 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934. That section provides:

G

“(1) Where an action is commenced in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court, then, subject to the provisions of sub-s. (3) and sub-s. (4) of this section . . . (b) if the plaintiff recovers—(i) in the case of an action founded on contract, a sum of £40 or upwards but less than £100 . . . he shall not be entitled to any more costs of the action than those to which he would have been entitled if the action had been brought in a county court.”

H

Bearing in mind the difference between set-off and counterclaim and that this was an action in which the judge held that work done by the plaintiffs merited a payment of £900 and, £550 having been paid to them, they were entitled to a balance of £350, I think it is clear that the action could not have been commenced in the county court. In giving judgment for the balance of £49 the commissioner was allowing against the plaintiffs’ claim the sum awarded on the counterclaim. It becomes apparent that it is usually better that the judgment should be in the form to which I have been accustomed, namely, judgment for the plaintiff for so much on the claim with costs and for the defendant for so much on the counterclaim with costs. The order can include a provision for mutual set-off as to claims and costs. That course prevents an involved argument about the difference between set-off and counterclaim. This claim could not have been commenced in the county court, and, therefore, in my view, s. 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934, does not apply at all. The parties thought it did apply, and if they had gone before the district registrar to tax I have no doubt that it would have been said that taxation must be on scale B in the county court. The plaintiffs' costs on taxation might have been £20 or £30 on their claim, whereas under the order as drawn the defendants' costs as taxed might well have amounted to several hundred pounds. I do not think it is certain that the learned commissioner intended that result. He left the law to take its course, and it seems to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs on the High Court scale.

If my reading of s. 47 is wrong, I still think that the commissioner has not found anything which would disentitle the plaintiffs to their costs on the High Court scale. I do not forget for one moment that the question of costs is within the discretion of the trial judge under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1. If the commissioner had exercised his discretion with regard to these costs for good cause I should not have thought that this court ought to interfere, but, as the matter stands, I see no reason why the plaintiffs should not be entitled to High Court costs.

That leaves one matter outstanding, the payment into court by the defendants of the sum of £250. The action should have been tried at some earlier date than it was in fact heard. It was adjourned by consent to a later date, and on Mar. 15 the defendants paid into court the sum of £250. This is the form of their notice:

"Take notice that the defendants, Unit Tool & Engineering Co. Ltd., have paid into court £250 and say that sum is enough to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim."

That sum was not sufficient to satisfy the claim. After the commissioner had expressed his view as to the manner in which costs should be dealt with, counsel for the defendants said:

"There is a sum of money in court, £250, which we paid in on Mar. 15. As I apprehend it, the effect of that will be payment out of the balance to the defendants, and that the plaintiffs' order on costs in any event shall only run down to the date of payment in, and that the defendants should have the whole costs of the action after payment in. That is the ordinary and customary order.

Mr. Commissioner GENTLE: I was not aware that there was any money in court.

Counsel for the defendants: There is £250 in court, and, that must vary your lordship's order as to costs to that extent."

I think it is a matter for regret that if the commissioner was to be asked to make an order of that kind reference was not made to the rules. It cannot be the ordinary and customary order, if plaintiffs on their claim have recovered £350 and only £250 has been paid into court, that the defendants should have the whole of their costs of the action after payment in. It was only after deducting the amount awarded on the counterclaim that there was £49 odd payable to the plaintiffs. In my view, the payment into court was not a payment with regard to the counterclaim at all. The payment in was made in respect of the plaintiffs' claim. If the plaintiffs had taken that sum out of court, they would not have been entitled to payment of the £350 which they were awarded. They could only take the amount out in respect of the claim. Therefore, to my mind, the payment into court of £250 ought not to affect the plaintiffs' costs at all.

In the result, this appeal ought to be allowed. I am not sure that it is necessary to quash the whole of the order as to the plaintiffs' costs, but certainly I think this court ought to make clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to costs on the claim on the High Court scale. Over and above that there must clearly be struck out of the order the words which limit the plaintiffs' costs to Mar. 15 and give the defendants' costs on the claim after Mar. 15 because of the payment into court. It seems to me, further, that the plaintiffs were bound to come to this court to make the matter clear on both points, and that, therefore, they should have the costs of this appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The distinction between a counterclaim and a set-off is rarely of importance nowadays, but it does happen to be so in this case because the costs depend on it. The claim was for a sum due under a contract for work and labour; the counterclaim was for damages for breach of that contract. In such cases in the old days the court often allowed a defendant to set up the damages in reduction of the price (Mandel v. Steel (4)), but the damages were, and are, in strictness, not set-off, but counterclaim only: Davis v. Hedges (5) and Stooke v. Taylor (2). It follows that in this case the claim could not have been brought in the county court because the plaintiffs recovered £350 on it. It is true that, by reason of the counterclaim, the judge gave judgment for the balance of £49 18s. 3d. only, but still the claim could not have been brought in the county court, and there is nothing in s. 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934, to prevent the plaintiffs recovering High Court costs. So, on the judgment as it stands the plaintiffs are entitled on the claim to High Court costs. The defendants paid £250 into court in regard to the claim. That did not exceed the amount recovered, which was £350. It is true that the £250 exceeded the amount of the balance judgment for £49 18s. 3d., but that is not sufficient to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs on the claim. The counterclaim is a separate matter, as is shown by the fact that if the plaintiffs had taken out the £250 the defendants could still have gone on with the counterclaim. I agree, therefore, that the plaintiffs should have their costs on the claim on the High Court scale throughout even after the payment into court.

I would only add that in most of these cases it is desirable that a judge should consider whether a special order should be made as to costs because the issues are often very much interlocked, and the usual order of "judgment for plaintiff on claim with costs and for defendant on counterclaim with costs" does not always give a just result.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree. The only difficulty I have felt in the case is whether we were being asked to disturb an order based on the discretion of the judge. If I had thought that the commissioner intended to limit the plaintiffs' costs to county court costs, that would have been such a disturbance, but it seems to me clear that the commissioner never intended that. I think that the commissioner had s. 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934, somewhat imperfectly in his mind and was not clear whether this was a case which could have been brought in the county court or not, so he left the matter at large. For the reasons which have been given in the judgments already delivered I agree that this is not a case which could have been commenced in the county court. Therefore, I think the ordinary order should follow, that the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs on the High Court scale, and that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs. Order as to costs varied. Plaintiffs to have costs on their claim on the High Court scale even after the payment of £250 into court by the respondents on Mar. 15, 1949.

A landowner, who owned a farm and was assessed on the whole of it under sched. A., granted to a company a lease of part of the farm, together with the right to take stone, sand and gravel therein and thereunder in consideration of a fixed rent of £10 a year, which was to merge in royalties payable for the stone, sand and gravel gotten. During the tax years 1942/43, 1943/44 and 1944/45, the company deducted tax at the standard rate from royalties due (apparently under the impression that this was authorised by s. 21 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1934) sending to the landowner monthly credit notes accompanied by cheques for the net amount and certificates of deduction of tax. Deductions from a part of the royalties for the year 1942/43 were acquiesced in by the landowner and accounted for by the company to the revenue authorities. As regards the rest of the royalties for the year 1942/43 and all royalties for the years 1943/44 and 1944/45, the landowner accepted the credit notes and certificates of deduction and cashed the cheques, but before the tax so deducted had been paid over to the revenue authorities he disputed the deductions. The company, nevertheless, paid the deductions to the revenue. When the decision in Russell v. Scott ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1) was given by the House of Lords it became apparent that the tax was not deductible under s. 21 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1934, and the landowner claimed from the company the amount of the royalties underpaid by reason of the alleged deduction of tax. For the company it was contended that (i) the jurisdiction of the court was excluded by r. 22 (1) of the All Schedules Rules under the Income Tax Act, 1918; (ii) the deductions were authorised by s. 21 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1934, or by s. 15 or s. 17 of the Finance Act, 1940.

HELD: (i) r. 22 only applied where a deduction could legally be made, but the amount was in dispute.

(ii) the words “the rent” in s. 21 (1) (b) of the Act of 1934 did not include royalties, but was confined to the fixed rent which, in the present case, never became payable because it merged in the royalties.

(iii) although s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1940 applied to the present case, thereby excluding it from the provisions of s. 17, this did not entitle the company to make the deductions since, by virtue of r. 1 of the Miscellaneous Rules Applicable to Sched. D., r. 1, and the Rules Applicable to Case VI of Sched. D., assessments under s. 15 (1) had to be made on the recipient of the royalties, i.e., the landowner.

(iv) as regards the part of the 1942/43 royalties for tax on which the company had accounted to the revenue authorities before the landowner objected to the deduction, the landowner was estopped from denying that tax had been properly deducted, but, as regards the later deductions to which he had objected before the company had accounted to the revenue authorities, there was no estoppel, nor did the acts of the landowner in receiving the credit notes, cashing the cheques and accepting the certificates of deduction constitute a settlement of account or accord and satisfaction so as to modify the terms of the original agreement to pay the royalties in full, and the landowner was entitled to claim from the company the amount of the royalties underpaid.

ACTION by the owner of land to recover from a company, to which part of the land had been leased for getting sand, stone and gravel, amounts of royalties in respect of sand gotten underpaid by reason of the company having purported to deduct tax from the sums due. The company had accounted to the revenue authorities for the tax so deducted by submitting to assessments of its trading profits without claiming deduction of the amount of the royalties as a trading expense, and, since such assessments had become final and conclusive, the company had no means of recovering from the authorities the tax so accounted for. ROXBURGH, J., held that tax was not deductible from the royalties under any provisions of the Income Tax Acts, but that the landowner was estopped from recovering such amounts from the company where he had allowed the deduction without protest before the assessment on the company became final and conclusive. The facts appear in the judgment.

Jan. 20. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. In 1942 a subsidiary of the defendant company obtained a contract for the construction of a runway at an aerodrome at Brawdy, Pembrokeshire, and for that purpose required suitable material for making up the surface under the foundations of the runway and also sand and gravel for making concrete and cement. Such material was available in the neighbourhood, and, in particular, under the plaintiff's farm. Accordingly, on Nov. 24, 1942, the company entered into an agreement with the plaintiff of which the following were the most important terms:

"1. The landlord demises unto the tenants first all those pieces or parcels of land part of the farm known as Brawdy Farm . . . and all the stone sand and gravel in and under such pieces of land and secondly the rights and privileges hereinafter mentioned to hold unto the tenants for the term of two years from Nov. 14, 1942, yielding and paying therefor the rents and royalties hereinafter reserved and subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

"2. The tenants shall and may at all times during the said term work and get from or out of the said lands so much stone sand and gravel as they shall think fit.

" 3. The tenants may from time to time during the said term (a) lay place and stack on or upon any convenient part of the said lands all or any of the stone sand and gravel to be gotten under the powers hereof and all earth and rubbish which shall be gotten thrown up or collected in carrying on the works hereby authorised (b) carry and convey away all such stone sand gravel earth and rubbish as aforesaid and all materials used in or about the said works (c) remove any hedges that may be necessary.

" 4. The following rents and royalties are hereby reserved in respect of the premises hereby demised and shall be paid by the tenants to the landlord namely (a) The yearly rent of £10 to be paid during the term hereby granted by equal half yearly payments on Nov. 14 and May 14 in every year the first of such payments to be made on May 14 next such yearly rent to merge in the royalties hereinafter mentioned (b) The royalties of 1/6d. per cubic yard for sand and gravel and 1/- per cubic yard for stone which shall or may be gotten from or out of the said lands in any year of the said term to be paid half yearly on Nov. 14 and May 14 in every year in respect of stone sand and gravel gotten as aforesaid during the then preceding half year.

" 5. The tenants hereby agree with the landlord in manner following namely . . . (c) To cause the weight or measurements of all materials got by virtue of this agreement to be duly ascertained to the satisfaction of the landlord or his surveyor or agent and not to remove or suffer to be removed any of the same from the said lands without the weight or measurement thereof being so ascertained (d) To keep or cause to be kept on the said lands or at some other place approved by the landlord proper books of account wherein shall be entered the quantities of all materials got by virtue of this agreement with the dates of production and all such particulars as may in the opinion of the landlord be necessary or convenient for ascertaining the amount of the royalties to be paid hereunder and to permit the landlord or his surveyor or agent at all reasonable times to inspect the said books of account and to take copies thereof or extracts therefrom And within fourteen days after each of the rent days hereinbefore specified to make out and deliver to the landlord or his surveyor or agent a sufficient abstract of the said books of account of the royalties then payable."

In December, 1942, the company or their subsidiary entered with one or more bulldozers and excavators. The bulldozer cleared the ground, which was pasture, and removed the top soil. The excavator scooped out sand and gravel to a depth which at one point may have been as much as forty feet, but averaged ten to sixteen feet. The excavator also scooped out dirty gravel and lumpy agglomerations of pebbles and sand lying in faults in the gravel face. This was suitable for making up the surface under the foundations and was so used. It was described by the company and paid for as "stone," though the plaintiff calls it "hoggin." It certainly was not stone in the ordinary sense and was of no use except for making up a surface or some like purpose. There was stone in the usual sense (sandstone or limestone) beneath the seams of sand and gravel under the demised premises, but this was never worked. In this judgment I use the word "stone" in the usual sense, and do not mean "hoggin."

G

The plaintiff exercised no supervision over the company's activities at the pit and had no representative on the spot either to check quantities or for any other purpose. In view of an argument which has been addressed to me, I must point out that the fixed rent merged in the royalties and never became payable. The company, early in April, 1943, sent to the plaintiff's solicitors what they called a "credit note" for royalties for the period December, 1942, to March, 1943, which read:

H

" Credit note. T. H. Gwyther Esq., Brawdy Farm. By royalty on sand and gravel during period December, 1942, to March, 1943: 7,451 cubic yards at 1/6d. cubic yard, £558 16s. 6d., less tax at 10/- in the £, £279 8s. 3d."

A A cheque for the balance, £279 8s. 3d. was enclosed, but there was a discussion about the appropriate payee, and ultimately this cheque was cancelled and another substituted. These were the only royalties attributable to the financial year ending Apr. 5, 1943. In May, 1943, the company sent a "credit note" for the month of April and a cheque for £227 10s. 3d. On May 17, 1943, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the company's secretary:

B "We thank you for cheque received this morning for £227 10s. 3d. payable to the [plaintiff] together with credit note. We have passed this on to Mr. Gwyther and assume that you require no other acknowledgement. In view of the large amount of the tax deducted however we think you should furnish us on behalf of our client with a proper certificate of deduction and perhaps we may have this in course of post."

On June 4 the company sent the substituted cheque for £279 8s. 3d., and on June 15 sent certificates of deduction of tax in respect of the two periods. One of the certificates, which are in common form, reads

C "I certify that on paying to T. H. Gwyther Esq., Brawdy Farm, the sum mentioned in the third column of the statement overleaf, I deducted the amount of income tax shown in the fourth column of the statement and I further certify that this tax has been or will be paid by me either personally to the proper officer for the receipt of taxes or by way of deduction from rent or other income when received by me."

D It is signed by the secretary of the company, dated June 15, 1943, and on the back there is:

"Royalty on sand and gravel, Brawdy Farm, £558 16s. 6d. Amount of income tax deducted by me: £279 8s. 3d. Period: December, 1942, to March, 1943."

E In each case the certificates were sent at the request of the plaintiff's solicitors. There is no other correspondence about remittances. Thereafter, until March, 1944, the company sent monthly "credit notes" accompanied by cheques and certificates of deduction of tax, but without any covering letter. On Aug. 3, 1944, they sent a "credit note," cheque and certificate of deduction of tax for the period from April to June, 1944, and on Sept. 5, 1944, they sent a final "credit note," cheque and certificate for July, 1944, when the workings stopped. In all, £1,883 11s. 3d. was paid and £1,883 11s. 3d. was deducted. The plaintiff endorsed the cheques and received payment and also received and retained the "credit notes" and certificates. He gave no receipts. At an early stage he made some remark to one of the company's employees questioning the deduction of tax, but he carried the matter no further at that time.

G This pit was, undoubtedly, a sand and gravel pit and not a stone quarry, and the decision of the House of Lords in Russell v. Scott (1) (which was not, however, given until 1948) makes it clear that these royalties were not taxable under sched. A, No. III, to the Income Tax Act, 1918, the properties referred to in which were rendered chargeable under sched. D, Case I, by s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1926, but there is no doubt that throughout both the company and the inspector of taxes proceeded on the assumption that they were, and, accordingly, they dealt with the income tax position as follows. The gross amount of the royalties was £3,767 2s. 6d., which was in the company's accounts distributed over three years as follows: Year ending Mar. 31, 1943, £558 16s. 6d.; year ending Mar. 31, 1944, £2,628 5s. 6d.; year ending Mar. 31, 1945, £580 0s. 6d.; making a total of £3,767 2s. 6d. The deductions made by the company amounted to £1,883 11s. 3d., and they were paid or accounted for to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as follows. The deduction from the royalties for the period from December, 1942, to March, 1943, amounting to £279 8s. 3d., was accounted for in the assessment made on the company's trading profits for the tax year 1943/1944 which became final in May, 1944. No further part of the deductions made by the company had been made or accounted for to the commissioners when, on Feb. 27, 1945, the plaintiff, through his solicitors, unequivocally objected to them.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to correspondence between the plaintiff's solicitors and those of the company in which the former, by a letter dated Feb. 27, 1945, contended that the company was not legally entitled to make the deductions, and continued:] The company ignored the plaintiff's contentions and, without even bringing them to the notice of the inspector of taxes, proceeded to pay over or account for the balance of the deductions amounting to £1,604 3s. 0d. under various assessments which became final between the date of the plaintiff's objection and February, 1946. I have not overlooked the payment of tax in respect of the year 1944/1945 which was made in February, 1945 (shortly before the plaintiff's objection), but, as no final assessment for that year had then been made, any over-payment could then easily have been recovered.

The plaintiff's solicitors, having failed to obtain any effective answer to their letter of Feb. 27, 1945, [which contained a formal demand for the payment to the plaintiff in full of all sums due to him under the agreement] and, presumably, not suspecting that the company would pay over any more of the deductions to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the face of their objection, took no further action till Russell v. Scott (1) was finally decided, when, on Nov. 5, 1948, they issued the writ in this action.

The short effect of Russell v. Scott (1) was that the produce of sand and gravel pits, like the produce of the soil, was an element in the annual value of the land which had to be taken into account in raising an assessment under sched. A in accordance with No. I (which is the general rule for estimating the annual value of lands) and not otherwise, so that, in the present case the plaintiff, notwithstanding an agreement for letting, was and remained assessed to tax under sched. A on the whole of the farm, including the part let to the company. In Russell v. Scott (1) there was no actual letting of the land. I shall not lose sight of this distinction. The sched. A assessment on the farm took no account of war-time sources of profit in connection with the building of aerodromes, and, if the plaintiff succeeds in the present action, he looks like making a handsome tax-free war-time profit, but he is entitled to take advantage, if he can, of a rule described by LORD SIMON ([1948] 2 All E.R. 5) as "so obscure and so difficult to expound with confidence." The company have accounted for the whole of the deductions which they made to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and if (as they say) the commissioners will not refund in the event of the plaintiff's success, they will pay a heavy penalty for making a pardonable mistake in assembling the complex units of the tax-gathering machine, but the company paid over £1,604 3s. 0d. out of the total claimed in the teeth of the plaintiff's opposition.

The company's first defence is that the jurisdiction of the court is excluded by r. 22 of the All Schedules Rules under the Income Tax Act, 1918, which reads:

"(1) If a difference arises—(a) between tenant and landlord or any other persons with regard to the deduction on account of tax to be made from any annual sum . . . the general commissioners of the division shall settle the proportion of the payments or deductions to be made according to the provisions of this Act . . . (2) In any such case the determination of the general commissioners shall be final. (3) In this rule 'annual sum' means any . . . rent . . ."

In sundry official publications the word "the" has fallen out before the word "deduction." The issue in the present case is whether any deduction ought to have been made. Rule 22 seems to me to presuppose that some deduction ought to be made, only the amount being in dispute. There is nothing in Ecclesiastical Comrs. for England v. Sackville Estates, Ltd. (2) which is inconsistent with this view, and, in adopting it, I think that I am following the Scots case of Fife's (Duke) Trustees v. George Wimpey & Co. (3), in which LORD NORMAND (Lord President) said (1943, S.C. 384):

- A    "The Lord Ordinary has held that the jurisdiction of the court is not excluded by r. 22, and I agree with him and with the reasons which he gives for his conclusion. I shall only add that, in my opinion, r. 22 applies where an annual sum of the nature of rent falls to be paid and there is a dispute about 'deduction on account of tax to be made from it.' The general commissioners then have exclusive jurisdiction to 'settle the proportions of the payments or deductions to be made according to the provisions of the Act.' But, when the dispute is whether the sum due under a contract is an annual sum or the price due under a sale, the general commissioners have no jurisdiction under r. 22 until it is decided by the court that the sum due is an annual sum within the meaning of the section. The defenders relied on Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England v. Sackville Estates Ltd. (2), but in that case there was no dispute that the plaintiffs were owed rent by the defendants, and the dispute concerned the amount of deduction for tax which the defendants were bound to make."
- B
- C

The next defence is that the deductions were authorised by s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1934. The substantial parts of that section read:

- D    "(1) Where rent is payable in respect of any land the property in which is not separately assessed and charged under sched. A, or in respect of any easement, and—(a) the land or easement is used, occupied or enjoyed in connection with any of the concerns specified in rr. 1, 2 and 3 of No. III of sched. A; or (b) the lease or other agreement under which the rent is payable provides for the recoupment of the rent by way of reduction of royalties or payments of a similar nature in the event of the land or easement being used, occupied or enjoyed as aforesaid; the rent shall be charged with tax under sched. D and shall, subject to the provisions of this section, be treated for the purpose of such of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts as refer to royalties paid in respect of the user of a patent as if it were such a royalty . . . (4) For the purpose of this section—(a) the expression 'land' means lands, tenements, hereditaments and heritages; (b) the expression 'easement' includes any right, privilege or benefit in, over or derived from land; (c) the expression 'rent' includes a rent service, rent charge, fee farm rent, feu duty or other rent, toll, duty, royalty or annual or periodical payment in the nature of rent, whether payable in money or money's worth or otherwise, but does not include any of the payments enumerated in rr. 1 to 6 of No. II of sched. A. (5) Rule 5 of No. III of sched. A (which provides for the computation of the annual value of the produce of any such concern as aforesaid) shall cease to have effect."
- E
- F
- G

- H    The case cannot fall within sub-s. 1 (a) because this sand and gravel pit is not a concern specified in No. III of sched. A, but the rent is payable in respect of land the property in which is not separately assessed, and the letting certainly contains provisions to the effect mentioned in sub-s. (1) (b), for there is a right to quarry stone, though no stone was ever quarried. Accordingly, counsel for the company argued, "the rent" (which, by definition, includes royalties) falls to be dealt with as indicated in that sub-section. In spite of the definition clause, the words "the rent" in sub-s. (1) (b) cannot include royalties, because if "rent" there included royalties, it could not be recouped by reduction of royalties, and, since it is coupled with the opening words of s. 21 by the word "and," cannot differ from "the rent" first mentioned in the section, and, further, "the rent" which is mentioned after the semi-colon at the end of sub-s.

(1) (b) cannot differ from the rent first mentioned and last mentioned. Accordingly, in my judgment, s. 21 (1) (b) must be confined to the fixed rent which never became payable because it merged in the royalties. It is, of course, easy to apply the definition of "rent" in connection with (1) (a).

The next line of defence is based on s. 15 or, alternatively, s. 17 of the Finance Act, 1940. I have already pointed out that the landowner, who owned the farm and was assessed on the whole under sched. A and occupied most of it, let a small portion to the company together with the right to take stone, sand and gravel for a term of two years at a rent of £10 per annum which was to merge in the royalties, and, accordingly, this case differs from Russell v. Scott (1). Section 13 (1) of the Finance Act, 1940, provides:

"The next five succeeding sections apply only to land in the United Kingdom chargeable to tax under sched. A, and in this and the said next five succeeding sections the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say—'immediate lessor' means in relation to any premises—(a) if different parts of the premises are the subject of separate tenancies or separate occupations, a lessor of the whole or any part of the premises whose estate or interest extends to the entirety of the premises and is not subject, immediately or mediately, to a lease of the entirety thereof . . . 'lease' includes an agreement for a lease if the term to be covered by the lease has begun, and any tenancy, but does not include a mortgage, and 'lessee' and 'lessor' shall be construed accordingly and include, respectively, the successors in title of a lessee or a lessor; 'long lease' means a lease granted for a term exceeding fifty years, other than a lease which is or takes effect as a lease for a term of years determinable after the death or marriage of any person; 'short lease' means a lease which is not a long lease; 'unit of assessment' means any land which forms a unit of assessment for the purposes of sched. A."

Section 15 provides:

"(1) If, as respects any year of assessment, the immediate lessor of a unit of assessment is entitled in respect of the unit to any rent payable under a lease or leases to which this section applies, he shall be chargeable to tax under Case VI of sched. D in respect of the excess, if any, of the amount which would have been the amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection, if the annual value of the unit had been determined (in accordance, in whatever part of the United Kingdom the unit is situated, with the rules applicable to sched. A set out in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918) by reference to that rent and the other terms of the lease or leases, over whichever is the greater of—(a) the actual amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection; or (b) the amount of any rent payable by the immediate lessor in respect of the unit under any short lease or short leases. (2) Where the immediate lessor of any unit of assessment is occupying any part thereof, sub-s. (1) of this section shall apply as if the rent to which he is entitled in respect of the unit under any lease or leases to which this section applies were increased by so much of the annual value of the unit (as ascertained for the purposes of sched. A) as is attributable to the part which he is occupying. (3) Where for any year an assessment has been made on an immediate lessor by virtue of this section, the amount of any relief which may be claimed by him under r. 8 of No. V of sched. A shall be such amount as could have been claimed by him if the annual value of the unit had been determined in the manner described in sub-s. (1) of this section. (4) A lease shall be deemed to be a lease to which this section applies if, and only if, the following conditions are fulfilled with respect to it—(a) that it is a short lease; (b) that the land comprised in it is or forms part of a single unit of assessment; (c) that the rent under it is payable to the immediate lessor of that unit; (d) that the estate or interest of the immediate lessor of that unit is not, as respects any part of that unit, subject to any short lease which comprises also land not wholly within that unit, being a lease the rent under which is payable to that immediate lessor."

A In my judgment, that section applies to the present case, but it will not aid the company because assessments under s. 15 have to be made on the recipient of the excess rent under r. 1 of the Miscellaneous Rules Applicable to Sched. D, and the Rules Applicable to Case VI of Sched. D and, accordingly, a tenant cannot be assessed thereon and cannot make any deduction in respect thereof. Section 17 provides:

B " (1) This section applies to the following payments, that is to say—(a) rents under long leases; (b) other annual sums as defined in para. (2) of r. 4 of No. VIII of sched. A, not being rents under a short lease or annuities within the meaning of the Tithe Act, 1936, being payments falling due on or after April 6, 1940. (2) Rules 1 and 4 of No. VIII of sched. A shall not apply to any payment to which this section applies, but any such payment shall, so far as it does not fall under any other Case, be charged with tax under Case VI of sched. D and be treated for the purposes of such of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts as apply to royalties paid in respect of the user of a patent as if it were such a royalty."

C As I have held that the fixed rents and royalties are within s. 15, they are excluded from s. 17. I note in passing the absence from s. 15 of the important words in s. 17 (2), which enable the party paying the annual sums to make deductions.

I now come to the defence of estoppel. Here a distinction must be drawn between the deduction of £279 8s. 3d., which was the only deduction accounted for to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue before the plaintiff objected to the deductions, and the other deductions. The payment of £279 8s. 3d. and deduction of £279 8s. 3d. were effected through solicitors. The plaintiff's solicitors actually asked for a certificate of deduction of tax when accepting the payment on behalf of the plaintiff who cashed the cheque, and, in my judgment, thereby evinced an intention not to dispute the deduction. With hesitation I hold that (notwithstanding their later disregard of the plaintiff's views) the company acted on that indication of intention, and, if they did, the detriment is clear. As regards all the other deductions except one, the plaintiff did not ask for certificates of deduction, but merely accepted them and cashed the cheques, but I am still prepared to hold that he thereby evinced an intention not to dispute the deductions. The company did not act on these indications of intention, for when he changed his attitude they took no notice but went on as before. Moreover, they had not paid over these deductions (notionally or otherwise) to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue before the plaintiff had changed his attitude. The negotiations which they were then conducting with the inspector of taxes would have been necessary in any event, and there is no evidence that the plaintiff's delay in clarifying his position increased the cost of those negotiations. Accordingly, the company suffered no detriment as a result of the plaintiff's attitude. Some point has been made of the long period which elapsed between the formal demand on Feb. 27, 1945, and the issue of the writ, but the correspondence during 1945 closes with two unsuccessful attempts by the plaintiff's solicitors to get an answer to their letters, and the company, instead of answering the plaintiff's solicitors' letters and advising the inspector of taxes of the dispute, proceeded forthwith to allow themselves to become liable to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for part of the money in dispute and by February, 1946, had allowed themselves to become liable for the whole. The company were not influenced by the plaintiff's delays, but by their own over-confidence. Accordingly, in my judgment, there is no estoppel except as regards the first deduction of £279 8s. 3d.

It is further contended that the acts of the plaintiff in receiving the "credit notes," cashing the cheques and accepting the certificates of deduction, constituted a "settlement of account" or "accord and satisfaction." In my judgment, there was, and is, no question of account between the parties. The question at issue is one of principle, namely, whether the company were entitled by the Income Tax Acts to make any deductions from admitted sums. Moreover, in my view, the conception of a "settlement" is alien to a situation in which each party thought that he had no option and acted accordingly. Similar difficulties beset the conception of "accord and satisfaction." I have no doubt that the company made the deductions because they thought that they had a right to do so, and that the plaintiff only acquiesced as long as he thought that he was bound to do so. It is, in my judgment, impossible to spell a contractual relationship out of conduct dictated by such considerations and "accord and satisfaction" necessarily involve some contractual modification of the original bargain. I must hold that neither party intended to modify the terms of the letting or agreed to treat payment of half the royalties, together with delivery of a certificate of deduction of tax, as satisfaction for an obligation to pay the whole. Each acted independently in supposed compliance with income tax law, and so long as each took the same view of it, their actions were in harmony. Those circumstances no more constitute an agreement in law than would the circumstance that two opposing litigants concurred in carrying out an order of court which afterwards turned out not to bind them. Accordingly, all the defences fail, except the defence of estoppel in relation to the first deduction, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff for £1,604 3s. 0d.

BARKWAY v. SOUTH WALES TRANSPORT CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe), November 8, 9, 10, 14, 15, 16, 17, 1949, February 9, 1950.]

Negligence—Res ipsa loquitur—Highway—Omnibus—Accident due to tyre burst—Impact fracture of tyre—Supervision of condition of tyre—Duty of owners of vehicle—Breach of regulation—Right of action—Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 398), reg. 71.

The appellants' husband was killed while travelling as a passenger in the respondents' omnibus, which at the time of the accident was being driven at a speed of some twenty-five miles per hour in a "black-out." After the offside front tyre had burst, the omnibus veered across the road and fell over an embankment. Evidence was given that the cause of the bursting of the tyre was an impact fracture due to one or more heavy blows on the outside of the tyre leading to the disintegration of the inner parts. Such a fracture might occur without leaving any visible external mark, but a competent driver would be able to recognise the difference between a blow heavy enough to endanger the strength of the tyre and a lesser concussion. The appellant contended that in the circumstances the speed at which the omnibus was driven was excessive and caused it to be thrown off the road when the tyre burst, that the defect in the tyre would have been revealed had adequate steps been taken regularly to inspect it, and that the respondents were negligent in not requiring their drivers to report occurrences which might result in impact fractures. The respondents contended that they had a satisfactory system of tyre inspection, which took place twice a week, and that impact fractures were so rare as to be a negligible risk which the public using their vehicles must take.

HELD: (i) the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, which was no more than a rule of evidence affecting onus of proof of which the essence was that an event which, in the ordinary course of things, was more likely than not to have been caused by negligence, was by itself evidence of negligence, depended on the absence of explanation of an accident, but, although it was the duty of the respondents to give an adequate explanation, if the facts were sufficiently known the question ceased to be one where the facts spoke for themselves, and the solution must be found by determining whether or not on the established facts negligence was to be inferred.

(ii) it could not be said on the evidence that the speed at which the omnibus was being driven at the time of the tyre burst had any causal connection with the subsequent accident.

(iii) despite the statements of the respondents' witnesses that their system of tyre inspection was satisfactory and accorded with the practice of other omnibus companies, the evidence showed that the respondents had not taken all the steps they should have taken to protect passengers because they had not instructed their drivers to report heavy blows to tyres likely to cause impact fractures.

(iv) the cause of the accident was a defect of the tyre which might have been discovered by due diligence on the part of the respondents, and the respondents were liable although it was not possible to affirm that the fracture would have been discovered by the exercise of due diligence.

By the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1941, reg. 71: "All the tyres of a motor vehicle . . . shall at all times, while the vehicle . . . is used on a road be maintained in such condition as to be free from any defect which might in any way cause . . . danger to persons on or in the vehicle . . ."

HELD: this regulation gives no right of action to persons injured by a breach of it.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal (reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 460). The husband of the appellant was killed while travelling as a passenger in an omnibus belonging to the respondents. She claimed that the respondents were negligent because the omnibus was driven at an excessive speed during a "black out," and she also alleged that a tyre burst which resulted in the omnibus falling down an embankment was due to the faulty methods of tyre inspection adopted by the respondents. SELLERS, J., found that the respondents were guilty of negligence in their system of tyre maintenance and awarded the appellant £2,000 damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. That finding was reversed by the Court of Appeal where it was held by a majority (SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.JJ., BUCKNILL, L.J. dissenting) that the respondents by their evidence had displaced the presumption of negligence raised by the fact that the omnibus had fallen over the embankment and that they had exercised adequate and reasonable care in maintaining and inspecting the tyres and were not responsible for the defect which caused the accident. The House of Lords now allowed the appellant's appeal, set aside the majority judgment of the Court of Appeal, and ordered that the judgment of SELLERS, J., should be restored.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 9. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this appeal is from a judgment of the Court of Appeal reversing a decision of SELLERS, J., by which he found the respondents liable for negligence in bringing about the death of the appellant's husband and awarded her £2,000 damages. The members of the Court of Appeal themselves were not unanimous. BUCKNILL, L.J., was for dismissing the appeal whereas the majority allowed it. The negligence alleged against the respondents was that one of their omnibuses had met with an accident owing to their want of proper supervision of its tyres and owing to the excessive speed at which it was driven. The circumstances in which the accident occurred must be fully set out, but for the moment it is sufficient to point out that the majority thought no negligence had been established whereas BUCKNILL, L.J., agreed with SELLERS, J., that the respondents were negligent, though he does not appear to have arrived at this conclusion wholly on the same ground.

The respondents are a transport company, and had at the material time undertaken to carry workers from the Royal Ordnance factory at Pembury to Gorseinon by omnibus. The omnibus in question, a double-decker, was some twenty-six feet long, seven feet six inches wide, and weighed ten tons. On the early morning of Feb. 27, 1943, it was driven by one Lewis Enoch, and left Pembury for Gorseinon with a full load of passengers, fifty-three in number, of whom the appellant's husband was one. After it had travelled about five miles, the offside front tyre burst while the omnibus was passing through the village of Pwll. There was a loud explosion and the omnibus veered across the road to the offside footpath, tore down some iron railings, fell over an embankment, and lay on its off side in contact with a truck or trucks standing on the railway line below the road. Shortly after the explosion the burst tyre became deflated. Before it had done so the omnibus proceeded for some eighty-two feet and then, as a result of the rim cutting through the deflated tyre, caused marks on the road which continued for eighty-six feet, two inches. At that point it mounted the pavement and continued to travel on the edge of the embankment for a further eighty-two feet. In these circumstances the appellant claims that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies. Omnibuses, it is said, which are properly serviced, do not burst their tyres without cause, nor do they leave the road along which they are being driven. If the evidence stopped there, the statement is unexceptional. As was said by ERLE, C.J., in Scott v. London Dock Co. (1) (3 H. & C. 601):

"... where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care."

The doctrine is dependent on the absence of explanation, and, although it is the duty of the defendants, if they desire to protect themselves, to give an

- adequate explanation of the cause of the accident, yet, if the facts are sufficiently known, the question ceases to be one where the facts speak for themselves, and the solution is to be found by determining whether, on the facts as established, negligence is to be inferred or not. In the present case, the evidence given and accepted by SELLERS, J., was that the omnibus left Pembury works at 6.15 and the accident occurred not later than 6.30. The distance covered between the start from the works and the place of the accident was five miles, 220 yards, but the first  $1\frac{3}{4}$  miles was along a private, narrow and dangerous road and the remaining  $3\frac{3}{4}$  miles along a road which was somewhat narrow and winding and in poor condition. Over the earlier portion the prescribed and safe limit was ten miles an hour. Over the second portion the limit during blackout hours in wartime was twenty miles an hour. BUCKNILL, L.J., points out in the course of his judgment that, if the driver proceeded at the proper speed of ten miles an hour over the private road, his average speed over the public road must have been some thirty-two miles an hour. This calculation was accepted by the respondents in your Lordships' House, but it does not conclude the matter or determine the speed at the moment when the accident took place. There was a considerable body of evidence at the trial to the effect that the omnibus was driven at a very fast speed in the conditions obtaining, and even that it increased speed just before the accident. On the other hand, many of the witnesses who gave this evidence had previously made statements to the police that the vehicle was being driven at a moderate speed. The driver himself asserted that he was going no more than fifteen-twenty miles an hour at the vital moment, but SELLERS, J., has not accepted this estimate and has put the speed at about twenty-five—twenty-six miles an hour. The exact speed must, of course, be no more than a rough estimate, but in the circumstances I see no reason for departing from the opinion expressed by SELLERS, J. It appears that shortly before the accident the road rises slightly uphill, and, though the evidence is not positive, there is a suggestion that gear was then changed down, an event which would lead passengers to suppose, from the increased revolutions of the engine, that the speed had increased. Moreover, it is exceedingly difficult, even for an expert, to estimate speed in the dark, and in the particular case it is doubtful if the speed could ever have exceeded thirty miles an hour as the engine was fitted with a governor preventing it from proceeding faster than that pace. If I were left to myself, I should be inclined to say that the driver must have exceeded the prescribed speed over all portions of the course, including the first portion, and, as regards the first portion, that in effect is the result of his evidence. If the prescribed rate of ten miles an hour was exceeded on that portion so that it reached fifteen or twenty miles an hour instead of ten miles an hour, the speed on the later portion need not have been much greater than twenty miles an hour. In this, therefore, as in all matters where SELLERS, J., saw the witnesses and formed his impression from the evidence given, I suggest that it would be unsafe for your Lordships to depart from the conclusion at which he arrived. I have dealt a little at length, and shall hereafter have to deal with, the question of speed because it was one of the foremost contentions relied upon in support of the appellant's case. But for the speed, it was said, the accident would not have happened, the tyre would not have burst, and the omnibus would have kept the road.
- The second ground of complaint is that in the case of an omnibus which has been properly serviced, the tyre would not have burst. Again, if there were no explanation, the mere happening of the accident would be fatal to the defence. After the accident, however, the tyre was inspected by two experts who were called to give evidence before the learned judge. It appears that under the system adopted by the respondents, tyres are examined twice weekly, and this particular tyre was examined by a Mr. Jenkins two days before the accident took place. When it was examined at the trial some four years after the accident, it was found that there was an unfilled gash in the outer cover. This outer cover is made up of a layer of rubber called the tread which comes into contact with the road surface. Inside the tread lies another layer of rubber called the breaker and inside that again is the cord which is about an inch thick and is the portion of the tyre which resists the pressure of the air with which the inner tube is filled. It is composed of twelve plies of cotton material each of which is sheathed in rubber and its innermost layer lies directly against the surface of the inner tube. The tread when new is .845 inches thick, but the tyre in question had run some 25,000 miles and the pattern had worn level over five inches of the width of the tyre. These tyres, however, are normally serviceable for 33,000 miles and the condition of its tread had nothing to do with the bursting of the tyre.

At the time of the trial the gash or puncture in the surface of the cover extended through the tread, and, apparently, right through the cord, and originally the appellant relied on it as being the cause of the burst, but the tyre was opened up at the trial, and, though it was within some inches of the place where the burst occurred, it was found to have no connection with the bursting of the tyre. On the evidence given and accepted by SELLERS, J., it is plain that the cause of the burst was what is known as an impact fracture. This condition is recognised by the trade as being caused by one, or possibly more, heavy blows on the outside of the tyre. The evidence shows that a blow of sufficient severity may sever some of the plies close to the breaker strip and these when severed rub against and disintegrate the inner parts of the cord. It is not possible to state how long the process of disintegration takes, or either by external or internal inspection, to discover the weakness until the last two or three plies have been reached. Moreover, in approximately fifty per cent. of the cases, no mark whatsoever is left on the outside of the tyre from which the existence of damage could be ascertained.

The case for the appellant originally rested on a belief that the puncture in question was the cause of the burst. It was alleged, and SELLERS, J., found, that the puncture, in the state which it had reached when the case was heard, was such that the tyre ought to have been removed and replaced, or, at any rate, the puncture hole filled in. If the evidence had established that the state of the puncture was the same at the time of the accident as it was when the trial was held, this argument would require careful consideration, but SELLERS, J., has found that the state differed and there was ample evidence on which he could so find. Admittedly the puncture, when examined just after the accident took place, did not go right through the outer tyre. If it had, it would have left a mark on the inner tube, and there was no such mark. Moreover, the tyre was carefully examined by two experts in order to ascertain what the cause of the fracture was, and they did not regard the puncture as of sufficient importance even to require mention in their report. Both asserted that it would be most unlikely that they should have omitted to refer to it if the tyre, when they examined it, had been in the same condition as it was at the time of the trial. The witness, Jenkins, who examined it and whose duty it was to do so, had given evidence at a previous trial held before LEWIS, J., to determine another claim arising out of the same accident, but he had died before the appellant's claim was heard. In the case now engaging your Lordships' attention some questions were asked of one of the witnesses on material derived from the testimony given by Jenkins before LEWIS, J., but nevertheless no application was made then or at any time to SELLERS, J., who was trying the case to admit the transcript of his evidence as evidence in this case. Application to do so was, however, made to the Court of Appeal and to your Lordships. In each case the application was refused—in the Court of Appeal on the ground that it did not come within s. 1 (1) of the Evidence Act, 1938, and also because no request had been made to SELLERS, J., to admit it, and in your Lordships' House on the principle that evidence which was available in the court of first instance but was not produced should not normally be admitted on appeal even in cases where it has been difficult to obtain or its existence or admissibility has been overlooked. As this was the ground for your Lordships' refusal, it is not necessary to consider or decide whether the Court of Appeal were right in what I believe to have been their unanimous view that in any case the wording of the Act

A did not make the evidence admissible.

Jenkins, however, was an experienced and competent workman, and it would be unlikely that he should have permitted an obviously dangerous tyre to remain in position. The matter derives its importance from the fact that SELLERS, J., thought him to have been negligent in not having the tyre removed, and inferred that he might have been careless also in other matters. I do not think this

B view is justified, having regard to the evidence adduced, and see no reason for supposing that he omitted the ordinary precaution that a skilled workman would take. The appellant sought to argue from the condition in which the tyre must have been that a careful examiner would have seen the puncture, would have been unable to determine how deep it went, would, consequently, have ordered the removal of the tyre, and, if he had done so, the deterioration might

C have been discovered in the inside surface since by that time the original impact fracture might have spread to the last few plies and be visible on internal inspection. I do not think that the conclusion follows. The evidence, it is true, established that a puncture of the kind now visible must have been caused by a nail or similar object, and that that object would not come out of itself and must have been removed by some special tool, but, whether the removal was

D effected by Jenkins himself or by someone else, the operator would see the length of the object which did the damage, and would, therefore, know the depth of the hole. Moreover, anyone in charge of the maintenance of the tyre would naturally probe the hole if he had no other means of discovering how far it extended into the cover and would then ascertain whether it was necessary to take off the tyre or not. In any case, the assumption that the inner surface

E of the tyre would show the disintegration of the plies at the time of the examination is purely conjectural, and the whole line of argument too speculative from which to draw any safe conclusion.

In addition to this suggestion the appellant relied on two other matters as constituting evidence of negligence on the part of the respondents—(1) that the omnibus was travelling too fast at and before the moment that the burst

F took place, and (2) that no proper system had been established to ensure the reporting of severe blows to the tyres and that in fact no such reports were made. So far as the speed is concerned, I have indicated that, in my view, the finding of SELLERS, J., that it did not at the material time exceed twenty-five—

G twenty-six miles an hour should be accepted. It is argued on behalf of the appellant that even this speed gives rise to an inference of negligence which contributed to the accident. Two reasons were put forward in support of this view. First, it is said, there is evidence that an increased speed causes the disintegration to proceed more rapidly, and that, if the omnibus had not been driven on this journey so fast, no accident would have happened, or, at any rate, not this accident. I find nothing in the evidence from which this conclusion

H can be derived. It is quite true that the faster the omnibus is driven the more likely is it to meet with a blow severe enough to cause an impact fracture, but there is no evidence of any severe blow on this occasion save the unsupported inference of one of the witnesses for the respondents resting on a reconstruction of the accident as he thinks it must have happened. All the other evidence leads in the opposite direction, since no one of the passengers or the driver speaks to any severe blow, and the road in the vicinity was searched by a policeman afterwards and no obstruction was found. Nor has anyone said that twenty-six miles an hour or even a greater speed would create any more rapid deterioration in the tyre than would a speed of under twenty miles an hour. Indeed, it would be odd if a speed of thirty miles an hour, which is permissible in daylight, should be negligent in the dark, not because of any danger caused by inability to see but because some change in the internal condition of the tyre might take place. But the appellant relies on another and more persuasive ground for imputing negligence to the respondents. If, she says, the omnibus had not been driven so fast, the driver would have been able to bring it to a standstill, and thus have prevented the accident. She agrees that once the burst had taken place no blame could be placed on the driver, but she argues that, if he had not driven so fast before the burst, he could have put on his brakes and held the vehicle on the road. The driver himself said that as a result of the shock of the burst he was thrown or partially thrown out of his seat, though he managed to keep his left hand on the wheel, and that as a result he was not able to apply his brakes, or at any rate not until too late. SELLERS, J., has accepted his evidence in this respect, and further evidence has been given that a slower speed, so far from being an advantage, would have caused the deflation of the tyre to swing the head of the omnibus to the offside more rapidly and bring about an earlier accident—the theory, as I understand it, being that in a faster moving vehicle it is easier to turn the wheel, and that in this particular case the driver was able to keep his vehicle on the road so long as he did, because, despite the fact that he was partially thrown from his seat, he was able to steer it more easily than if it had been going more slowly. Again, I think it would be unsafe for your Lordships to differ from SELLERS, J., in this matter, which must depend upon the weight to be given to the testimony of the witnesses who gave evidence at the trial. In these circumstances I do not think it can be said that the speed at which the omnibus was driven at the time of the burst has been proved to have any causal connection with the subsequent accident.

The further question is still to be determined, whether there was negligence in the system of inspection which the respondents adopted or negligence to be imputed to any of the respondents' drivers in not reporting a blow severe enough to cause an impact fracture to the tyre. In my view, one or either of these matters is a circumstance from which negligence on the part of the respondents or their servants might be deduced. The findings of SELLERS, J., which are supported by the evidence are that the fracture could only be caused by a very heavy blow or conceivably by more than one very heavy blow, though the latter alternative is very unlikely, as the learned judge found, and that a blow heavy enough to cause such a disintegration would be known to and recognised by a competent driver who would be aware that it was sufficiently severe to be a possible cause of damage and to require a report to be made to his employers. It is answered that (i) a driver would have difficulty in recognising the seriousness of the blow required, and (ii) that, even if he did recognise it, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to induce him to make the required report. Whatever weight may be given to these criticisms, the evidence given at the trial establishes the fact that a competent driver would recognise the difference between a blow heavy enough to endanger the strength of the tyre and a lesser concussion. If this be so, the fact that he would be unlikely to report it would still leave him negligent in not doing so, and for that negligence his employers must answer. In the second place, it was, I think, the duty of the respondents, who are fully aware of the possibility of an impact fracture, to instruct their employees as to the effect which a heavy blow may produce, and to impress upon them the necessity of reporting its incidence. It might be that an uninstructed driver would neither know of nor have experience of such a danger, and that difficulty would be surmounted if proper instructions were given. It is quite true that an accident of this kind and the burst of a tyre owing to an impact fracture is a rare event—so rare, indeed, that at least one of the witnesses on behalf of the respondents regarded it as negligible, and thought that the public must take their chance of its occurring. The duty, however, as I see it, of a transport company is to take all reasonable precautions for the safety of their passengers and not to leave them in danger of a risk against which some precautions, at any rate, can be taken. It was said by some of the respondents' witnesses that there was no difficulty in instructing their drivers to report heavy blows to a tyre, and one at least of the witnesses acknowledged that it would be prudent to do so and thought that the respondent company did include it in their system.

A In these circumstances, despite the evidence of the majority of their witnesses that their system of inspection was satisfactory and was in accordance with the practice of companies carrying on a similar occupation, the respondents did not, in my opinion, take all the requisite steps they should have taken to protect their passengers from risk. So far as their practice of inspection and overhaul of tyres in other respects was proved in evidence, I should myself agree with SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.JJ., that it was adequate, and no fault could be found with the course they adopted.

B My Lords, before I finish I should wish it to be clear that I am conscious that the opinion I have formed differs not only from that of the majority of the Court of Appeal but also from that arrived at by LEWIS, J., in the earlier trial. It is unfortunate that in dealing with the same general situation two diverse results have been arrived at, but it is accepted doctrine that each case must depend and depend only on the evidence presented. As the learned judge pointed out, the evidence in the case heard before LEWIS, J., must have differed to a considerable extent from that given before him, and, indeed, any decision of fact may be proved wrong by a fuller knowledge of the circumstances or a more precise grasp of the technical possibilities or difficulties involved. So far as I am concerned the conclusion at which I have arrived is strictly confined to the evidence adduced before and findings of fact by C D SELLERS, J. Guided by those considerations I think he rightly found the respondents liable in damages, though I should not include a failure to remove the tyre because of the existence of the puncture among the grounds of my opinion. I should allow the appeal with costs in your Lordships' House and below, and restore the judgment of SELLERS, J. E

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, but since there has been much difference of judicial opinion on more than one aspect of the case, I may be forgiven if I detain your Lordships by referring as briefly as I can to the main points of controversy. For this purpose it is superfluous to repeat the analysis of the evidence which my noble and learned friend has incorporated in the judgment which he has delivered. It is important to bear in mind, however, that the evidence, so far as it deals with the causation and development of impact fractures of tyres, represents only the present state of knowledge about a subject which is under investigation by tyre manufacturers. It is, nevertheless, the evidence by which this case G may be judged.

The fact that an omnibus leaves the roadway and so causes injury to a passenger or to someone on the pavement is evidence relevant to infer that the injury was caused by the negligence of the owner, so that, if nothing more were proved, it would be a sufficient foundation for a finding of liability against him. It can rarely happen when a road accident occurs that there is no other evidence, H and, if the cause of the accident is proved, the maxim res ipsa loquitur is of little moment. The question then comes to be whether the owner has performed the duty of care incumbent on him, or whether he is by reason of his negligence responsible for the injury. The maxim is no more than a rule of evidence affecting onus. It is based on commonsense, and its purpose is to enable justice to be done when the facts bearing on causation and on the care exercised by the defendant are at the outset unknown to the plaintiff and are or ought to be within the knowledge of the defendant. It is not necessary in the present case to consider the intermediate position, when there is some evidence bearing on the causation of the accident and on the care exercised by the defendant, but the cause of the accident has not been proved, or to discuss what evidence in such a case may suffice to discharge the onus.

It is now common ground that the bursting of the tyre was, at any rate, a cause of the accident and that the burst was the result of the disintegration of the plies in the outer cover which was in turn the result of an impact fracture of the plies. The appellant maintained also that the omnibus was negligently driven at an excessive speed at the material time and that the excessive speed caused or contributed to the accident in one or both of two ways, first, by accelerating the process of disintegration and so bringing about the burst at the time when it took place, and, secondly, by disabling the driver from controlling the omnibus and bringing it to a stop before it went over the bank. On the first of these submissions it is enough to say that there is no evidence to show that the speed in fact accelerated the process of disintegration, and so SELLERS, J., found. On the second, the findings are that the speed limit of twenty miles an hour during black-out hours in a built-up area was exceeded, but that the speed was not more than twenty-five or twenty-six miles per hour at the time of the burst; that there is no reason to think that the omnibus would have been in any difficulty if the tyre had not burst; and that when the tyre burst the driver was partially dislodged from his seat though he kept hold of the steering wheel with his left hand. It is also found that it was not shown that the driver had any reason to anticipate that a tyre would burst. It must be added to this that the appellant's counsel imputed no fault of commission or omission after the moment when the tyre burst. On these facts SELLERS, J., declined to hold that there was negligence on the part of the driver contributing to the accident. The findings of fact were attacked by counsel for the appellant but there was a conflict of evidence about the speed and I am of opinion that the assessment of the value of the evidence by SELLERS, J., must be respected. If the findings stand, his refusal to find the driver in fault cannot be reversed. The fact that the speed limit in black-out hours was exceeded is not shown, and I think could not have been shown to have any relevance.

There remains the question whether there was negligence in relation to the defect in the tyre cover. Here it is convenient to say that I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack on the interpretation of art. 71 of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 398) and in holding that it gives no right of action to persons injured by the breach of it. The respondents are not insurers, but they have a duty, both at common law and by their contract, with those who travel in their omnibuses to take all reasonable care that the omnibus, including the tyres, is in good order and in a safe condition to carry a full load of passengers on the intended journey. Here again the onus is on the respondents since they alone are in possession of the relevant facts, but the evidence about the genesis of the fracture and the precautions taken by them for the good condition of their tyres, though not in all respects as ample or clear as it might have been, is sufficient for the decision of the case without resort to rules of onus.

Impact fractures of the cord or plies resulting in the bursting of a tyre are fortunately rare. From the evidence presented to the court in this case it appears that they are caused by an exceptionally severe impact against some obstacle, which would be felt and recognised as exceptional by the driver of the omnibus, though the possibility that two or more less severe blows on the same area of the tyre might cause a fracture cannot be wholly ruled out. It is the top or outer plies that are fractured by the external blow. The fracture of these plies may produce a bulge on the outer surface of the cover. On the other hand, there may be no external sign of damage at any time before a burst takes place. It is estimated that the bulge appears in about fifty per cent. of tyres damaged by impact fractures. There will probably be no sign of damage on the inner surface of the cover until the damage has spread downwards to the lowest or innermost plies by friction and fraying caused by use on the road. How long it may take the damage to spread to the innermost plies cannot be known or estimated. When this process of disintegration has reached that stage there is great risk that the air pressure will force the inner tube between the broken plies where it may be pinched and so burst. These facts impose on omnibus owners a duty to take all practicable steps to diminish the obvious risk that a tyre which has once suffered an impact of exceptional severity may subsequently burst and bring about a grave accident such as occurred in the present instance. Even if it is not practicable wholly to eliminate the risk, it is obviously imprudent to neglect any practicable means of reducing it.

- A What then did the respondents do ? They had a regular system of a twice-weekly inspection for pressure and for external examination of the cover by tyre examiners whose duty it was to look for any signs of the treads having been penetrated by nails or stones and for any signs of cracking of the sides of the cover or for any unusual appearance. If the examiner discovered any defect indicating penetration of the plies it was his duty to remove the wheel and to send it to the respondents' central works where it would be stripped down and the tyre fully examined. If this examination revealed any sign that the plies had been penetrated the tyre would be put aside for inspection by the tyre company which owned it and supplied it to the respondents. Every week also the front wheels were jacked up and examined by spinning them. At the same time the tyres were inspected for cuts or the like. Every three or four thousand miles the wheels were removed so that a thorough external examination could be carried out. When a tyre had run 25,000 miles the wheel would be removed and sent to the main tyre shop. There it would be examined and it would be decided whether it was fit for further service. For that purpose it would not necessarily be stripped from the wheel. The life of a tyre in the respondents' services was 33,000 miles, after which it might be re-treaded for further use.
- D The system in use did not provide for a routine inspection of the inner surface of the tyre cover, and the tyre covers were not removed unless a puncture made that necessary or the external examination showed damage which suggested the need for an examination of the inner surface. The evidence of the respondents' chief engineer is that if an omnibus hits an obstacle with such force that a fracture of the plies might result the driver would be aware of it and that if he reported it some inspection would be made. There is no evidence that reports of this sort were made by the respondents' drivers, and the appeal was argued on the footing that the drivers of the respondents' omnibuses had not been instructed to report severe impacts and that they did not in fact report them.

- G As regards the tyre cover concerned in this appeal, the facts are that it was examined internally in August, 1942, when a puncture was repaired. It had then run 1,792 miles. The internal surface had never been examined again before the accident on Feb. 27, 1943, but it had been regularly examined externally, and was so examined eleven times in January and ten times in February, 1943. The last of these examinations took place on Feb. 24, 1943, three days before the accident. No report that it had received a severe impact had been made, and it is not possible to determine the date when the impact which caused the fracture took place. It is reasonably certain that it did not take place on the day of the accident, for no impact was felt on that day and, though a simultaneous fracture and burst is a possibility, no impact was felt at the time of the burst, and there was apparent no obstacle or unevenness on the surface of the road which might have occasioned it. The probability is that the fracture occurred a considerable time before the accident. The tyre had at the date of the accident run 23,545 miles and therefore it was not yet due for the inspection which, according to the respondents' practice, falls to take place when a tyre has run 25,000 miles. The tread was worn smooth, but no one says it was for that reason not fit for use.

The respondents adduced a number of expert witnesses to speak to the practice of other omnibus companies. With one exception they deponed that the respondents observed all the precautions observed by others. The exception was Mr. Mernagh, a tyre technologist formerly employed in that capacity by a well-known company of tyre manufacturers. He is, therefore, not in as good a position to speak of the practice as some of the other witnesses who were employed by large omnibus companies. He was asked whether an omnibus company ought to have some system by which the drivers are required to report any event which might, within reason, cause a fracture of the plies. His answer was: "I think they do. Many omnibus companies do require it. I think this' one [the respondents] does require its drivers to report any occurrence of such a nature which in the driver's opinion would lead to its destruction." He was then asked: "You say that is common in omnibus companies, and you think it was prudent?" and he said "Yes." This is important evidence coming, as it does, from an acknowledged expert in tyres put forward by the respondents, and its importance is not greatly diminished by the fact that he has not been himself concerned in the management of an omnibus company. Evidence that the respondents' practice does not fall short of the precautions taken by other owners goes only part of the way to meet the case of negligence made against them. It is not a complete answer to the charge that they have omitted precautions which were obviously called for. In Morton v. William Dixon, Ltd. (2) LORD DUNEDIN (Lord President) dealt with this aspect of the proof of negligence and said (1909 S.C. 809):

"Where the negligence of the employer consists of what I may call a fault of omission, I think it is absolutely necessary that the proof of that fault of omission should be one of two kinds—either to show that the thing which he did not do was a thing which was commonly done by other persons in like circumstances, or to show that it was a thing which was so obviously wanted that it would be folly in anyone to neglect to provide it."

That was said in an action between employee and employer where the onus was on the employee, but the principle which the Lord President applied in that case is of general application. If the evidence of Mr. Mernagh on practice is to be treated as outweighed by the evidence of other expert witnesses, it is still valid evidence on the precautions obviously wanted to diminish the danger resulting from impact fractures. It necessarily implies that the reporting of exceptionally severe impacts is both a possible thing and a useful thing. That it is possible and that a report would be followed by an examination is admitted by the respondents' chief engineer, but it was submitted that a report would lead to no useful result, because, it was said, the routine examinations would discover any external surface damage, and because no examination of the internal surface of the cover would reveal anything unless it took place in the brief and unpredictable period between the destruction of the innermost plies and the occurrence of the burst. Mr. Mernagh's evidence implies that an examination of the damaged tyre after a report of a serious impact may be expected to be better directed to discover signs of damage which may escape notice when no such report has been received. This is, to my mind, a reasonable, if not a self-evident, proposition. The alternative is to accept the submission that no report need be made because it could not lead to useful results and that what happened in this case is a risk which is normally taken because it cannot be prevented. It is not for a court of law to lay down a code of precautions which omnibus owners must observe, and it may be that the Court of Appeal were justified in saying that some of the recommendations of SELLERS, J., for I respectfully think that some of them were recommendations rather than findings.

of a duty based on the evidence, were not practicable. On the evidence it is proved that reasonable care was not exercised. The drivers themselves failed to report impacts which they ought to have reported, the respondents failed to instruct the drivers about impact fractures and to require them to report, and the tyre examiners ought to have been, but were not, informed. If these precautions were taken it is a reasonable conclusion that the risks of bursts caused by impact fractures would be sensibly reduced. It is not necessary to go farther or to suggest to omnibus owners what additional steps might be taken if the results of a careful and properly directed examination after receipt of a report were negative. It would, however, be in accordance with experience that a stricter attention to the duty of eliminating the risk would lead to the discovery of improved means of doing so.

I think, therefore, that on the evidence adduced in this case it is proved that the death of the appellant's husband was caused by a defect in the tyre which might have been discovered by due diligence on the part of the respondents. That is a finding which entitles the appellant to damages, though it is not possible to affirm that the fracture would have been discovered by the exercise of due diligence. My Lords, it is not necessary to go on to discuss the relevance of the hole which at the date of the trial penetrated through the outer cover, but I will briefly state the view which I have formed of the facts. SELLERS, J., found that when the tyre was first inspected after the accident this hole did not penetrate through the cover, and it is proved that the cover was much pulled about by persons examining it before the trial. It is also proved that it was carefully examined by experts in March, 1943. I think that it is most improbable that if the outer orifice had then been as large as it was at the date of the trial they would have failed, as they did, to take notice of it. It is, therefore, not proved that there was any negligence in failing to notice it on Feb. 24, if indeed any hole existed at that date. I would allow the appeal and restore the award of damages.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I agree with the reasons which have led my noble and learned friends LORD PORTER and LORD NORMAND to find the respondents liable in damages. I think, moreover, that there is much weight in the additional reasons given by BUCKNILL, L.J., in the Court of Appeal. I need not, however, pursue that line of thought, as I agree that this appeal must be allowed, and the judgment of SELLERS, J., restored.

LORD REID: My Lords, I have had more difficulty than your Lordships have had in reaching the conclusion that the respondents were negligent in not having a better system for guarding against the danger of tyres bursting, but my doubts are not sufficiently strong to require me to dissent.

LORD RADCLIFFE (read by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON): My Lords, I am at one with your Lordships in thinking that this appeal ought to be allowed. I do not think that the appellant was entitled to judgment in the action because of any special virtue in the maxim res ipsa loquitur. I find nothing more in that maxim than a rule of evidence, of which the essence is that an event which in the ordinary course of things is more likely than not to have been caused by negligence is by itself evidence of negligence. In this action much more is known than the bare fact that the omnibus mounted the pavement and fell down the bank. The true question is not whether the appellant adduced some evidence of negligence, but whether on all the evidence she proved that the respondents had been guilty of negligence in a relevant particular. In my view, the important thing is that the tyre on the respondents' omnibus was defective. It was, indeed, their case that the burst of the inner tube was caused by the faulty condition of the structure of the tyre, and that that faulty condition had arisen from an impact fracture suffered at some unascertainable time before the accident. Now, a carrier's obligation to his passenger, whether it be expressed in contract or in tort, is to provide a carriage that is as free from defects as the exercise of all reasonable care can make it. This care the respondents claim to have taken, and the majority, if not all, of the members of the Court of Appeal upheld their claim. In my view, the respondents failed to establish that they had observed an adequate standard of care, and it is for that reason that I think that the appellant is entitled to her damages.

It is unnecessary for me to repeat what has been said by others of your Lordships on this point. An impact fracture, I conclude, is, though a rare event, a danger well recognised by those responsible for the technical direction of omnibus undertakings. It is unreasonable to suppose that its nature and probable consequences are familiar to drivers in the same degree, if at all, but it is very likely, though not certain, that such a fracture can only be caused by a blow of exceptional severity on the tyre, of the occurrence of which a driver could not be ignorant. I have found it impossible to read the evidence as showing that the respondents had given any actual instructions to their drivers to the effect that they were to report any such violent blow as would be likely to cause an impact fracture. To say that it was a driver's duty to make such a report seems to me insufficient as a defence, unless measures had been taken to explain and bring home the duty to those directly concerned. It is possible to make much of the undoubted fact that a driver's impression is not an accurate recording instrument and that an interior examination of the tyre immediately following on a report might very well reveal nothing. That means, what is evidently true, that no measures could be devised to detect with any certainty the incipient disintegration of the tyre structure that follows on an impact fracture. It does not mean, however, that a system of reports, if each report were followed by a thorough internal examination and a special scrutiny of the outside of the suspected tyre at the ordinary bi-weekly inspections, would not have helped to reduce the risk and might not in this very case have prevented the tragic accident that took place. A court of law is in no position to lay down a code of precautions that ought to be observed by omnibus carriers on this head, but it is its duty to say whether on the whole of the evidence the respondents have shown that they observed as much care as could reasonably be required of them in guarding against this particular danger. I do not think that they did show that and consequently I do not think that they exculpate themselves from the consequences of running their omnibus with defective equipment.

THEOPHILE v. SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

Bankruptcy—Petition—Service—Service out of the jurisdiction—"Debtor"—Foreigner—"Carrying on business"—Business continued till all debts paid—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 1 (1) (a), (2) (c), s. 4 (1) (c).

T., a citizen of Rumania, carried on a leather business in England, and on Jan. 1, 1946, two notices of assessment for £10,000 each were issued to him in respect of excess profits tax in connection with his business in respect of the chargeable accounting periods ending on Mar. 31, 1943, and Mar. 31, 1945. On Jan. 10, 1946, a further notice of assessment was issued to him for £10,000 for excess profits tax in respect of the chargeable accounting period ending on Mar. 31, 1944. T. left England on Oct. 31, 1946, and had ever since resided in Eire. By the end of 1946, T. had disposed of his business. On Nov. 14, 1947, a bankruptcy petition was presented at the instance of the Crown against T. in respect of the non-payment of excess profits tax amounting to £30,000. It was not denied that there was prima facie evidence of an intent in T. to delay or defeat the Crown in its claim by remaining out of England.

HELD: (i) section 1 (2) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, by its express terms extended not only to British subjects but to foreigners, and was applicable to T., notwithstanding that he was a Rumanian subject and that the act of bankruptcy alleged was committed outside England.

(ii) although T. was not actively carrying on business for many months before the presentation of the petition, he did not cease to trade for the purposes of the Act until all sums due in respect of the business were collected and all debts were paid, there being no difference in this respect between trade debts incurred by buying and selling and excess profits tax, and, therefore, T. was carrying on business in England at the time of the act of bankruptcy specified in s. 1 (1) (d) of the Act so as to be "debtor" within s. 1 (2) (c), and the Crown was not debarred by s. 4 (1) (c) from presenting the petition.

APPEAL by a debtor against an order of the Court of Appeal, dated July 16, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 533, allowing an appeal by the Crown from an order of Mr. REGISTRAR PARTON, made on Apr. 7, 1948, and discharging an order giving leave to serve a bankruptcy petition out of the jurisdiction. The respondent argued that, being a Rumanian subject, he was not a "debtor" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (2), and that he had not committed an act of bankruptcy on which a petition could be grounded inasmuch as he did not carry on business in England at the date of the petition or during any portion of the three months prior thereto. The House of Lords dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER. B

Feb. 9. LORD PORTER: My Lords, the appellant is a citizen of Rumania. For some years, however, before the proceedings under review, he carried on a leather business in this country, apparently with success. On Jan. 1, 1946, two notices of assessment for £10,000 each in respect of excess profits tax in connection with this business, covering the two chargeable accounting periods ending on Mar. 31, 1943 and Mar. 31, 1945, were issued to the appellant, and on Jan. 10, 1946, a further notice of assessment was issued to him for another sum of £10,000 for excess profits tax in respect of the chargeable accounting period ending Mar. 31, 1944. Certain incidental proceedings were taken, but they are not material to the question now before your Lordships. It is enough to record that on Nov. 14, 1947, a bankruptcy petition at the instance of the Crown was issued in respect of the non-payment of these three sums, amounting to £30,000 in all, which had not then been paid, and are still unpaid. It appears that the appellant had disposed of his business by the end of 1946 and meanwhile he left this country on Oct. 31 of that year and has resided in Eire since that date. D

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1, it is provided :

"(1) A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases:—(a) If in England or elsewhere he makes a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally; (b) If in England or elsewhere he makes a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property, or of any part thereof; (c) If in England or elsewhere he makes any conveyance or transfer of his property or any part thereof, or creates any charge thereon, which would under this or any other Act be void as a fraudulent preference if he were adjudged bankrupt; (d) If with intent to defeat or delay his creditors he does any of the following things, namely, departs out of England, or being out of England remains out of England, or departs from his dwelling-house, or otherwise absents himself, or begins to keep house; . . . (2) In this Act, the expression 'a debtor,' unless the context otherwise implies, includes any person, whether a British subject or not, who at the time when any act of bankruptcy was done or suffered by him—(a) was personally present in England; or (b) ordinarily resided or had a place of residence in England; E F G H or (c) was carrying on business in England, personally, or by means of an agent or manager; or (d) was a member of a firm or partnership which carried on business in England.”

Section 4 of that Act provides:

A “(1) A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless . . . (c) the act of bankruptcy on which the petition is grounded has occurred within three months before the presentation of the petition, and (d) the debtor is domiciled in England, or within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition has ordinarily resided, or had a dwelling-house or place of business, in England, or (except in the case of a person domiciled in Scotland or Ireland or a firm or partnership having its principal place of business in Scotland or Ireland) has carried on business B in England, personally or by means of an agent or manager, or (except as aforesaid) is or within the said period has been a member of a firm or partnership of persons which has carried on business in England by means of a partner or partners, or an agent or manager . . .”

C In these circumstances the contention for the Crown is that the appellant has committed an act of bankruptcy because when the petition was issued he was a debtor in that he was carrying on business in England personally at that time and that being out of England he remained out of England with intent to defeat or delay his creditors and so committed the act of bankruptcy defined in s. 1 (1) (d). It is not denied that he is remaining out of England, nor that there is prima facie evidence of an attempt to defeat or delay the Crown in its endeavour D to collect the debt which is claimed to be due, but the appellant maintains that, being a Rumanian subject, he is not a debtor within the meaning of the Act, and that he has not committed an act of bankruptcy inasmuch as he did not carry on business in England at the date of the petition, or during any portion of the three months prior thereto. The Crown maintains that the wording of sub-s. (2) in terms embraces both English subjects and foreigners provided that E either class carried on business in this country at the date of the act of bankruptcy relied on, or within three months prior thereto, and that there is a long series of cases which establish that a business does not cease to be carried on in this country until all the debts incurred in the course of it have been discharged.

As regards the first point, the appellant maintains that, despite its wording, sub-s. (2) has no application save in the case of British subjects or persons F domiciled here or in a case where the act of bankruptcy relied on was committed in this country. In the present case he relies on the facts that the petition is based on an allegation that, being out of England, he has remained abroad, that he is a Rumanian subject, and that the alleged act of bankruptcy by its very nature has not been, and could not be, committed in this country. It would, he says, be contrary to the comity of nations and to the ordinary construction G of Acts of Parliament to decide that an act committed out of this country by a foreign national domiciled abroad should be held to come within the mischief of the Act.

My Lords, s. 4 (1) limits the circumstances in which a creditor can present a bankruptcy petition, but I do not think that it throws any further light on his right to do so. Before it can be presented, there must be a debtor and he must H have committed an act of bankruptcy. If those two pre-requisites are established, the petition may be issued subject to the conditions laid down in s. 4. The answer, therefore, to the question submitted to your Lordships depends, in the first instance, on the true meaning of s. 1 (1) (d) and (2) (c). Interpreted in accordance with its strict wording, the latter sub-section applies to British and foreign nationals alike, and, unless some principle to the contrary can be established, I should so construe it. If I am right in this, an invocation of the comity of nations is irrelevant. If the meaning of an Act of Parliament is ambiguous, that doctrine may be prayed in aid, but, where an English statute enacts a provision in plain terms, no such principle applies. Any foreign nation of which the person affected is a member, or with whom such person is domiciled, is free to disregard the provisions of the English enactment, but the person concerned cannot himself take exception, though it may be he will escape from compliance with its terms because he is out of the jurisdiction and cannot be reached by English process. The principle is, I think, accurately expressed in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Halsham ed., vol. 31, p. 509, paras. 658, 659:

"658. There is a presumption that Parliament does not assert or assume jurisdiction which goes beyond the limits established by the common consent of nations. On the principles already stated, however, this presumption must give way before an intention clearly expressed. 659. Statutes are to be interpreted, provided that their language admits, so as not to be inconsistent with the comity of nations. International law, however, being mainly conventional, can, it seems, only be administered by the courts when it forms part of the law of this country. If, therefore, statutory enactments are clearly inconsistent with international law, they must be so construed, whatever the effect upon the rights of aliens not within the jurisdiction may be."

The observations of the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., in Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co. (1) ([1901] A.C. 107) are to the same effect.

In considering the authorities, it is not, I think, necessary to refer to any case preceding Ex p. Crispin, Re Crispin (2), but before that and the succeeding cases are dealt with, and before the statements contained in them are appraised, it is essential to bear in mind what the relevant statutory provisions were at the time when they were decided. In Crispin's case (2), the statute applicable was the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and that case in terms decided only that "an alien non-trader domiciled abroad who contracts debts in England cannot be made a bankrupt upon an act of bankruptcy committed abroad." In the course of his judgment, however, MELLISH, L.J., laid down (8 Ch. App. 380) three considerations as supporting the conclusion at which he had arrived. The first two referred to wording which is similar to that which is now to be found in s. 1 (1) (a), (b) and (d) of the present Act. Paragraph (a), he says, is clearly intended to relate to a conveyance which is to operate according to English law; para. (b) clearly means fraudulent by the law of England; and para. (d) implies that the person who remains out of England has his home or place of business in England and cannot reasonably be held to apply to the case of a foreigner remaining in his own home. In ascertaining the effect of this case, however, it has to be borne in mind that the Act of 1869 contained no definition of the word "debtor," and the court, being unable to find any intermediate meaning for that word between any debtor, whatever his nationality or domicile, who commits an act of bankruptcy anywhere and a debtor who commits an act of bankruptcy in this country or is otherwise subject to the law of this country, chose the latter. The act of bankruptcy alleged was the going or remaining out of England with intent to defeat or delay creditors, and the head-note is, I think, accurate in saying (ibid., 374):

"An alien non-trader domiciled abroad, who contracts debts in England, is liable to be made a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, if he commits an act of bankruptcy in England, although he may have left England before the petition for adjudication is presented. But he cannot be made a bankrupt upon an alleged act of bankruptcy committed abroad."

This language, indeed, but repeats the observations of the court (ibid., 379).

Ex p. Blain (3) was also decided under the Act of 1869, and in it the court held (i) that an act of bankruptcy must be a personal act or default and cannot be committed through an agent nor by a firm as such, and (ii) that to use the words of BRETT, L.J. (12 Ch.D. 528):

"... upon the ground of the limited power of the legislature of England to legislate, all the authorities have held that it is necessary that the act of bankruptcy should have been committed in England, if the person against whom the statute is invoked is a foreigner who is not domiciled in England."

In that case, the persons against whom the petition was presented, and by order discharged, were Chilean subjects who had never been in this country, though they were members of a firm carrying on business here. Undoubtedly, the subsequent Bankruptcy Acts have altered the first principle decided; whether they have altered the second is the matter for your Lordships' consideration.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, like the Act of 1869, contains no definition of debtor, though it increases the number of acts which are acts of bankruptcy. It does, however, contain a fresh section—s. 6—which enacts that a creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless—s. 6 (1) (d)—the debtor is domiciled in England or, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, he ordinarily resided in or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England. In Ex p. Pearson (4) an American citizen who was resident in America but was said to have carried on business in England within a year was served with a bankruptcy notice in America and it was sought to make him bankrupt thereon. The court held that s. 6 (1) (d) made no difference in law—it did not enlarge the class of debtors but only limited the cases in which a bankruptcy petition could be presented. At the same time it affirmed the principle laid down in Ex p. Blain (3), FRY, L.J., saying ([1892] 2 Q.B. 268):

"... I can entertain no doubt that s. 4 of the Act of 1883 relates only to debtors who are subject, either by birth and natural allegiance or by temporary residence, to the English law."

Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co. (1) raised a somewhat different question. In that case, two American subjects resided and carried on business in America, but they also carried on a branch of their business in this country, and had assets here. In December, 1899, they executed an assignment of all their property to their manager in America in trust to pay their debts. This was said to be an act of bankruptcy under s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1883, which is in the same terms as s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914. They had, it was argued, "in England or elsewhere [made] a conveyance ... of [their] property to a trustee ... for the benefit of [their] creditors generally." The contention failed: LORD HALSBURY said ([1901] A.C. 108):

"The words 'debtor' and 'creditor' certainly cannot be sufficient to give jurisdiction to the English Court of Bankruptcy, because if unlimited they would give jurisdiction all over the world in respect of debts, petitions, or acts of bankruptcy committed anywhere ... Once it is admitted that a limit must be placed upon those words, it must follow that the limit must be 'debtor' and 'creditor' respectively who are subject to the jurisdiction of the English bankruptcy law ... The whole argument, I think, depended upon the generality of the word 'debtor'."

LORD DAVEY, who also spoke, affirmed the decision in Ex p. Pearson (4) to the effect that s. 6 was a limiting and not an enlarging section, and had not altered the law in this respect.

My Lords, in these cases no question arose as to the effect of the change in the law brought about by the description of debtor which was inserted for the first time in the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, s. 8, and repeated in s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1914, but some discussion as to its effect took place in 1936 in Re Debtors (5). The problem in that case was the same as that in Vogeler's case (1). Two American citizens carried on a financial business in partnership in a number of foreign cities including London and Paris, the London business being managed by an Englishman. In 1935, the London business was wound-up, and its assets were applied, so far as they went, in settlement of English claims. At this time both partners were living in America, and in August of that year executed in the State of New York an assignment of their property to trustees for the benefit of their creditors, an assignment which in the case of one partner comprised the whole of his property. Against that partner, the petitioning creditor relied on the execution of the assignment as an act of bankruptcy. The Court of Appeal, following Vogeler's case (1), held that an assignment executed abroad by a foreign national, not domiciled or resident in England, did not constitute an act of bankruptcy unless it was intended to operate in accordance with English law. The court considered itself bound by the decision in Vogeler's case (1) in spite of the fact that the Act of 1914 had added a definition of or additional meaning to the word "debtor." In the opinion of the members of the Court of Appeal, Vogeler's case (1) was decided on two grounds—(i) that the person petitioned against was not a debtor, and (ii) that the assignment was not an act of bankruptcy. As regards the first point, the court were inclined to think that the provisions of the Act of 1914 had disposed of the difficulty, and that the American gentleman who was petitioned against was a debtor, but, in their opinion, the House of Lords had also decided that a deed of assignment or conveyance executed by a domiciled foreigner in his own country is not an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts if it is to operate according to the law of the foreign country in which it is made.

My Lords, whatever view one may take of this decision, it has no direct bearing on the question now under consideration. It is a decision on the terms of s. 1 (1) (a) not s. 1 (1) (d), and deals with the limitation to be placed on the meaning of the word "conveyance," not with the width of that class of persons who are included in the word "debtor." The appellant, however, relies on the fact that the provisions of s. 1 (2) are not definitive, i.e., they do not say what a debtor is, but merely add a fresh type or fresh types to those who have been held in law to constitute the category of debtors, and therefore leave it still necessary to put some limit on so wide a class. Let me assume then, without expressing any opinion as to the validity of the contention, that the sub-section should read: "In addition to one who is already subject to the English bankruptcy law, the word debtor shall also embrace a non-British subject who, at the time when the act of bankruptcy was committed, was carrying on business in England." On this wording, if the appellant was carrying on business in England when he failed to pay his debt to the Crown, he would, prima facie, be a debtor since, as a result of the wording of the section, it is immaterial that he was not a British subject, and from the terms of para. (b) it is clear that residence is only one of four alternative requisites which constitute a debtor within the meaning of the Act—residence may be a factor which brings him within that class, but it is not a necessary element. Whatever limitation may formerly have been put on the meaning of the word "debtor," a wider sense has now been given to it. It includes not only persons who were in the past subject to the English bankruptcy law, but a new class consisting of persons who are not British subjects or domiciled in this country, but carried on business in England at the time when the act of bankruptcy was committed. Whether Re Debtors (5) was rightly decided or not, one still has to construe sub-s. (1) (d), and I find it difficult to see what bearing a narrowed construction of the word "conveyance" in s. 1 (1) (a) has on the width of the class of debtors who can commit the act of bankruptcy defined in s. 1 (1) (d). As LORD GREENE, M.R., points out ([1948] 2 All E.R. 536), an act within sub-s. (1) (d) can only be committed by someone abroad. That person must, of course, have been carrying on business in England within three months of the act of bankruptcy alleged, and the factors needed to fulfil this condition will require analysis at a later stage, but, once it is established that these requirements are fulfilled, the sub-section declares in terms that it does not matter whether the person concerned is a British subject or not. He is a debtor provided he fulfils any one of the four conditions stipulated for in the sub-section. In seeking to say that the provisions are confined to a British national or British domiciled person or to a case where the act of bankruptcy is committed in this country the appellant seems to me to give the go-by to the words "whether a British subject or not," and I do not understand what

 A extension of the law he suggests to have been intended by them unless his contention is that they apply to some of the acts of bankruptcy set out above, but not to all—at any rate not to the one relied on in this case. I cannot find that the wording of the Act makes any such differentiation between what is required to constitute one category of those whom the present Act declares to be included in the class of debtors and another, and I can see no reason for its
 B implication.

My Lords, out of respect for a strenuous argument presented to your Lordships, I have dealt at some length with this aspect of the case, but in the end I find myself coming back to the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and find myself in complete agreement with its expression and substance. Like him I think the point is disposed of if one reads the relevant words of the statute in
 C their appropriate position. I repeat them as a convenient method of winding up the view I hold on this question. Section 1 (1) (d) will then run: "Any person, whether a British subject or not, who at the time when any act of bankruptcy was done by him was carrying on business in England commits an act of bankruptcy if, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, being out of England, he remains out of England." So read, I find it impossible to add as a limitation
 D the provision that no foreigner is hit by the Act unless he in some way owes allegiance to the law of England, or the act has been committed in this country. To adopt this construction is not to limit the meaning of the wording of the section but to contradict it.

The further argument, however, still remains open to the appellant that he was not carrying on business in England within three months of the presentation
 E of the petition, and, therefore, was not a debtor within the meaning of the Act. In a sense it is true that the appellant was not actively carrying on business within three months of the presentation of the petition, but there is a series of cases beginning with Re Dagnall (6) and ending with Re Reynolds (7) which in unbroken sequence have decided that trading does not cease when, as the expression is, "the shutters are put up," but that it continues until the sums
 F due are collected and all debts paid. It is true that all the decisions have been given in respect of married women's trading and that a distinction has been made between the earlier Acts, where the expression was "as a trader," and the later, where the phrase "carrying on trade" is found, but it is the later, not the earlier, phrase which has been adopted in the Act of 1914. It was suggested on behalf of the appellant that the decisions had application to married women
 G only, because the wording was first used in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and transferred therefrom to the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, and thence to the present Act. I cannot follow why the same wording should have one significance when employed of married women and another in the case of all other persons engaged in trade. More particularly, I think that the meaning placed on the words in the cases referred to must
 H be followed when it is remembered that two Acts of Parliament have been passed since Re Dagnall (6) and Re Worsley (8) were decided and that those cases have been followed and approved in Re Clark (9), Re Allen (10) and Re Reynolds (7). In my opinion, those cases were rightly decided, and are conclusive of the present question.

There is, however, one further matter which requires consideration. In all the cases referred to the debts which were to be paid or collected were strictly trade debts, and it is maintained that in that respect they differ from the case under appeal in that the debt claimed by the Crown to be due is in respect of excess profits tax, and that such a debt is not a trade debt but a sum due for taxes, and no more connected with the appellant's business than income tax or any other tax liability. Whatever else may be said about excess profits tax, however, it is imposed on the debtor because he has been trading, and I do not see any reason for confining trade debts to those incurred in buying or selling. Re Allen (10) shows that they extend to liabilities incurred in incidental matters which occur during the course of carrying on the trade, including a liability for careless driving of a servant resulting in an accident. In Dagnall's case (6) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said ([1896] 2 Q.B. 410):

"It seems to me that trading is not completed until you have performed all the obligations that the fact of trading imposed upon you" and this language was quoted with approval by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Re Reynolds (7) ([1915] 2 K.B. 191). I think it is accurate, and that the payment of excess profits tax was one of the obligations imposed on the appellant by his trading. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I concur.

LORD REID: My Lords, I concur.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I have nothing to say in this appeal except that I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HOBSON v. BARTRAM AND SONS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 25, 26, 1950.]

Negligence—Ship—Invitee—Injury to employee of independent contractor during ship's trial—Ship under command of employee of shipbuilders—Negligence of purchasers' servants on board—Common interest of shipbuilders and purchasers in success of trial—Control of purchasers' servants by shipbuilders' employee—Liability of shipbuilders.

The plaintiff was employed by a company which was engaged by the defendants to instal refrigerating machinery in a ship which they (the defendants) were building for the Argentine government. When the ship was taken on its trial at sea the plaintiff was invited by the defendants to accompany it to complete the work which he was doing. On the trial, the defendants' general manager was in charge, and the ship was worked by a crew provided by the defendants. In addition, there was an Argentine crew on board, but their only purpose was to observe the ship's performance prior to it being accepted by the purchasers. On Oct. 1, 1947, the plaintiff was working near a hatchway, which was battened down, the place being lighted by a lamp. During the plaintiff's temporary absence, the hatch was opened and the lamp removed by members of the Argentine crew who wished to examine the hold. On his return to work the plaintiff fell down the hatchway and was injured. On a claim by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages for negligence,

HELD: the fact that there was a common interest between the defendants and the purchasers in the inspection of the hold was not sufficient to make the Argentine crew, who were the servants of the purchasers, the agents of the defendants; the fact that the defendants' manager (who was in the position of captain) necessarily had control over all the acts of all persons in the ship did not make those persons his agents for all purposes; and, there being no evidence that the defendants had delegated any duties to any member of the Argentine crew, they (the defendants) were not liable for the injury caused by the Argentine seamen's negligent acts.

(1) Woodward v. Mayor of Hastings, [1944] 2 All E.R. 565; [1945] K.B. 174; 114 L.J.K.B. 211; 172 L.T. 16; 109 J.P. 41; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of OLIVER, J., made on Oct. 17, 1949, at Newcastle Autumn Assizes, whereby he awarded the plaintiff £3,745 16s. 4d. damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff, who was a plumber's mate engaged in the installation of refrigerating machinery, was injured by falling down a hatchway during the trial at sea of a ship being built by the defendants for sale to the Argentine government. The hatchway had been left open and unlighted by certain Argentine sailors, who were on board to observe the ship's performance, but were taking no part in the working of the ship. OLIVER, J., held that for the purpose of the ship's trial the sailors were the agents of the defendants, thus making the latter vicariously liable to the plaintiff for the injury. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal.

Beney, K.C., and J. Charlesworth for the defendants.

Harvey Robson for the plaintiff.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants from an order of OLIVER, J., made at the Newcastle Autumn Assizes in which he awarded the plaintiff £3,745 16s. 4d. damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was a plumber's mate in the employment of J. E. Hall, Ltd., who were sub-contractors for the defendants, Bartram & Sons, Ltd., in connection with certain work on the Rio Chico, a cargo vessel of some ten thousand tons, which the defendants were building for the Argentine government. J. E. Hall, Ltd., were putting refrigerating machinery into the ship. When the time came for the ship's sea trial, the work of installing the refrigerating machinery was not completed, and the plaintiff and some other employees of J. E. Hall, Ltd., were invited to join the ship during the trial to enable them to complete the work. The plaintiff was, accordingly, an invitee in the ship and it is conceded that the defendants were the occupiers of the ship.

The contract between the Argentine government and the defendants provided, by cl. 3:

"The vessel, including engines, boilers, machinery outfit and equipment as she is constructed, and all materials, wherever situated, appropriated to this contract shall immediately after payment of the first instalment, as the work proceeds, become the property of the purchasers, and shall not be within the ownership or disposition of the builders; but the builders shall at all times have a lien thereon for any unpaid purchase money and interest thereon, and for their charges for any additions, alterations or extra work."

The contract provided for the payment of the purchase price by instalments, the balance to be paid when the ship was delivered or on the handing over of the builders' certificate, whichever should be the earlier. Clause 9 of the contract provided:

"In the event of a sea trial trip being carried out in accordance with cl. 6 to purchasers' account the engine-builders, for the purpose of such trial, shall supply the attendants, fuel and engine consumable stores for the propelling machinery. The builders shall provide pilotage and towage, and the purchasers shall provide the crew necessary for the safe handling and navigation of the vessel, whilst proceeding to or from and during the trial."

The engine builders there referred to are defined in cl. 1 of the contract as being the North-Eastern Marine Engineering Co. (1933) Ltd., of Sunderland, who are not parties to this contract. It is, however, doubtful whether the provisions of cl. 9 provide for what is to happen in the event of a sea trial trip being carried out in accordance with cl. 6 whereby the purchasers have to provide the crew for the safe handling and navigation of the vessel, because the wording of cl. 6 in the present contract was different from that which formerly prevailed in this form of contract. Clause 6 used to provide "the total expenses of a sea trial trip, if available, will be extra to purchasers' account." Those words in the contract between the parties have been omitted, and, accordingly, it is very doubtful whether the words in cl. 9 are applicable. On the evidence and on the finding of the learned judge it appears that, whatever the obligation of the purchasers may have been under the contract, they did not, in fact, supply the crew for the navigation and working of this vessel. The learned judge's finding on that matter, which is not disputed, was as follows:

"There was an Argentine crew with officers on board, but they were there, not to work the ship, but to observe her performance during the trials preparatory to her being accepted or otherwise by the buyers, the Argentine government. The ship was being worked by the defendants' sailor crew from the shipyard and other tradesmen were aboard to stand by in case of breakdown."

On Oct. 1, 1947, the plaintiff was working on the installation of the refrigeration machinery in a position in the 'tween deck adjacent to a hatchway leading to a hold. When he left where he was working to have his lunch there was a lamp which lit up the place, the hatch cover was battened down, and everything was safe and in order. The plaintiff had to walk across the hatch cover when going to his lunch. When he came back, the lamp had been removed, the hatch cover was off, no guard rope or rail had been put round the open space, and he fell down the hatchway without any negligence on his part, suffering serious injuries. In those circumstances he brings this action against the defendants. He claims against them for breach of the duty owed to an invitee by an invitor. The learned judge has found as a fact that this accident was brought about by some of the Argentine seamen moving the light, taking off the hatch, opening up the hatchway, and going down to examine the hold. The learned judge found, further, that, unless these Argentine sailors are to be regarded as the agents of the defendants, the defendants were not in breach of any duty owed by them as invitores because they had not been guilty of negligence. They had not failed to take reasonable care to have the premises reasonably safe for the invitee. They were unaware that the hatch covers had been opened and removed. If the Argentine sailors were their agents, however, then the defendants were liable for their agents' acts, and the knowledge of the sailors would be attributed to the defendants.

The whole of this case turns on the question whether the plaintiff has proved that these Argentine sailors were, in the circumstances I have outlined, the agents of the defendants. The evidence showed that the Argentine government had put on board a captain, thirty-eight officers, six engineers, a wireless operator, eight petty officers, eight stewards, ten motormen, and ten seamen. The defendants' general manager was on board and there was a pilot. The general manager was, no doubt, in the equivalent position of a captain of the ship. He had complete charge of her, but the defendants also had a crew of ten seamen who were attending to the driving of the vessel. The learned judge said in giving a preliminary judgment:

"On looking at this case, I have come to the conclusion that, on the footing of agency, the defendants, for the purpose of this ship's trial were, by their manager, in control of the foreign crew, and, on that footing, although the manager knew nothing about it, nevertheless, the foreign crew vicariously make the defendants liable."

After an interval, he delivered a more detailed judgment, and, dealing with the question of agency, he says:

"Turning once more to the question of agency, the situation to be examined is the position of the Argentine crew qua the defendants during the trial, not at any other time. Considering the number of ships which must have undergone similar trials during the last century or so, it seems rather unusual that there should be no authority establishing the relationship between the buyer's crew and the builders during such a trial as this, but none has been discovered. I have come to the conclusion that, inasmuch as both the defendants and the Argentine government were equally interested in the success of the trials, or otherwise, the Argentine crew were, pro tem, under the orders of the defendants, and their examination of all parts of the ship was an integral part of the trial and they were agents of the defendants when they went below to make their examination."

Earlier he had said:

"It has been conceded on the part of the shipbuilders, the defendants, that the plaintiff was an invitee and also that the defendants were at the time occupiers of the premises. It was contended, in the circumstances, that the fact that the hatch cover was removed did not involve the defendants in liability, inasmuch as the concealed danger was not known to their manager, nor could he with reasonable diligence have discovered it. That proposition is undoubtedly sound, unless, in law, at the time the Argentineos committed their act of negligence and folly, they were the agents of the defendants. I have come to the conclusion—though not without some hesitation—that they were their agents."

I am of a contrary opinion. It seems to me that there is nothing in this case to show that the Argentine sailors were at any time during this trial the agents of the defendants. They were there on behalf of the Argentine government, who were the intending purchasers of the ship, to satisfy themselves and their government with regard to the performance of the vessel before they took delivery of it. They were in exactly the same position as the agent of any purchaser who goes to inspect goods before the actual purchase is completed. It is true that there is a common interest in the success of the trial between the builders of the ship and the purchaser, but that is not sufficient to make the servants of the purchaser the agents or servants of the builders. It is true that the defendants' manager, who was in charge of the ship, admitted that he had a control for certain purposes over these men. Every captain of a ship (and this man was in the position of a captain) necessarily has control in a certain sense over all the acts of all the persons in a ship, but that does not make them for all purposes his agents. It is not necessary to consider what is the liability of the shipowner when the captain gives an order to some person in the ship, who is in no sense his agent or servant, to do something or refrain from doing something and somebody is injured as a result of the negligent way in which that order is obeyed. That is not this case. These men were not going down into the hold pursuant to any order given by the manager, nor were they going down into the hold for the purpose of the business of the manager or his employers, although, no doubt, the learned judge has found that there was a common interest between the parties in the result of the inspection of the hold. That is another matter altogether.

The passages in the evidence relied on by counsel for the plaintiff with regard to control, appear in the cross-examination of Mr. Mellanby, the manager, where he was asked:

"(Q.)—And the Argentines you say (and, no doubt, quite rightly) had no control over your men? A

(A.)—Yes, that is correct.

(Q.)—And had you control over them? I suppose you could direct them where to go on the ship.

(A.)—Yes.

(OLIVER, J.): If you had seen them doing something you disapproved of, you would have stopped them. B

(A.)—Yes, unless it was an urgent requirement, then I would not stop them. Otherwise I would have approached their officers and they would have had to obey if I had ordered them to do something or not to do something in the ship.

(Q.)—You said they had no business to go below and if you had seen them you would have stopped them. C

(A.)—I would have stopped them because it was obvious that the hatch should be covered to prevent such an accident."

In my view, those answers fall far short of establishing that these Argentine sailors were either for all purposes during the trial the agents of the builders or that they were their agents in connection with the particular operation which they were carrying on prior to the plaintiff's accident. It is not a matter which permits of any elaboration. Counsel for the plaintiff has referred to Woodward v. Mayor of Hastings (1). The facts in that case were entirely different from the present. DU PARCQ, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 567): D

"Even if the cleaner [who was cleaning some snow covered steps on school premises and whose negligence had caused injury to a pupil of the school] was not temporarily under the control of the defendants, and thus for the time being their servant, they are liable on the ground that they delegated to her the performance of the duty which was incumbent on them." E

He held that in those circumstances the defendants, the school governors, were liable. In the present case there is no evidence that the defendants had ever delegated any duties, the performance of which lay on them, to the Argentine sailors. For these reasons this appeal must succeed. F

ASQUITH, L.J.: I entirely agree.

ROXBURGH, J.: I also agree. G

Re SECHIARI (deceased). ARGENTI v. SECHIARI.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), February 7, 1950.]

Company—Capital profits dividend—Capital or income—Assets of company acquired by State—Profit on sale—Reconstruction of company as investment and holding company—Receipt of dividend by settlement trustees.

A Settlement—Capital or income—Tenant for life and remaindermen—Capital profits dividend—Profit on sale of company's assets—Company to continue as investment and holding company.

By her will the testatrix, who died in 1924, settled her residuary estate which included £4,000 ordinary stock of a company which had considerable interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings. As a result of the Transport Act, 1947, these interests were sold by the company to the British Transport Commission for the sum of £24,800,000, which was satisfied by an allotment to the company of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock at 101 per cent. At an extraordinary general meeting of the company its memorandum was altered so that the company then became entirely an investment and holding company, and, by an ordinary resolution at the same meeting, the company resolved to pay a special capital profits dividend on its ordinary stock by distributing to each stockholder £5 British Transport stock for each £1 of the company's ordinary stock held by him. As a result of this resolution, £20,000 British Transport stock was received by the trustees of the testatrix's residuary trust fund, and the question to be determined was whether this sum was to be treated as income or as an accretion to the capital of the fund.

D HELD: as a limited company not in liquidation could make no payment by way of return of capital to its shareholders except as a step in an authorised reduction of capital, the sum of British Transport stock was to be treated as income of the testatrix's residuary trust fund.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a sum of £20,000 British Transport stock, received by the trustees of the testatrix's will as capital profits dividend on £4,000 ordinary stock in Thomas Tilling, Ltd., on the acquirement of that company's interests in road transport undertakings by the British Transport Commission, which stock formed part of the testatrix's residuary trust fund, was to be treated as income or an accretion to the capital of the trust fund. ROMER, J., held that it was income. The facts appear in the judgment.

H ROMER, J.: The question raised by this summons is whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and in the events which have happened, a certain sum of £20,000 British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73, which has been received by the trustees of the testatrix's will as a capital profits dividend on £4,000 ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., and forms part of the residuary trust fund of the testatrix, ought to be treated as income of such fund, or as an accretion to the capital of the fund, or how otherwise the same ought to be dealt with. I am not proposing to deliver judgment at any length in this case, because the point, so far as this court is concerned, is, in my view, entirely covered by binding authority.

The testatrix, who died in February, 1924, made her will in 1907, giving her residuary estate to her trustees on trust for all her children in equal shares, and directing the trustees to settle each child's share on trust to pay the income to the child for life with remainder to that child's issue. She had six children, all of whom survived her, and there are three grandchildren, who are interested in the capital of the trust fund. Among the assets constituting the residuary trust fund, there was a sum of £4,000 ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd. I think I may take the relevant facts from the affidavit which has been sworn in support of the summons:

"The company was the owner of substantial holdings of shares in omnibus companies and of other interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings affected by the Transport Act, 1947. Since the passing of that Act the company has been re-organised by the carrying out of a number of transactions, which may be summarised as follows. The company sold all its interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings affected by the Transport Act, 1947, to the British Transport Commission set up by that Act, under an agreement negotiated between the company and the commission. The consideration for such sale was £24,800,000, which was satisfied by the allotment to the company of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73, at a price of 101 per cent. The company distributed £20,600,000 of the said British Transport stock as a special capital profits dividend on its ordinary stock, each ordinary stockholder on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, receiving £5 British Transport stock for every £1 ordinary stock of the company held by him. At the same general meeting of the company which declared the said capital profits dividend, the memorandum of association of the company was altered, and new articles of association were adopted, with a view to facilitating the co-ordination by the company of branches of business unconnected with public transport, in particular investment business and building."

There are also exhibited to the affidavit certain documents, which were circulated by the company to its ordinary stockholders, explaining the position and telling them that the company thenceforward would be entirely an investment and holding company and that the transference of the British Transport stock as capital profits dividend to holders of the company's ordinary stock would be free of tax and would, accordingly, commend itself to them. The resolution that was passed regarding the relevant matter was an ordinary resolution, put to the members at an extraordinary general meeting of the company on Mar. 17, 1949, and unanimously carried:

"That a special capital profits dividend on the ordinary stock of the company of £20,806,000 payable out of the profit realised by the company on the recent sale of part of its undertaking to the British Transport Commission be and the same is hereby declared and that such dividend be payable to the ordinary stockholders on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, in proportion to their holdings of ordinary stock and be paid and satisfied by the distribution amongst them as at Apr. 1, 1949, of £20,600,000 British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73 (part of the consideration received by the company from the British Transport Commission for the sale above referred to) taken at its issued price of 101 per cent., being in the proportion of £5 British Transport stock for every £1 ordinary stock of the company held by them."

It was in pursuance of that resolution that the trustees of the testatrix's will received this £20,000 British Transport stock now in question.

The principle which is decisive of the question is to be found in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council delivered by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in Hill v. Permanent Trustee Co. of New South Wales (1). LORD RUSSELL enunciated ([1930] A.C. 730) five principles which are directed to the position of beneficiaries of a settled trust fund which comprises shares in a company in regard to the distribution by the company of moneys to its shareholders, and I think, for present purposes, that the second of these principles is the most important. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said (ibid., 731):

“(2) A limited company not in liquidation can make no payment by way of return of capital to its shareholders except as a step in an authorised reduction of capital. Any other payment made by it by means of which it parts with moneys to its shareholders must and can only be made by way of dividing profits. Whether the payment is called ‘dividend’ or ‘bonus,’ or any other name, it still must remain a payment on division of profits.”

Then the third principle is:

“(3) Moneys so paid to a shareholder will (if he be a trustee) prima facie belong to the person beneficially entitled to the income of the trust estate.”

Those observations, coupled with the rest of the judgment of the Board in that case, completely cover the present position so far as this court is concerned, as counsel for the remaindermen, in presenting the case, was disposed to concede. Although that decision, as a decision of the Privy Council, is not strictly binding on this court, it formulates in an extremely clear way, as one would expect from its author, the principles applied, both before and since, by the High Court in this country, which are binding on me. I will, accordingly, apply them, and I will make a declaration that this sum of British Transport stock ought to be treated as income of the trust fund, but that declaration, which is limited to being a declaration on the construction of the will and in the events which have happened, will leave the way open to such steps as have been suggested as possible by counsel for the remaindermen. The declaration will, accordingly, be qualified by a proper provision somewhat resembling the one which was inserted by the Privy Council in Hill v. Permanent Trustee Co. of New South Wales (1).

Declaration accordingly, but the order to be without prejudice to any question whether, in the circumstances, in the administration of the trust, the court has, or would exercise, any jurisdiction to apportion the dividend on equitable principles between income and capital.

CHARLES RICKARDS, LTD. v. OPPENHEIM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Denning, L.J.J.), January 12, 13, 16, 1950.]

Contract—Time of performance—Sale of goods—Work and labour—Contract to build motor car body—Time of the essence—Original condition in regard to time waived—Subsequent notice fixing time for completion—Reasonableness—Conduct amounting to waiver.

By a contract made between the plaintiffs and O., the plaintiffs agreed to supply a motor car chassis to O. and to have a body built on to it within seven months, time being of the essence of the contract. The plaintiffs gave the work of building the body to sub-contractors and authorised them to accept instructions in regard to the work direct from O. The sub-contractors failed to complete the work within the time stipulated, but O. waived the original condition in regard to time by pressing for delivery to be made on successive later dates. Eventually, on June 28, 1948 (about three months after the date originally fixed for delivery), the sub-contractors' manager informed O. that the car would be ready in two weeks' time, and on the following day O. gave a written notice to the sub-contractors stating that, unless he received the car within four weeks, he would be unable to accept delivery. The sub-contractors sent the notice on to the plaintiffs after eight or nine days. The car was not delivered within four weeks and was not completed until Oct. 18, 1948, when O. refused delivery. The plaintiffs brought an action against him claiming the price of the body-work, and he counterclaimed for the chassis or its value.

HELD: (i) as there was an initial stipulation making time of the essence of the contract, O., after waiving that initial stipulation, was entitled to give a reasonable notice making time of the essence of the matter, whether the contract was for the sale of goods or for work and labour.

(ii) the reasonableness of the notice had to be judged at the time at which it was given, and it could not be held to be bad because, after it was given, there were unanticipated difficulties in making delivery.

Observations of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Stickney v. Keeble ([1915] A.C. 419), followed.

(iii) on the facts of the case, the notice of June 28, 1948, was reasonable, and it was a good notice to the plaintiffs, even though it was given by O. only to the sub-contractors.

(iv) waiver of the notice could be inferred only from conduct which showed an intention to affect the legal relations of the parties, and, therefore, O.'s failure to reply to a letter from the plaintiffs, written on July 16, 1948, in which they assumed that he would take delivery of the car at a later date, notwithstanding the notice of June 28, did not amount to a waiver of the notice, and O. was entitled to rescind the contract and to receive the chassis or be repaid its value.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, motor traders, from a decision of FINNEMORE, J., dated July 27, 1949, whereby he gave judgment for the defendant in an action claiming the price of a motor car body and on the defendant's counterclaim for the chassis or its value. By a contract between the parties, the defendant bought the chassis from the plaintiffs and ordered a body to be built within a stipulated time. The original stipulation in regard to time was waived by the defendant, but, some months later, he gave a notice requesting delivery within a stated time. The car was not delivered within the time stipulated by the notice, and the defendant cancelled the contract. The learned judge held that he was entitled to do so, and the Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal from his decision. The facts appear in the judgment of DENNING, L.J.

Eric Sachs, K.C., and Gorst for the plaintiffs.

Levy, K.C., and Faulks for the defendant.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment of the court.

DENNING, L.J.: Early in 1947 the defendant, Mr. Oppenheim, wanted a new Rolls Royce car, and he placed an order in two parts with the plaintiffs, Charles Rickards, Ltd., who are motor car traders. He first ordered the chassis, a Rolls Royce Silver Wraith chassis, for estimated delivery in June, 1947, but he also wanted a body built on the chassis, and he particularly wanted to know the time within which that body could be made. The plaintiffs made inquiries of various firms for an estimated time for building a body on to the chassis. In July, 1947, Rolls Royce themselves estimated twenty-one months, and Park Ward at about the same time estimated fifteen months. Those times were too long for the defendant's satisfaction, so the plaintiffs obtained an estimate from Jones Brothers (Coachbuilders), Ltd., who said that they could do it within "six months or, at the most, seven months." Thereupon, the plaintiffs gave the same time to the defendant and he gave them the order for the body on that footing. The order was placed in July. The plaintiffs sub-contracted it and put out the work with Jones Brothers (Coachbuilders), Ltd. The actual time from which the six or seven months started is not precisely ascertained. The chassis was actually delivered to the sub-contractors on July 30, 1947, and, if that is taken as the date from which the time ran, the seven months would be up at the end of February, 1948, but the specification for the body work was not finally agreed until Aug. 20, 1947. If that date is taken, the latest time for delivery would be Mar. 20, 1948. Whichever date is taken, though, is immaterial, for the time was plainly exceeded. The body was not built on to the chassis by Mar. 20, nor, indeed, until many months later—not until Oct. 18, 1948, was the car completed.

Meanwhile, however, as from Mar. 20, 1948, at least, onwards, the defendant had been pressing for delivery. During the winter of 1947/8 he went to America, and in the autumn of 1947, before he left, he told the plaintiffs that he hoped the car would be ready by the time he came back. He came back in March, and the car was not ready by Mar. 20, 1948. He could have cancelled the contract there and then, but he did not do so. By pressing for delivery he waived the stipulation as to time. He asked for delivery in time for Ascot, but he did not get it. He asked for delivery in time to take the car on his holiday abroad at the beginning of August, 1948. He did not get it. He was given promises from time to time for early delivery—not definite guarantees, but promises which were not fulfilled. These promises were made not so much by the plaintiffs as by the sub-contractors, but the defendant was well justified in dealing direct with the sub-contractors, as, not only were they actually doing the work, but, on Aug. 7, 1947, the plaintiffs had written to them telling them that it was in order for them to accept any instructions with regard to the body that were given by the defendant, and asking them to keep the plaintiffs au fait with the situation. It was, therefore, quite natural for the defendant to deal direct with the sub-contractors, to talk to them about the work, and to press them for delivery. He also pressed the plaintiffs for delivery, but they did not go further than to say that the car would be delivered as early as possible.

Eventually, not having got the car for Ascot and wanting it in time to take it abroad at the beginning of August, on June 28, 1948, the defendant saw Mr. Musk, the sub-contractors' manager, who told him that it would be ready in two weeks' time. On the next day the defendant wrote to the sub-contractors a letter on which much of this case turns. He sent it "For the attention of the managing director." It says:

"Further to my conversation with Mr. Musk to-day, I regret that I shall be unable, unless my plans change, to accept delivery of the Rolls you are making for me after July 25. For six months I have had a reservation to take a car abroad on Aug. 3 for my holiday and it would appear to me to be impossible for me to alter this date. I shall therefore have to buy another car."

He also asked in the letter whether there was any definite likelihood of receiving the car before July 25. A week later, about July 7, Mr. Musk intimated that the car would not even be ready for him to take abroad by Aug. 3. Thereupon the defendant bought elsewhere another car, a Rolls Bentley, and asked the plaintiffs to return the money which he had paid for the chassis—he was ready to let them keep the chassis and have the advantage of the work that had been done on the body. This request was followed by an interview on July 10 at which, according to the evidence of the plaintiffs, the defendant in effect waived his notice of cancellation and agreed that the plaintiffs should go on with the work and he would take the car later. The judge has negatived any such waiver on the facts, and I do not see any reason to differ from his finding. After that interview the plaintiffs, through the sub-contractors, completed the car. On Oct. 18, 1948, it was finished, but delivery was refused by the defendant. This action is now brought by the plaintiffs for the price of the body, and a counter-claim is made by the defendant claiming the return of the chassis or its value.

It is clear on the findings of the judge that there was an initial stipulation making time of the essence of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, namely, that it was to be completed "in six, or, at the most, seven months." Counsel for the plaintiffs did not seek to disturb that finding—indeed, he could not successfully have done so—but he said that that stipulation was waived. His argument was that, the stipulated time having been waived, the time became at large, and that thereupon the plaintiffs' only obligation was to deliver within a reasonable time. He said that, in accordance with well-known authorities, "a reasonable time" meant a reasonable time in the circumstances as they actually existed, i.e., that the plaintiffs would not exceed a reasonable - time if they were prevented from delivering by causes outside their control, such as strikes or the impossibility of getting parts, and so forth, and that, on the evidence in this case, it could not be said that a reasonable time was in that sense exceeded. He cited the well-known words of LORD WATSON ([1893] A.C. 32, 33) in Hick v. Raymond and Reid (1) to support the view that in this case, on the evidence, a reasonable time had not been exceeded. If this had been

- A originally a contract without any stipulation in regard to time, and, therefore, with only the implication of reasonable time, it may be that the plaintiffs could have said that they had fulfilled the contract, but, in my opinion, the case is very different when there was an initial contract, making time of the essence, of "six or, at the most, seven months." I agree that that initial time was waived by reason of the requests for delivery which the defendant made after March,
- B 1948, and that, if delivery had been tendered in compliance with those requests, the defendant could not have refused to accept. Supposing, for instance, delivery had been tendered in April, May, or June, 1948, the defendant would have had no answer. It would be true that the plaintiffs could not aver and prove that they were ready and willing to deliver in accordance with the original contract. They would have had, in effect, to rely on the waiver almost as a cause of action.
- C At one time there would have been theoretical difficulties about their doing that. It would be said that there was no consideration, or, if the contract was for the sale of goods, that there was nothing in writing to support the variation. Plevins v. Downing (2), coupled with what was said in Besseler, Waechter Glover & Co. v. South Derwent Coal Co., Ltd. (3) gave rise to a good deal of difficulty on that score, but all those difficulties are swept away now. If the defendant, as
- D he did, led the plaintiffs to believe that he would not insist on the stipulation as to time, and that, if they carried out the work, he would accept it, and they did it, he could not afterwards set up the stipulation in regard to time against them. Whether it be called waiver or forbearance on his part, or an agreed variation or substituted performance, does not matter. It is a kind of estoppel. By his conduct he made a promise not to insist on his strict legal rights. That
- E promise was intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and was, in fact, acted on. He cannot afterwards go back on it. That, I think, follows from Panoutsos v. Raymond Hadley Corpn. of New York (4), a decision of this court, and it was also anticipated in Bruner v. Moore (5). It is a particular application of the principle which I endeavoured to state in Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd. (6).
- F Therefore, if the matter stopped there, the plaintiffs could have said that, notwithstanding that more than seven months had elapsed, the defendant was bound to accept, but the matter does not stop there, because delivery was not given in compliance with the requests of the defendant. Time and time again the defendant pressed for delivery, time and time again he was assured that he would have early delivery, but he never got satisfaction, and eventually
- G at the end of June he gave notice saying that, unless the car was delivered by July 25, he would not accept it. The question thus arises whether he was entitled to give such a notice, making time of the essence, and that is the question which counsel for the plaintiffs has argued before us. He agrees that, if this is a contract for the sale of goods, the defendant could give such a notice. He accepted the statement of McCARDIE, J. ([1920] 3 K.B. 495), in Hartley v. Hymans (7), as
- H accurately stating the law in regard to the sale of goods, but he said that that statement did not apply to contracts for work and labour. He said that no notice making time of the essence could be given in regard to contracts for work and labour. The judge thought that the contract was one for the sale of goods, but, in my view, it is unnecessary to determine whether it was a contract for the sale of goods or a contract for work and labour, because, whichever it was, the defendant was entitled to give a notice bringing the matter to a head. It would be most unreasonable if, having been lenient and having waived the initial expressed time, he should thereby have prevented himself from ever thereafter insisting on reasonably quick delivery. In my judgment, he was entitled to give a reasonable notice making time of the essence of the matter. Adequate protection to the suppliers is given by the requirement that the notice should be reasonable.

The next question, therefore, is: Was this a reasonable notice? Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that it was not. He said that a reasonable notice must give sufficient time for the work then outstanding to be completed, and that, on the evidence in this case, four weeks was not a reasonable time because it would, and did, in fact, require three and a half months to complete it. In my opinion, however, the words of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Stickney v. Keeble (8) apply to such a case as the present, just as much as they do to a contract for the sale of land. LORD PARKER said ([1915] A.C. 419):

"In considering whether the time so limited is a reasonable time the court will consider all the circumstances of the case. No doubt what remains to be done at the date of the notice is of importance, but it is by no means the only relevant fact. The fact that the purchaser has continually been pressing for completion, or has before given similar notices which he has waived, or that it is specially important to him to obtain early completion, are equally relevant facts . . ."

To that statement I would add, in the present case, the fact that the original contract made time of the essence. In this case, not only did the defendant press continually for delivery, not only was he given promises of speedy delivery, but, on the very day before he gave the notice, he was told by the sub-contractors' manager, who was in charge of the work, that it would be ready within two weeks. He then gave a four weeks' notice. The judge found that it was a reasonable notice and, in my judgment, there is no ground on which this court could in any way differ from that finding. The reasonableness of the notice must, of course, be judged at the time at which it is given. It cannot be held to be a bad notice because, after it is given, the suppliers find themselves in unanticipated difficulties in making delivery.

The notice of June 29, 1948, was, therefore, a perfectly good notice so as to make time of the essence of the contract, subject, however, to another point that counsel for the plaintiffs made. He said it was bad because it was given, not to the plaintiffs direct, but to the sub-contractors, and it would appear that the sub-contractors did not send it on to the plaintiffs for another eight or nine days. The answer to that argument is that the notice was given to the people who were actually doing the work, and the plaintiffs had, from the beginning, authorised the defendant to give instructions direct to the sub-contractors. This notice was, no doubt, important, and it would have been better for the defendant to have given it both to the plaintiffs and to the sub-contractors, but it seems to me that, in view of the authorisation in August, 1947, the fact that it was not given to the plaintiffs direct cannot make it a bad notice. In any event, the plaintiffs received it within eight or nine days, and, even if it was only received then, there was still more than a fortnight to go before July 25, and it would still be a reasonable notice. That point also, therefore, does not hold good.

There was yet one remaining point. Counsel for the plaintiffs said that, even accepting the notice of June 29 as a notice making time of the essence, nevertheless even that notice was afterwards waived by the defendant. On July 10, 1948, there was a discussion between the defendant, on the one hand, and Mr. Bates and Mr. Rickards, on the other, as to what was to be done about the car. Mr. Bates says that the defendant authorised the plaintiffs to go ahead with the work and promised to take delivery of the car after he came back and then decide whether they should sell it for him, whereas the defendant says that he only offered to do what he could to help them and that he suggested their best course was to go on and complete it and sell it on their own account, not on his behalf, but in order to save any loss. The judge took the view that the defendant's memory about it was probably the more accurate, and I see no reason for taking a different view. This interview was followed on July 16 by a letter from the plaintiffs to the defendant in these terms:

A "In view of your comments during our conversation on this subject last week we assume that you are prepared to leave the order with [the sub-contractors] until you return from holiday, by which time the car should be ready for delivery. Every effort will be made on our part to expedite delivery, and we feel sure you appreciate our desire to settle this matter amicably."

B The defendant did not reply to that letter, and counsel for the plaintiffs says that the proper inference was that he assented to it. On this point I would say that to constitute waiver there must be conduct which leads the other party reasonably to believe that the strict legal rights will not be insisted on. The whole essence of waiver is that there must be an intention to affect the legal relations of the parties. If that cannot properly be inferred from the conduct, there is no waiver: see Foot Clinics (1943), Ltd. v. Cooper's Gowns, Ltd. (9) and Bird v. Hildage (10). In this case the conversation and the letter do not show any intention to affect the legal relations in the matter. They were only approaches with a view to settlement from which nothing concrete emerged. I agree, therefore, with the judge that nothing in them can really be said to amount to a waiver of the clearly expressed notice given on June 29, 1948.

C The case, therefore, comes down to this. There was a contract by the plaintiffs D to supply and fix a body on the chassis within six or seven months. They did not do it. The defendant waived that stipulation. For three months after the time had expired he pressed them for delivery, asking for it first for Ascot and then for his holiday abroad. But still they did not deliver it. Eventually at the end of June, being tired of waiting any longer, he gave a four weeks' notice and said: "At all events, if you do not supply it at the end of four weeks I must cancel," and he did cancel. I see no injustice to the plaintiffs in saying that that was a reasonable notice. Having originally stipulated for six to seven months, having waited eleven months, and still not getting delivery, the defendant was entitled to cancel the contract.

E On the counterclaim the judge has held that the chassis should be returned or its value paid. I assume that the plaintiffs will exercise their option of paying F for the chassis. They will then own the whole car, which they can sell for whatever they can realise. I cannot help sharing the regret of the judge that this car was not sold before and the proceeds used to meet the cost of the work, but we have only to deal with the strict legal rights of the parties. They are that the plaintiffs made a contract which they have not fulfilled and which the defendant G justifiably cancelled. I think that the learned judge was right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

H SINGLETON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I did not think I should add anything, but, perhaps, I ought to say a few words because a case such as this is of importance to the public as well as to the plaintiffs and to the defendant. This court is, of course, only concerned with the position as between the plaintiffs and the defendant. That position, it seems to me, falls to be determined on the facts, and on the facts, as found by the learned judge, the defendant was entitled to succeed on claim and on counterclaim. The defendant obtained a Rolls Royce chassis through the plaintiffs, and it was through them, and on their behalf that the sub-contract was made for the building of the body. It was found that the sub-contractors could give, or said they could give, much earlier delivery than other body builders who were in contemplation, and it was on that basis that the defendant and the plaintiffs decided that the sub-contractors should build the body. The chassis was delivered in July, 1947, and the contract in regard to the building of the body was entered into about July 11, 1947. It was understood then—indeed, it was said—that the body should be completed in six to seven months. That did not take place. There were very many delays. In June, 1948, the defendant was told by someone in the employ of the sub-contractors, with whom he had been put in direct communication and relationship, that they could finish the body in two weeks' time. Thereupon he thought it right, in view of what had happened, to write to them the letter of June 29 to which DENNING, L.J., has referred in his judgment. That letter gave them virtually a month in which to complete the body. There was no answer to the letter, and the defendant spoke to the sub-contractors on the telephone and wrote to them again on July 7, 1948. Thereafter they answered and said that it was impossible to do that which he wished. The question that arises is: Was the notice which he gave a reasonable notice, or was the time which he allowed them for completion a reasonable time in the circumstances? The learned judge, in his judgment, said:

“He then, on June 29, called for the car within a month, namely, by July 25, which I think he was entitled to do, being a reasonable time in which to call for delivery of the car, which was then very considerably overdue.”

The evidence before the learned judge justified him in coming to that conclusion, and I do not think that this court has any right or duty to interfere with that finding.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, in his argument, raised a question whether the contract was a contract for goods sold and delivered or a contract for work and labour. He submitted that the learned judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion that this was a contract for goods sold and delivered, and that, if it was, on the other hand, a contract for work and labour done, the principle applied by the learned judge did not apply. I am not sure that I agree with the finding of the learned judge that this was a contract simply for the sale of goods, but I do not think that that matters. The law as to contract for the performance of work is stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 3, pp. 220-222. At p. 222, para. 380, the law is stated in this way, and I think it is applicable to this case in every respect:

“In cases where time has not been made of the essence of the contract, or where, although time originally was of the essence of the contract, the time so fixed for completion has ceased to be applicable by reason of waiver or otherwise, the employer has still a right by notice to fix a reasonable time for the completion of the work, and, in case the contractor does not complete by that time, to dismiss the contractor, just as a vendor would be entitled to rescind the contract in case of a contract for sale of land.”

As I have said, I do not think it matters whether this case was really a case of goods sold and delivered, or a case of a contract for work and labour to be done. If, in circumstances of this kind, the purchaser, or the one for whom the work is to be done, has no right to put an end to the contract if the goods are not delivered in reasonable time, or if the work is taking much too long a time, then, I think, the law is defective. The public point of view seems to me to be as follows, and the law ought to be sufficient to meet it, and I believe it is. If a person wants something done, or if he wants a particular article and agrees to buy it, and that which he has contracted to have done is not done within a reasonable time, or the article which he has bought is not delivered within a reasonable time, I think that he has the right, in the circumstances, to say: “Well, I will not have it unless you deliver it within a certain length of time”—and states a reasonable time. Great inconvenience may be caused by the failure to comply with contracts, and, if there is no time stated, the delivery ought to be made, or the work ought to be done, within a reasonable time. I agree with the judgment which has been given to the effect that this appeal should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I also agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HARRIES AND OTHERS v. ASHFORD AND OTHERS.

C

[COURT OF APPEAL (Asquith, L.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 3, 1950.]

Pleading—Amendment—Claim made by writ omitted from statement of claim—Revival of claim.

D

On Aug. 9, 1944, W.H. was killed in a motor car accident. On Aug. 7, 1945, a writ was issued in which W.H.'s widow and another person, described as administratrices of the estate of W.H., and W.H.'s widow in her personal capacity, were named as plaintiffs. The administratrices claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the widow claimed under the Acts of 1846-1908. The administratrices, however, did not obtain a grant of administration of the estate of W.H. until Aug. 9, 1945. In the statement of claim, which was delivered on Nov. 4, 1946, the only claim made under the Acts of 1846-1908 was that of the administratrices. On Dec. 16, 1949, the plaintiffs applied for leave to amend the writ and statement of claim by the deletion of the administratrices as parties, and by making consequential alterations. They also sought to substitute in the statement of claim a claim by the widow under the Acts of 1846-1908 for that of the administratrices, the personal claim by the widow under those Acts, although included in the writ, having been omitted from the statement of claim.

HELD: as the administratrices were improperly joined, they should be struck out from the parties named as plaintiffs and consequential amendments should be made, but the restoration of the widow's claim under the Acts of 1846-1908 in the statement of claim could not be permitted.

APPEAL by leave from an order of STREATFEILD, J., in chambers, dated Jan. 11, 1950, affirming an order of the district registrar at Cardiff refusing leave to amend a writ and a statement of claim.

On Aug. 9, 1944, William Harries and his wife, the plaintiff, Margaret Gwen Harries, were passengers in a motor car owned by the second defendants, Swansea Corporation, and driven by the first defendant, David Stanley Ashford, a servant of the corporation, when the car came into collision with an omnibus owned by the third defendants, United Services Ltd., and driven by their servant. William Harries sustained fatal injuries, and his wife was injured. On Aug. 7, 1945, a writ was issued by the wife and Brenda Mary Taylor, as administratrices of William Harries, and by the wife in her personal capacity, the administratrices claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of the death of William Harries, and the wife claiming damages under the Acts of 1846-1908 in respect of the said death, and also damages for her personal injuries. On Aug. 9, 1945, letters of administration to the estate of William Harries were granted to the persons named as administratrices in the writ. On Nov. 4, 1946, the statement of claim was delivered, and, by para. 5, it limited the claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, to that of the administratrices, the claim of the wife under those Acts not being repeated. On Dec. 16, 1949, the plaintiffs applied to the district registrar for leave to strike out the administratrices from the parties named as plaintiffs (they having been, in view of the date of the grant of administration, improperly joined), and to make consequential amendments in the writ and statement of claim, including an amendment to para. 5, so as to substitute a claim by the wife under the Acts of 1846-1908 for that of the administratrices. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal as regards the substitution of the wife's claim, but allowed the appeal in respect of the deletion of the administratrices from those named as plaintiffs and the consequential amendments. The costs of the appeal were awarded against the plaintiffs, they having failed on the only issue of substance between the parties.

ASQUITH, L.J. (having stated the facts): Two authorities have been cited to the court which appear to decide that where a writ contains two separate claims endorsed on it, and later, when the statement of claim comes to be delivered, one of those claims does not appear in it, then either there is no power to grant leave to amend to restore it, or, at all events, the discretion of the court ought not to be exercised in favour of permitting such an amendment. The first authority is Cargill v. Bower (1). I need not consider, in detail, the facts therein, which are quite different from those in this case. In his judgment, FRY, J., said (10 Ch.D. 508):

"The plaintiff . . . issued his writ in November, and it was addressed to two things, rescission of the contract and indemnity against future liability arising under it. This, no doubt, was a perfectly consistent claim, for rescission might not be granted at the hearing, and liability might accrue under the contract before the hearing. Then, in December the plaintiff appeared as a contributory on the hearing of the winding-up petition and supported the prayer, and costs were allowed to him as a contributory supporting the petition. In April, 1876, he delivered his statement of claim, and he dropped out of the prayer all claim to relief in the nature of rescission of the contract, and only asked for relief in the nature of indemnity. Afterwards an application was made in the winding-up to put him on the list of contributories, he resisted the application, and it was ordered to stand over until after the trial of this action. Under these circumstances I think that I ought not to give leave to amend the statement of claim. It is not necessary for me to say whether the plaintiff has finally elected to approbate the contract, but I think that he has by his conduct at any rate expressed an intention and desire to assert his claim to rescission of the contract only in the winding-up proceedings."

A The learned judge, therefore, refused to give leave to amend. That decision, which might seem to be based partly, at any rate, on the facts of that case, on approbation and reprobation, was considered in Lewis and Lewis v. Durnford (2), an action decided by SWINFEN EADY, J. He said (24 T.L.R. 65):

"... it was said that the claim for £100 liquidated damages precluded the granting of an injunction. It was true the writ claimed both forms of remedy; but the claim endorsed thereon was superseded by the statement of claim, and under Ord. 20, r. 4, a plaintiff was entitled in his statement of claim to alter, modify, or extend his claim without amending his writ. It had been held in Cargill v. Bower (1) that where a plaintiff in his statement of claim omits part of his claim, he will be deemed to have abandoned that part."

C Having regard to those two decisions, I think our proper course in this case is not to allow this amendment.

If, however, we are not bound by authority, but have a discretion, the question arises whether we ought to exercise our discretion to allow an amendment in a case in which there has been such a long lapse of time between the apparent abandonment of the claim and the attempt to revive it? The statement of claim was delivered on Nov. 4, 1946, and it was not until December, 1949, that this application for leave to amend was made. I think that in those circumstances amendment ought to be refused, and that part of the appeal, therefore, fails.

D The first paragraph of the endorsement on the writ, viz., the claims of the administratrices, is a nullity under Hilton v. Sutton Steam Laundry (3). In that case, which was also a case under the Fatal Accidents Acts, it was held in an action brought by the plaintiff as administratrix of her deceased husband's estate, but who had not taken out letters of administration when the writ was issued, that the writ was a nullity and was not validated by the subsequent grant of administration. That decision was accepted by all parties in this court, and, therefore, to that limited extent the appeal succeeds.

E ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. The effect of the statement of claim in this case was to abandon the claim which it is now sought to restore to the statement of claim. If that claim has been abandoned, this application must be an application to raise the claim de novo, and I should hesitate long before allowing someone to raise a claim de novo by amendment if at that time he could not successfully raise that claim by an original action.

Enemy—Enemy property—Financial agreement between Great Britain and ex-enemy Power—Action by ex-enemy Power to enforce agreement—Competence—Financial Agreement, Apr. 17, 1947 (Treaty Series, No. 31 (1947), Annex to No. 6), arts. 1, 2, 5.

By the Treaty of Peace with Italy, Feb. 10, 1947 (Treaty Series, No. 50 (1948)), art. 79: "1. Each of the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to seize, retain, liquidate or take any other action with respect to all property rights and interests which on the coming into force of the present Treaty are within its territory and belong to Italy or to Italian nationals and to apply such property or the proceeds thereof to such purposes as it may desire, within the limits of its claims and those of its nationals against Italy or Italian nationals, including debts, other than claims fully satisfied under other articles of the present Treaty. All Italian property, or the proceeds thereof, in excess of the amount of such claims, shall be returned. 2. The liquidation and disposition of Italian property shall be carried out in accordance with the law of the Allied or Associated Power concerned. The Italian owner shall have no rights with respect to such property except those which may be given him by that law . . . 6. The property covered by para. 1 of this article shall be deemed to include Italian property which has been subject to control by reason of a state of war existing between Italy and the Allied or Associated Power having jurisdiction over the property . . ."

By the Financial Agreement between the United Kingdom and Italy, Apr. 17, 1947 (Treaty Series, No. 31 (1947), Annex to No. 6: "1. The government of the United Kingdom will transfer to the Italian government all the liquid assets now held as Italian property by the Custodians. 2. The government of the United Kingdom will release to the original owners . . . any Italian property now vested in or under the control of the Custodians other than the liquid assets referred to above . . . 5. The Italian government, . . . will notify the Controller-General . . . under which of the following three categories it desires that such non-liquid property should be treated, viz.: (a) Properties to be realised in order to increase the sterling amount available for the payment of debts. (b) Properties to be released to the former owners or to their legal representatives. (c) Properties the disposal of which under (a) and (b) is to be deferred for further consideration."

King Victor Emanuel III of Italy possessed a private fortune in this country consisting of cash, British government securities, and investments, which, on the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Italy, became vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. King Victor Emanuel III abdicated his throne on May 9, 1946, and died in exile on Dec. 28, 1947. On Mar. 5, 1949, letters of administration of his estate were granted to Hambros Bank as attorney administrators. On January 18, 1949, the Custodian of Enemy Property, under directions of the Board of Trade, paid £78,248 by way of estate duty on the footing that the property had passed on the death of King Victor Emanuel III, and, on Mar. 10, 1949, transferred the balance to Hambros Bank. The Republic of Italy claimed a declaration that, by reason of the provisions of the Financial Agreement of Apr. 17, 1947, the transfer of the property by the Custodian of Enemy Property to Hambros Bank was a breach of his obligations, and an injunction to restrain Hambros Bank from dealing with the property.

HELD: the Financial Agreement of Apr. 17, 1947, was not cognizable or justiciable by the court, and, accordingly, did not confer rights on the Republic of Italy enforceable by the court.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, the Republic of Italy, claimed a declaration that by reason of the provisions of a Financial Agreement of Apr. 17, 1947, between the Republic of Italy and the British Government, the property of the late King Victor Emanuel III of Italy in the United Kingdom was held by the Custodian of Enemy Property subject to a fiduciary obligation to give effect to the provisions of the Agreement and that the payment and transfer of the property by the Custodian of Enemy Property to Hambros Bank on Mar. 10, 1949, was unlawful and in breach of his obligations.

The plaintiffs also asked for an injunction to restrain the bank from dealing with the property, and, alternatively, claimed damages. VAISEY, J., held that the Financial Agreement of Apr. 17, 1947, was not cognisable or justiciable by the court and gave judgment for the defendants without costs other than a half contribution to the cost of the shorthand notes and transcript.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and V. Pennington for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., Cozens-Hardy Horne and Megaw for the first defendants (Hambros Bank).

Charles Russell, K.C., and Denys Buckley for the second defendant (the Custodian of Enemy Property).

Feb. 9. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. I wish to say at the outset that what I know of this case (though my knowledge is admittedly imperfect) has not a little disturbed me, for it was hinted to me (or, perhaps, rather more than hinted) that there had been some misapprehension of fact (entertained by I know not whom) which had given rise to the transactions of which the Republic of Italy, the plaintiffs in this action, are complaining. I gather that some person or authority (not identified) had acted in the erroneous belief that the plaintiffs had either given their previous consent to those transactions, or could be safely assumed to be willing to accord their subsequent approval to those transactions. I desire, therefore, to express myself with reserve, and to confine my judgment to what I conceive to be the one and only issue before me, that is to say, whether the plaintiffs can in this court and in this action obtain as against the defendants the relief which they are seeking, or any part of such relief. Have the plaintiffs a cause of action? Are these proceedings maintainable? Or are they, in the time-honoured expression, "frivolous and vexatious" and an abuse of the process of the court"?—words familiar in our legal phraseology, though they might appear to the uninstructed to be somewhat incongruous when applied to such a case as the present. I do not like even in appearance to attribute to the Republic of Italy, to those who direct its fortunes, or to those who speak in its name, any feelings of, or even akin to, levity or disrespect, or to imply, however remotely, the existence of some possible impropriety in the method of their approach to this court. I would rather put the alternatives thus: Is the action maintainable, or is it misconceived? A

The point seems, indeed, to be narrowed down to this: Are the terms of a certain agreement, arrangement, or bargain made in Rome on Apr. 17, 1947, between the government of the United Kingdom, acting by His Majesty's ambassador there, and the government of Italy, acting by Count Sforza, its Foreign Secretary, which I may conveniently call "the Financial Agreement," justiciable or cognisable in the courts of this country, as forming part of our municipal or domestic law? Or is the agreement the outcome of a negotiation between high contracting parties, resulting in a treaty, placed apart from and above our general law and so outside my ken and purview? It was frankly admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that their rights, if any, arise out of the Financial Agreement and have no other source, and that, unless the former of the two alternative views which I have just formulated can be established, their case must necessarily fail. C

The action concerns the private fortune in this country of the late King Victor Emanuel III of Italy, which is said to have amounted to some £1,500,000. At the outbreak of the war between this country and Italy, that fortune, consisting partly of cash, partly of British government securities, and partly of investments quoted on the London Stock Exchange, became vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property, the second defendant, under and for the purposes of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders and regulations made thereunder. On or about May 9, 1946, the late King (who is admitted to have been at all material times an "Italian national") abdicated his throne. On Dec. 28, 1947, he died in exile. On Mar. 5, 1949, letters of administration to his estate were granted out of the Principal Probate Registry to Hambros Bank, Limited, the first defendants, as attorney administrators. On Feb. 10, 1947, a Treaty of Peace between the United Kingdom and certain other powers, on the one hand, and Italy, on the other hand, was signed in Paris, and, having been ratified by Italy on Sept. 15, 1947, it came into force on that day in accordance with its terms. This Treaty of Peace is a very lengthy document, but I need only refer to so much of art. 79 of it as empowered the United Kingdom to seize, retain, liquidate, or take any other action with respect to all property, rights, and interests which on the coming into force of the Peace Treaty were within its territory and belonged to Italy or to Italian nationals, and to apply such property or the proceeds thereof to such purposes as it might desire within the limits of its claims and those of its nationals (including certain debts), followed by a direction that all Italian property or the proceeds thereof in excess of the amount of such claims should be returned, meaning, I think, returned to the former owners of the property. Paragraph 2 of art. 79 provided that the liquidation and disposition of Italian property should be carried out so far as the United Kingdom was concerned in accordance with our law, and that the Italian owner should have no rights with respect to such property except those which might be given to him by our law. D E F G H

I now turn to the Financial Agreement which was entered into, as I have said, on Apr. 17, 1947. It took effect, according to its terms, on the date of the ratification of the Peace Treaty by Italy, that is to say, on Sept. 15, 1947. It sets out the provisions of art. 79 of the Peace Treaty, and recites that the

- Italian government, in consideration of the relinquishment by the United Kingdom government of certain of the debts mentioned in that article, desired to provide funds in the United Kingdom for the payment of certain debts which had not been so relinquished. Its operative parts deal with the liquidation and disposal of Italian property (thereby defined as meaning all property which on the relevant date, that is Sept. 15, 1947, was held by, among others, the defendant Custodian as belonging to Italy or Italian nationals) including, I should suppose, the property of the late King. It covered (a) Italian property consisting of liquid assets, and (b) other Italian property. Liquid assets were to be transferred to the Italian government to be utilised by them for the payment of the debts in this country with which Italian property was intended to be charged, as I shall presently mention, and the Italian government was to open an account, referred to as the Special Account, in the name of the Bank of Italy with the Bank of England into which the said liquid assets were to be paid. It would certainly seem that such of the late King's property as on Sept. 15, 1947, consisted of cash in the hands of the Custodian was liquid assets within the meaning and for the purposes of the Financial Agreement. As regards other Italian property, the Financial Agreement provided that it should at the request of the plaintiffs be realised and the net proceeds paid into the Special Account, with the object, so far as I can see, of increasing the amount available for the payment of the debts. The plaintiffs were to be liable for any deficit on the Special Account and were to be entitled to the free use of any surplus that might remain.

- The chronological order of events in this case is rather confusing, but I must next refer to the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act, 1947, which received the Royal assent on Apr. 29, 1947. This Act empowered His Majesty to make Orders in Council to give effect to the said Peace Treaty. Accordingly, by the Treaty of Peace (Italy) Order, 1948, it was directed that the provisions of (among other things) art. 79 of the Peace Treaty should (so far as they were by their nature capable of doing so) be and have effect as law, and that the property, rights, and interests therein mentioned (that is to say, the Italian property, rights, and interests referred to in the article) should be charged with the claims (including debts) therein mentioned. The Order further provided that any such property, rights, and interests so charged might, under the direction of the Treasury—and I quote the exact words (1948, S.I. No. 117, para 1 (2))—

- “... be transferred ... free of any such charge in accordance with the terms of any ... Agreement with the government of Italy affecting the said property, rights or interests to which His Majesty is or may be a party ...”

- It is here, if anywhere, that the Financial Agreement is brought into and made part of the law of this country. There are obvious difficulties about that view of the matter. In the first place, the words are permissive, not obligatory. Secondly, if the Financial Agreement was intended to be referred to, why was it not expressly mentioned? Thirdly, is there any authority or principle which enables me to hold that a contract such as the Financial Agreement made between high contracting parties and having all the appearance of a Treaty can be imported into and incorporated in our domestic law by a mere vague allusion, when there would have been no difficulty at all in doing so expressly and when an obvious opportunity for doing so presented itself?

The points which seem to arise are these. First, did the Financial Agreement confer rights on the plaintiffs which are enforceable in this court? Secondly, are those rights enforceable against the Custodian? Thirdly, are they enforceable against property in the hands of the defendant bank? Unless the first of these questions is answered in the affirmative, the action fails in limine. In my judgment, the reported decisions contain nothing to support, and everything to negative, its being so answered. I have been referred to the following, among other cases: Re Californian Fig Syrup Co.'s Trade Mark (1), Salaman v. Secretary of State for India (2), Stoeck v. Public Trustee (3), Civilian War Claimants Association Ltd. v. R. (4), and Hoani Te Heuheu Tukino v. Aotea District Maori Land Board (5). None of these authorities assists the plaintiffs in contending either that the Financial Agreement is not, in substance, a treaty or that I can in such an action as this take cognisance of it. It is to be observed that neither of the two defendants was a party to the Financial Agreement and that the British government, which was a party to it, is not a party to this action. What happened was this. The Custodian, admittedly in good faith and acting under directions of the Board of Trade (as he was entitled and probably bound to do), but without the consent or approval of the plaintiffs, in the early months of 1949 parted with the whole of the late King's property. A sum of £78,248 was applied in purported satisfaction of a claim for estate duty payable on the late King's death, and the balance was handed over to the defendant bank as the attorney administrators of the late King's estate. The plaintiffs say that this was contrary to and inconsistent with the terms of the Financial Agreement and that they are prejudiced thereby by the increase pro tanto of their liability to meet any deficit on the Special Account and by the reduction of the amount of the surplus or possible surplus on such account. It certainly looks as if the plaintiffs were very closely concerned in the matter, having regard to the Financial Agreement, and I cannot understand why they were not consulted. The Financial Agreement appears to be still in operation. Was it forgotten or overlooked on this occasion?

I end, as I began, in an atmosphere of some bewilderment. There must surely be some explanation of what is to me so inexplicable. Italy's entry into the war as an enemy of this country was a tragedy, and I cannot believe that the further, though minor, tragedy of a misunderstanding will be allowed to ensue now that peace is restored. Any person who has created or contributed to such a misunderstanding must have done (I should have thought) a grave disservice to both countries. I dismiss this action on the ground that the Financial Agreement is not cognisable or justiciable in this court, but it is only right that I should add that, even if it were, I doubt whether the necessary parties to any action to enforce its terms are before me. I shall make no order as to the costs, except to direct that the cost of taking the shorthand note of the two days' hearing and the provision of one transcript for my use should be divided equally, half and half, between the plaintiffs and the defendants.

[After hearing argument on the question of costs his lordship said he would adhere to the conclusion he reached in writing his judgment but would grant leave to appeal on the question of costs].

A Costs—Counsel's fees—Fees of counsel for trustees or executors on hearing of originating summons on the construction of a will.

SUMMONS to review taxation.

On an originating summons for the construction of a will it was ordered, inter alia, that the costs of the plaintiffs and the defendants be taxed as between solicitor and client and raised and paid out of the estate of the testator in due course of administration. The taxing master disallowed a proportion of the brief fees of counsel. Certain parties objected to the reduction, and the master, in answering and overruling the objections, said that, in endeavouring to arrive at the amount to be allowed, account must be taken of the work involved, which included not only the perusal of documents, but also consideration of legal principles and authorities. Some regard must also be had to the amount involved in the decision. In this case there was only one affidavit besides the affidavit of fitness of the guardian ad litem of the infant concerned in the matter. The will was of eighty folios. There was no opposition to the order asked for by the originating summons, and the summons only came before the court because the Attorney-General for New Brunswick decided that, as he represented the Crown, he could not consent to the order proposed, but that he would not oppose it. The time occupied in court, one hour and seventeen minutes, was not relevant, as it was unknown when the fee was fixed. The master emphasised that he was not deciding what a client should pay his counsel, but what fee was reasonable to be borne by the trust fund. It had been suggested that all juniors in a construction summons or like application to the court were entitled to the same brief fee, but the master rejected the suggestion as being at variance with the practice that, in fixing the fee, the work involved should be considered. That was why the brief of counsel for the trustees asking for the court's directions was usually marked less than counsel for a beneficiary or other party who had some definite view to urge. ROMER, J., varied the master's certificate, and, in the course of his judgment (of which a report is not otherwise necessary), said that it was right that briefs for plaintiff executors and trustees in ordinary cases should be marked similarly to those for defendant beneficiaries.

ROMER, J., directed that the certificate of the taxing master be varied so far as the first three defendants were concerned by restoring the fee to leading and junior counsel as marked on their briefs, and, in the course of his judgment, he said: My experience is that in the past the briefs for plaintiff executors or trustees in ordinary cases have been marked similarly to those for defendant beneficiaries, and, in my view, it is right that it should be so. Counsel for the plaintiffs in such cases has much preliminary work to do, which calls for skill and judgment and is remunerated only on a moderate scale. At the hearing such a counsel owes a considerable responsibility to his clients in seeing that nothing is overlooked. Further, the court is entitled to his assistance in argument, and frequently calls for it. For these reasons it would be very regrettable if a rule were to grow up that plaintiff's counsel should receive a fee lower than that of counsel for the beneficiaries.

Re GREENWOOD'S AGREEMENT. PARKUS v. GREENWOOD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), February 8, 9, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Renewal—Perpetual right of renewal—Lease for three years with option to renew for further period of three years on same terms “including the present covenant for renewal”—Law of Property Act, 1922 (c. 16), s. 145; sched. XV, para. 5.

An agreement dated Jan. 29, 1946, whereby premises were let for a term of three years from Jan. 30, 1946, contained the following option to renew: “The landlord will on the written request of the tenants made three calendar months before the expiration of the term hereby granted and if there shall not be at the time of such request any existing breach or non-observance of any of the agreements on the part of the tenant herein contained . . . grant to them a tenancy of the . . . premises for the further term of three years from the expiration of the said term at the same rent and containing the like agreements and provisions as are herein contained (including the present covenant for renewal) . . .” The agreement contained the usual covenants by the tenants and also a positive covenant for the user of the premises. An assignee of the agreement contended that, in view of the terms of the option to renew, the agreement constituted a perpetually renewable lease within the Law of Property Act, 1922, s. 145 and sched. XV, para. 5, and that, therefore, there was vested in him a term of two thousand years.

HELD: (i) the covenant was a covenant running with the land, and the benefit of the option to renew was not limited to the original tenants, but enured for the assignee.

(ii) although the covenant was not in terms expressed to be one for perpetual renewal, on its true construction the lease was a perpetually renewable lease within s. 145 and sched. XV, para. 5, and so took effect as a demise for two thousand years.

APPEAL of the assignee from a decision of HARMAN, J., dated Oct. 21, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 743.

A The assignee by his summons asked for a declaration that on the true construction of a lease dated July 29, 1946, for premises situate in Brick Lane, Stepney, he was granted a perpetually renewable lease which, under the provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1922, had been converted into a term of two thousand years. HARMAN, J., found that on the face of it the covenant for renewal in the agreement was not a covenant for perpetual renewal, but simply
B a covenant to renew once, and, therefore, the Law of Property Act, 1922, sched. XV, para. 5, did not apply to convey the term of two thousand years. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal with costs, holding that the perpetual renewal clause in the lease operated as a demise for the statutory term.

Michael Albery for the assignee.

C Hesketh for the respondent.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The short question raised by this appeal is whether the tenancy agreement or lease with which we are concerned (for it is conceded that for present purposes the result is the same, by whichever description it is called), created what is known to conveyancers as a perpetually
D renewable lease, so that, according to the provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1922, the term granted by the document is converted into one of two thousand years. HARMAN, J., came to the conclusion that there was sufficient material to be found in the language of the document (and the intention of the parties which he discerned from the document) to avoid a conclusion which plainly, I think, he felt to involve almost an absurdity; and I confess I feel sympathy with the learned judge.

E This is an agreement between two persons for the tenancy of premises at 96 Brick Lane, Stepney, with a workshop at the rear, for the use by the tenant of those premises as and for the tenant's business of a tailor (which is still its use) or such other mode of business as may be approved by the landlord. The original term was one of three years. It is at least probable to my mind that
F the parties to this document had not sufficiently informed themselves of the effect of modern legislation relating to real property. However that may be, HARMAN, J., in order to avoid a result from which he somewhat recoiled, found that, in applying the statute, a distinction could be drawn between cases in which there was to be found a covenant or an obligation in actual terms for perpetual renewal, on the one hand, and, on the other, cases in which the language used
G might, under the old law, have produced a similar effect, but was not in terms a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal. I have come to the conclusion, with all respect to HARMAN, J., that that distinction involves a refinement which cannot be supported.

It is first important to regard the language of the relevant sections of the Act of 1922 before approaching the material paragraph of sched. XV to that Act. Counsel for the assignee told us that these sections were not brought to the H attention of HARMAN, J. Perhaps, if they had been, he might have reached a different conclusion. The first relevant section is s. 145 which provides:

"For the purpose of converting perpetually renewable leases and underleases (not being an interest in perpetually renewable copyhold land enfranchised by Part V. of this Act, but including a perpetually renewable underlease derived out of an interest in perpetually renewable copyhold land) into long terms, for preventing the creation of perpetually renewable leasehold interests and for providing for the interests of the persons affected, the provisions contained in sched. XV to this Act shall have effect."

That section clearly manifests an intention by Parliament to put an end to perpetually renewable leasehold interests. I turn to the definition section, s. 190, para. (iii), which says:

" 'A perpetually renewable lease or underlease' means a lease or underlease the holder of which is entitled to enforce (whether or not subject to the fulfilment of any condition) the perpetual renewal thereof, and includes a lease or underlease for a life or lives . . . "

In the light of that definition it seems impossible to hold that in setting its face against perpetually renewable leaseholds Parliament only intended to deal with those leaseholds where the covenant or obligation was one in actual terms for perpetual renewal. The definition makes it reasonably clear, to my mind, that Parliament is dealing also with any renewable lease which falls within the definition, that is, one whereunder any lessee is entitled to enforce the perpetual renewal thereof.

It is next convenient to look at the vital paragraph in sched. XV, which is para. 5.

"A grant, after the commencement of this Act, of a term . . . or other leasehold interest with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal . . . shall . . . take effect as a demise for a term of two thousand years . . . to commence from the date fixed for the commencement of the term . . . or other interest, and in every case free from any obligation for renewal or for payment of any fines, fees, costs, or other money in respect of renewal."

Other paragraphs in the schedule are relevant to the effect of this conversion, and, put briefly, the tenant, instead of having periodically to apply in the prescribed manner for a new lease and pay any fines, costs, or other monies to be paid, remains on with a right, on giving the requisite notice, to put an end to the demise of two thousand years, and thus, so to speak, to contract out of the bargain instead of contracting into it although that last formula does, perhaps, rather less than justice to the full nature of the change. From the words I have read from para. 5 it is clear that Parliament thought it right that tenants should be relieved from the financial burden of costs or fines which might be exigible on renewal. They are also relieved of another obligation. Commonly in such renewable leaseholds the obligation of the landlord to renew is made conditional (and these courts have tended to construe the condition strictly) on the tenant at the date of his request not being in any breach of his covenants for repair or otherwise, so that, practically speaking, the landlord has been given a fairly firm control of the tenant's performance of his obligations. The effect of the conversion is very much to lighten the burden on the tenant in practice. Counsel for the assignee points out, however, that the tendency of modern legislation has obviously been in favour of protecting the security of a tenant's tenure, and there may, therefore, be nothing surprising in the circumstance that conversion does, as I think, substantially favour the tenant.

But these general considerations are, perhaps, of more interest than relevance. The question is whether this document which we have to construe falls within the terms of the definition I have read. Its date is Jan. 29, 1946, and the parties are David Greenwood, who is described as "the landlord," and two persons, Mark Lee and Jack Barnett, who are described as "the tenants." The present assignee is the assignee of the tenants, but the defendant is the original party to the agreement. The tenants' obligations in cl. 2 of the lease are in a form common and appropriate for a three-years' term of the premises in question, which are partly business premises and partly a residence. I have already mentioned that the tenants covenant to use the premises for their business "or such other mode of business as may be approved." There is a covenant against parting with possession though not in terms against assignment. Clause 11 provides :

A "The landlord hereby agrees with the tenants . . . (b) that the landlord will on the written request of the tenants made three calendar months before the expiration of the term hereby granted and if there shall not be at the time of such request any existing breach or non-observance of any of the agree-
B ments on the part of the tenant herein contained at the expense of the tenants grant to them a tenancy of the said premises for the further term of three years from the expiration of the said term at the same rent and containing the like agreements and provisions as are herein contained (including the present covenant for renewal) the tenant on the signature of
C such renewed agreement to sign a counterpart thereof and to pay the proper costs of such agreement and counterpart."

Counsel for the lessor took the point that the absence of any definition clause making the word "tenants" in this agreement comprehend not only Messrs. Lee and Barnett but all other persons in possession under the demise was a strong indication against treating this covenant which I have read as one for perpetual renewal. He did, however, concede that the provisions of s. 78 of the Law of D Property Act, 1925, will apply so that the covenants which can be said to relate to the land would enure for the benefit not only of the original tenants but also of any successors to their interest or estate. It is impossible to say (and counsel for the lessor was unable to support the suggestion with any authority) that a covenant for renewal in this form is not a covenant relating to land. It seems,
E as a matter of construction, equally impossible to hold that, if the covenant in para. 11 (a) for quiet enjoyment and the covenant for renewal are treated as entered into with the tenants and their successors in title, nevertheless the benefit of the right to renew is limited to the original tenants. Therefore, we have to approach this clause by treating it as though it were an agreement or covenant by the landlord with the tenants and their successors in title giving to the tenants and their successors whatever right of renewal on its proper construction para. (b) contains.

That being so, the argument comes down to the single point: Is a covenant not in terms expressed to be one for perpetual renewal, that is to say, not using those words or using any cognate expression, but being one which provides for renewal on the terms and conditions "as are herein contained (including the F present covenant for renewal)," one for perpetual renewal within the meaning of the Act of 1922? HARMAN, J., thought not, and he referred to, and I think in a measure relied on, the decision in Green v. Palmer (1), decided by UTHWATT, J., as a judge of first instance, as supporting his view. I shall say something on Green v. Palmer (1) later, but I note that HARMAN, J., though he derived some comfort from it, expressed himself as not entirely able to comprehend the
G reasoning which underlay it. The truth is, I think, that it has been long established that as a matter of conveyancing machinery a well-recognised method of producing perpetually renewable leaseholds was by just this form of covenant which has been adopted here. The authority, and it has stood, not only unchallenged, but affirmed and cited time and again, for nearly one hundred years, is Hare v. Burges (2), a case which came before LORD HATHERLEY
H as a judge of first instance. That was a lease for lives by deed and it contained various covenants including this covenant in regard to renewal. Paul Lord Methuen, who was the lessor (4 K. & J. 45)

"... did ... covenant, grant, and agree with and to Sir John Hare [the lessee] that in case Sir John Hare, his heirs or assigns, should, upon the decease of either of them the said Charles Hare, Leonard, and Harris, be desirous of taking a further or renewed lease of the said demised premises for another life, and should, within the space of twelve calendar months next after such decease, give notice in writing of such desire unto Lord Methuen, or the person or persons for the time being entitled to the reversion of the premises expectant on the determination of the demise thereby made, and should nominate any person in the room or stead of the person who should have so departed this life, Paul Lord Methuen, or the person or persons for the time being entitled as aforesaid, would, at the request and at the costs and charges of Sir John Hare, his heirs or assigns, and on the surrender of the present lease, on payment of the sum of £134 5s. 0d. by way of fine or premium for such renewal, forthwith duly make and execute unto Sir John Hare, his heirs or assigns, a new and further lease of all and singular the premises thereinbefore demised, for and during the natural life of the person so to be nominated, and the lives of such of them the said Charles Hare, Leonard, and Harris, as should be then living, and of the survivors and survivor of them, at and under the same yearly rent, and with and subject to such and the same covenants, provisos and agreements, 'including this present covenant,' as were therein contained."

The argument was that each new lease granted should not be treated as containing the whole of that provision including particularly the words "including this present covenant" as set out in full again—in other words, that this provision should be construed as promising to put into the new lease all the provisions of the covenant in question except those words "including this present covenant," so that they operated once but no more. That argument was rejected and it was held that the effect of inserting those words, "including this present covenant", was to express in terms an intention to make the right to renew perpetual. The material part of the judgment, following the statement, which has been so often repeated, that there is a tendency in the court against construing provisions in documents of this kind as providing for perpetual renewal, is this (ibid., 56):

"That being the rule of the court in construing a covenant so generally worded, conveyancers have taken this course: finding that the courts would not imply such an intention, they have said, 'we will express it.' And the course they have taken in order to express it has been, to add to the general words which the courts have held as necessary to imply such an intention [I think that should read 'as insufficient to imply such an intention'] the words 'including this present covenant.' That this has been the history of the law in these cases is clear . . ."

That statement seems to be as clear an authority as possible that the addition of the words "including this present covenant for renewal," or comparable words, to the general terms "upon like conditions and agreements as are herein contained" is as a matter of conveyancing to be taken as an expression of intention that the right of renewal is to be perpetual.

Wynn v. Conway Corpn. (3) was a case of a document different in form because it had language which in terms involved perpetual renewal. The significance for the present purposes of the case seems to be that in it Hare v. Burges (2) was approved in this court. Not only that, but from the examples given to us by counsel for the assignee, taken from DAVIDSON'S CONVEYANCING PRECEDENTS, 21st ed., and BYTHEWOOD AND JARMAN'S CONVEYANCING PRECEDENTS, 2nd ed., the statement of LORD HATHERLEY in Hare v. Burges (2) is obviously borne out by the facts. In those circumstances I feel unable to say that a lease containing such a formula as does the present is not within the definition which I have read from s. 190 (iii) of the Act of 1922. In other words, having regard to this formula, this is a perpetually renewable leasehold and the results of conversion pursuant to sched. XV to the Act of 1922 inevitably follow.

I said that I would say a word further on Green v. Palmer (1), a case in which, perhaps, any judge would feel even stronger inclination than in the present to avoid a result which on the face of it would appear unlikely to have been contemplated by the parties, for it was a furnished tenancy for a period of six months only. The material passage which the court had to construe was ([1944] 1 All E.R. 670):

- A     “ “ The tenant is hereby granted the option of continuing the tenancy for a further period of six months on the same terms and conditions including this clause, provided the tenant gives to the landlord in writing four weeks’ notice of his intention to exercise his option.”

- UTHWATT, J., having regard to the circumstances of the case read into this provision the qualification that “ the same terms and conditions including this clause ” must be read as meaning “ including this clause ” on the first occasion,
B but, when the clause came to be operated again there was no ground for once more reproducing the whole formula, including the option to renew. I share with HARMAN, J., considerable difficulty in following the logic of the argument, but it may well be a circumstance which has to be borne in mind that this was a six-month’s tenancy of furnished premises and we have not got in the report a full statement of all the terms of the lease. They may have contained covenants
C or obligations with regard to specific furniture which might have forced a court to give a strained or artificial construction to a formula which otherwise in essentials I should have thought hardly possible to distinguish from that of the present case.

- Counsel for the lessor concedes that his main argument involved this court saying that Hare v. Burges (2) could not be treated as authority. He said that,
D after all, counsel for the assignee had felt no reluctance in saying that we should overrule Green v. Palmer (1). If the whole of the facts in Green v. Palmer (1) are stated in the report it is difficult to see how that case can stand with Hare v. Burges (2), and, since I regard Hare v. Burges (2) as well-established, it would follow that Green v. Palmer (1) ought not to be followed. I, therefore, say no more about it than that it seems to me that, if Green v. Palmer (1) were to be
E followed in another case, it would have to be shown that the facts in that other case were for practical purposes identical with the very special facts in Green v. Palmer (1). On the facts of the present case I do not think that Green v. Palmer (1) should be followed. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

- SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. I cannot find any words in the Act of 1922
F (and, as my Lord has said, we were referred to certain relevant sections to which the attention of HARMAN, J., was not drawn) which would justify the exclusion from the provisions of sched. XV of leases which on their true construction are perpetually renewable but where words referring to perpetual renewal or some such phrase are not to be found in the relevant covenant. I have nothing which I wish to add to the reasons which have been given by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, G M.R. I would also like to express my agreement with him when he said that, having regard to our decision in this case, Green v. Palmer (1) cannot be regarded as an authority.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

M. and R. committed an act of bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (a), by executing a deed of assignment of their property to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The council did not assent to the deed, and subsequently presented a bankruptcy petition against M. and R. On Sept. 28, 1949, a receiving order was made against M. and R. M. appealed on the ground that the debt alleged was not a good petitioning creditor's debt in law.

HELD: having regard to the use of the word "debts" in s. 30, s. 33, and s. 1 (1) (f) of the Act of 1914 the council was a "creditor" and the unpaid rates were a "debt" within s. 4 (1) (b) of the Act, and, therefore, the rates were a debt which would support a bankruptcy petition.

APPEAL by a debtor from an order of the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division, dated Dec. 5, 1949, and reported ante, p. 30, dismissing his appeal from a receiving order made on Sept. 28, 1949, by the registrar of the Southend County Court.

The petition was presented by the Benfleet Urban District Council to whom the debtor (and his business partner, who did not resist the petition or appeal against the order) owed a large sum in rates. The debtor argued on appeal that the unpaid arrears of rates were not such a debt as would support a bankruptcy petition. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Aronson, K.C., and M. V. S. Hunter for the debtor.

Christie, K.C., and Caplan for the Benfleet Urban District Council.

C. W. Chandler for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Feb. 9. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The issue raised by this appeal is whether rates assessed, demanded and unpaid are a "debt," and the rating authority to whom the rates are due is a "creditor" who can petition, within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 4, the relevant provisions of which are:

"(1) A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless . . . (b) the debt is a liquidated sum, payable either immediately or at some certain future time . . ."

The rating authority here is the Benfleet Urban District Council, whom we will refer to as the council. Their petition sets out that the debtors, Mr. McGreavey and Mr. Rundle, who carried on business as partners, were justly and truly indebted to the council for £4,489 6s. 11d. for general rates, and that an act of bankruptcy had been committed—and this is not disputed—within three months by an assignment of their property to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors generally. The council were not a party to and have not assented to this deed. A receiving order was made on this petition by the registrar on Sept. 28, 1949. Mr. Rundle did not, but Mr. McGreavey did, appeal against that order to the Divisional Court. The issue which we have to decide was raised as an additional ground before the Divisional Court, consisting of HARMAN and ROMER, JJ., who dismissed the appeal. From that decision Mr. McGreavey appeals to this court. We are told, and we accept, that there is no case of a petition based on rates to be found in the bankruptcy records.

The main argument was based on the fact that unpaid rates cannot be recovered by an ordinary action. It was submitted, therefore, that there was no "debt" within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 4 (1) (b). It is common ground that unpaid rates are not recoverable by action, but it is necessary at the outset to refer to the statutes with regard to rates and their recovery. By 43 and 44 Eliz., c. 2, which first created rates, the overseers, by s. 2, were authorised by warrant from two justices to levy the rates arrears "of everyone that shall refuse to contribute according as they shall be assessed" by distress and sale of the offender's goods. By the Distress for Rates Act, 1849, s. 2, it is provided that if no, or no sufficient, goods or chattels can be found on the execution of such a warrant, it shall be lawful for the justices to issue a warrant of commitment ordering the person on whom the rates have been assessed to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding three months, unless the sums therein mentioned shall be sooner paid. The general law as to the making of rates, appeals, and so on, is now contained in the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. Section 1 (2) of that Act transferred the powers and duties of the overseers of the poor, in relation to the making, levying and collection of rates, to the rating authority. The Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, s. 10, modified s. 2 of the Act cited of 1849. If the justices are of opinion that the failure to pay the rates was not due either to wilful default or culpable neglect, they are not to issue the warrant. If no warrant is issued, the justices are given power to remit the payment of part or all of the sums to which the application relates. It was decided by this court in Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (1) that an action by a local authority to recover unpaid arrears of rates will not lie. Reference will have to be made to some observations in the judgment in that case later, but it clearly decided that unpaid rates are not an actionable debt.

We will now consider the relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Counsel for the debtor relied on the history of certain provisions, on dicta in various cases, and on the absence of any case in which a liability for rates has been made the basis of a petition. We have borne these matters in mind and will refer to them in detail later, but we prefer in the first place to state what seems to us the natural construction of the provisions of the Act which we have to construe and apply. Section 4 (1) (b) has already been read. There is an express reference to rates in the Act, to be found in s. 33 (1) which provides:

"In the distribution of the property of a bankrupt there shall be paid in priority to all other debts—(a) All parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before that time, and all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment."

The wording of para. (a) makes it clear that rates are regarded as becoming "due and payable." When a sum for rates is lawfully demanded it does, we would have thought in the ordinary meaning of words, become due and payable, although not actionable. The section also makes it clear that rates are provable. If a man has been made bankrupt, owing a sum for rates, it is not disputed that a rating authority has a "remedy" by proving for the sum due in the bankruptcy. It is, with assessed taxes, given a priority.

An argument for the council was based on the words "all other debts." This implies, it was said, that rates are a debt for all the purposes of this Act, including s. 4. This is not, in our opinion, a conclusive argument by reason of the provisions of s. 30. That section sets out what is and what is not provable in bankruptcy. It is necessary to read sub-ss. (1), (2), (3) and (8) of s. 30. It is clear from sub-s. (3) that the expression "all other debts" in s. 33 is given a special and extended meaning, and it would not necessarily follow that the word "debt" in s. 4 had this same extended meaning. Sub-section (8) of s. 30 shows that there are provable debts which would not support a petition, being outside the express provisions of s. 4. On the other hand, reading s. 30 and s. 33 together, we come to the conclusion that rates are within the word "debts" in s. 30 and are not brought in as a "liability," which is deemed to be a debt. In the first place, we think that the word "debt," apart from any indication from the context to the contrary, would in its natural meaning cover a liability for rates. It is, undoubtedly, a sum due. If a man were asked to make a list of his debts, he would clearly include it. In the second place, if the word "debt" is to be construed in its narrow procedural sense as meaning a sum for which an action can be brought, leaving rates to be brought in as a liability, we would have expected an express reference to rates in sub-s. (8), having regard to the express reference to rates in s. 33.

We will now consider the wording of s. 4 and the sections which precede it. Section 1, which sets out what constitutes acts of bankruptcy, provides as follows in sub-s. (1) (f):

"If he [a debtor] files in the court a declaration of his inability to pay his debts or presents a bankruptcy petition against himself:"

It seems to us plain that unpaid rates must be a "debt" to be taken into account when a debtor is considering whether he is in a position to file a declaration within the opening words of this paragraph. Section 3 provides:

"Subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, if a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy the court may, on a bankruptcy petition being presented either by a creditor or by the debtor, make an order, in this Act called a receiving order, for the protection of the estate."

A When one comes to s. 4, which has already been read, its wording, we think, tends to negative the view that "debt" is used in its pleading or procedural sense. If it were, it would be unnecessary to provide that the debt must be a liquidated sum.

B Whether or not "debts" extends in s. 1 to all provable debts, we find no grounds in the Act for construing the word "debt" in s. 4 as referring only to debts in the pleading or procedural sense. Considering the words in s. 4, having regard to the use of the word "debts" in s. 30, s. 33 and s. 1 (1) (f), we would come to the conclusion that the council is a creditor and the unpaid rates a debt within s. 4. We think considerable support for this construction is to be found in Lloyd v. Heathcote (2). The question there was whether the bankrupt had begun "to keep house with intent to delay creditors." A collector of rates had called and been told by the bankrupt's wife on his instruction that he (the bankrupt) was not at home. It was argued that this was not sufficient, as the C bankrupt could not be proceeded against immediately, but only by distress on a justices' warrant. In the course of his judgment DALLAS, C.J., said (5 Moore C.P. 137):

D "But it has been contended, that the collector was not a creditor, as he could not immediately sue the bankrupt for his debt. The argument, however, rests on fallacy, as it confounds the debt with the remedy, and assumes that the former cannot exist unless the debtor may be sued in the usual and ordinary manner. . . . The collector was in the nature of an agent duly entitled to demand and receive them, and when the assessment was made, the debt was created, and might be immediately demanded."

PARK, J., said (ibid. 139):

E "I am further of opinion, that the collector of the rates in question was in a situation to apply for them as a debt due at the time, and concur with the distinction as drawn by my Lord Chief Justice, as to the debt being due, and the effect the denial might have, in postponing the remedy of the collector."

BURROUGH, J., said (ibid. 140):

F "The rate is in the nature of a debt, and it is immaterial whether it be immediately suable or not, for if a remedy be given to recover the assessments due, they must stand in the same situation as debts which are usually suable."

G It is, we think, relevant that at that date, when the old forms of action existed, the word "debt" in relation to bankruptcy proceedings was regarded as apt to describe unpaid rates.

H Although in certain contexts the word "debt" means a liquidated sum which can be sued for, to treat the word as prima facie so restricted, is, we think, to confuse, as DALLAS, C.J., said, the debt with the remedy. This is well illustrated by the wording of the Infants Relief Act, 1874, s. 2, which was considered in Rawley v. Rawley (3):

"No action shall be brought . . . upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy . . ."

We were referred to STROUD'S JUDICIAL DICTIONARY, 2nd ed., p. 471, where that case is cited as authority for the statement:

"A 'Debt' is a sum payable in respect of a liquidated money demand, recoverable by action."

We have quoted one of the statutes being construed, in which the word "debt" is used to cover what was plainly not recoverable. MELLISH, L.J., in dealing with the Statute of Set-off (2 Geo. II., c. 22, s. 13) on which the case turned, quoted (1 Q.B.D. 467) from a judgment of WILDE, C.J., in Francis v. Dodsworth (4) (4 C.B. 220):

"The judicial construction of this section has been, that no debts can be used by way of set-off except such as are recoverable by action; and it has accordingly been held that the Statute of Limitations may be replied to a plea of set-off."

The language implies that the word "debts" covers sums which are not recoverable by action. The statement in STROUD must be read in the context of the decision, which was, in substance, that, if no action can be maintained, a debt cannot be set off.

We will now deal with the argument based on the history of this legislation. Counsel for the debtor started with the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but we think it is worth referring to the earlier Bankruptcy Act, 1861. That Act made provision in s. 89 for the amount of the petitioning creditor's debt, and in s. 97 provided a way in which secured debts were to be reckoned and expressly excluded debts barred by the Statute of Limitations. In the Act of 1869, s. 6 provided:

"... moreover, the debt of the petitioning creditor must be a liquidated sum due at law or in equity ..."

It had been held that an equitable creditor could not petition: see, e.g., Medlicot's Case (5). We will assume for the moment, without deciding, that "due at law" in this context means recoverable by action. In the Act of 1883 the words "due at law or in equity" are omitted, and the relevant provisions of s. 6 are identical with those of s. 4 of the Act of 1914. It is suggested that the only reason for the omission was the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that we must, therefore, read in the words "due at law." It would clearly not be sufficient to read in "due" as the words we have quoted from s. 33 make it clear that the rates are treated as "due." No doubt, in certain circumstances previous legislation is of legitimate assistance to construction. There can, however, be no presumption that Parliament has not intended to alter the law when words are changed or omitted. Suppose that when the Bill was under discussion it had been suggested that simply to omit these words might extend the scope of the section in certain directions, Parliament might have thought such an extension desirable. We have ourselves considerable doubt as to the premise of the argument. Once it appears that rates are treated as "due and payable" when assessed and demanded, we should have thought they were probably within the words "due at law." It was submitted that Parliament, having set up the procedure under which a defaulting ratepayer might, in certain circumstances, be imprisoned, and in certain circumstances have a remission of rates, would not allow a rating authority the further or alternative right of petitioning in bankruptcy in respect of the unpaid rates. We do not follow this argument. There seems to us no kind of inconsistency in having one procedure perhaps more appropriate for small sums due from individuals, and another, and in some cases an alternative, procedure more suitable for large sums due from individuals or limited companies.

Before coming to the dicta relied on by counsel for the debtor, we would like to make a general observation. An obiter dictum, though not binding, may be of great assistance in coming to a conclusion if it is clear that its author had in mind the issue which one has to decide. If not, it is of little, if any, help, and it is very often unfair to its author to seek to extend it to an area which he was clearly not considering. For example, counsel for the debtor, who was, if we may say so, right in drawing our attention to these dicta, referred to the observations ([1938] 1 All E.R. 494) by SLESSER, L.J., in Liverpool Corpn.

v. Hope (1), that the only remedy which is afforded to a local authority entitled to rates is the remedy of distress. We agree with what was said by the Divisional Court, that the lord justice was addressing his mind only to the question before him, namely, whether a remedy by action was available. He clearly had not in mind, and was not considering, the construction of the Bankruptcy Act as applicable to rates. Under that Act there is admittedly "a remedy" other than distress, namely, proof in the bankruptcy.

A We will deal next with Ex p. Muirhead, Re Muirhead (6). In that case a co-respondent in a divorce suit was ordered to pay £5,000 into the registry. As he was abroad, the order was altered and the sum was ordered to be paid to the husband, he undertaking to pay it into the registry. It was held this did not constitute a good petitioning creditor's debt. The ratio decidendi is stated by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Re A Debtor (No. 975 of 1937) (7) where he says ([1938] 2 All E.R. 533):

"... the reason why it was held insufficient ... was that it merely put the petitioner into the position of a conduit pipe for bringing the money to the court, and gave him no rights of his own with regard to it."

C The decision does not, of course, assist us here. COCKBURN, C.J., in the course of his judgment in Ex p. Muirhead (6), says (2 Ch.D. 25):

"Now in order to constitute a good petitioning creditor's debt, you must have that which may be the immediate subject of an action at law or suit in equity."

D The law at that time was contained in s. 6 of the Act of 1869. As a general statement it is inaccurate now, in that a debt payable at a certain future date is a good petitioning creditor's debt. Quite plainly, however, the Lord Chief Justice had not in mind the question whether, on the construction of the 1869 Act as a whole, rates which are referred to as due and payable for the purpose of proof, in s. 32 of that Act, were "due at law" within s. 6.

E In Seaman v. Burley (8) this court had to consider the question whether proceedings before justices under a local Act for a warrant of distress in respect of unpaid rates with power to commit to prison if there was insufficient distress was a criminal cause or matter. It was argued that the power to imprison was not punishment, but a process for enforcement of a civil liability, like an order for commitment under the Debtors Act, 1869. It was in this context that LORD ESHER, M.R., said ([1896] 2 Q.B. 347):

F "Therefore, assuming the contention that the rate is a debt to be well founded, which I do not admit, nevertheless, if the legislature have enacted that it may be recovered or enforced by criminal procedure, there can be no appeal to this court. But I do not think it is true to say that the obligation to pay the rate is a debt. It is certainly not a debt in the ordinary sense of the term. No one can bring an action for it. It is a payment to be made in pursuance of a public duty, which cannot be enforced by action or in any other way than by proceedings before magistrates."

G The passage shows that a decision of this issue was not necessary for LORD ESHER's decision on the appeal. The words used show that LORD ESHER had not in mind bankruptcy proceedings where rates are admittedly provable priority "debts." With respect, we think a rate is a debt in the ordinary sense, though it may well not be so for the purposes of the argument which LORD ESHER was considering.

H We were also referred to a passage in a speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Potts v. Hickman (9) ([1940] 4 All E.R. 495, 496). The decision in that case is not relevant, but in the passage cited the Lord Chancellor confirmed the view that had been previously expressed that justices, when granting a distress warrant for rates, are proceeding judicially. This, no doubt, is an instance of what is plain, that there is this special procedure for dealing with defaulting ratepayers. It does not, in our opinion, advance the argument. We were also referred to Re Hunter (10). That case turned on special powers given by statute to the Collector General of Rates in the city of Dublin and we do not think it assists. In Re North Bucks Furniture Depositories, Ltd. (11), the question was whether a rating authority, to whom rates were due from a limited company which had obtained a distress warrant, but found no goods and chattels on which to levy distress, was a "creditor" within the Companies Act, 1929, s. 170, and could present a petition to wind-up the company. CROSSMAN, J., decided that it was. The company did not appear, but counsel for the petitioners drew the attention of the learned judge to Liverpool Corp'n. v. Hope (1). In s. 264 (1) of the Act of 1929 there is a provision similar to that in s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, giving rates a preference in the winding-up, and referring to them inferentially as debts. Counsel for the debtor argued that that case could be distinguished as there was no section corresponding to s. 4. The Acts are, of course, different, but, as it seems to us, the reasoning of CROSSMAN, J., is, mutatis mutandis, on the same lines as our reasoning in the present case, and we agree with his conclusion. It is satisfactory that there should be uniformity and that in both cases a rating authority to whom rates are owed is a creditor who can present a petition. We have examined, but do not propose to set out, the relevant sections of the Companies Acts. It is sufficient to say that, if the conclusion to which we have come on the Bankruptcy Act is right, the decision of CROSSMAN, J., on the sections which he had to construe seems to us, a fortiori, right.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that the conclusion to which we have come is a surprising one. It does not surprise us. Rating authorities, in carrying out their duties, have not sought a decision of the courts as to whether unpaid rates would support a petition in bankruptcy. Since 1861, with the possible exception of the period 1869 to 1883, there was clearly an argument for this contention, having regard to the general meaning of words and the observations in Lloyd v. Heathcote (2). The point not having been raised, it would not have been surprising if one had found that the words used in the relevant Act excluded a rating authority from petitioning, but, considering the code as a whole, it seems to us sensible that the body which is given priority among those who can prove in the bankruptcy should have a right, if so minded, to petition. We agree with the Divisional Court, for substantially the same reasons, and, in our opinion, this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed. The trustee in bankruptcy was refused his costs of the appeal on the ground that it was not the practice for the trustee to appear unless there were circumstances in which he could assist the court. As regards the remainder of the costs, the court ordered that a sum of £20 which had been paid into court should be paid out in part satisfaction of the costs, and that the balance of the costs should be added to the petitioning creditor's costs in the proceedings.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Greene, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey and Lord Morton of Henryton), October 24, 25, 26, 27, 31, November 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 1949, February 6, 1950.]

A Libel—Privilege—Qualified privilege—Malice—Evidence—Expression of opinion—Opinion actuated by financial considerations—Right of defence against written attack—Procedure at trial.

On Sept. 22, 1946, the appellant, who was a film critic, under an agreement with the British Broadcasting Corporation broadcast a review of the previous week's films. The review included an adverse criticism of a film produced by the respondents who, on Sept. 27, 1946, wrote to the B.B.C. as follows: "We regret to inform you that, in our judgment, based upon a considerable number of talks given by Mrs. Arnot Robertson, that critic is completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners, and her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry. In these circumstances we propose not to invite Mrs. Arnot Robertson to review Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer films in future, and we would ask your kind co-operation in restraining her from doing so in B.B.C. broadcasts." The appellant claimed damages for libel, alleging that the statements contained in the letter were defamatory in that they imputed to her incompetence in her professional capacity as a critic. It was admitted by the appellant that the letter was written on an occasion of qualified privilege, but it was contended that, in writing it, the respondents were actuated by malice. The judge, before ruling whether or not the words complained of were capable of a defamatory meaning, summed up to the jury and put to them the following questions, to which the answers of the jury are appended:—(Q.) "Was the letter in question a libel on the [appellant] (a) giving their words their natural and ordinary meaning? (A.)—Yes. (b) in the sense that it imputed to her incompetence as a film critic and broadcast reviewer of films? (A.)—Definitely. Yes."

HELD: (i) in considering whether the words complained of were malicious, the appellant was entitled to show any example of spite or indirect motive whether before or after publication of the letter, each piece of evidence being considered separately, and, even if there was a number of instances where a favourable attitude was shown, one case tending to establish malice was sufficient evidence on which a jury could find for the appellant.

(ii) the statements that the appellant was "out of touch" and that "her criticisms were ... unnecessarily harmful to the film industry" were expressions of opinion, and, therefore, the test was not whether that opinion was right, but whether it was genuine.

(iii) the fact that, in writing the letter the respondents were actuated by financial considerations, was not, in itself, evidence of malice since they had a right to protect their pecuniary interests.

(iv) in the circumstances and applying the test that it was the honesty of the respondents' views, and not their reasonableness, which decided whether or not they were malicious, there was no evidence of malice, and the communication was privileged.

Per LORD OAKSEY: "There is, it seems to me, an analogy between the criminal law of self defence and a man's right to defend himself against written or verbal attacks. In both cases he is entitled, if he can, to defend himself effectively, and he only loses the protection of the law if he goes beyond defence and proceeds to offence. That is to say, the circumstances in which he defends himself, either by acts or by words, negative the malice which the law draws from violent acts or defamatory words."

Per curiam: The practice in actions of libel for the judge to take the verdict of the jury before ruling whether the words are capable of being defamatory has serious disadvantages where more than one statement is said to constitute libel or where a number of disconnected circumstances, by which malice is said to be established, come in question.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SCOTT, ASQUITH and COHEN, L.JJ.), dated July 26, 1948, setting aside a verdict of a jury and an order of HILBERY, J., dated July 17, 1947, whereby he gave judgment for the appellant for £1,000 damages on a claim for libel and £500 damages for slander. The libel complained of was contained in a letter addressed by the respondents, a film company, to the British Broadcasting Corporation, by whom the appellant was employed as a critic of films, in which the respondents suggested that the appellant was "out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners, and her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry." The House of Lords now held that the words were written without malice and dismissed the appeal. D

Feb. 6. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal dated July 26, 1948, by which a verdict and judgment on behalf of the appellant was set aside and judgment entered for the respondents. The jury had awarded her £1,000 for libel and £500 for slander, and the learned judge held that the evidence adduced entitled them to do so. G

The appellant is a writer and critic of films who uses her maiden name of Arnot Robertson for the purposes of her profession. She was at one time film critic for the "Daily Mail" and had broadcast on various subjects for the British Broadcasting Corporation. One feature of this broadcasting is a ten-minutes criticism of the week's films on Sunday morning. This feature is not conducted solely by one person, but different critics are engaged from time to time for a specified number of talks. The appellant was thus engaged in September, 1946, and on Sept. 22 she reviewed a number of films, among which was the film produced by the respondents and entitled "The Green Years." H
The review was an adverse one and the respondents, who had been previously dissatisfied with her references to their films, wrote to the Director of Talks of the B.B.C. a letter dated Sept. 27, 1946, in the following terms:—

A "We regret to inform you that in our judgment, based upon a considerable number of talks given by Mrs. Arnot Robertson, that critic is completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners, and her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry. In these circumstances we propose not to invite Mrs. Arnot Robertson to review Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer films in future, and we would ask your kind co-operation in restraining her from doing so in B.B.C. broadcasts."

B At the same time the respondents sent a copy of this letter to the appellant, but they addressed it to her at the B.B.C. offices, with the result that it did not reach her till Oct. 3, 1946. The letter did not influence the B.B.C. in any way, but by some means or other it appears that the fact that it had been written became common knowledge to members of the Press, and on Oct. 2 two reporters, one of whom was a Mr. Moynihan connected with the "News-Chronicle," interviewed the appellant in the matter. She, as she informed them, had not seen the letter, and Mr. Moynihan thereupon first telephoned to the C B.B.C., who said that they had no statement to make, and then rang up the respondents, where he got into communication with a Mr. McPherson, the respondents' publicity manager. Some differences as to what then occurred are to be found in the evidence of these two witnesses, Mr. Moynihan saying that the letter was read over to him twice, Mr. McPherson stating that the gist alone had been communicated. In accordance with the terms of their letter, D the respondents, who at the request of the B.B.C. had previously sent an invitation to the appellant for the pre-view of their films at their private theatre, withdrew that invitation. On Oct. 3 the appellant received a copy of the letter and, thereupon, herself wrote to "The Times," setting out the letter in full and adding:

E "How far should an American film company be allowed to interfere with the public's right to an unbiased opinion? I find it hard to believe that, had I praised "The Green Years" (of which few of my colleagues took a favourable view), M-G-M's sense of my unfitness for my job would have been quite so keen, or taken this rather remarkable form."

F After writing this letter the appellant asked for an apology for the wrong which she alleged had been done her, and for reasonable compensation. On the respondents declining to comply with her request, she brought the action now the subject of your Lordships' consideration. For her cause of action she relied on the statements contained in the letter of Sept. 27, 1946, and on their repetition by Mr. McPherson as being defamatory in their natural and ordinary meaning and as bearing the innuendo that they imputed to her incompetence as a critic. G To this claim the respondents answered in their defence that the words were incapable of the meaning alleged or any defamatory meaning and denied any malice on their part in writing the letter or speaking the words.

When the case came on for trial certain admissions were made on either side. It is common ground that the respondents were entitled to withdraw their permission from the appellant to visit their theatre and to be present at their H Press shows which precede the general release of their films, and even precede the pre-release at their own theatre. It was also admitted that, if the respondents intended to exclude the appellant from attending these shows, it was proper that they should inform the B.B.C. of this intention, as the original invitation to the appellant had been given at the B.B.C.'s request. Accordingly, there was a common interest between the respondents and the B.B.C., creating a qualified privilege. It was, therefore, necessary for the appellant to establish malice in fact on the part of the respondents if she was to succeed in her action.

On the other hand, it was conceded that the words, if defamatory at all, were defamatory of the appellant in her professional capacity and were actionable in slander without proof of special damage. Both courts held that the expressions used were capable of a defamatory meaning and the learned judge left it to the jury to decide whether there was malice or not. The jury decided that there was. The majority of the Court of Appeal (SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.J.J.) held that there was no evidence of malice fit to be left to the jury, but COHEN, L.J., agreed with the ruling of HILBERY, J., that there was evidence of malice. The issues which came before the court of first instance were summed up in certain questions put to the jury and their answers thereto. These questions were submitted to and accepted by counsel for each of the parties and except for some immaterial alterations were submitted to the jury in the form which had been agreed. The questions and answers were:

- (1) (Q.)—Was the letter a libel on the plaintiff [appellant]—
(a) giving the words their natural and ordinary meaning?
(A.)—Yes.
(b) in the sense that it imputed to her incompetence as a film critic and broadcast reviewer of films?
(A.)—Definitely, yes.
- (2) (Q.)—Was the letter comment or statement of fact?
(A.)—Statement of fact.
- (3) (Q.) In writing the letter were the defendants [respondents] actuated by malice?
(A.)—Yes.
- (4) (Q.)—Did the defendants speak over the telephone to the witness Moynihan the contents of the letter complained of or the part of it which Moynihan said he took down?
(A.)—Yes.
- (5) (Q.)—If the defendants did state the whole or part of the contents of the letter to Moynihan, did the words slander the plaintiff in the way of her profession of film critic?
(A.)—Yes.
- (6) (Q.)—If the defendants read the letter over the telephone to Moynihan were they actuated by malice when they so read it?
(A.)—Yes.
- (7) (Q.)—If you find for the plaintiff that the plaintiff was (a) libelled or (b) slandered, what damages for (a) libel or (b) slander?
(A.)—£1,000 for libel, £500 for slander.

My Lords, as I have said, the majority of the Court of Appeal took the view that there was no evidence of malice, but a further question was argued both in the court of first instance, in the Court of Appeal, and before your Lordships, namely, that the words in question do not constitute a libel on the appellant in that, taken in their ordinary meaning, they are not defamatory nor are they capable of bearing the sense ascribed to them in the innuendo, viz., that they impute to her incompetence in her work as a critic. If they are incapable of the alleged or any defamatory meaning, the appellant must fail. If, however, any defamatory meaning can be found in them, a number of further questions require determination, the first and most important of which is whether there was any evidence of malice fit to be left for the consideration of the jury, and the second, whether the learned judge misdirected the jury on the question of malice. Besides these two main matters certain additional questions as to the claim for slander and as to damages might require discussion if the appellant were to succeed in her action. Both courts below held that the words did not bear the innuendo suggested. The learned judge so decided on the ground that the appellant, though completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners, might still be a perfectly competent critic, and, though highly skilled in the technique of the art which the critic was called on to deal with and having an acknowledged taste and a trained taste in that art, might still be out of touch with millions of people who flock to those theatres where that particular art was the attraction. Nor, in his view, did the words "unnecessarily harmful" reflect on her competence of a critic though they might otherwise be defamatory in their natural meaning. In the Court of Appeal COHEN, L.J., thought that "out of touch with" might either mean "ignorant of" or "out of contact with," but in either event the words, in his view, were incapable of the innuendo alleged. "A critic," he says, "may lack one qualification which he could usefully have, but it does not follow that he is incompetent," and, accordingly, he agreed with the learned judge in the observations quoted above. I also agree with these observations, and, indeed, all the members of the Court of Appeal took the same view. It still, however, remains to be determined whether the words can bear a libellous meaning in their natural and ordinary sense. The learned judge left the questions quoted above to the jury before dealing with the submissions made on behalf of the respondents, viz:—(i) that the words were incapable of bearing any defamatory meaning; and (ii) that there was no evidence of malice fit for the consideration of the jury. When the submission was renewed after the jury's verdict had been given he held that the earlier words were incapable of a defamatory meaning, but that the statement that the "criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful" was defamatory because of the use of the word "unnecessarily." COHEN, L.J., on the other hand, in the Court of Appeal appears to have formed the view that the words were capable of a libellous meaning as a result of the opinion which he, on an analysis of the meaning of the wording, entertained that "out of touch" might bear one of the two meanings set out above. If the first meaning were adopted, he thought that the words could not be defamatory. If the latter, they were, he held, capable of being defamatory of a film critic. "She is not bound to agree," he says, "with the tastes of the millions, but it might be thought that she should know what these tastes are." The other lords justices confined their observations to the question of malice or no malice, and do not seem to have dealt with the question of libel or no libel, except that SCOTT, L.J., on this issue does say—

"On the whole I come to the same conclusion as the learned judge, but I think it [the letter] only just over the boundary line and that, had there been no plea of qualified privilege, the justifiable figure for damages could not possibly be more than a small fraction of the figure of £1,000 awarded by the jury for the libel whether the innuendo was established or not."

My Lords, having regard to the view I have formed on the question of malice, I do not think it necessary to come to a final determination on this matter. I would only say that I agree with the opinion of SCOTT, L.J., that the allegations in the letter, if libellous at all, are only just over the border-line, and I can, perhaps, best express my view by quoting from the words of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Nevill v. Fine Arts and General Insurance Co. (1) where he says ([1895] 2 Q.B. 168):

"It seems to me that the terms of that circular come as nearly as possible to being incapable of a defamatory meaning; but it is not necessary, I think, to go the length of deciding that they are so."

One more observation I desire to make on this matter. The modern practice in actions of libel is for the judge to take the opinion of a jury first and after their verdict has been recorded to rule whether the words are capable of being defamatory. No doubt this course has great advantages in that it avoids the necessity of a second trial if the judge rules there is no case to go to the jury but the Court of Appeal take a different view. Nevertheless, in a case of any complication such as exists in the present instance, where there are at least two statements, either of which may or may not be libellous in the view of the tribunal which tries the case, the course adopted presents considerable difficulty. The case was left to a jury uninstructed whether either or both of the statements (i) that the appellant was out of touch with her listeners and (ii) that her talks were unnecessarily harmful, could be libellous or not, and it is impossible to say whether they relied for their verdict on one or both. Consequently, an appellate court is left in uncertainty as to what the grounds of their verdict were. It will later be necessary to consider whether there was any evidence of malice to go to the jury. Here, again, the same difficulty arises. Some ten or twelve matters were put before your Lordships' House as being evidence of malice. So far as I am able to see, the learned judge gave little if any direction to the jury as to what they might regard as evidence of malice, and, consequently, it is impossible to say on what they relied to support their verdict. The court might think that some or one only of the circumstances relied on were evidence from which malice could be derived, but the jury may have relied, not on that or those matters, but on others which, in the view of the court, could not be evidence of malice. Whatever the advantage of the present practice may be, I cannot help feeling that it has grave disadvantages where more than one separate statement is said to constitute libel or where a number of disconnected circumstances, by which malice is said to be established, come in question.

Some argument was presented to your Lordships as to the attitude which the judge should adopt where, in his view, the only inference which can be drawn from the words complained of is that they lie on the border-line, and it is impossible to say whether, when properly considered, they are capable of a libellous meaning or not. It is, of course, the duty of a judge in the first instance to put an accurate interpretation on the words used, and, having done so, to make up his mind whether they are capable of a defamatory meaning or not. Theoretically, if he is left in doubt, he should rule them incapable of a defamatory meaning, but this, I think, is a theoretical and not a practical difficulty. It is the judge's duty to make up his mind and, save in very exceptional cases, he can decide on which side of the line the words complained of are to be placed. If he comes to the conclusion that a reasonable jury would be justified in finding that they had a libellous tendency, he must leave it to them even though the words might also bear an innocent interpretation, or, to put it from the point of view of an appellate court, the question of libel or no libel should have been left to the jury if it cannot be said that twelve men could not reasonably have come to the conclusion that the words were defamatory. This, I think, is what LORD BLACKBURN means in his observations in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (2) when he says, quoting BRETT, L.J. (7 App. Cas. 786):

"... it is unreasonable that when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document."

It is in accordance with the test put by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., when he says (ibid., 745) :

"The test, according to the authorities, is, whether under the circumstances in which the writing was published, reasonable men, to whom the publication was made, would be likely to understand it in a libellous sense."

In the present case both the court of first instance and the Court of Appeal, though for different reasons, found the letter capable of a defamatory meaning, and I proceed to consider the second question whether there is any evidence of malice on the part of the respondents on this footing.

It is common ground, as I have indicated, that qualified privilege is rightly claimed by the respondents, but, it is said that any reliance on it is ruled out by the existence of express malice on their part. Where such an allegation is

A made it is the duty of the plaintiff to establish the existence of malice and, unless he does so, the defendant succeeds. If, however, the plaintiff can show any example of spite or indirect motive, whether before or after the publication, he would establish his case provided that the examples given are so connected with the state of mind of the defendant as to lead to the conclusion that he was malicious at the date when the libel was published. No doubt, the evidence must be more consistent with malice than with an honest mind, but this does not mean that all the evidence adduced of malice towards the plaintiff on the part of the defendant must be set against such evidence of a favourable attitude towards him as has been given and the question left to, or withdrawn from, the jury by ascertaining which way the scale is tipped when they are weighed in the balance one against the other. On the contrary, each piece of evidence must be regarded separately, and, even if there are a number of instances where a favourable attitude is shown, one case tending to establish malice would be sufficient evidence on which a jury could find for the plaintiff. Nevertheless, each particular instance of alleged malice must be carefully analysed, and, if the result is to leave the mind in doubt, then that piece of evidence is valueless as an instance of malice whether it stands alone or is combined with a number of similar instances. MAULE, J., delivering the judgment of the court in Somerville v. Hawkins (3) and referring to the facts in that case, said (10 C.B. 590):

D "... the facts proved are consistent with the presence of malice, as well as with its absence. But this is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to have the question of malice left to the jury ... It is certainly not necessary, in order to enable a plaintiff to have the question of malice submitted to the jury, that the evidence should be such as necessarily leads to the conclusion that malice existed, or that it should be inconsistent with the non-existence of malice; but it is necessary that the evidence should raise a probability of malice, and be more consistent with its existence than with its non-existence."

E In the light of these observations I turn to the instances adduced from which it is said that a jury were entitled in the present case to find that the respondents were malicious. The circumstances relied on by the appellant for this purpose were conveniently tabulated by her counsel.

F First, it is said that the words themselves are evidence of malice. It is true that grossly exaggerated language may be evidence of malice, but I find nothing gross or exaggerated in the words used in the letter complained of. Indeed, having regard to my views as to the extent to which they can be held defamatory at all, it would be difficult to do so. I can see nothing in them which a film manager and film producer might not genuinely believe. After all, the success of their films is of vital importance to them from what has been called the "box-office" point of view, and they might well feel that a seriously adverse criticism was unjustified. Secondly, it is said that the mere exclusion of the lady from the pre-views was itself evidence of malice. I do not follow this argument. G Admittedly, the respondents were entitled to withhold their invitation. It is true that they had at an earlier time withheld an invitation from Miss Dilys Powell on the ground that they did not approve of her reviews, but I cannot see how the repetition of the exercise of a right can be evidence of malice, and, even accepting the view that the respondents were wrong in their attitude, H their action is still no evidence of malice. Thirdly, it is said that malice can be inferred from the evidence given on behalf of the respondents at the trial by Mr. Eckman, who was chairman and managing director of the respondent company, and by Mr. McPherson. In criticism of their evidence it was said that they were not concerned with the mere protection of their company's interests, nor entertained a general belief that the appellant's criticisms were unjustified, but desired to stifle all adverse criticism and, if possible, to hound the appellant out of her position as film critic. Certain matters, which, in the evidence they gave, were relied on as justifying their statement that she was "out of touch" with the public and doing "unnecessary harm" to the industry, were said to be mere excuses and not honestly held. The first of these was their complaint of self-exhibitionism on the part of the appellant, and it is suggested that such a view could not genuinely be held. Obviously intimate criticism such as these talks contained is apt to call attention to the personality of the critic. Whether it calls undue attention is, in the end, a matter of opinion. The question is not whether it is a right opinion, but whether it is a genuine one, and in the present instance there is, I think, no ground for inferring that the respondents, as producers of films, did not genuinely feel that more space ought to be devoted to the film itself and less to the personal views and what they might regard as idiosyncracies of the critic. I cannot derive evidence of malice from such an attitude. The expressions "flippancy" or "exhibitionism" or "self-advertisement" which were also employed and the allegation that the appellant was more interested in "wisecracking" than in reviewing films appear to be used with the same general meaning, viz., that she was accustomed to utter clever witticisms rather than engage in a genuine exercise of the critical faculty. Examples may be found in her criticisms of "Bathing Beauty," "Sally O'Rourke," "To Have and Have Not" and "The Green Years." I am prepared to assume, without affirming, that every word of those criticisms is justified, and I have not forgotten that serious criticism is to be found at the end of her talk on the first-named film, but the general treatment consists in poking a good deal of fun at each of those pictures, and I can well imagine the producers of a film thinking that such criticism was not only flippant, but failed to convey to filmgoers the substance of the film under review. Moreover, the witnesses are being asked for their genuine opinion—it matters not whether in examination in chief or in cross-examination. In either case they are obliged to express their real belief, be it hostile or not. The mere stating of it in these circumstances cannot of itself be evidence of malice, and I can find no ground for supposing it was not their genuine opinion. Nor is this view disposed of by putting forward a number of favourable reviews of the respondents' works. The respondents are still entitled to complain of what they regard as a general air of flippancy though it be tempered with some more favourable and serious criticism. Again, when the witnesses for the respondents complained that the appellant was out of touch with the film-going public, it was suggested that they could not be expressing their genuine opinion of the general tone of her talks. To this charge Mr. McPherson, when asked in cross-examination what he considered objectionable, mentioned, in addition to flippancy, the complete lack of relation in the talks to any knowledge of the kind of thing that the general cinema-going public wants and gave three specific examples, viz., hatred of anything with "heart" in it, a prejudice against the introduction of religion, and a dislike of musical films.

I cannot find any evidence to suggest that he did not actually hold such an opinion. The charge is not that she was ignorant of that public's wants, but that she disregarded those wants in her talks. So far as "heart" is concerned, it may be that the appellant regards, and, perhaps, rightly regards, much of the script of the films as full of false sentiment, and I am prepared to accept the contention that some of her talks showed deep and genuine feeling, but the question is not whether she is right or wrong, but whether Mr. McPherson genuinely thought she disliked emotion. What he is complaining of is lack of sympathy with, and a failure to take account of, public taste, and the film-going public's taste may differ from that of the critic, though it may be the critic's duty to do what she can to improve it. He gives examples of films which some critics, and among them the appellant, have criticised harshly, but which, nevertheless, have been welcomed by the public. Whether or not these instances are to be regarded as establishing a want of heart in the abstract is irrelevant.

It is enough if the witnesses believed that they did, and I find nothing in their answers to indicate that they were dishonest in the view they expressed. Similar observations apply to his assertion that the appellant hated "musicals." The witness again gave a number of examples, but, perhaps, it is enough to quote from a talk given on Oct. 1, 1944, where, after praising "Greenwich Village" for its entertainment value, the appellant says that for a technicolour musical it has exceptionally little plot and adds:

"Rarely, if ever, am I more frantically bored than by the plot of the average musical when this is allowed to take up the time when dancers might have been dancing and the funny men ought to be funny."

No doubt this is a criticism of the plot of musicals and not of their incidental qualities, but a witness is not to be accused of malice merely because he fails to distinguish between the two. With that and other examples in mind, I cannot see any evidence of malice in Mr. McPherson's attitude even though there are instances where the appellant has given some degree of praise to musical films which, as in the quotation given above, he regarded as somewhat contemptuous.

The third matter is the statement that the appellant was prejudiced against the introduction of any form of religion. Much stress was laid in argument on behalf of the appellant that Mr. McPherson said in evidence that he could not support this allegation with a number of examples from her film talks and was thinking largely of her written criticisms in the "Daily Mail." It was suggested in cross-examination that he had withdrawn this charge. In fact, he did not do so, but gave some instances from her talks which, in his view, supported his opinion though he said that his evidence had not been prepared in advance and he could have given better instances from her criticisms in the "Daily Mail," which for some reason he thought himself precluded from adducing. Again, the evidence may have been less full, and the view may have been mistaken, but, in itself, it was not unnatural for an honest man to hold it and beyond the contention that no honest man could hold it there was no evidence of malice. I might sum up Mr. McPherson's attitude in his answer, when asked what he meant by saying the lady was "completely out of touch":

"I meant that the great majority of the people who listen to her, the type of people who listen to broadcasting at 12.50 p.m. on a Sunday, would disagree with her on a generality of her criticisms."

I see no evidence in that answer of a malicious state of mind at the time of the alleged libel.

Next it was said that the motive in the mind of the respondents was to stifle criticism generally. The only evidence relied on to support this suggestion was the statement made in the box that they desired criticisms of the productions of other film companies besides their own to be more reasonable. It is difficult to see why such a complaint is justified. It might have force if they were not concerned at all with the result of the talks on the productions of other film companies, but criticism which deals adversely with a large number of films may well affect the whole trade and not only diminish the number of theatres in which films, including the respondents' films, can be shown, but may be thought to lessen the numbers which frequent cinema theatres in general. Another circumstance from which it was suggested that malice could be deduced was to be found in the conflict of evidence between Mr. McPherson and Mr. Moynihan. Mr. McPherson stated in the box that he had only given Mr. Moynihan the gist of the letter of Sept. 27. Mr. Moynihan, on the other hand, asserted that it had been read to him twice. From these facts it was suggested that the jury were entitled to consider that Mr. McPherson must have been deliberately lying, and to find him malicious accordingly. I do not think this allegation is open to the appellant. In the first place, it was never suggested to Mr. McPherson that he was telling a deliberate untruth. All that was put to him was that his memory was at fault. Moreover, what advantage he could have expected to gain or what his motive could have been is difficult to see. Once he admitted that he had repeated the gist of the letter, he had said enough to establish the appellant's claim if she had a claim at all. Moreover, the very question put by the judge to the jury and answered by them indicates, as I think, that no distinction was made either between reading part of the letter and reading the whole, or between the gist and the exact words. A further proof of malice was sought to be derived from Mr. Moynihan's testimony that Mr. McPherson described the appellant as "anti-film." I do not remember Mr. McPherson being asked in cross-examination whether he had in fact made this statement as he ought to have been if it was to be relied on. In any case it is a small matter and there is nothing to suggest that Mr. McPherson did not genuinely believe it, more especially when it is remembered that the appellant said in one of her broadcasts: "When will Hollywood learn that to make everything larger, louder and lumpier than life is simply to diminish the effect," and added in an interview that the refusal by the respondents to issue her a pass to the previews will save her from seeing some of the silliest of the American films. After all the respondents are makers of American films and might be expected to consider that such an attitude was anti-film. At any rate, the holding of this view is not evidence of malice even if it be assumed that a judge or jury or appellate court might think that her criticism had substance. As showing that Mr. McPherson was malicious, reliance was also placed on the fact that, when giving evidence in support of his suggestion that the appellant hated "heart," he quoted from her criticism of the film "Lermontov," but omitted a portion of the words used. He read:

"Lermontov is a big Russian picture on the life of the nineteenth century Russian poet of that name. It has very considerable merits; there is no pandering anywhere to the lower standards of cinema taste—no fudging in of a love-affair."

He omitted, however, to continue to the end of the sentence, which, after the words "no fudging in of a love-affair," contained the further words "for which history gives no warrant." When the omission was pointed out to the witness he at once apologised and admitted his mistake. Moreover, it must be remembered that the script of the talks was in the hands of the appellant's counsel and of the judge. The witness in these circumstances could not hope to deceive the court and, in my opinion, no reasonable jury could draw the inference from the omission that he was displaying malice.

Some ground for imputing malice seems to have been sought in the fact that the respondents' attitude was, perhaps wholly, or, at any rate, to some extent, influenced by what was called the "box-office" motive. No doubt, a critic should not be guided in her estimate of the merits of a film by its money-making capacity, but, however desirable it is to improve the public taste and not to pander to false art, a film producing and exhibiting company cannot disregard the question of finance, and it is no evidence of malice that their motive in withdrawing their invitations to the appellant and requesting the B.B.C. not to employ her to review their films was influenced by their financial interests. As LOPES, L.J., said ([1895] 2 Q.B. 171) in Nevill v. Fine Arts & General Insurance Co. (1) with reference to the defendants' secretary,

"... it seems to me that the true view of that evidence [i.e., that given in that case] is that it does not indicate any malice on the part of the secretary towards the plaintiff, but only a desire to preserve and protect the interests of his employers by keeping for them the business which he conceived to be theirs."

I do not refer to that language on the ground that there is any analogy between the facts of that case and this, but because it recognises the right of defendants to protect their interests even when they are only pecuniary ones.

Further evidence of malice towards the appellant was said to be found in three documents emanating from the respondents. First, a draft letter written about Oct. 3 for transmission to the "News Chronicle, 1946"; secondly, an internal memorandum dated Oct. 7; and thirdly, an article contributed by Mr. McPherson to the "Cinematograph Weekly" of Sept. 26 under the heading of the "The Lion's Roar." As regards the last-named, it was written before the letter complained of in this action, and is no more than a statement containing the same criticisms, not of the appellant, but of a coterie of critics who, apparently, took the same view as she did. Of course, if that publication could be shown to contain a dishonest attack on critics holding the same views as the appellant, it might furnish some evidence of malice, but the fact that Mr. McPherson expressed the same opinion with regard to other publications on a previous occasion would only be evidence of malice if he did not believe in their truth and yet repeated them in writing to the B.B.C. In neither case do I think it shown that they were not his genuine opinions. The gravamen of the charge in respect of the letter and memorandum, the former of which was not sent, and the latter of which was merely an internal communication, is that the letter exaggerates the position by saying:

"If all the films, both British and American, vehemently condemned on the radio by Miss Robertson, had been boycotted by the public, and only those very rare specimens proposed by her had been patronised, the British film industry would have ceased to exist, because ninety-five per cent. of the cinemas would have had no pictures to show endorsed by her and, therefore, acceptable to the public . . . Which is absurd; but not more absurd than to suggest that free speech includes the right of a critic to do, or try to do, grave harm to one of this country's greatest industries."

So far as the complaint is concerned with the suggestion that ninety-five per cent. of the cinemas would have had no pictures to show, obviously the proportion is meant to be, and would be, taken to be a rough guess at the effect of her criticism, and is no more accurate than the appellant's statement in her broadcast of Jan. 21, 1946, when she says:

"This may not seem so welcome to you, but then you do not have to see so many films as I do, about ninety-five per cent. of which counting the world well lost for love."

With regard to the expression "to do, or try to do, grave harm," it is to be remembered that the letter was never sent, that Mr. McPherson withdrew the words in the box when it was pointed out to him that they might be unfair, and at most, it seems to me to be but a scintilla of evidence of malice, and not such as should be left to a jury.

As to the internal memorandum, the evidence relied on is that contained in the paragraph reading:

"Nevertheless it seems intolerable that Mrs. Robertson and her cell of critics can say more or less what they like, without reply from us, and I wonder if it would give grounds for a writ to be put in to her quickly, if only to show that M-G-M mean business, and are not going to tolerate a campaign (a) to advertise Mrs. Robertson; (b) to prove that critics are themselves above criticism; (c) further to increase the power of the little group of people inside the Critics' Circle, who are already trying to eliminate the 'old-fashioned' critic (who seeks to be fair even to entertainment films) and who habitually do the maximum amount of harm they can to the sort of pictures, whether British or American, likely to be popular with the general public."

This is a private memorandum passed from one director of the respondents to another, suggesting a method of protecting themselves against what they might honestly consider to be unfair criticism, and complaining of harm done to pictures which, in their experience, the public liked, even though they were such as a coterie of critics might regard as bad art. Moreover, both these documents were written after the appellant's interview had been reported in the "News Chronicle." After all, critics are not exempt from criticism and if they attack the products of a business, whether rightly or wrongly, they must not complain if the proprietors seek means to protect themselves from their animadversions. A

A further reason for the jury's finding might, it was suggested, be in the demeanour of the witnesses at the trial. This is a dangerous line of argument. Except for two instances which, to my mind, are both neutral and unsubstantial, there is no indication in the evidence that the attitude of the respondents' witnesses was deserving of any criticism. Some more solid ground is required on which to base the existence of a hostile demeanour. If it were not so, every finding of malice by a jury where the defendants called witnesses might be supported on the sole ground that those witnesses might have exhibited malice by their demeanour in the box. Some point was sought to be made of the allegation that the respondents' witnesses had expressed one view of the appellant's unfairness in the letter of Sept. 27, and a different one in the box. My Lords, I do not read the letter and the evidence as containing anything contradictory the one of the other. The testimony, it is true, expands and amplifies the assertions in the letter, but says nothing which contradicts them. I know of no reason compelling a defendant to set out every ground on which he acted, nor is there anything to show that Mr. McPherson was not speaking the truth in his reply to the question: B

"(Q.)—Why did you not say to the B.B.C.: 'We much regret to inform you that in our opinion Miss Arnot Robertson is abusing her position as a broadcaster and is self-advertising rather than giving favourable criticisms'?" D

(A.)—The main part of our objection to Miss Arnot Robertson as a broadcaster of film criticisms was that she was out of touch with public taste. That we honestly and quite frankly said in our letter to the B.B.C. Having done that it was not necessary for us to enter into any further details." E

Finally, some imputation of unfairness was put on Mr. McPherson because he stated that the appellant, as she felt her feet, became more bitter and flippant and wisecracking, whereas it was suggested that the talks showed just the reverse behaviour. My Lords, in a matter so full of the possibility of divergent views and personal prejudices, it seems to me impossible to establish the existence of malice or to find any evidence of it from a comparison of the tone of one talk with another, or a consideration of the hostility shown or welcome afforded, from time to time, to the films criticised. The effect they produce and any appreciation of their quality is a matter dependent on the personal opinion of each individual hearer or reader, and I know of no standard by which it can be exactly measured. An opinion expressed in answer to questions put in the box as to the comparative merits or demerits or as to the exact amount of praise or blame of the films dealt with in the several broadcasts is, to my mind, too slender a source from which to derive an indication of malice. F

These are, I believe, all the matters which were submitted to your Lordships as evidence of malice, and for the reasons I have given I find them both individually and collectively insufficient for the purpose. On the claim for libel, therefore, the appellant must, in my opinion, fail, but she can still rely on the claim for slander. This issue, however, is, in my opinion, disposed of by considerations which are the same as or similar to those applicable to libel. It is not disputed that the communication to Mr. Moynihan was a matter of public interest and, therefore, a plea of fair comment can be relied on, but it is said on behalf of the appellant that the communication is neither comment nor fair. G H

Of course, if the communication were a statement of facts, and the facts were untrue, a plea of fair comment would not avail and it is for the jury in a proper case to determine what is comment and what is fact, but a pre-requisite to their right is that the words are capable of being a statement of a fact or facts. It is for the judge alone to decide whether they are so capable, and whether his ruling is right or wrong is a matter of law for the decision of an appellate tribunal.

A I believe that all your Lordships agree with the Court of Appeal that the words are not statements of fact nor are they capable of being so considered. It is not only that the whole of the letter is prefaced with the words, "in our opinion," but, to my mind, "out of touch" in its normal and natural signification means "out of sympathy with" and this interpretation is strengthened when one finds that it is the tastes and entertainment requirements with which the appellant is said to be out of touch. Moreover, so far as I have been able to ascertain from the record of the trial the contention that the words meant "ignorant of" was never put forward, and, indeed, only emerged in the judgment of COHEN, L.J. I doubt, indeed, whether, even if the words could and should be construed as meaning "ignorant of," the language, having regard to its preface and subject-matter, could be regarded as fact. In common with C the rest of your Lordships, I think they express opinion only and, therefore, are comment. Here again, as in the case of malice, the question is not whether the comment is justified in the eyes of judge or jury, but whether it is the honest expression of the commentator's real view and not mere abuse or invective under the guise of criticism: see McQuire v. Western Morning News Co. (4) where COLLINS, M.R., speaking of a case in which fair comment was pleaded, says D ([1903] 2 K.B. 111) :

"It is, however, for the plaintiff, who rests his claim upon a document which on his own statement purports to be a criticism of a matter of public interest, to show that it is a libel . . . and therefore it must be for the judge to say whether it is reasonably capable of being so interpreted. If it is not, there is no question for the jury, and it would be competent for him to give judgment for the defendant."

E To a similar effect were the words of LORD ESHER, M.R. (20 Q.B.D. 281), in Merivale v. Carson (5) which are so often quoted:

"... would any fair man, however prejudiced he may be, however exaggerated or obstinate his views, have [written] this criticism . . . ?"

F I should adopt them except that I would substitute "honest" for "fair" lest some suggestion of reasonableness instead of honesty should be read in.

G The only foundation in the present case for the assertion that the comment is unfair, lies in the suggestion that it does not represent the real view of the speaker, but was uttered with a dishonest object of injuring the appellant and driving her from the occupation of film critic. I have already dealt with this question in considering whether there is any evidence of malice which would defeat the qualified privilege enjoyed in respect of the letter. Having regard to the opinion there expressed, it is plain that I see no evidence from which unfairness could be derived. In alleging unfairness the plaintiff takes on him or herself the onus, also taken by an allegation of malice, to prove that the criticism H is unfair either from the language used or from some extraneous circumstance. In the present case there is no extraneous circumstance and the language itself does not warrant such a judgment. Nevertheless, the appellant maintains that in order to succeed the respondents must have obtained a verdict from the jury to the effect that the comment was fair, and they have not done so. I agree that, if the language itself warranted an inference of unfairness or if there were any other evidence from which a finding of unfairness could be derived, the matter must be left to the jury, but when, as here, if the matter had been left to the jury, an appellate court must have set aside their verdict, there is no material on which a finding hostile to the respondents could be based.

Once the questions of malice or no malice and fair or unfair comment are decided in favour of the respondents, the case is at an end. I, therefore, propose to say nothing on the question of damages, as affected either by the circumstance that the jury found their verdict before the question whether the words were capable of supporting the innuendo relied on had been decided, or by the fact that no reference was made in the summing-up to the fact that the appellant herself published the letter in "The Times." The question whether the jury may have been misled by the summing-up and may have thought that the respondents must be fair-minded as well as honest has, however, been strenuously argued, and should, I think, receive some consideration from your Lordships' House.

The task of a judge called on immediately after the conclusion of a trial to sum up to a jury is always a difficult one. As BRAMWELL, L.J., pointed out ([1887] 3 Q.B.D. 243) in Clark v. Molyneux (6):

"... a summing-up is not to be rigorously criticised; and it would not be right to set aside the verdict of a jury, because in the course of a long and elaborate summing-up the judge has used inaccurate language; the whole of the summing-up must be considered in order to determine whether it afforded a fair guide to the jury..."

My Lords, in the course of his summing-up in the present case the learned judge undoubtedly in places used language which accurately states the law as I conceive it to be, and, indeed, as it is accepted to be by both parties, viz., that it is the honesty of the witnesses' views, not their reasonableness, which decides whether they are malicious or not. I am not sure whether the learned judge always makes a clear distinction between words which go beyond the privilege which the occasion affords and those from which malice is to be inferred, neither am I sure that the authorities themselves are always careful to make such a distinction. Indeed, in the majority of cases it is not a matter of moment to do so, since the two considerations merge one into another, so that language which is alleged to go beyond the privilege claimed frequently justifies a finding of malice. I do not think, therefore, that any complaint can be made of the summing-up on this ground. Its early words on this part of the case express exactly what the authorities convey. "Fair comment" (in effect the learned judge says) "has to be an honest expression of the real opinion of the defendants when they wrote it..." "Did they honestly and really think that she" (the appellant) "was completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners and that her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry? Did they honestly hold that opinion and really believe it? If they did—then they were not abusing the occasion." Such a direction is, I think, entirely accurate and could not be attacked, and similar language is to be found in other parts of the summing-up. On the other hand, language of this kind is frequently interspersed with words which suggest that the criterion is whether fair-minded men could hold that view. Let me take one example only. It runs:

"First of all... do you think that a fair-minded man capable of impartial judgment of the plaintiff's [appellant's] talks... could come to that conclusion. Was there anything in them or in her conduct which would lead a fair man honestly to entertain the opinion that the defendants expressed in this letter?"

Similar observations appear throughout the summing-up and, undoubtedly, if they were found alone there would have been clear misdirection. It is said, however, in the first place, that, in his cross-examination and address, leading counsel for the respondents used the phrase and accepted the burden that fair-mindfulness was required. I do not think that the record justifies this allegation, but if it did I should think it immaterial. Secondly, it is argued with more force that, when the summing-up is regarded as a whole, a jury would not be misled, but would rightly apprehend that honesty, not reasonableness, was the state of mind required. My Lords, I cannot take this view. I have read the summing-up as a whole more than once and I think a jury might well have come to the conclusion that both honesty and reasonableness were necessary and that the defendants were unreasonable and therefore malicious. It is, I think, difficult for the uninstructed mind to guard against such a misconception, and to my mind the clearest direction is necessary to the effect that irrationality, stupidity or obstinacy do not constitute malice, though in an extreme case they may be some evidence of it. The defendant, indeed, must honestly hold the opinion he expresses but no more is required of him. All the lords justices took this view of the summing-up and I agree with them. Therefore, had I come to the conclusion that the words were defamatory and the respondents malicious, I should still have thought with COHEN, L.J., that it would be necessary to submit the issue to another jury. As it is, I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD GREENE: My Lords, the letter which the appellant asserts to be defamatory is variously described, by herself as a "flagrant commercial effort to stifle free, unbiased criticism", and by her counsel as "a malicious attempt to destroy a critic." Your Lordships will be neither assisted nor misled by such rhetorical misdescriptions. A criticism is a literary work which is itself a fair object of criticism, as much so as the work which it criticises, and a professional critic holds no privileged position in that respect. In the arguments presented to your Lordships a number of matters have been canvassed. I do not find it necessary to discuss more than two of them at any length. Either of these, if decided adversely to the appellant, is sufficient to dispose of this appeal. They are, first, the question of libel or no libel, and, secondly, the question whether there was evidence of malice proper to be submitted to the jury. I have formed the clear opinion that in both these respects the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

It is necessary to keep the essential factors in the case in their true perspective. The appellant is a professional critic specialising in criticisms of films. She held an engagement with the B.B.C. under which she gave a series of critical talks on films of the week. Among the films which from time to time it fell to her to criticise in these talks were films produced by the respondents, and it was their practice to provide for her use free tickets of admission to their trade shows. The style and substance of her critical talks, particularly those which dealt with certain of the films produced by the respondents, caused them growing annoyance until at last they wrote the letter which has given rise to this litigation and is alleged to be defamatory. The reasons for the respondents' annoyance, as stated in the letter and in the evidence of their witnesses, were numerous. I need only give two examples. One was that she would often discuss a film which she disliked without giving any such description of it as to enable the film-going public to decide for themselves whether it was worth seeing or not. The other was that she indulged in facetious remarks or "wisecracks" at the expense of films which she thought were bad. While not (so they claimed in evidence) objecting to adverse criticism as such, the respondents formed the opinion that the appellant's style of criticism went beyond what adverse criticism required, and was unnecessarily harmful to the industry. That they honestly held these views, that for persons having occasion to criticise a critic, particularly if they happen to be producers engaged in a commercial venture, they were intelligible views, I see no reason whatever to doubt. There is scope for a wide latitude of opinion as to both the subject-matter and the style of a literary work, no less so where that work is itself a work of criticism than where it is an original work. When we move in the sphere of taste, opinion, aesthetic sense or whatever we may choose to call it, we may have our preferences, our likes and our dislikes, but, in the very nature of things, the free expression of them, untainted by misstatements of fact, can seldom be defamatory, and an amateur critic has as much freedom in that respect as a professional.

In the circumstances that I have described, the respondents took such steps as were available to them to protect themselves against a type of criticism, in the publication of which, they were not legally or morally bound to co-operate. Many of the appellant's criticisms were unquestionably severe and often contemptuous. She frequently employed what is a common, and often the most destructive, weapon of a critic, namely, ridicule, and to certain subjects, such as that described as "heart" by the respondents, but treated by her as something no better than sentimentality, she obviously had a strong, and, maybe, commendable, objection which she did not hesitate to express. That her criticisms were legitimate expressions of a trained judgment, I cannot venture to doubt, but the respondents were just as much entitled to dislike them and to express their dislike as she was entitled to dislike and express her dislike of their films.

The letter of which complaint is made was addressed to the Director of Talks at the B.B.C. It has been read, but I make no apology for reading it again

"We regret to inform you that in our judgment, based upon a considerable number of talks given by Mrs. Arnot Robertson, that critic is completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners, and her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry. In these circumstances we propose not to invite Mrs. Arnot Robertson to review Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer films in future; and we would ask your kind co-operation in restraining her from doing so in B.B.C. broadcasts."

This letter falls into four parts. It contains two statements of opinion giving reasons for writing as they did, one statement of the respondents' intention and one request to the addressee. I will deal with these in the first instance one by one, not forgetting that the question of libel or no libel is to be answered by a consideration of the letter as a whole when interpreted in connection with the relevant surrounding circumstances—a matter of which I shall say something later.

Neither the statement of intention nor the request, if the letter had contained nothing more, could, as it appears to me, have conveyed any defamatory signification whatever. The respondents had a perfect right to discontinue the grant to the appellant of facilities for giving criticisms of their films which they considered damaging to their interests, and to inform the B.B.C. of their intentions in that behalf. They were also perfectly entitled (no question of procuring breach of contract being involved) to request the B.B.C., who were the employers of the appellant, not to continue to permit her to review their films. Whatever may be the meaning of the proposition of counsel for the appellant that "it is a social duty to submit to criticism," there is certainly no legal duty on anyone to give free facilities to a critic who attacks him, nor is there any legal duty to abstain from requesting an employer not to allow such attacks to be made by his employee. What the B.B.C., in fact, thought of the request is shown by their action in refusing to comply with it. To interpret the announcement that facilities will be suspended, or the request to the B.B.C. as anything more than legitimate self-defence is, in my judgment, quite fantastic. The respondents, however, gave reasons to explain their actions, and these form the core of the appellant's contention on this part of the case. The first reason given is that the appellant was, in the respondents' judgment, "out of touch, etc."; the second is that, in their judgment, "her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry." HILBERY, J., in his judgment, ruled that the words in which the first reason is expressed were incapable of bearing a defamatory meaning. He held, however, that the words of reason number two were capable of a defamatory meaning. No reference to this latter view appears in the judgment of any member of the Court of Appeal and I understand them as not agreeing with it since, as will presently appear, it is only in the first reason as interpreted by them that they find a possible defamatory meaning.

A Following what is now the usual practice, HILBERY, J., summed up to the jury and took their answers before he had heard the respondents' argument whether the words complained of were capable of a defamatory meaning, either in their natural and ordinary sense, or in the sense of the innuendo alleged. Certain inconveniences which may flow from this practice are well exemplified in the present case. The following among others were the questions left by B HILBERY, J., to the jury and the jury's answers:—

“(Q.)—(1) Was the letter in question a libel on the plaintiff—

(a) giving the words their natural and ordinary meaning?—

(A.)—Yes.

(b) in the sense that it imputed to her incompetence as a film critic and broadcast reviewer of films? [the sense pleaded in the innuendo]—

C (A.)—Definitely, yes.”

After hearing the arguments of counsel, the learned judge in his judgment rightly said:

D “As to the question whether the letter was capable of being a libel, I must divest my mind of the answers given by the jury, and put myself back into the position in which I should have been had the matter been submitted to me at the close of the plaintiff's case.”

He held that the letter was not capable of conveying the only innuendo pleaded (i.e., that of incompetence). This disposed of the jury's answer to question (1) (b).

E In this I agree with him. He next considered the question whether the words in their natural and ordinary signification were capable of conveying a libellous meaning and he examined separately the two reasons given in the letter as above mentioned. Now, in his charge to the jury, he had not instructed them as to what the meaning of either of these two reasons, in their natural and ordinary signification, must be taken to be—a matter for him and not for the jury—but as he had not yet heard argument on that matter he could not very well have

F done so. Consequently, so far as any direction was concerned, the jury were left free to decide for themselves what that significance was, subject, of course, to the right of the respondents to argue at a later stage that in that significance (whatever it might be held to be) the words were incapable of bearing a defamatory meaning. HILBERY, J., nowhere in terms states what the words “out of touch with”—and those are the words on which the controversy as

G to reason number one turns—mean in their natural and ordinary signification, but it seems to me perfectly clear what his opinion on that matter was. The question being: What is that signification?, a careful examination of the material to be found in the record and the appendix makes it abundantly clear, to my mind, that the only meaning put forward for these words by either party was “out of sympathy with.” That the learned judge in his judgment was interpreting H them in this sense appears to me beyond question. After quoting the sentence in question he says:

“I am unable to see that that is a libellous reflection upon a critic in the way of her profession as a critic. She may be out of touch with the millions. I hope I shall not seem in any way to be saying anything which is offensive, but persons who are competent to be critics on matters like the arts will necessarily be, to some extent, upon Olympus, while the millions who go to the theatres will necessarily be upon the common earth. There will of necessity to some extent be a lack of contact between the two, and certainly they are not likely to share many tastes in common."

These sentences and, in particular, the reference to "sharing tastes" make it clear, to my mind, that the judge was not merely interpreting the words as bearing the only natural and ordinary meaning which had been suggested by anyone, i.e., "out of sympathy with," but was interpreting the answer of the jury as given in reference to that meaning and that meaning only. When the words "out of touch" are read in that sense, they are, in my opinion, quite incapable of a defamatory meaning. Some people may think that it is desirable for a critic to be in sympathy with the millions, others may well think that it is not and that a good critic ought to disregard their tastes. Quot homines, tot sententiae, but to express the opinion that a particular critic is or is not out of sympathy with the millions cannot, in my view, possibly be defamatory. For the same reason, the suggestion made in argument that the words construed in the sense of "out of sympathy with" could support the innuendo of incompetence is even more unacceptable if, indeed, that be possible.

Here arises a curious point which has led to a great deal of discussion during the hearing before your Lordships. In the course of the argument before the Court of Appeal one of the lords justices threw out the suggestion that the words "out of touch with" might mean "ignorant of." In his judgment COHEN, L.J., accepted this suggestion and he regarded that possibility as being a sufficient ground for upholding the answers of the jury. Now this view as to "ignorant of" being a possible meaning for the words appears to me to involve the following assumptions:—(i) the words are capable of meaning "ignorant of"; (ii) on the footing that they do not mean "out of sympathy with" the jury must be assumed to have interpreted them in the only sense which would make their answer acceptable in law (the sense of "out of sympathy with" being ex hypothesi incapable of bearing a defamatory meaning) i.e., "ignorant of"; (iii) interpreted in that sense, they are capable of a defamatory meaning; (iv) it is for the jury to decide whether words capable of bearing a defamatory meaning do, in fact, bear that meaning; (v) the answer of the jury to the question (1) (a) is, therefore, unassailable. On the assumptions made in propositions (i) and (ii), assumptions (iii), (iv) and (v) would, I imagine, follow, but, accepting for the moment the correctness of assumption (i), assumption (ii) appears to me to present insuperable difficulties. It was, in my opinion, a matter for the judge, not the jury, to decide whether the words "out of touch with" could in their context bear as their natural and ordinary meaning the sense of "ignorant of." Subject to an argument on a point in the evidence with which I will deal later, no such meaning was submitted either to the jury or to the judge at any stage in the case. Before your Lordships it was argued that there were two "ordinary and natural" meanings of the phrase, and that the jury were entitled to choose and must have chosen that which they considered was defamatory, which happened to be the only meaning capable of bearing a defamatory signification. I see no ground whatever for assuming that the jury made any such choice. Not only did the learned judge not leave any such choice to the jury—and I will assume that in law he would have been entitled to do so—but it was never suggested that the words were capable of bearing any meaning except that of "out of sympathy with." The questions which were framed for the jury were in the usual manner submitted to and approved by counsel for the parties. The form of question (1) (a) makes it, to my mind, impossible to suppose that what was being submitted to the jury was a phrase having more than the one "natural and ordinary meaning," i.e., the only one which throughout the trial has been put before them. I, therefore, construe the answer to question (1) (a), in so far as it refers to reason number one, as meaning that in its natural and ordinary meaning, viz., "out of sympathy with," the letter was a libel on the appellant, but, as in that sense the reason is, in my opinion, incapable of being defamatory, the answer cannot stand so far as it is based on reason number one.

I must here mention the point of evidence to which I referred earlier. It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the meaning "ignorant of" was in fact before the jury. What is relied on in support of this submission is an answer given by one of the respondents' witnesses, Mr. McPherson. When asked what, in his view, was objectionable about the criticisms of the appellant, he began a long answer with the following words:

"First and foremost they are intolerable flippancies—their complete unrelation to any knowledge of the kind of things that the general cinema-going public wants, for example . . ."

This, of course, is not an interpretation of the words of the letter, but, leaving that aside, the words of the witness cannot, in my view, be interpreted as imputing to the appellant a lack of knowledge of what the public wants. What the witness complains of is that the appellant's criticisms were not, as he considered they should have been, related to such knowledge—a quite different thing. His view was clearly not that she had not the knowledge, but that she did not make use of it. If it had entered anybody's head that this answer ought to be regarded as suggesting that the words in reason number one meant "ignorant of" in their natural and ordinary sense it is incredible to my mind either that the fact would not have been referred to at least in the judgment of the learned judge or that the question should have been framed as it was. SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.JJ., held that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that there was no evidence of malice to go to the jury, but they agreed with COHEN, L.J., that "ignorant of" was a possible meaning. No one of the learned lords justices appears to have considered the question whether the jury could properly be taken to have had any such meaning in its mind in view of the fact that no one had ever suggested it. The danger of the argument is obvious. If it were to be accepted it would mean that a jury could properly be left, without a word of guidance from the judge, to discover by itself some "natural and ordinary" meaning for the words which no one had ever suggested, leaving it to the appellate court to guess what that meaning was. Holding as I do the opinion that the jury's answer cannot be interpreted as relating to any such alleged meaning, even if it be a possible meaning, it is not strictly necessary for me to express an opinion as to that possibility, but as it was argued I feel bound to state that, in my opinion, and with all respect to the learned lords justices, the words are not in their natural and ordinary meaning in their context capable of meaning "ignorant of."

I now turn to the second of the two reasons given in the letter, viz., "and her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry." As to this the learned judge said in his judgment:

"I have finally come to the conclusion that the inclusion of these words makes it (i.e., the letter) capable of a defamatory meaning because these words in their natural and ordinary signification seem to me to say that she puts into her criticisms that which it is not at all necessary for them to contain as criticisms, and that she is making unnecessary statements in her criticism which are harmful. It seems to me that to allege that a person goes out of her way, when she has the position of a critic to do harm to the industry in which the subject-matters of her criticisms are displayed, and which sustains the performance of those matters which she is called upon to criticise is capable of being understood in a way which is libellous."

With respect, I cannot agree with this. In the first place, the second reason, like the first, is a mere expression of opinion, although that, of course, does not necessarily mean that it is not capable of being libellous. It follows without a break the statement that she is "out of touch." The two reasons when read together appear to me incapable of meaning more than that the method of criticism used by the appellant is, in the opinion of the writer, calculated to do more harm to the industry than is necessary for the purpose even of an adverse criticism. An adverse criticism is probably, and even necessarily, harmful to the proprietors of the films criticised. To say that a particular type of adverse criticism is in the opinion of the writer unnecessarily harmful can surely mean no more than that, e.g., in order to express criticism, however adverse, it is not necessary to be, e.g., facetious or to omit to tell the public what a critic sympathetic to the tastes of the public would tell them. The learned judge in his reasoning seems to me to have lost sight of the fact that opinions may differ widely as to what it is "necessary" for a criticism to contain in order to be a criticism. There is no measure by which such "necessity" can be judged, and, as it seems to me, an expression of the writer's opinion on such a matter is a legitimate expression of opinion on what is a matter of taste and literary judgment, and nothing more. His opinion may well be, and can scarcely avoid being, coloured by his own tastes, prejudices or interests, but he is entitled to hold it. As I have said, I do not ignore the necessity of interpreting the letter as a whole for the purpose of deciding whether or not the language used is capable of being defamatory. This I have not failed to do, but the process, although in theory a perfectly proper and indeed an obligatory one, does not help me in this case. Nought plus nought still equals nought and no paraphrase of the words complained of must be allowed to obscure that fact. The interpretation put on the letter on behalf of the appellant was summed up by counsel in the following manner:

"The appellant is not fit to be invited to review our films. She is not fit to be put on to review films by you, the B.B.C. She knows nothing of the public taste and is guilty of sabotage."

I hope that I shall not be considered wanting in respect if I say that it passes my comprehension how anything remotely approaching this can be extracted from the letter.

I now turn to the question whether there was any sufficient evidence of malice to be put to the jury. Here, again, the practice of taking the opinion of the jury before the arguments have been heard made it impossible for the judge adequately to instruct the jury or to rule for its guidance what it might and what it might not take into account. The result inevitably was that a mass of unsorted material was put to it for its consideration. In his judgment HILBERY, J., did no more than state his opinion that there was evidence of malice to go to the jury. In the Court of Appeal, COHEN, L.J., in his dissenting judgment, thought that there was such evidence in at least three matters:— (a) the allegations as to "self-exhibitionism" made by the respondents' witnesses, McPherson and Eckman, in the witness box; (b) the answers given by Mr. McPherson on the subject of the Russian film "Lermontov"; and (c) his answer that he could not support, by example, his allegation about the appellant's aversion from the introduction of religion into films. SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.J.J., thought that there was no evidence of malice to go to the jury. Before your Lordships, counsel for the appellant relied on various matters in addition to those mentioned by COHEN, L.J. Thus they argued that the opinions expressed as to the appellant's broadcasts, both in the letter and by the respondents' witnesses in the witness box, were so unreasonable that they could not have been honestly held and that their statements that they did hold them were, accordingly, false and, as such, evidence of malice. I feel bound to say that, in my judgment, the argument is quite inadmissible, and I do not propose to say more about it except that those opinions, however much one may disagree with them, are both legitimate and understandable. Another suggestion was that the jury may have found something in the demeanour of the respondents' witnesses which led them to think that they were lying witnesses, and that this would have been evidence of malice. Here again I do not see how such an argument can be supported. There is no suggestion in the summing-up to the effect that there was anything in the demeanour of the witnesses which the jury might, or ought, to take into account in considering whether or not there was malice. As lying in the witness box is, or may, in appropriate cases, be evidence of malice, some reference to it ought to be made by a judge in summing-up if he considers that there has been anything in the demeanour of a witness on which a reasonable jury would be justified in concluding that he was telling lies.

A In the present case, the appellant endeavours to fall back on the view that the finding of malice by the jury ought to be supported on the basis that the jury may have disliked the demeanour of the witnesses, and come to the conclusion that they were telling lies. A more dangerous doctrine to be applied in a libel action I find it difficult to imagine. If it were accepted, it would be possible

B to argue that a finding of malice could always be successfully supported on the ground that, although there was no substantive evidence to go to the jury, the jury may have thought that the defendant's witnesses were lying in the witness box. In any case the grounds on which it was suggested (and in this I include the "Lermontov" matter referred to by COHEN, L.J.), that the jury might have formed the opinion that the respondents' witnesses were telling

C deliberate untruths were, in my judgment, so tenuous as to be incapable of supporting any such conclusion. The repetition of the letter, or its substance, on the telephone was strongly relied on as being evidence of malice. In my opinion, having regard to the circumstances, it is quite impossible so to regard it. As to the two items of evidence, other than the "Lermontov" answers, which COHEN, L.J., thought were proper to be submitted to the jury, I am unable

D to see how the description of the appellant's style as amounting to "self-exhibitionism" can be regarded as evidence of malice. It was nothing but an expression of opinion, exaggerated, perhaps, and founded on what, I venture to think, runs right through the evidence of the respondents' witnesses, viz., a complete misunderstanding of what criticism means, of what forms it may take, and of what language it may use in order to express most effectively the critical

E judgment which the critic desires to put before his readers or hearers. Thus, they were unable to understand that a witticism is as permissible as a pedestrian, and, perhaps, dull, examination of the subject-matter of the criticism. What they regarded as "self-exhibitionism" appears to me to be no more than the sort of conversational style which may well be appropriate to the comparatively new technique of broadcasting. The fact that they used the word "self-exhibitionism"

F may indicate a lack of linguistic sense, but how it can be evidence of malice, with all respect to COHEN, L.J., I fail to see. The suggestion of COHEN, L.J., that Mr. McPherson's answer "that he could not support, by example, his allegations about the plaintiff's aversion to the introduction of religion into films" with respect appears to me to be based on a misreading of the evidence. Mr. McPherson's first answer, when asked by counsel for the appellant in cross-

G examination to deal with the allegations, was:

"Yes, I should like to say that I cannot support this with a number of examples and to say in defence, if I may, that I was perhaps wrongly thinking largely of Miss Robertson's written criticisms in the "Daily Mail" which of course I am not allowed to introduce here."

H Why the witness thought that he was "not allowed" does not appear. A paragraph from his evidence-in-chief was read to him, ending with the statement:

"She also had a particular prejudice against the introduction of any form of religion into a film."

Counsel for the appellant then asked him,

"(Q.)—And you now say there was no justification for that—is that right?

(A.)—I have said nothing of the sort, sir, nothing whatever of the kind—and I repeat that that evidence was not prepared in advance. I had no idea that I was going to be asked that question by Sir Patrick Hastings.

(Q.)—So now you want to withdraw ?

(A.)—I do not withdraw it. I am quite prepared to give you examples from these film criticisms, but I could give you better examples from her written criticisms."

The witness, having twice refused to accept the suggestions of counsel for the appellant that he meant something which he had not said, was then asked to give examples from the appellant's broadcasts. He proceeded to give three, after which counsel did not pursue the point. I cannot agree that this evidence, rightly understood, could properly be regarded as evidence of malice. The statement of the witness appears to me to have been nothing but a perfectly bona fide expression of an opinion legitimately held by him. I have dealt with the principal matters relied on as being evidence of malice. I do not propose to deal in detail with any of the others that are relied on as they appear to me to have even less substance than those which I have discussed.

I will add a few words on the subject of the alleged slander. It is argued that the question of fair comment was not put to the jury in terms. This, however, in my opinion, does not prevent the defence succeeding. The letter was clearly comment, and the finding of the jury that it was fact cannot stand. There only remains the question of "fairness." On the facts, the allegation of fairness was bound to succeed once the charge of malice was decided in favour of the respondents. That charge being negatived, it would not, in my opinion, have been open to the jury to find that the allegation of "fairness" had not been proved. That this was the position accepted by everyone at the trial is I think manifest from the form of the questions put in which no suggestion of unfairness appears save such as might result from a finding of malice. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, It is unnecessary for me to detain your Lordships by delivering an opinion of my own, because I agree in all respects with my noble and learned friend LORD GREENE on the question of libel or no libel, and with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack on the other questions dealt with in his opinion.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. The main question argued was whether there was any evidence of malice fit to be submitted to the jury, that is to say: Did the appellant prove that it was more probable than not that the respondents were actuated by malice? That it was a privileged occasion was conceded by the appellant at the trial, and the privilege is founded not on any duty resting on the respondents, but on the fact that the words were written by the respondents "... in the conduct of [their] own affairs, in matters where [their] interest is concerned" to use the words of PARKE, B. (1 Cr. M. & R. 193), in Toogood v. Spyring (7) and "in such cases, the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorised communications..." What, then, was the interest of the respondents which they were concerned to protect? Clearly, as their witnesses said, it was to protect themselves against the appellant's criticisms on the B.B.C. wireless. There was nothing indirect in that interest or motive. It was direct and acknowledged, and yet the very interest which made the occasion privileged, which, as PARKE, B., said, prevents the inference of malice, is said to be evidence of malice.

There is, it seems to me, an analogy between the criminal law of self defence and a man's right to defend himself against written or verbal attacks. In both cases he is entitled, if he can, to defend himself effectively, and he only loses the protection of the law if he goes beyond defence and proceeds to offence. That is to say, the circumstances in which he defends himself, either by acts or by words, negative the malice which the law draws from violent acts or defamatory words. If you are attacked with a deadly weapon you can defend yourself with a deadly weapon or with any other weapon which may protect your life. The law does not concern itself with niceties in such matters. If you are attacked by a prize fighter you are not bound to adhere to the Queensberry rules in your defence. The "Lion's Roar" was probably not as far-reaching as the appellant's voice on the B.B.C. wireless, nor could the respondents, so far as the evidence shows, command so pointed a pen as that of the appellant. They had, therefore, to adopt other means of defence, but provided that they were means of defence and not of offence or attack, they are not evidence of malice, but merely the adoption of the most effective method of defence available: (cf., the cases cited in GATLEY ON LIBEL AND SLANDER, 3rd ed., pp. 290-299).

A It appears to have been conceded at the trial, and, in my opinion, it is clear, that the respondents were entitled to refuse to have the appellant at their previews, and were entitled to ask the B.B.C. not to allow her to broadcast on their films, but it was and is said that, in giving the B.B.C. two reasons why they objected to her broadcasts, they showed evidence of actual malice, and that the conduct and evidence of their witnesses at the trial, ten months later, were further evidence of malice. In the alleged libel the respondents wrote that in their judgment the appellant was completely out of touch with the tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions and that her criticisms were unnecessarily harmful to the film industry. In order to achieve one of their avowed objects, namely, to induce the B.B.C. to prevent the appellant broadcasting on the respondents' films, it was probably necessary for the respondents to give some reasons for their request, and I am entirely unable to understand the contention that no fair-minded man could take the view either that the appellant was out of sympathy with the picture-going public or that her criticisms were unnecessarily harmful to the industry. It was proved at the trial that films on which the appellant in her broadcast poured ridicule and contempt had earned very large profits for their producers and it seems to me that a film producer would naturally consider that such success is the best, if not the only, test of the taste of "the picture-going millions." Cinema producers are not educationalists. They are business men who invest enormous sums of money in the production of films, and unless their productions draw the public they will very soon be out of business. They are concerned primarily with business and not with the education of public taste. As to criticism being harmful or beneficial to the film industry it is a question on which different views may obviously be held. Criticism may be harmful or helpful. It may be necessarily harmful for a time, but do good afterwards. Equally, it may be so harmful as to stop the industry altogether, which even persons of the most exacting taste would probably acknowledge to have been unnecessary in the year 1946. In my opinion, therefore, no inference of malice can be drawn from the words used in the letter.

G It is said, however, that the evidence and demeanour of the respondents' witnesses at the trial ten months later are evidence of malice. They complained that the appellant was a "self-exhibitionist" in her criticisms, that she was flippant and did not describe the subject of the films, that she loathed "heart" in films, and disliked musicals and the introduction of religion. The appellant's counsel also relied as evidence of malice (i) on a quotation made by Mr. McPherson of the appellant's broadcast on the film "Lermontov"; (ii) on the "Lion's Roar," an article written by Mr. McPherson in the "Cinematograph Weekly" dated Sept. 26, 1946; (iii) on the draft letter composed by Mr. McPherson and an internal memorandum from the respondents' office dated Oct. 7, 1946; (iv) the fact that, whereas Mr. Moynihan, a newspaper reporter, called for the appellant, said that Mr. McPherson had read the alleged libel over twice to him on Oct. 2, 1946, Mr. McPherson said he did not read the letter, but gave the substance of what had happened; (v) the alleged fact that Mr. McPherson was not telling the truth in that he might have been disbelieved by the jury and may have known that the appellant had pleaded that the whole letter was read over to Mr. Moynihan; (vi) the evidence of Mr. Moynihan that Mr. McPherson said the appellant was "anti-film," and (vii) the demeanour of the respondents' witnesses. In my opinion, there is abundant evidence from the broadcasts themselves to show that the statements of the respondents' witnesses about them were not irrational and might have been honestly made. Mr. McPherson's evidence on the "Lermontov" broadcast was perfectly consistent with his honesty, and the words omitted by him were really irrelevant to the point he was making. The "Lion's Roar" was a fair presentation of the respondents' point of view about the sort of criticism in which the appellant indulged. The draft letter and the internal memorandum were not published, and Mr. McPherson withdrew in the box the words in the latter document "or try to do grave harm." Moreover, it may be that the letter was not published because Mr. Eckman or Mr. McPherson disapproved of it. As to the Moynihan conversation on the telephone, it was not suggested to Mr. McPherson that he was not telling the truth, and in such circumstances it is, in my opinion, not open to counsel for the appellant to argue before a Court of Appeal that he was not to be believed and, therefore, malicious. As to the evidence that Mr. McPherson used the word "anti-film" about the appellant, such an expression might, I think, honestly be used by the respondents, and could not in any event be considered in all the circumstances as more than a scintilla of evidence. The learned judge made no criticism of the respondents' witnesses either as to their credibility or their demeanour. It is, therefore, impossible for a Court of Appeal to speculate on such a subject. For these reasons I am of opinion that the issue of malice ought to have been withdrawn from the jury and judgment entered for the respondents on the alleged libel.

As to fair comment, I am of opinion that the words repeated from the letter were comment and not statements of fact, and that they were fair in the circumstances. It was the appellant and not the respondents who had taken the controversy to the public press, and it was, in my view, not in any sense unfair to tell a Press correspondent the actual words or the substance of the letter to the B.B.C. It is argued that the respondents cannot succeed on this issue without getting a verdict of the jury that the comment was fair, but it is, in my view, evident from the summing-up and the form of the questions to the jury agreed on by counsel that it was assumed by all parties that, if the words were comment and there was no malice, the comment was fair.

On the question whether the words were capable of a defamatory meaning, I agree with the noble lord on the Woolsack. On the question of misdirection, although the learned judge put the question correctly to the jury on certain occasions, other passages in his summing-up may have led the jury to think that, unless the words were such that a fair-minded man would have thought them true, their verdict ought to be for the appellant, although the respondents had honestly believed the words to be true. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that, apart from the issue of malice, the verdict could not stand.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, counsel for the appellant suggested, in the course of his argument, that if the respondents succeeded in this appeal they would have established a right to "obliterate" a critic who had ventured to criticise their films. It would indeed be regrettable if your Lordships' decision had any such result, or even were thought to have any such result. I shall spend a short time in considering what the respondents did, what was the position of the appellant immediately before she issued her writ against the respondents, and what is the real nature of this action. I hope that by so doing I may dispose of this suggestion, and may also lay the foundation for the views which I shall later express in regard to the issues arising on this appeal.

The act of the respondents whereof complaint is made in the action was the sending of a letter of Sept. 27, 1946, which has already been read, to the British Broadcasting Corporation, hereafter referred to as the B.B.C. For the moment I disregard the subsequent telephone conversation between Mr. McPherson and Mr. Moynihan. It is obvious that this letter was written because Mr. Eckman, Mr. McPherson and their colleagues disliked the appellant's criticisms of M-G-M films in her series of broadcasts. The appellant was, of course, entitled to express her own opinions of each week's films, and I do not doubt that she honestly held the views that she expressed week by week, but I can well imagine that some of her criticisms of M-G-M films might cause a good deal of irritation to M-G-M officials and that the matter might well be brought to a head by her criticism of "The Green Years" on Sept. 22, 1946. That criticism is quite short and I shall set it out in full, as the setting out of one of the appellant's criticisms may help to explain the views which I express hereafter.

"No flesh and blood at all appears in 'The Green Years': nothing but whimsy: pseudo-Scottish whimsy at that. The picture was made in Hollywood, and there's something about the Californian sunshine which makes tossing the caber, by extras put into kilts, appear an even less probable form of sport than it has always seemed to me in Scotland. (I know I shall be howled at by my fellow-countrymen for this remark). To my fascinated eye, some of the participants in the reconstituted Highland Games we are shown look to be dressed in their combinations, which certainly adds novelty to the scene. This quality, however, doesn't extend to other parts of the film. Echoes of 'The Bells of St. Mary's' and 'The Hoodlum Saint'—'The Green Years' has a strongly Catholic theme: the poor boy from Dublin comes to live with unbelievably dour Scots relatives, fights for his faith, loses it, and finds it again at the end, reinforced with love and success thrown in. Echoes of innumerable pictures about lovable vagabonds who would be merely tiresome in real life—unfortunate Charles Coburn, a good actor, is required to caricature a naughty old grandpa with a vast red nose, round which the whimsy clusters thickset. Echoes of 'The Corn is Green,' we have again the brilliant student in the dirty-faced job working and sitting for the all important scholarship exam, spurred on by the devoted teacher. There isn't an episode in this long film, running over two hours, which doesn't strike a familiar note. A familiar note of cinema-going, I mean, not of human experience. When for the sake of the plot, the little boy must be sent to school in a suit which will cause derision, his grandmother—our dear Gladys Cooper, being wasted again—makes it out of one of her petticoats. We are whimsically shown that she is wearing three plain ones, in addition to the one she sacrifices, but she chooses the bright green one with the flower pattern all over it. And, of course, one's sympathy with the boy dies with one's belief in the whole situation. When will Hollywood learn that to make everything larger, louder and lumpier than life is simply to diminish its effect?"

Following on this criticism, there took place a meeting between certain officials of the respondent company and other persons interested in M-G-M films, and as a result of that meeting the letter of Sept. 27 was written. Although that letter must, of course, be read as a whole, it falls into three parts. The first part expresses an opinion of the appellant as a critic and of her criticism. To this part I shall return later. The second part contains a statement of intention. "In these circumstances we propose not to invite Mrs. Robertson to review M-G-M films in future." The third part contains a request: "we would ask your kind co-operation in restraining her from doing so" (i.e., from reviewing

M-G-M- films) "in B.B.C. broadcasts." This letter was given considerable publicity, partly because, by some means, the substance of it became known to certain journalists who, thereupon, interviewed the appellant; partly because Mr. McPherson either read the letter or quoted part of it to a journalist, Mr. Moynihan, and partly because the appellant herself set it out in full in a letter from herself to the editor of "The Times," which was printed in "The Times" of Oct. 4, 1946.

What was the position immediately before the appellant issued her writ? As to the first part of the letter, the B.B.C. had replied on Oct. 4,

"We wish to make it clear that we do not share your view of the criticism of Miss Arnot Robertson, in whose ability and integrity as a critic we feel confident."

As to the second part, the respondents were, of course, entitled, if they chose, to refrain from sending an invitation to the appellant and she was equally entitled, if she chose, to see their films in the same way as any other member of the public and to comment on them in her weekly broadcasts. As to the third part, the B.B.C.'s reply was:

"Nor can we agree to your proposal that we should 'co-operate' with you in placing restraint on Miss Robertson's freedom to review particular films in future broadcasts."

The appellant did in fact complete the series of broadcasts which she had agreed to give and there is no evidence that the respondents' letter in any way affected the appellant's employment from time to time by the B.B.C. On the contrary, there is very emphatic evidence to the opposite effect which was given by Mr. Rendall, the Controller of Talks at the B.B.C. Thus, after the letter had been written, the appellant continued to be perfectly free to broadcast criticisms of any films, while the respondents were equally free to refrain from inviting the appellant to their Press shows. Their right to do so was never questioned in this action. They were also free to invite the B.B.C. to co-operate with them in the manner stated in the letter of Sept. 27, but they were aware that such an invitation would meet with a chilly response. In these circumstances, it would be a misuse of language to describe this action as one brought to establish the right of free criticism. It is in fact an action brought by a lady, who objects to certain criticisms of herself and her broadcasts, to recover damages in respect of those criticisms and an injunction to restrain their repetition.

My Lords, I now come to consider the questions arising on this appeal, and I can do so briefly, as they have already been so fully discussed. I shall confine my observations to the first sentence in the letter of Sept. 27, 1946, as, in my view, the second sentence is quite incapable of a defamatory meaning. I start by observing that, in my opinion, the first sentence consists of two statements of opinion which cannot properly be construed as statements of fact. It is true, as counsel for the appellant pointed out, that a statement which is plainly one of fact cannot be transformed into a statement of opinion merely by prefacing it with the words "in our judgment"; but the statements "that critic is completely out of touch, etc." and "her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful to the film industry" are in their very nature statements of opinion, and if there were any doubt as to their nature it would be removed by the words "in our judgment, based upon a considerable number of talks by Mrs. Arnot Robertson." In my view, the question of "fact or opinion" should not have been left to the jury. Were these two statements of opinion capable of conveying the libellous innuendo that the appellant was an incompetent film critic? HILBERRY, J., and all the members of the Court of Appeal have held that they were not. I agree with them and I need not add anything on this point. Were the words used, in their natural and ordinary signification, capable of having a defamatory meaning? My Lords, I incline to think that they were not. The learned judge thought that the latter part of the sentence was capable of meaning that the appellant "went out of her way to do harm to the industry in which the subject-matter of her criticisms were displayed." The Court of Appeal did not, I think, attach such importance to that part of the sentence but thought that the words "out of touch with" were capable of bearing the meaning "ignorant of." To my mind, the natural meaning of the first part of the sentence is simply that the appellant's taste in films was completely different from the "tastes and entertainment requirements of the picture-going millions who are also radio listeners." So construed, the words are not, in my view, defamatory. It might well be expected of a film critic that her standards would be different from those of the "picture-going millions." As to the words "her criticisms are on the whole unnecessarily harmful," I do not think that these words, in their natural and ordinary meaning, impute to the appellant an intention deliberately to injure the film industry. I think they mean that the appellant's criticisms were so worded as to do more harm than an adverse criticism need do to the film industry. It may well be that the respondents had in mind the fact that the appellant launched shafts of ridicule against films instead of merely pointing out their shortcomings. They may have thought, rightly or wrongly, that the appellant's criticism of "The Green Years," already quoted, was an example of this.

My Lords, although I have formed the view just expressed, I feel reluctant to decide this appeal on this ground, having regard to the views expressed by the learned judge and the Court of Appeal. I shall assume, therefore, that the sentence in question is capable of bearing a defamatory meaning and the jury found that it was in fact defamatory. As the occasion of writing the letter is admitted to be one of qualified privilege, the next question is: Was there evidence of malice fit to be left to the jury? My Lords, in my judgment there was not. It is, of course, plain that the intention which the respondents had in writing the letter was to ensure, so far as they could, that the appellant should no longer review M-G-M films, but, as ASQUITH, L.J., pointed out, the existence of this intention is no evidence of malice. There is, I think, no evidence that the respondents did not honestly hold the opinions expressed in the first sentence of the letter, however misguided these opinions may have been. I do not think it necessary to discuss the various matters relied on by counsel for the appellant as being evidence on which the jury were entitled to find malice. These matters have already been discussed by your Lordships, and I am content merely to say that I agree with the views already expressed.

As to the claim for damages for slander, I do not think it matters whether Mr. McPherson read the whole of the letter on the telephone to Mr. Moynihan or only part of it. The protection of qualified privilege does not extend to the telephone conversation, but, in my view, the comments contained in the letter and repeated to Mr. Moynihan were statements of opinion on a matter which was obviously a matter of public interest. The jury might not agree with the opinions thus expressed, but they would have no right to substitute their own opinion of the appellant's criticisms for that of the respondents, or to try the fairness of the respondents' comments by this standard. In the absence of any evidence that the respondents did not honestly hold the opinions expressed in their letter, I see no grounds on which they could be held to have exceeded the limits of fair comment. My Lords, on the views which I have expressed, no further question arises on this appeal. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

PROLE v. ALLEN AND OTHERS.

[SOMERSET WINTER ASSIZES (Pritchard, J.), January 27, 1950.]

Club—Negligence—Unincorporated members' club—Member injured by fall down unlighted steps—Liability of committee—Liability of steward.

The plaintiff, a married woman, was a member of an unincorporated members' club, the management of which was carried on by a committee. The defendants were all members of the committee and included the secretary and steward of the club. The steward was responsible for seeing that the club premises were generally in a fit condition for use by the members and, inter alia, that lights were switched on and off when and where necessary. In the early part of December, 1946, on the authority of the secretary and steward, certain alterations were carried out to the position of some steps leading from the men's quarters of the club. On Dec. 31, 1946, the plaintiff attended a social function at the club and remained there until 10.30 p.m. when she left with others by the exit normally used by the male members. When the plaintiff arrived outside the building she found that the place was in darkness, and, being unaware of the newly constructed steps, she fell down them and was injured. In a claim by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages for negligence it was proved that there was a light suspended near the steps, but that this had been switched off by the steward at 10.10 p.m. on the night in question.

Held: the fact that the defendants were all members of the committee and one of them the secretary of the club imposed no duty on them towards the plaintiff, but the steward, having been appointed as such by the members, was the agent of each member to do with reasonable care all those things which he had been appointed to do and owed a duty to each of the members to carry out his functions without negligence; on the facts, the plaintiff was entitled to use the exit from the club which she did use; and the steward, in switching off the light when he did, was guilty of negligence and was liable in damages to the plaintiff.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Hilda May Prole, was a member of an unincorporated members' club known as the Quantock Club and Institute. The defendants, Allen, Andress, Short and Norman, were members of the committee of the club, Allen being also the secretary and Andress the steward. The club premises consisted of a converted railway station building, and access from the men's quarters of the club was by means of a doorway opening on a platform which extended round the corner of the building to the street where there were steps leading down from the platform. In December, 1946, on the authority of the defendants Allen and Andress, an alteration was made in the position of the steps by shortening the platform and building new steps up to the shortened platform. At night the steps were lighted by a lamp suspended over the platform. On Dec. 31, 1946, the plaintiff attended a New Year's Eve party at the club. She entered the premises by the women's entrance. At 10.10 p.m. the defendant Andress extinguished the light over the steps leading from the platform. At 10.30 p.m. the plaintiff left the club, and, the women's entrance being locked, she went out by the door leading to the platform. On arriving outside she found the place in darkness and, being unaware of the altered position of the steps, she fell down them and suffered injury. The plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants in that they, as members of the committee of the club, failed in their duty either to warn her of the alterations or to light the steps so that she could see that the alterations had been made. PRITCHARD, J., held that the only duty owed to the plaintiff was by the defendant, Andress, in his capacity of steward, and against him the judge awarded £350 damages.

A Raymond Stock for the plaintiff.

Michael Hoare and H. E. Park for the defendants.

PRITCHARD, J., stated the facts and continued: The basis on which the plaintiff puts her case in the statement of claim is that the defendants, who were all members of the committee, knew that alterations had been made to the steps, failed to warn her of those alterations, and failed to light the steps from the platform in a way which would enable her to see for herself that the alterations had been made. The defence raises three points. First, that the management of this club and its affairs was conducted by all the members operating through their committee, and that in those circumstances there was no duty which any individual member of the club or of the committee owed to the plaintiff, and, therefore, that she has no cause of action against any one of them. Secondly, that the plaintiff had no right, and knew that she had no right, to leave the club premises by the particular exit which she used. The defence asked a number of the plaintiff's witnesses about that matter, it being their case that ladies were strictly forbidden to enter or leave the club by any means other than the ladies' entrance, and that, therefore, the plaintiff at the time of her accident was somewhere where she had no right to be. Thirdly, the defendants say that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. They allege that she was with her husband who was the chairman of the club, and, therefore, that she must have known the position of the new steps, that she failed to use the hand-rail provided, and that she failed to switch on the light. Counsel for the defendants referred to Lewis v. Ronald (1) which decides, in effect, that darkness in itself ought to be regarded as a warning, and argued that, therefore, the plaintiff has nobody to blame for her accident but herself.

With regard to the first defence—that the defendants owed no duty to the plaintiff—I think that that defence is well-founded in so far as it is raised on behalf of the defendants Allen, Short and Norman. They were members of the club as was the plaintiff, and, as such, they owed her no duties. It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff that, as members of the committee, they owed her a duty, but I do not agree that their membership of the committee made any difference. Counsel quoted to me Brown v. Lewis (2), but I do not find assistance in his favour from that case for several reasons, one of which is that there the plaintiff was a stranger to the club and not a member, nor does it appear that there was there any distinction between a member of the committee and an ordinary member of the club, and I do not think that there is. Therefore, in the present case the defendants, Allen, Short and Norman, are entitled to succeed because the only way in which it is alleged that they could be liable to the plaintiff is that they were members of the committee, and in the case of Mr. Allen that he was secretary. I find no facts produced which imposes any other relationship between them and the plaintiff than their joint membership of the club, and, therefore, I come to the conclusion that they did not owe a duty to her, and they are entitled to judgment.

In the case of the defendant, Andress, I think that the position is different. He, in addition to being a member of the club, a member of the committee, and one of the freeholders of the building, was the steward of the club, and I think that that relationship places him in a different position towards the plaintiff from that in which the other defendants are found. He was appointed by all the members, operating through the committee, and, in my judgment, he thereupon became the agent of each member to do reasonably carefully all those things which he was appointed to do, and in that way he came to owe a duty to each of the members to take reasonable care and to carry out his duties without negligence. In evidence he said:

"It was my duty to open the club and to close it, to remain on the premises until everybody had left, and to put the lights on and to turn the lights off when and where necessary. It was my duty to obey the directions of the committee, to receive the instructions of the secretary, and to see that the premises were in as good order as they could be, and in a fit condition for use by members of the club. It was also my duty to notify the committee of any defects which would render the club not so fit."

Those being the duties which he had himself admitted were his, I find that on Dec. 31 the platform was in complete darkness, that Mr. Address was negligent in failing to light it, although he knew that there had been recent alterations made to it, and that he ought to have realised that, for the safety of members who, perhaps, had not visited the club regularly some kind of warning, by lighting or otherwise, ought to have been given of the change which had been made. It is obvious that there must have been some necessity for that light to be on, and, therefore, by switching it off, Mr. Address created a different situation—one which, I think, was created negligently. It is admitted that no notice was put up, as it might have been, in the club warning members that the position of the platform had been drastically altered within the previous fortnight, and, knowing, as he did, that those recent alterations had been made, knowing that there was a New Year's Eve party going on till midnight at least, and knowing, as I think he ought to have done, that some of the members might be people who had used the club infrequently during the preceding two or three months, I am driven to the conclusion that Mr. Address did not take reasonable care to see on that night that the premises were in as good order as they could be for the user of the members who might be expected to go out that way. In those circumstances I find that he was negligent and in breach of the duty which he admitted he owed to the members of the club.

Mr. Address is entitled to rely on either of the other two defences which were put forward and, therefore, I must deal with them. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence and continued:] I have come to the conclusion that on occasions when the men and women members mixed for some evening's entertainment such as this New Year's party it was a recognised thing that, when people wanted to leave the entertainment, they were not prevented from leaving by the platform entrance, and that the plaintiff, in leaving this club by that entrance on the occasion in question, was making no improper use of the club premises, and was doing that which she was entitled to do. Therefore, I think that the second defence fails. The third defence is that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. On that aspect of the case I have in mind the decision in Lewis v. Ronald (1). I am satisfied that in the circumstances the plaintiff was not negligent. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that, as against the defendant Address, all the defences fail, the plaintiff having established a breach of duty on his part which, in my judgment, caused her to fall, and she is entitled to recover damages against him.

Re WESTBY'S SETTLEMENT. WESTBY v. WESTBY AND OTHERS.

Settlement—Forfeiture clause—Receiver in lunacy of life tenant's property appointed—Percentage charged on estate of lunatic—Lunacy Act, 1890 (c. 5), s. 148 (3).

Under a settlement L.W. was entitled to the income of the trust fund thereby settled for her life “provided nevertheless that if whilst the said [L.W.] shall be discovert any act or event shall happen whereby the income of the trust fund would if belonging absolutely to her become vested in or charged in favour of or payable to some other person or persons or a corporation then” her life interest was to be forfeited. L.W. was discovert at all material times. On Oct. 11, 1935, an order was made under the Lunacy Act, 1890, appointing the Official Solicitor receiver of L.W.'s property. Section 148 (3) of the Act provides that the percentage payable in proceedings relating to lunatics “shall be charged upon the estate of a lunatic, and be payable thereout.”

HELD: assuming that s. 148 (3) created a charge or incumbrance on the income payable to L.W., it was a charge analogous to a provision for the prior payment out of income of management expenses or management remuneration and was not such an incumbrance as was contemplated by the forfeiture clause, and L.W. did not, therefore, forfeit her interest under the settlement.

APPEAL by the Official Solicitor, as receiver in lunacy of a life tenant's property, against an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Nov. 24, 1949, answering in the affirmative a question, raised on an originating summons, whether, on the true construction of a settlement and in the events which had happened—in particular, an order made on Oct. 11, 1935, under the Lunacy Act, 1890—any event had occurred whereby the income of a trust fund would, if belonging absolutely to the life tenant, become vested in or charged in favour of or payable to some other person or persons. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal, and answered the question in the negative. The facts appear in the judgment of

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

W. F. Waite for the Official Solicitor.

A. F. M. Berkeley for the settlor.

D. A. Zeigler for the trustees of the settlement.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is in form an appeal from a judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Nov. 24, 1949, but it is in substance an appeal against a decision of COHEN, J. (as he then was), in Re Custance's Settlements (1). The point which arose in Re Custance's Settlements (1) and arises in this case may be briefly put thus. Under a settlement the tenant for life was entitled to the income of the trust property subject to a forfeiture clause in substantially common form, i.e., to the effect that her interest would be forfeited in the event, among other things, of the income to which she was entitled becoming charged in favour of some other person or persons. In the present case, as in Re Custance (1), an order was made under the Lunacy Act, 1890, appointing a receiver of the property of the tenant for life. In both the present case and Custance's case (1) the point is, therefore, whether the fees which become leviable—to use for the moment a neutral word—and are ascertained as a percentage of the patients' income are, by reason of the language of s. 148 (3) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, "charged" on the income to which the life tenant is entitled so as to create a forfeiture within the forfeiture clause.

Before I proceed to deal with the reasoning of the learned judge in Re Custance's Settlements (1), it is necessary to refer to the position which arises when orders of this kind are made. Section 148 provides:

"(1) The Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the Treasury, may make rules fixing the percentage and fees payable in proceedings relating to lunatics and their estates, and regulating the mode in which the same are to be ascertained and paid. (2) Save as otherwise provided by the Rules in Lunacy the percentage and fees in lunacy shall be subject to the rules contained in s. 26 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875."

That last mentioned section has been replaced by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 213, which, as amended, provides, in brief, for the fixing and collection of all court fees by order of the Lord Chancellor with the advice and consent of the judges and of the Treasury. Therefore, s. 148 (2) is saying no more than that, subject as otherwise provided by the Rules in Lunacy, these fees are to be dealt with in the same way as court fees. Then comes the vital sub-s. 3:

"The percentage, or a proper proportionate part thereof (as the case may require), shall be charged upon the estate of a lunatic, and be payable thereout, although before payment thereof he die, or the inhibition be superseded, or be vacated and discharged on a traverse; but in either of the two last-mentioned cases the judge in lunacy may, if he thinks fit, remit or reduce the amount of the sum to be paid."

Various rules have been made, and those which affect the ascertainment and payment—to borrow the words from s. 148 (1)—of fees of this kind are now contained in a section of the Management of Patients Estates Rules, 1934, beginning with r. 148. I do not propose to take up time by reading the whole of those rules from r. 148 to r. 160. Suffice it to say that, under those rules there is no reference anywhere to a "charge" or to the coming into existence of any kind of incumbrance. That, of itself, is not, perhaps, of great importance—plainly, if a charge is created by the Act, it could not be taken away by the rules. It is to be noted, however, that the rules proceed, apparently, in oblivion of the circumstance that the section imposed a charge. The rules provide that the percentage is calculated on what is called the "clear annual income." They provide (by r. 152) that from time to time the master in lunacy shall certify the amount which has to be paid, and who is to pay it. In the ordinary course it would be the receiver, and he would pay the amount out of such funds as the master directs. The clear annual income of a patient on which the percentage falls to be calculated is a sum which is arrived at as the result of some elaborate calculations. The method of calculation is to be found set out in HAYWARD AND MASSEY'S LUNACY PRACTICE, 6th ed., pp. 132, 133. It is plain, to take any particular year, that it cannot be discovered until the end of the year what is the clear annual income of the lunatic, and it is to be noted that obligations for surtax and other obligations to which the lunatic may be liable, (e.g. bank charges), are matters which have to be taken into account before the clear annual income is ascertained in respect of which the percentage is then calculated. I may say the percentage, so far as is relevant to this case, is three per cent.

A In the present case the trustees of the settlement continued to receive the annual income from the invested funds. The Official Solicitor is now, and I think always was, the receiver of the patient's estate. There is here no fund in court. The trustees from time to time pay over the income they receive to the Official Solicitor who then deals with it for the patient's benefit, but since there is no fund in court the fees which are payable as the result of s. 148 are paid by way of judicature stamps impressed on demand notes sent from time to time to the Official Solicitor as receiver. Two affidavits are before the court in addition B to that sworn by the Official Solicitor—an affidavit of the chief clerk of the Court of Protection, and an affidavit of Mr. Vickery, of the same department. Mr. Vickery is able to describe exactly what happens in this case because it is within the scope of his duties to deal with this particular matter. He says:

C "Demand forms for payment of such Supreme Court percentage are issued by the Court of Protection annually and are paid by way of judicature fee stamps impressed upon the said demand forms."

D The payments are made by the Official Solicitor out of moneys in his hands on behalf of the patient. The next question is what happens to those moneys which the Official Solicitor pays when he gets the stamps and impresses them on the demand notes? The answer is that those moneys are carried over to the credit of the Accountant-General to an account in the Pay Office book entitled E "Percentage Account under 53 Victoria, c. 5, and Amending Acts." From time to time there is a transfer to the Paymaster-General Cash Account for the credit and debit of the Supreme Court of Judicature, or otherwise, if there has been a direction (as there has not), as the Treasury may direct. The effect, therefore, is that these fees go as part of the revenue which is brought into account in the annual accounts relative to the costs of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and become in substance part of the general revenue of the State.

F It has been necessary to go thus fully into the matter, partly because of the nature of the argument addressed to us and partly because in some respects the material I have related is additional to anything which was before COHEN, J., in Re Custance's Settlements (1). The arguments which counsel for the tenant for life has put forward are two, and they are distinct. First, he says, when the truth is ascertained as to the method of assessment of these fees, their collection, and so forth, it cannot be said that, in any proper sense of the term "charge," these fees were "charged" on any income or other property of the patient. Secondly, he says, even if you can treat these fees as "charged" on the estate or income of the patient, nevertheless the charge is one for a purpose and of a character foreign to the scope and intention of a forfeiture clause, and ought G not to be, and cannot properly be, treated, therefore, as being within its ambit so as to work forfeiture at all. Both those arguments were put in Re Custance's Settlements (1) to COHEN, J., and both were rejected by him. In fact, they were put in the reverse order, and as regards the second of them (whether strictly speaking these fees were a charge at all) the learned judge, as appears from his H judgment, himself put in the course of the argument this point: If they are a charge who is the chargee? That was, I think, a somewhat formidable question, but the learned counsel who was concerned to argue against the forfeiture in that case appears to have conceded (and I quote from the judgment) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 444):

"... that he thought the government officer entitled to receive the money must be either a person or a corporation within the meaning of the clauses under consideration."

It seems to me that on the facts now ascertained there is at least a strong argument for saying, as counsel for the life tenant has said, that you cannot define or identify any officer entitled to receive this money. Who is the chargee? Who would be entitled to come, as chargees would be normally entitled to do, to ask the Court in Chancery to enforce the charge? Counsel says there is no such person, and, therefore, since the essential characteristic of any charge, namely, the presence of a chargee, is absent, there is no charge at all. He further observes with some justice that the language of s. 148 is capable of sensible interpretation without reading "charged upon" as importing the existence of an incumbrance. In other words, he asks the court to say that the words "shall be charged upon the estate of the lunatic" mean really "shall be assessed upon" just as income tax is said to be "charged"—not on, but in respect of, certain profits or gains. I have indicated that it seems to me there is in the circumstances great force in that argument.

Another event has, however, occurred which may have an important bearing on this part of the case and that is the passing and coming into operation on Dec. 16, 1949, of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949. Section 8 of that Act provides:

"The following proviso shall be inserted at the end of sub-s. (3) of s. 148 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (which provides that the percentage payable in proceedings relating to a patient and his estate shall be charged upon his estate and be payable thereout) that is to say, Provided that neither the charge created by this sub-section nor any payment made by virtue thereof shall cause any interest of the patient in any property to fail or determine or to be prevented from recommencing."

The Act of 1949 had not come into operation when DANCKWERTS, J., gave his judgment in the present case, and, according to well-recognised principles, in the absence—and I do not think it is suggested that there is here the presence—of any language indicating retro-active effect, it would not be proper in the determination of this case to apply the proviso. We must decide this case according to the law as it was before this Act had been passed. But that does not necessarily answer the question put by SOMERVELL, L.J., in the course of the argument. True, we apply the law as it stood when the proceedings began, but does it follow that, in construing s. 148 of the Act of 1890, you may not be entitled to look at any parliamentary affirmation of any view of construction even though such affirmation is contained in a statute passed since the proceedings began? That again, I think, is a point of some substance, for the language of s. 8 appears to emphasise that s. 148 in the view of Parliament did create, and was intended to create, a charge.

I have come to the conclusion that it is unnecessary to express a decision on either of these points which I have so far stated. I do not decide, therefore, whether there was or was not in this case a charge of some kind on the estate of the patient or her income, and I do not decide whether we can in this case take note of the language of Parliament in 1949 in construing the language of the legislators of 1890. For, in my judgment, the answer to this case is to be found in the second of the arguments of counsel for the life tenant. In my opinion, assuming there is here created a charge of a kind understood by lawyers, something in the nature of an incumbrance on the income, still it is not such an incumbrance as is contemplated by the forfeiture clause in this case, and it does not, and did not in this case, work a forfeiture.

In approaching the question whether there has been a forfeiture it is proper to refer to the language of FARWELL, J., as a judge of first instance in Re Greenwood (2). That was a case in which a creditor had served garnishee proceedings on the trustee of a life tenant, and the suggestion was made that the effect was to work a forfeiture. But, as the learned judge pointed out, those who preferred that claim were in a difficulty. If the money which the creditor sought to garnishee had not become absolutely due and payable to the life tenant, then the garnishee proceedings were wholly ineffective. On the other hand, if the moneys had become absolutely due and payable to the life tenant then it would appear that no question of forfeiture could arise within the language of the forfeiture clause. By way of expansion of the last point, the learned judge said ([1901] 1 Ch. 891):

A "In my opinion, the true meaning of these words . . . 'or until any other event happens whereby, if the same were payable to him absolutely for his life, he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof,' is 'if he were deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof on the day it becomes due'."

B That gloss is justified by the view he had earlier expressed in these terms (ibid.):

"First of all, we must bear in mind that the courts do not construe gifts on forfeitures so as to extend their limits beyond the fair meaning of the words unless they are actually driven to it. Forfeitures are not regarded with favour, and there can be no particular desire to extend the terms of a forfeiture clause to a gift such as the present."

C With that guide to my application of the section to the present case, I ask myself what is, in truth, the nature of this charge which I am construing, what is its purpose, and is it such a charge as the forfeiture clause here can be taken fairly to have contemplated?

The forfeiture clause is as follows:

D "Provided nevertheless that if whilst the said Lilian Westby shall be discovert any act or event shall happen whereby the income of the trust fund would if belonging absolutely to her become vested in or charged in favour of or payable to some other person or persons or a corporation then . . ."

E The said Lilian Westby, the patient, at all material times was, and is now, discovert. Nobody has contended that the act or event of the appointment of the Official Solicitor as receiver has resulted in the income being payable to some other person or persons within the meaning of the clause. Of course, in a very strict sense you might say it has, for, as I have stated, the trustees, instead of paying the income when they receive it into the hands of the patient, have sent it to the Official Solicitor, who, as receiver, gives them a receipt for it. But EVE, J., stated in Re Marshall (3) that the Official Solicitor is really a statutory agent for the patient who is not capable of managing her own affairs. So much is accepted. There remains the "charge." In Re Custance's Settlements (1), counsel based his argument (accepting, as he did, that there was a charge of some sort created) on an analogy to the decision in Re Tancred's Settlement (4). In that case there was again a life tenancy determinable on similar happenings to those relevant to the present case. The life tenant made a marriage settlement and assigned his life interest to the marriage settlement trustees, but on terms that he should continue to receive it, subject, however, to the condition that the trustees were entitled to pay out of the income before the balance was handed over to him their management expenses. It was suggested that that involved a "disposition" by the tenant for life which worked a forfeiture, but BUCKLEY, J., said ([1903] 1 Ch. 724):

H "The [forfeiture] clause is intended to provide that, if a tenant for life disposes or attempts to dispose of his interest so as to lose the enjoyment of it himself, or if he should become bankrupt, his life estate should cease and be given over to others. This has not happened. Seymour Mitford Tancred remained after the settlement the only person entitled to the income. The mere fact that the trustees may be entitled to have their expenses recouped to them out of the income does not make it a disposition within the clause. It is parallel to the case of a person who is going abroad and appoints somebody to collect his rents on the terms that he should be paid by deducting a commission. Neither is the appointment of the trustees to be his attorneys to recover the income an assignment. He only appointed them to act as his agents, retaining the beneficial interest himself."

It is fair to observe that the emphasis in that case was on whether the tenant for life had himself disposed or purported to dispose of the income so as to effect a forfeiture, and that is a somewhat different problem, strictly speaking, from the present case, but the analogy I think is not far to seek.

Mr. Cross suggested in Custance's case (1) that the fees payable under s. 148 were really in pari materia with remuneration to an agent. The learned judge, who appears to have felt doubt on the whole of the case, eventually came to the conclusion that he could not accept that argument. He said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 444):

"Had the charge been for the remuneration of the receiver the argument might have been well founded, but I think I should be straining the law too far if I were to hold that fees payable to the percentage account and applicable as part of the vote for the Supreme Court of Judicature were analogous to remuneration to an agent appointed by act of party or by statute."

With very great respect to so learned a judge, I part company from him in not treating the percentage as fairly analogous. It seems to me that once you concede that some kind of a charge to provide for remuneration for the trustee does not work a forfeiture, then it must proceed on the view that really what the forfeiture clause is directed to protect is the net income which the tenant for life can enjoy when the necessary and proper expenses of collecting it have been discharged. There may be in many cases expenses of that kind which have to be discharged. One was put by SOMERVELL, L.J., in the course of the argument. It may be that as a result of proceedings trustees are directed to pay out of income certain costs. True they do not in normal circumstances become the subject of a charge, but the result is, of course, that the income, or a part of it, has to go in discharging some obligation before there is rendered available the sum of income which beneficially the tenant for life may enjoy.

In the present case the charge for fees is not by way of remuneration of the Official Solicitor. He is an officer of the court whose remuneration does not depend on the amount of income from the various persons whose affairs he looks after. But, the patient having become a lunatic and the powers and duties of the Court of Protection having been invoked, certain expenses are necessarily incurred as a result, by way of administration of her affairs. The patient is subject to the jurisdiction of a branch of the Supreme Court. The purpose of these fees is, obviously, to go some way towards discharging the general costs of this branch of the administration of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and those costs, or those contributions to the costs, are levied by way of charge on the estates of patients who come within the ambit of the Act. To say that is a charge such as the forfeiture clause contemplated I venture to think offends against good sense. I think there is a true analogy between the sort of charge envisaged by COHEN, J., and designed to provide for the prior payment of management expenses or management remuneration, and this charge designed for securing the contribution which patients have to make to court costs as a result of resorting to the Court of Protection. I hope I have been able to express the way in which I have felt impelled to conclude, notwithstanding the contrary view of COHEN, J., that in this case there is no forfeiture and that Re Custance's Settlements (1) was not correctly decided. The result, in my judgment, is that the plaintiff is entitled in this case to the declaration, which by her originating summons is sought, that on the true construction of the settlement in the events which have happened, in particular an order made on Oct. 11, 1935, under the Lunacy Act, 1890, and amending Acts, no act or event has happened whereby the income of the trust fund would, if belonging absolutely to the plaintiff, become vested in or charged in favour of or payable to some other person or persons.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the Master of the Rolls that it is unnecessary to decide in this case the question whether s. 148 imposed a charge in all or any circumstances. I also agree that the appeal succeeds on the second point for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, to which I do not wish to add anything.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), January 27, 1950.]

Probate—Costs—Administrator pending suit—Costs of administration and remuneration of administrator—Possible benefit of administration to estate—Apportionment between estate and party bringing proceedings.

An action to prove the testator's will was brought by the executrix as a result of the defendant's contentions that the execution of the will was forged, or, alternatively, obtained by undue influence. Those contentions were abandoned before the hearing and probate of the will in solemn form was granted to the plaintiff, with costs against the defendant. While the action was pending an accountant was appointed administrator pending suit to preserve the estate. After the action had been disposed of the administrator presented his bill for the costs of the administration and his own remuneration which was fixed by the registrar at £525. When the plaintiff's bill of costs in the action was taxed the costs of the administration and the remuneration of the administrator were included in full and were allowed by the registrar.

HELD: an unsuccessful defendant in an action of this kind must bear any additional cost falling on the estate by reason of his conduct in bringing, or being responsible for, the proceedings, and the costs of the administration and the remuneration of the administrator were part of that additional cost, except that, if in the course of his duties the administrator did work which must have been done in any event to wind-up the estate, and so the estate was benefited, there must be an apportionment of the costs and remuneration between the estate and the defendant.

SUMMONS.

After an action for probate of a will the unsuccessful defendant was ordered to pay the costs. In this bill of costs the plaintiff contended that costs of administering the estate incurred by an accountant who was appointed administrator pending suit and £525 for his remuneration should be included, and on taxation these sums were allowed. ORMEROD, J., held that any additional cost to the estate occasioned by the defendant in commencing or being responsible for the proceedings should fall on him, but that there should be an apportionment of the expenses and remuneration of the administrator if any general benefit had resulted to the estate as a result of the work of the administrator. The matter was remitted to the registrar so that effect could be given to this expression of opinion. A

Hollins for the plaintiff.

Bruce Campbell and Ian Warren for the defendant.

ORMEROD, J.: This summons arises as a result of an action brought to prove the will of William Henry Howlett deceased. The defendant is the son of the testator, the plaintiff (the executrix appointed by the testator) was his second wife, and the action to prove the will in solemn form was occasioned by reason of the defendant's contention that the execution of the will was forged, or, alternatively, was obtained by undue influence. Those contentions were abandoned shortly before the hearing of the action and probate of the will in solemn form was granted to the plaintiff, the defendant being ordered to pay the costs of the action. When the action was pending it became necessary to appoint an administrator pendente lite and an accountant was appointed for the purpose of preserving the assets. The administrator, having been appointed, proceeded to deal with the estate. (I am using, so far as possible, a neutral term). It is contended by counsel for the defendant that substantially he wound-up the estate. It is clear that he did everything that was necessary to preserve the estate when the suit was pending, and when the action was disposed of, some two years or more after the death of the testator, he presented his bill for the costs of the administration and for his remuneration, and that remuneration was fixed by the registrar at the sum of £525. That sum, together with the various other costs, was properly retained by the administrator from the funds in his hands before he handed the balance over to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's bill of costs against the defendant in the action was taxed by Mr. REGISTRAR FORBES and the costs and remuneration of the administrator which the estate had had to bear were added to that bill of costs and were allowed by the registrar, although objection was taken on taxation by the defendant's advisers to the whole of these amounts being included. B C D E F

Counsel for the defendant now submits that the work done by the administrator was not merely rendered necessary by reason of the action, but was necessary to be done in the winding-up of the estate in any event, and that, had it not been done by the administrator, the plaintiff would have been obliged to employ professional assistance in order that the estate could be properly wound-up. Whether that be so or not I do not propose to decide. G

Counsel for the defendant says that, if that be the position, it is unreasonable that the additional costs of the winding-up of the estate (other than the costs which were rendered necessary by the action of the defendant) should be borne by the defendant because it would mean that the estate would get from him the benefit of work done by the administrator, the expense of which would otherwise have been payable by the estate. He goes further than that and contends that no part of that remuneration should be borne by the defendant, and he bases this contention on the wording of s. 163 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provides that the court may, out of the estate of the deceased, assign to an administrator appointed under sub-s. (1) of the section such reasonable remuneration as the court thinks fit. Counsel for the defendant argued that, if it were not for that section, this administrator would not be able to obtain any remuneration at all as the power H of recovering that remuneration cannot be wider than is expressed in the section. I do not agree with that contention. I think the position in this case is that the remuneration of the administrator has been paid out of the estate of the deceased and the only question that arises now is whether the estate can recover from the defendant that additional cost to which the estate has been put by reason of the action of the defendant. I am satisfied that in the proper circumstances either the whole or part of this administration can be recovered by the plaintiff from the defendant.

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the whole of the administrator's costs and the whole of the administrator's remuneration should be paid by the defendant, because, if it had not been for the action of the defendant, it would not have been necessary to appoint an administrator, and he said that, if the administrator has done (in the course of his duty of protecting the estate) some work which would otherwise have had to be done by professional advisers, it is so much the better for the estate. Counsel for the plaintiff went much further by saying that the contention which he puts forward reflects the established practice of this Division. The only authority on the point which appears to affect the present case at all is Fisher v. Fisher (1) where an order was made that the unsuccessful party should bear the additional costs thrown on the estate by the appointment of an administrator pendente lite. That appears to be a sound proposition of law. It is clear that the unsuccessful defendant in an action of this kind must bear any additional cost which has been thrown on the estate by his conduct in commencing the proceedings or being responsible for the proceedings. A part of that additional cost is clearly the remuneration of the administrator, or a proportion of it. If, however, in the course of his work the administrator does work in the winding-up of the estate which, to be done efficiently, must be done by a professional man, I fail to see why the defendant should bear the burden of that and the estate receive the benefit of it because of the defendant's action. If the portion of the work for which the administrator has been remunerated is work which must have been done in any event in order to wind-up the estate, there should, I am satisfied, be an apportionment of the remuneration so that the estate may bear its proper portion of the cost of winding-up. Whether that is the position here or whether the whole of this remuneration was occasioned by the action and would not have been occasioned if no administrator had been appointed is a matter for the registrar to decide when the whole of the facts are placed before him, but in principle I am satisfied that there should be an apportionment of both the costs of the administration and of the remuneration of the administrator if, indeed, the facts warrant it on the lines which I have set out. It follows that there must be an order that the bill goes back to the registrar for him to determine whether or not there should be an apportionment of the remuneration and costs.

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Driver without means—Liability of owner of vehicle to satisfy judgment against driver—Effect on owner's liability of independent contract of insurance—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

In an action by the plaintiff against the first and second defendants, as respectively driver and owner of a motor vehicle, it was proved that the first defendant had negligently knocked down and fatally injured the plaintiff's husband. At the time of the accident there was not in force in relation to the user of the vehicle by the first defendant a policy of insurance against third-party risks as required by the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), and the owner of the vehicle was, therefore, in breach of that sub-section, and the first defendant had no means to meet the judgment which was given against him for his tortious act. Under a contract made with the Minister of Transport an incorporated body called the Motor Insurers Bureau undertook to pay any sum due under a judgment obtained by a person in respect of a liability required to be covered by a policy of insurance under the Act of 1930 which was not satisfied within seven days.

HELD: (i) rights against both defendants accrued to the plaintiff immediately on her husband's death, and, therefore, it could not be said that she had suffered no damage by reason of her inability to recover against the first defendant merely because the Bureau would pay to her any damages which she was awarded against him.

(ii) the second defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the amount of damages awarded against the first defendant by reason of her (the second defendant's) breach of statutory duty in permitting an uninsured person to drive the car.

ACTION for damages against both defendants for negligence under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and, further, against the second defendant for breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff's husband, while crossing a road, was knocked down and fatally injured through the negligent driving by the first defendant of a motor vehicle, the property of the second defendant. The first defendant, who was a person without means, was found not to be the agent or servant of the second defendant so as to make the latter liable for his negligence, but it was contended that the second defendant was, nevertheless, liable to pay to the plaintiff the damages recovered against the first defendant because she (the second defendant) had permitted the vehicle to be on the road without there being in force in relation to its user a policy of insurance, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). The second defendant maintained that the plaintiff had suffered no damage because the latter would be compensated by virtue of a contract between the Minister of Transport and the Motor Insurers Bureau whereby the Bureau undertook to satisfy any unsatisfied judgment arising from any liability required to be covered by a policy of insurance under the Act of 1930. HILBERY, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against both defendants.

Ruttle and M. G. Polson for the plaintiff.

Wallis-Jones for the first defendant.

Bickford Smith for the second defendant.

A HILBERY, J., reviewed the evidence, found that the accident happened through the negligence of the first defendant, that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, and that, when the accident occurred, the first defendant was not driving the car as agent or servant of the second defendant, and he continued: Lastly, there is a claim against the second defendant for damages for an alleged breach of statutory duty. The Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), provides:

B “Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, it shall not be lawful for any person to use, or to cause or permit any other person to use, a motor vehicle on a road unless there is in force in relation to the user of the vehicle by that person or that other person, as the case may be, such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third-party risks as complies with the requirements of this Part of this Act.”

C The first defendant had no policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks which covered him on this occasion. The second defendant had no policy of insurance against third-party risks covering the driving of the car by the first defendant, but she permitted the first defendant to drive the car without there being in existence such a policy and has been convicted before a magistrate of that offence. She was, therefore, in breach of her statutory duty. In Monk v. Warbey (1) it was decided that, where there has been a breach of this statutory duty and injury has been caused to a third party, the latter may, where the person primarily liable is in such a financial position that nothing is obtainable from him, proceed directly against the person responsible for the breach. It has been argued by counsel for the second defendant that, although the first defendant is in this financial position, nevertheless, the plaintiff has not suffered any damage by reason of this breach of the requirements of s. 35 (1) because there is in existence a contract between an incorporated body called the Motor Insurers Bureau and the Minister of Transport by which the Motor Insurers Bureau has agreed with the Minister as follows:

F “If judgment in respect of any liability which is required to be covered by a policy of insurance or a security, hereinafter called a contract of insurance, under Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, is obtained against any person or persons in any court in Great Britain, whether or not such person or persons be in fact covered by a contract of insurance, and any such judgment is not satisfied in full within seven days from the date upon which the person or persons in whose favour the judgment was given became entitled to enforce it, then Motor Insurers Bureau will, subject to the provisions of cl. 5 and 6 of these presents, pay or satisfy or cause to be paid or satisfied to or to the satisfaction of the person or persons in whose favour the judgment was given any sum payable or remaining payable thereunder in respect of the aforesaid liability, including taxed costs, (or such proportion thereof as is attributable to the aforesaid liability) whatever may be the cause of the failure of the judgment debtor to satisfy the judgment.”

H There, says counsel for the second defendant, is a contractual obligation on the Motor Insurers Bureau to satisfy any judgment which this court may give against the first defendant, and, therefore, the plaintiff has not suffered any damage.

I do not think that that argument is well founded for these reasons. The breach of the statutory duty was a continuing breach operative at the time of the accident (the time of the tortious act), and the moment the tortious act occurred the deceased man had his cause of action for the tort. At the date of his death and before she ever issued her writ, there immediately accrued to the widow a right to claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts against the tortfeasor for negligently causing her husband's death, and an enforceable claim against the second defendant under the decision in Monk v. Warbey (1) for any damages which she then sustained by reason of the breach by the second defendant of her statutory duty, which existed at the time of the tortious act, to fulfil the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The damage had, in fact, accrued to her inasmuch as at the time of the tortious act the first defendant was an uninsured person and in such a financial position that nothing was obtainable from him, even by bankruptcy proceedings. She had a complete cause of action, and GREER, L.J., in Monk v. Warbey (1) has pointed out ([1935] 1 K.B. 83) that it does not matter, even if it were the fact, that at the time of the tort her damages could not be quantified. In theory, of course, her damages are quantified as on the day of the accruing of her complete cause of action.

I have come to the conclusion that there must be judgment against the second defendant for the amount of the damages which I assess against the first defendant for his tortious act by reason of the second defendant's breach of statutory duty in allowing an uninsured person to drive her car contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930. A witness from the Motor Insurers Bureau expressed the opinion that under the agreement with the Minister the Bureau would satisfy any judgment that I might give against the first defendant. If they do, no difficulty arises, because those damages cannot be taken twice by the plaintiff. She cannot have double satisfaction for the tortious act which resulted in her husband's death. Therefore, there seems to me no practical difficulty in my giving judgment against the first defendant for damages due to the tortious act and against the second defendant for damages for the breach of her statutory duty resulting in the damage to the plaintiff in accordance with the decision in Monk v. Warbey (1).

[HIS LORDSHIP then assessed the damages at £5,250 and gave judgment for £5,249 under the Fatal Accidents Acts and £1 under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, with costs.]

Power of Appointment—General or special power—“In trust for such persons or person not being her husband” as daughter should appoint—Purported exercise of power by spinster daughter in favour of charity—Validity.

By his will, dated Nov. 22, 1907, a testator, who died on Jan. 10, 1913, gave all his real estate and his residuary personal estate to his trustees on trust for sale and investment and directed that (in the events which happened) the proceeds of sale and the investments thereof should be divided into three equal shares one of which was to be held on trust to pay the income thereof to each of his three daughters, A., E. and F., during her life and on the death of each daughter the capital and income of her share was directed to be held in trust for such one or more of her children or remoter issue as she should by deed or will appoint. The testator further provided: “And if there shall be no child who shall take a vested interest hereunder the share of each daughter shall be in trust for such persons or person not being her husband as she shall by deed or will whether covert or sole appoint.” On Mar. 21, 1931, A. died a spinster and by her will she purported to give, devise, bequeath, and appoint all her real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of, including the share and interest bequeathed to her by the will of the testator and all the moneys, stocks, funds, and securities for the time being representing such share, to her trustees on trust for sale, and directed her said trustees to stand possessed of her residuary trust fund on trust to pay the income to E. for life and thereafter to hold her trust fund on certain trusts for the establishment of a home for poor and aged persons of genteel birth. On Sept. 19, 1936, E. died a spinster, and by her will she purported to give, devise, bequeath and appoint all her real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of, including the share and interest bequeathed to her by the will of the testator, to her trustee on trust for sale and directed her trustee to stand possessed of her residuary trust fund so constituted on trusts for the purposes of the home for needy persons closely similar to, but not identical with, the trusts in that behalf contained in the will of A.

HELD: (i) the power of appointment given to A. and E. was effectively exercised although the will referred only to “such persons or person” and the power was exercised in favour of a charity.

Re Dilke ([1921] 1 Ch. 34), applied.

Per VAISEY, J.: If there is a power to appoint generally to persons, that involves necessarily that the persons who are the recipients of the bounty of the creator of the power can themselves be made the instruments to effect particular purposes.

(iii) a power to appoint to the whole world with a particular exception is not a general power properly so-called, but, if the excepted individual does not, and cannot, exist, the power can be treated for all purposes as a general power; A. and E. were both unmarried at the time of their deaths; and, therefore, the exception of their husbands could be disregarded and the powers treated as general powers. ✓

PRELIMINARY POINT OF LAW.

By an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Oct. 13, 1949, it was ordered that the question whether certain appointments, which purported to have been made by the wills of Edith and Alice Harvey under a power conferred on them by the will of their father, Robert Harvey, deceased, and which were mentioned in the statement of claim delivered in the action Re Harvey, deceased, Banister v. Thirtle and Others, were valid and effectual, should be set down as a preliminary point of law to be argued before the court. VAISEY, J., now answered the question in the affirmative. The facts appear in the judgment.

Christie, K.C., and E. I. Goulding for the plaintiff, sole executor of Fanny Banister, a daughter of Robert Harvey, deceased, who claimed to be entitled to the shares of the testator's residuary estate settled on Alice Harvey and Edith Harvey.

R. E. Megarry for the first defendant, the sole surviving executor and trustee of Robert Harvey.

R. W. Goff for the Westminster Bank, Ltd., the executor and trustee of the wills of Alice Harvey and Edith Harvey.

Denys Buckley for the Attorney-General.

VAISEY, J.: The point which I have to decide is whether the wills of two spinster ladies, who died in 1931 and 1936 respectively, operated to exercise the powers of appointment conferred on them by the will of their father who died in 1913. By that will, a one-third share in the testator's estate was settled on trust for each of those ladies for her life, followed by trusts in favour of her children. Then come the relevant words, which are:

"And if there shall be no child who shall take a vested interest hereunder the share of each daughter shall be in trust for such persons or person not being her husband as she shall by deed or will whether covert or sole appoint."

The daughter, Alice, who died in 1931, made a will by which she appointed the Westminster Bank, Ltd., and her sister, Edith, the other daughter, to be the executors and trustees thereof. She gave certain legacies and then purported to give, bequeath, and appoint the whole of her estate, including specifically the share and interest bequeathed to her by the will of the testator and all the moneys, stocks, funds, and securities for the time being representing such share unto her trustees on trust for sale. The residuary trust fund so constituted was to be held on trust to pay the income thereof to her sister Edith during her life, and after the sister's death the testatrix (Alice) directed that her trustees should hold the residuary trust fund on certain trusts for establishing a charitable institution. The testatrix died on Mar. 21, 1931, a spinster, and her will was duly proved on July 6, 1931, by the Westminster Bank, Ltd., the sister Edith having renounced probate. Edith made a will in very similar terms to those of Alice's will. She appointed the Westminster Bank, Ltd., to be the sole executor and trustee, and she gave, devised, bequeathed, and appointed the whole of her estate, including, as in the other case, the share and interest bequeathed to her by her father's will, and directed her trustee to stand possessed of the resulting fund on trusts similar in character to those in the will of Alice, i.e., on certain trusts defined to endow or assist in the foundation and endowment of a charitable institution. Edith died on Sept. 19, 1936, a spinster. Her will was proved on Dec. 24, 1936, and now the question arises how far, if at all, those two wills executed the power conferred on these two ladies by their father's will.

The suggestions which are made as to the invalidity of the appointments may, I think, be thus summarised. First, it is said that, there being reference only to persons or person and no reference to purposes or purpose, it was necessary, in order that the power might be effectively exercised, that it should be exercised in favour of specified individuals or a specified individual, and that those individuals or that individual must take beneficially, the only limit placed on the selection of the individuals being that the husband of the appointor was excluded. Then it is said (again, I think, because of the absence of any reference to purposes or purpose) that the creation of charitable trusts was outside the purview of the power. Finally, it is said that the objects of the power must be individual persons and not a corporation. It is not, I think, seriously contended that the nomination of the Westminster Bank as the primary appointee under the power is something which would vitiate the whole appointment, nor do I think it is seriously suggested that any objection could be taken to the bequest in the will of Alice of a life interest in favour of her sister Edith, but the other points require a little more consideration.

The absence of any reference to purposes in the creation of a power, whether it be a general power or a special power or one of those intermediate kinds of power which undoubtedly exist, cannot, I think, now be urged as a relevant consideration. I think that the point is concluded, so far as this court is concerned, by the decision of the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of PETERSON, J., in Re Dilke (1). I do not think I need refer to any particular passages in the judgments as reported, but I regard that case as making it clear that a general power, or a power comparable to a general power, is none the less general because persons only and not purposes are referred to. The reason for that, I suppose, is that it is only through the instrumentality of persons that purposes can be effected. If there is power to appoint generally to persons, that involves necessarily that the persons who are the recipients of the bounty of the creator of the power can themselves be made the instruments to effect particular purposes. Then it is said, as I understand it, that the reference to the exclusion of the husband indicates in some way that the class from which he is excluded must be a class of individual persons and not corporations or such a general conception of an appointee as is involved in the creation of a charitable trust. In my judgment, there is nothing in that point. True it is that in Re Jones (2), I held that the class of appointee must necessarily be limited to individual persons, but I did so on a very different ground. There the direction was that the fund should be held for persons living at a particular time. There is no doubt that that indicated that the appointees must necessarily be persons who were alive, which, of course, was something which could not be predicated, in ordinary language, of anyone except an individual person.

The further question is raised whether this is a general power. There is no doubt that the wills of the two ladies are framed on the assumption that it is a general power. Each of the ladies purports to create a fund out of her own property and out of the property of which she has power to dispose under her father's will. That, I think, is rather an interesting point, but, in my judgment, it is, on the facts of this case, covered by the decision of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Byron's Settlement (3). I agree that a power to appoint to the whole world with a particular exception is not, within the meaning of the Wills Act, 1837, or otherwise, a general power properly so called, but if the excepted individual does not, and cannot, exist, I think that the power may become a general power~ and can be so treated for all purposes. In Re Byron's Settlement (3) there was a power conferred on a married woman to appoint to or for such person or persons (not being her present husband, or any friend or relative of his) as she might select. The lady's husband died and she made a will in which she treated the power as being a general power. KEKEWICH, J., refused to treat the reference to the husband's friend or relative as being inoperative by reason of its uncertainty, but he said that, apart from those words, he thought that the removal from the scene of the excepted person, i.e., the husband, would have had the result of converting the power, which was originally of a different character, into a general power. He said ([1891] 3 Ch. 480):

"But supposing these words [the reference to the friend or relative] were out of the way it is argued that the words 'not being her present husband' would have no force in this particular instance, because the power was exercised after the death of the husband, when the lady was a widow, and, therefore, it had no effect upon the execution of the power; that at the date at which the power was exercised, it was a power to appoint in favour of any person in the world except one, who was a non-existent person, and that therefore the exception did not in fact have reference to any person at all. That was the argument; and, as at present advised, I think the argument is a sound one. I see no reason why a general power originally limited by exception may not become a general power free from exception by subsequent events. I do not see why a power to appoint to all the world except A., B., and C., may not be a power to appoint to all the world if, when the power comes to be exercised, A., B., and C. are dead."

In the present case each of these ladies executed the power, or purported to do so, by a document which took effect on her own death. At, or immediately✓ before, her death, it was, of course, an impossibility that there should be any husband who would come within the words of exception. Therefore, I take the view that in the case of each of these ladies the power, at the relevant moment, i.e., at the time when she exercised it by her will, she never having been married, was for all purposes a general power of appointment. In so deciding, I think that I am following what may be possibly only a dictum of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Byron's Settlement (3). It seems to me that there is no difference in principle between the case of the excepted person being dead, and the case of the excepted person being non-existent and, indeed, incapable of coming into existence, at the relevant moment when the power is exercised. I follow Re Byron's Settlement (3), and that decision, together with Re Dilke (1), seems to me to govern the present case, and there is nothing in Re Jones (2) which causes me the least hesitation in coming to the conclusion to which I do. It is, I think, plain, and I so held in Re Jones (2), that there are powers which are neither special powers nor general powers of appointment. It seems to me impossible for anyone to say that this power which I am considering in the present case was in any respect fiduciary. It possesses many of the characteristics of a general power, and at the relevant time I think it fell exactly within the definition of "general power" in the Wills Act, but, however that may be, I feel no doubt that in the present case each of these ladies, dying a spinster, exercising the power in the way that she did in her will, has exercised it effectively, and I will so declare.

The question whether the word "person" includes "corporation" does not, in my judgment, arise in the present case, but if and so far as it does, I personally feel no doubt that the Westminster Bank's position as executor qualifies that corporation to be the appointee under the wills of the two ladies, and it seems to me that it would be a technicality undeserving of the slightest sympathy if any attention were paid to the fact that these ladies, instead of appointing individuals as representatives of their estates, had chosen to appoint a trust corporation.

Declaration accordingly. Costs to be costs in the action. His Lordship's decision in fact disposed of the action which was therefore set down pro forma and dismissed with costs.

CORCORAN v. CORCORAN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), February 8, 1950.]

Contempt of Court—Divorce—Child—Custody—Failure to obey order—Child sent out of jurisdiction—Proceedings for custody by petitioner in Eire—Waiver—Need to purge contempt.

On the petition of the applicant's wife a decree absolute for divorce was made against him and he was ordered to deliver the child of the marriage to her custody. He, having previously sent the child out of the jurisdiction to his mother in Eire, failed to comply with the order, and in February, 1949, he was committed to gaol for his contempt of court by FINNEMORE, J. Proceedings were instituted in Eire by the wife, but the High Court in Eire refused to make an order granting her custody and the child remained in Eire. In support of the applicant's application for discharge it was contended that he had suffered sufficiently by remaining in prison for a year and that his wife, at whose instance he was attached, had waived her rights by taking proceedings in the Eire court.

HELD: (i) although there might be cases of contempt by failure to pay money in which waiver by the person to whom the money was owed gave a right to release to the party in contempt, there could be no question of waiver where there was failure to obey an order of the court relating to a child, and the fact that the wife had taken proceedings in Eire could not constitute a waiver.

Best v. Gompertz (1837) (2 Y. & C. Ex. 582), distinguished.

(ii) the only ground on which the court would be justified in releasing the applicant would be on condition that he carried out the terms of the order of FINNEMORE, J., and that he refused to do.

SUMMONS.

The applicant, Denis James Corcoran, applied for an order of release from custody under a committal order made by FINNEMORE, J. In 1947 a decree absolute for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his cruelty was made against the applicant who was then ordered to deliver the child of the marriage, a daughter aged nine, to his wife. Instead of complying he sent his daughter to reside with his mother in Dundrum, co. Tipperary, Eire, where she still remained. In February, 1949, as a consequence of this contempt the applicant was committed to Winchester gaol under the order of FINNEMORE, J., until the child was brought within the jurisdiction of the court and delivered to her mother and an apology was made to the court. As the applicant refused to carry out these terms and to purge his contempt, Mrs. Corcoran began proceedings in the High Court in Eire, but a Divisional Court sitting in Dublin refused to order the child's removal from the grandmother's care on the ground that it was not in the best interests of the child so to do. The main grounds now urged in support of the applicant's application for release were that he had suffered sufficiently for his conduct and that his wife had herself waived the contempt by seeking an order for the child's custody from the High Court in Eire.

Robert Hughes for the applicant.

WILLMER, J.: In this case counsel for the applicant has said everything that can possibly be said, but I am none the less persuaded that this application fails. As has been frankly conceded, there has been no attempt whatsoever on the part of the applicant to purge his contempt. It seems to me it would be a most dangerous and damaging thing for this court to allow his release.

Two points have been taken in argument. In the first place, it is contended that the applicant has a right to his release on the ground that the wife, at whose instance he was attached for contempt, has waived her rights by taking Irish proceedings. Best v. Gompertz (1) is cited in support of that contention. Assuming that there are cases such as that in which waiver by some party may give rise to an absolute right of release in favour of the party in contempt, I do not think that those considerations necessarily apply to this case. Best v. Gompertz (1) was a case of a contempt by failure to pay money, and it may very well be that the person to whom money is owed may be in a position to waive his or her rights, but in the present case the contempt in respect of which the applicant was attached had nothing to do with a failure to pay money, but was the result of a much more serious matter, viz., failure to obey the order of the court in relation to a child. I do not think that anybody can possibly do anything in regard to waiving the rights of a child in such circumstances as those of this case. In my view, there can be no question of waiver here on the ground of the wife's taking proceedings in Ireland.

Secondly, it is said that this man has suffered enough and that after a lapse of a year this court can now afford, without any loss of dignity, to be compassionate and release him. In support of that proposition Re Maria Annie Davies (2) was cited. In that case the court did order the release of a person attached for contempt, but under certain conditions. It was conceded by counsel for the applicant that if I were to release the applicant it would be appropriate in this case also to attach conditions to the release. Re Maria Annie Davies (2) was a case in one of the courts of common law. My attention was also drawn to the old case of Barlee v. Barlee (3) which arose in the ecclesiastical courts. In that case it was held that the court had no power to release in the absence of any attempt to purge the contempt. I do not think it is necessary to decide whether it would be right at this period of time to follow the older decision or the more modern view expressed in Re Maria Annie Davies (2). It may be a matter for consideration at some time whether, in exercising its jurisdiction, this court ought to follow the ecclesiastical law and practice or whether it ought to follow the practice in the courts of common law. I do not think that question arises here because the only condition on which I feel this court would be justified in releasing the applicant would be that he carried out the terms of the order made by FINNEMORE, J. That, he has said himself, and repeated to me through his counsel today, he does not propose to do. It seems to me that so long as he is in that frame of mind the only course is to let him remain where he is in the hope that in due course reason will prevail and he will one day be persuaded to purge his contempt by obeying the order.

In the course of the argument, I put forward certain suggestions to his counsel on which, I think, the applicant would be wise to act. The first suggestion was that he should comply with the order, because by doing so he does not in the least prejudice his position or the position of the child. I do not know whether it has been adequately explained to him that, if he were to do that, there would be nothing (questions of custody being always open for consideration) to prevent him from issuing a fresh summons on the basis that circumstances have changed since the time of the order of FINNEMORE, J. If he can be persuaded to bring the child back to this country and to hand her over in accordance with the order, at the same time taking out a fresh summons to consider again the future of the child, his position would not be prejudiced and he would be assured a full and patient hearing of any such new application. It seems to me, however, that it is for him to take the first step. During the course of the argument I made various other suggestions by which the applicant might give some evidence of change of heart. I do not propose to repeat them now in this judgment, but his counsel could take steps to advise him of what has been said in this court today. For the moment all I can do is to say that I refuse this application.

MacDARMAID v ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson, J.), January 30, February 10, 1950.]

Legitimation—Legitimation per subsequens matrimonium—Marriage to third person at date of birth of illegitimate person—Onus of proof—Presumption as to continuance of life—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 1 (2).

Section 1 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, provides for the legitimation of an illegitimate person by the subsequent marriage of his parents. By s. 1 (2): "Nothing in this Act shall operate to legitimate a person whose father or mother was married to a third person when the illegitimate person was born."

The petitioner, who was born on March 14, 1894, claimed a declaration under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1 (1), that she had become legitimated as from Jan. 1, 1927, the date of the commencement of the Act, her parents having married on Mar. 10, 1925. Her father had been married on Jan. 24, 1886, but he never lived with his first wife. There was evidence that she was last seen alive in 1891 or 1893 and that a year or two before his death in 1931 the petitioner's father stated that he had not seen or heard of her since that time, but that he never said that she had died.

HELD: (i) once the marriage of the petitioner's father in 1886 had been proved the onus was on the petitioner to prove that that marriage had ceased before she was born, or, at least, to prove facts from which the cessation of the first marriage could be inferred.

(ii) there was no presumption of law as to the continuance of life, but each case must be determined on its own facts; in view of the evidence that the first wife of the petitioner's father had been seen alive in 1891 or 1893 and that nothing abnormal about her health or circumstances was then observed, the proper inference to be drawn on the probabilities of the case was that she was still alive in 1894; and the petitioner, therefore, had failed to discharge the onus which was on her and her petition must be dismissed.

PETITION FOR DECLARATION OF LEGITIMACY.

The petitioner, Ellen Elizabeth MacDarmaid, claimed a declaration under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1, that, by reason of the lawful marriage of her parents on Mar. 10, 1925, she became legitimated as from Jan. 1, 1927. She was born on Mar. 14, 1894, and when her parents married, her mother described herself as a spinster and her father as a widower, he having previously been married on June 24, 1886, to Rosa Johnstone. The evidence showed that Rosa Johnstone had not been seen or heard of since 1891 or 1893, and it was argued for the petitioner that s. 1 (2) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, cast no onus on her to prove that the woman was dead. For the Attorney-General it was contended that the petitioner must discharge that onus or prove circumstances from which the court could presume the death. His Lordship accepted this proposition of law and dismissed the petition. D E

Stockdale for the Attorney-General.

Feb. 10. HODSON, J.: The petitioner, Ellen Elizabeth MacDarmaid, F claims a declaration under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, that her parents, Cadogan Thomas and Elizabeth Ann Thomas, were lawfully married on Mar. 10, 1925, and that by such marriage she became legitimated as from Jan. 1, 1927, the date of the commencement of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. A question of liability for succession duty depends on the result of the petition.

The petitioner was born on Mar. 14, 1894, and her birth certificate shows G that her father was described as a widower and her mother as a spinster. Both parents are dead, the father having died on May 9, 1931, and the mother on Jan. 25, 1940. Section 1 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, says:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, where the parents of an illegitimate person marry or have married one another, whether before H or after the commencement of this Act, the marriage shall, if the father of the illegitimate person was or is at the date of the marriage domiciled in England or Wales, render that person, if living, legitimate as from the commencement of this Act, or from the date of the marriage, whichever last happens."

It is admitted that the petitioner has satisfied the burden of proof imposed on her by this sub-section. Section 1 (2), however, provides :

“ Nothing in this Act shall operate to legitimate a person whose father or mother was married to a third person when the illegitimate person was born.”

The question which has to be determined is whether the father was married to a third person when the petitioner was born.

A The petitioner's father was married to Rosa Johnstone on June 24, 1886—that is to say, eight years before the birth of the petitioner. His younger brother, Vivian Thomas, proved that after the marriage the petitioner's father never lived with his wife, but continued to reside at his parents' home with the other members of his family in Drury Lane, London; that Rosa Thomas never lived there; and that she had a child which died almost immediately. He also proved that he and the petitioner's father saw Rosa at the roller skating rink at Olympia in 1891 or 1893, when she would be some twenty-seven years of age and that she appeared to have aged somewhat, and that a year or two before he died the petitioner's father said to his brother (the witness, Vivian) that he had not seen or heard of Rosa since the Olympia meeting, but that he never said anything about her having died.

B It is argued on behalf of the petitioner that there is no onus cast on her by s. 1 (2) to prove that her father's first wife was dead, but that, as the matter is left in doubt by the evidence, she is entitled to succeed. On behalf of the Attorney-General it is argued that sub-s. (1) does not come into operation in the case of a person whose father was married before the date of her birth unless there is evidence on which, despite the marriage, a declaration of legitimacy can be made. In these circumstances, it is contended that the onus is on the petitioner to prove that the death of Rosa occurred on or before Mar. 14, 1894, or to prove circumstances or facts which the court should accept as prima facie evidence that such death occurred. In my judgment, the proposition contended for by the Attorney-General is correct, and once the fact of the previous marriage is proved the petitioner must at least prove facts from which the cessation of the first marriage can properly be inferred before she can succeed.

D Where a person has not been heard of by persons who would naturally have heard of him, if alive, he will be presumed to be dead after a lapse of seven years: Doe d. Knight v. Nepean (1), confirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Nepean v. Doe d. Knight (2). The present petitioner cannot rely on this presumption since the first wife was seen alive in 1891 or 1893—within seven years of the birth of the petitioner. Moreover, in view of her age and the circumstances in which she was last seen, there are no facts proved from which the inference can properly be drawn that she died within the seven years. Even if the matter F be approached from another direction, namely, that it is for the Attorney-General to establish that the first marriage existed at the time of the birth of the petitioner, the same conclusion is reached.

There is no presumption of law as to continuance of life, but each case must be determined on its own facts. This is established by the authority of LORD DENMAN, C.J., who delivered the judgments in Doe d. Knight v. Nepean (1) and in Nepean v. Doe d. Knight (2) and thus expressed himself in R. v. Harborne (Inhabitants) (3) (2 Ad. & El. 544):

G “ I must take this opportunity of saying, that nothing can be more absurd than the notion, that there is to be any rigid presumption of law on such questions of fact, without reference to accompanying circumstances, such, for instance, as the age or health of the party. There can be no such strict presumption of law. In Doe d. Knight v. Nepean (1) the question arose much as in R. v. Twynning (4). The claimant was not barred, if the party was presumed not dead till the expiration of the seven years from the last intelligence. The learned judge who tried the cause held that there was a legal presumption of life until that time, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, because, if there was a legal presumption, there was nothing to be submitted to the jury. But this court held, that no legal presumption H existed, and set the verdict aside. That is quite consistent with the view which we take in the present case; and R. v. Twynning (4) may be explained in the same way. I am aware that, in this latter case, BAYLEY, J., founds his decision on the ground of contrary presumptions; but I think that the only questions in such cases are, what evidence is admissible, and what inference may fairly be drawn from it. It may be said, suppose a party were shewn to be alive within a few hours of the second marriage, is there no presumption then?"

The judgment of BAYLEY, J., is to be found in R. v. Twynning, Gloucestershire (Inhabitants) (4), and his observations to the effect that the presumption of the continuance of life was offset by the presumption of innocence of crime were not accepted by LORD DENMAN, C.J.

Before citing the passage from the Harborne case (3), SIR G. M. GIFFARD, L.J., in Re Phene's Trusts (5) made the following observations (5 Ch. App. 150):

"The existence of the party at an antecedent period may or may not afford a reasonable inference that he was living at the subsequent date. If, for example, it were proved that he was in good health on the day preceding the second marriage, the inference would be strong, almost irresistible, that he was living on the latter day, and the jury would in all probability find that he was so. If, on the other hand, it were proved that he was then in a dying condition, and nothing further was proved, they would probably decline to draw that inference. Thus the question is entirely for the jury."

After citing the passage from the judgment of LORD DENMAN, C.J., which I have just read, he added (ibid., 151):

"The notion of a legal presumption in favour of life originated, I believe, with the civil law; and we have SIR WILLIAM GRANT'S opinion in Mason v. Mason (6) as to adopting presumptions of fact from that law."

Applying the law as laid down in those decisions to the facts of this case, without reliance on any presumption, I find that the first wife of the petitioner's father, Rosa Johnstone, having been seen alive in 1891 or 1893 at Olympia at the age of twenty-seven, when nothing abnormal about her health or circumstances was observed save that she had aged somewhat, the proper inference to draw on the probabilities of the case is that she was still alive in 1894 when the petitioner was born. In my judgment, therefore, the petition fails.

Re FISON'S WILL TRUSTS. FISON v. FISON AND OTHERS.

Will—Option—Shares—Options to sons to purchase shares after death of tenant for life—“At par value”—Changes in regard to shares during tenancy of tenant for life—Amalgamation of company and substitution of increased number of shares in new company for those of old company—Substantial increase in value of holding—Liquidation of another company—Large sum paid by liquidator in respect of shares—Right of sons to exercise options.

By his will, dated May 11, 1918, the testator gave his shares in J.F. and Co., Ltd. and C.U., Ltd. “which I die possessed of” to his trustees on trust to pay the income of one fourth part thereof to his wife during her life, and after her death the trustees were to offer to sell that fourth part of the shares to his sons, F. and J., “at par value in equal shares.” He directed that, if either son should decline the offer made to him, his share of the fourth part of the shares should be offered at the same price to the other son, and, if only one son should be then living, the whole of the fourth part of the shares should be offered to him at par value. Any of these shares not sold to the sons were to be otherwise sold and the proceeds of sale were to form part of the testator's residuary estate, which was to be divided in equal shares among all his children who should survive him. The testator died in 1920 and the widow died on Jan. 24, 1949. The fourth part of the shares in the two companies which were settled on the widow for life were 752 ordinary shares of £10 each in J.F. and Co., Ltd. and 122 ordinary shares of £10 each in C.U., Ltd. As a result of an amalgamation between J.F. & Co., Ltd. and other companies in 1929, the 752 ordinary shares of J.F. & Co., Ltd. were exchanged for 15,040 ordinary shares of £1 each and 3,760 seven per cent. preference shares of £1 each in the new company (now F., Ltd.), and in 1947, on a conversion of the seven per cent. preference shares into  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares, the 3,760 seven per cent. preference shares were exchanged for 5,848  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares of £1 each. The present market value of the shares in F., Ltd. was 44s. per £1 ordinary share and 22s. per £1  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference share. C.U., Ltd. was wound-up in 1948, and the trustees had received from the liquidator a sum of £13,952 in respect of the 122 shares in that company held by them on trust for the widow for life. The greater part of this sum had been invested and the remainder was still in cash. The question was whether the options granted to the sons, F. and J., became operative on the widow's death, notwithstanding the changes which had occurred in regard to the shares.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, the testator, in granting the options, intended to confer a bounty on the sons, and, therefore, the options were exercisable on the death of the widow, notwithstanding the changes which had occurred.

(ii) the direction with regard to purchase “at par value” referred to the par value of the shares at the time of the testator's death, and, therefore, the sons were entitled to purchase in equal shares (a) 15,040 ordinary shares of £1 each and 5,848  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares of £1 each in F., Ltd., at the price of £7,520, and (b) the investments and cash now representing the sum of £13,952 received by the trustees on the liquidation of C.U., Ltd., and any further sums payable by the liquidator in respect of the 122 shares, at the price of £1,220.

Will—Option—Option to purchase real property—Subject-matter of option—Agreement by testator to purchase additional property, but sale not completed until after his death—Right of grantee to take property free from incumbrances—Purchaser or devisee—Real Estate Charges Act, 1854 (c. 113), s. 1.

By his will the testator, who died in 1920, devised "my estate known as the 'Stutton Hall estate' including the 'Crepping Hall estate' and all my real estate situate in the parish of Stutton" to his wife for life, and directed that, after her death, the property was to form part of the residue of his real estate as thereafter devised and was to be sold accordingly, but that "before selling the said hereditaments so devised to my . . . wife for life as aforesaid my trustees shall after her decease offer the Stutton Hall estate at the price of £15,000 and the Crepping Hall estate at the price of £8,000 to my son [F.] if living." Between the date of his will and the date of his death the testator contracted to purchase seven cottages at Stutton, adjoining the Stutton Hall estate, but the purchase was not completed until after his death. At the time of the widow's death, the Stutton Hall estate and the Crepping Hall estate were subject (a) to an equitable charge in favour of the residuary estate, and (b) to a mortgage raised by the trustees for payment of estate duty and of the purchase price which was owing in respect of the cottages. The questions to be determined were (i) whether the option to the son, F., relating to the Stutton Hall estate, included the seven cottages, and (ii) whether, if he exercised his option to purchase the estates, the properties were to be conveyed to him free from, or subject to, the charges.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, the option relating to the Stutton Hall estate included all the testator's property in the parish of Stutton, subject only to the excision therefrom of the Crepping Hall estate, which was subject to a separate option; the position in regard to the seven cottages was the same as if they had actually been conveyed to the testator before his death (Re Wakefield ([1943] 2 All E.R. 29), applied); and, therefore, the subject-matter of the option included the cottages.

(ii) if the son exercised the option, he elected to become a purchaser and was not a devisee under the will, and, therefore, the Real Estate Charges Act, 1854, s. 1, did not apply and he was entitled to the conveyance of the estates free from any incumbrances.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine inter alia (i) whether options given by the will of the testator to his two sons to purchase certain shares on the death of the widow were still exercisable notwithstanding changes that had occurred in regard to the shares during the widow's lifetime, and (ii) whether, in exercising an option, given by the will, to purchase real property, the grantee of the option took the property free from, or subject to, incumbrances. ROMER, J., now held (i) that the options in regard to the shares were still exercisable, and (ii) that, on exercising the option to purchase the real property, the grantee became a purchaser and was entitled to a conveyance of the property free from any incumbrances. The facts and the relevant provisions of the will appear in the judgment.

Droop for the plaintiff (a trustee).

J. A. Reid for the first defendant (the testator's elder son, Frank Fison).

Lightman for the remaining defendants (residuary legatees).

ROMER, J.: The problem raised by question (i) of this summons is due to the fact that, after the testator died, radical changes came about in regard to shares which he owned in certain companies at the time of his will and at the time of his death, and which he made the subject of express dispositions by his will. The testator made his will on May 11, 1918, and on Dec. 17, 1918, he made a codicil, which is not material for the present purposes. He died on Feb. 19, 1920. His widow, who survived him and to whom he gave certain life interests, died on Jan. 24, 1949. By his will, after appointing executors and trustees and making certain pecuniary bequests, he said:

"I bequeath my shares in 'Joseph Fison & Co., Ltd.' and in 'The Chemical Union, Ltd.' which I die possessed of as follows: As to one equal fourth part thereof to my trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to my said wife during her life and after her death my trustees shall offer to sell the said fourth part of my shares to my sons Frank Guy Clavering Fison and John Reginald Gifford Fison at par value in equal shares and if one of my said two sons shall decline the offer thus made to him his share of the said one fourth part shall be offered at the same price to the other said son and if only one son shall be living then the whole of the said fourth part of my shares shall be offered to such son at par value and any of such shares not sold to my said sons or son shall be otherwise sold and the proceeds of sale of the shares held in trust for my said wife shall fall into and form part of the residue of my estate."

Then he dealt with the other three equal fourth parts of his shares, and made a disposition with regard to his real estate. He gave all his real and personal property not thereby otherwise disposed of to his trustees on the usual trust for sale, and directed that the trustees "shall stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys in trust" for all his children who should survive him in equal shares. He then settled the interest which his daughters took under his will on the usual trusts for the benefit of themselves and their husbands and issue. There followed a declaration in the ordinary form, giving his trustees power to postpone the sale or conversion of any part of his real and personal estate.

The facts with regard to the shares in Joseph Fison & Co., Ltd. and Chemical Union, Ltd. are as follows. First, with regard to Joseph Fison & Co., Ltd., what is described in the plaintiff's affidavit as an amalgamation took place in 1929 between that company and Packard and James Fison (Thetford), Ltd. and Prentice Brothers, Ltd. At the date of the amalgamation the one-fourth of the shares in the company which were settled on the widow for life, and were, on her death, subject to these options, were 752 ordinary shares of £10 each in the company. By an agreement, dated Apr. 11, 1929, and made between the three companies, it was provided, in effect, that Packard and James Fison (Thetford), Ltd. should absorb the undertakings of the other two companies. The terms on which that transaction should be effected were submitted to arbitration, and as a result of the award made in that arbitration, the 752 ordinary shares of £10 each, to which I have referred, were exchanged for 15,040 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 3,760 seven per cent. preference shares of £1 each of the Packard company. The Packard company subsequently changed its name to Fison, Packard & Prentice, Ltd., and then to Fison's, Ltd., which is its present name. In 1947 the preference shares of Fison's, Ltd., were converted into  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares of £1 each by the issue of fourteen of the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares in place of every nine of the seven per cent. preference shares, and the holding of preference shares by the trustees of the testator's will on trust for Mrs. Fison for life became 5,848  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference shares of £1 each. Those shares are still held by the trustees of the will, and their present market value is 44s. per £1 ordinary share and 22s. per £1  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. preference share.

With regard to the testator's holding in Chemical Union, Ltd., he held 490 ordinary shares of £10 each in that company, and 122 of those shares were appropriated by the trustees after his death on trust for Mrs. Fison for life, and on her death the option would operate on those 122 shares. At the time of the testator's death, Chemical Union, Ltd., was a trading company, but in 1926 it sold its business for cash and thereafter became an investment company in the sense that it invested the proceeds in various securities and ceased to be a trading company. In 1948 the company was wound-up and the trustees received from the liquidator a sum of £23,328 in respect of 204 shares which they held in trust including the 122 shares to which I have referred, and of that sum £13,952 was received in respect of those 122 shares. Most of the money which the trustees received from the liquidator has been invested in various investments, but there is also a sum of £2,835 cash remaining uninvested.

The question is whether, notwithstanding the changes which were brought about in the testator's shares in those two companies, the options conferred on or granted to the two sons became operative on the death of the testator's widow. It appears to me that the matter is substantially concluded, so far as this court is concerned, by authority. Counsel for the first defendant, Frank Fison, referred me to three cases, the first of which is Re Cant's Estate (1). The headnote says:

"Land was devised in trust for the testator's widow for life, and after her death for sale and division of the proceeds among his children equally, with a direction that the trustees should offer the land to the testator's son, at a specified price, upon the death of the widow. The land was purchased by a railway company, under the powers given by their Act, for more than twice the specified sum: Held, that the son was entitled to the difference."

It was argued on behalf of the grantee of the option in that case that his interest was not affected by the operation of the railway Act, which could not alter the rights of the parties. On behalf of the other children of the testator, it was argued that the testator's object in granting an option to the son, Charles Cant, was that he might use the land for a particular purpose, and that, as the land was sold during the lifetime of the tenant for life, the testator's intention became incapable of being carried into effect. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., and TURNER, L.J., dealt with the matter very shortly. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said (4 De G. & J. 507):

"By a contract of purchase under the powers of a railway Act, a sum of money was substituted for land and became subject to all the rights which affected the land. The land had been devised with other property by the owner to his wife for life, and after her death all was to be sold, and the testator in effect said, 'as to a particular portion,' namely, the land now in question 'my son shall have it if he shall elect to be charged for it with £450 as between himself and my estate.' I conceive that this right remains not affected by the Act, and that the son is entitled to take the purchase-money, whether amounting to hundreds or thousands, on paying the sum which the testator has specified in his will, just as he would have been entitled to the land itself if it had not been taken by the railway company."

TURNER, L.J., said (ibid.):

"The whole argument of the respondents rests on this, that the testator only intended to benefit his son Charles, in the event of his continuing to be a gardener. The true test of this argument is, whether, if he had ceased to be a gardener in his father's lifetime he would still have been entitled to the land. This question admits of no doubt, and the only consideration then is, whether, if the right remained at the death of the testator, the Act of Parliament subsequently passed can affect it. I am of opinion that it cannot."

The option, therefore, was held to be subsisting.

In Re Kerry (2), which came before NORTH, J., a testator by his will devised his real estate to trustees, on trust for sale. The proceeds of sale were to be applied in paying the testator's debts and bequests, and the residue invested and held on certain trusts. The testator directed that no sale of his dwelling-house, shop, and stock-in-trade should be made under the trust until the trustees should, when they had determined to sell the same, offer the property for sale to his son G. W. Kerry at the price of £1,500 in preference to any other person. If the son should refuse to purchase the same when offered to him for sale, or should he neglect or refuse to complete the purchase within six calendar months after the same should have been so offered to him, the trustees should be at liberty to sell the property to any other person. A similar option to purchase two cottages was given to a daughter of testator, the price fixed being £350. The testator's real estate was sold in a creditor's administration action for the payment of his debts. The dwelling-house, etc., was sold for £2,350; the two cottages were sold for £550. After the debts had been paid there remained a surplus of less than £1,050 in court. The son, G. W. Kerry, claimed to have the surplus divided between himself and the daughter, in the proportion of £850 to £200, those sums being the respective amounts by which the purchase-moneys of the two properties exceeded the respective option prices.

NORTH, J., is reported as having said ([1889] W.N. 4) that:

"... Re Cant's Estate (1) was an analogous case, though not a direct authority. Effect ought to be given so far as was possible to the provisions of the will. The intention of the testator was that, if the son and daughter exercised the option to purchase, the other persons entitled under the will should not receive more than £1,500 and £350 from the two properties respectively. The option was intended to be a benefit; the excess in value above the price fixed was intended to go to the person to whom the option was given. The sale in the creditor's action was not made under the trusts of the will, and, before the persons interested in the residue could take any benefit, the excess above the option prices must be paid to the son and daughter respectively. The surplus must be divided between them in the proportion of £850 to £200."

In Re Armstrong's Will Trusts (3), which recently came before COHEN, J., the headnote ([1943] Ch. 400) is:

"A testator by his will made in 1899 gave to his wife a life interest in land and to his son an option, exercisable within twelve months after his wife's death, to buy the land for £5,000. In 1900 the testator died. His widow, as tenant for life, sold and otherwise dealt with parts of the land. She died in 1942, and over £19,000 was due to be received in respect of her dealings with the land. Three days after her death the son purported to exercise his option: Held, that the son had validly exercised the option and was entitled to the moneys receivable in respect of his mother's sales of and other dealings with the land or to the investments representing them."

COHEN, J., devoted the first part of his judgment ([1943] 2 All E.R. 538) to a consideration of Re Flint (4), a decision of ASTBURY, J., in which:

"A testator who died in 1920 gave his property to trustees, and settled the entirety upon trust for various beneficiaries in undivided shares. He empowered the trustees at any time to sell any part of his estate, subject to a right of pre-emption thereby given to his son Alfred over property A at a price to be fixed by the trustees' valuer before sale. On Jan. 1, 1926, the land vested in the trustees on the statutory trusts for sale, etc., under the Law of Property Act, 1925, sched. I, pt. 4, s. 1 (3): Held, on the construction of the will, that the right of pre-emption was only intended to attach to an exercise of the power of sale under the will, and not to a sale under the statutory trusts or any other extraneous powers. Held, also, that, even if the right of pre-emption was intended to attach to any sale whatever by the trustees, it was not enforceable against the statutory trusts of s. 35 either as an 'equitable interest or power' within s. 3 and s. 205 (1) (ix); or as an 'additional or larger power' . . . or as an 'incumbrance'."

It was, accordingly, held

"... that the trustees on executing the statutory trusts could disregard the right of pre-emption."

COHEN, J., in Re Armstrong's Will Trusts (3), distinguished Re Flint (4), saying ([1943] 2 All E.R. 538):

"That case seems to me, however, to be distinguishable for two reasons. In the first place, Alfred was not given any option to buy at a fixed price; the testator merely directed that he should receive the first offer at a price to be fixed by a valuer at the time when the trustees decided to sell. The valuer would fix a proper price as between willing buyer and willing seller, and it is impossible, therefore, to argue that the intention of the testator by fixing a price was to confer bounty on Alfred. In the second place, the question what right, if any, Alfred might have in the proceeds of sale was not considered at all. I cannot, therefore, derive assistance in the present case from the decision in Re Flint (4)."

The learned judge then referred to Re Cant's Estate (1) and Re Kerry (2), and came to the conclusion which is indicated in the headnote. He supported his view on another ground which I do not think it is necessary for me to consider, although counsel for the first defendant made reference to it.

It appears to me that, subject to one point which I will mention in a moment, those decisions govern the present case. In regard to the Chemical Union shares, it might be thought that the fact that the company was wound-up during the widow's lifetime, and the trustees received in respect of the settled one-fourth part of the shares cash which they invested, gave rise to a position which was outside the testator's contemplation and outside the scope of his disposition. It seems to me, however, that the events which gave rise to and resulted in that are comparable to the events which fell for consideration in the three cases to which I have referred, in which the court saw no difficulty in holding that the options which were given in relation to the property could be exercised in connection with the money representing the proceeds of sale. Counsel for the residuary legatees was, I think, inclined to concede that, if on construction of the will the court came to the conclusion that the testator intended to confer a bounty on the two sons, then those cases would apply. He contended, however, that there was no reason to suppose that the testator intended to confer a bounty on the sons, but that the true view was that he intended to create the ordinary position of vendor and purchaser, his idea being to keep his family companies, and, as appears from other parts of the will, certain family estates, within the possession of his own family. Counsel for the residuary legatees pointed out

A that there were a good many options given in the will, and that the testator showed that it was very possible that the options might not be attractive propositions, and, therefore, he needed to provide for what should happen in the event of the options not being exercised. Counsel went on to say that that showed that the testator did not regard this as being a matter of bounty or benefit which he was conferring on his sons, but he was merely making provision for what should happen in the events which I have described. He cited Re Wilson (5) as showing that a person in the position of these sons should rightly be regarded as a purchaser and not as a beneficiary.

B It is plain that, for some purposes, they are to be regarded as purchasers if and when they exercise their option, but that does not, in my opinion, lead to the conclusion that the element of bounty was absent from the granting of the options. It seems to me to be evident that the element of bounty was present in the granting of the options. The grantees of the options were his sons, and, although no evidence was given in this case—even as none was given in any of the reported cases—in regard to the value of the shares at the date of the testator's death, or what the testator regarded as being their value, nevertheless, it seems to me that, when a testator makes provision in his will whereby one of his children is entitled to take either one or more of his assets at a definite price, that in itself is an indication of bounty, because in any case it would be open to any one of his children to buy the property or to bid for it in the market against all the world. If he did so, he could be run up in the bidding. If he chose to go high enough, he might get the property, but in that case his rights would be in common with those of everyone else. When the testator says that, if his son is prepared to put up £x, he can have the property, my conclusion is that that is prima facie a bounty. In my judgment, in the light of the cases to which I have referred, these options are exercisable still, notwithstanding what has happened to the shares.

E In regard to the argument of counsel for the residuary legatees that, by giving alternative options and providing what was to happen if the options were refused, the testator showed that he contemplated what he was doing, not as being an act of bounty, but as being an act of family policy, I would like to point out, first, that that element was present also in Re Kerry (2), and, secondly, that a very sensible explanation of the precaution is to be found in this circumstance. If the shares were, in fact, worth only round about par when the time to exercise the option came, it might well be that one of the sons would not want to take up the shares, while the other one, having greater confidence in the future of the company, or for some other reasons, might take up the shares instead. I think that the matter—down to this point, at all events—is covered by authority binding on me. Then comes the question: Assuming that the options are still exercisable, or were still exercisable when the widow died, what is to be the price which the sons have to pay in order to acquire the investments and cash which now represent the original shares? The words of the will were: G “I bequeath my shares in [the two companies] which I die possessed of as follows,” and the testator then directed that the income of one fourth part thereof should be paid to his wife during her life

H “... and after her death my trustees shall offer to sell the said fourth part of my shares to my sons Frank Guy Clavering Fison and John Reginald Gifford Fison at par value in equal shares ...”

The argument of counsel for the residuary legatees was as follows. He said, first, that the whole thing failed because the testator intended to project his mind forward to the par value at a future time, viz., the time when the option should be exercised, and, so far as the Chemical Union shares are concerned, there is no measure now of what should be paid for them because those shares became cash and one cannot value cash. The fact of the subsequent investment of part of that cash, he said, is a mere incident and one cannot get a yardstick of value from those investments. His alternative contention was that one had to take the ordinary price of the shares in Fison's, Ltd., to which the original shares in Joseph Fison, Ltd., could be traced, and that is the value which the sons must pay.

The difficulty of the case is that the testator never contemplated the events which, in fact, happened, or, if he did contemplate them, he certainly did not provide for them in express terms. When he says that the trustees should "offer the said fourth part of my shares at par value," he may have had in mind the par value of those shares at the time when his widow should die and the option might become effective. I think, however, that it is open to me to construe the will in such a way as to give effect to the disposition and to interpret the direction with regard to purchase price "at par value" as the par value of the shares at the time he died because it is the shares which he had at the time of his death with which he was actually dealing, since he said: "I bequeath my shares . . . which I die possessed of as follows," and then he gave an option and referred to the par value of those shares. If that were the case, at his death it would be known what shares he held, and what their par value was, and from that moment onwards, accordingly, everyone concerned would know at what price the options could, in the future, be exercised. The result, therefore, is that the gift has the same effect as though there were substituted for the words in the will, "the said fourth part . . . at par value," the words "the sum which the shares in the aggregate were worth at par at the time of my death." Accordingly, I hold that the options are still exercisable, and that the two sons are now entitled to purchase in equal shares at the price of £7,520 15,040 £1 ordinary shares, and 5,848 £1 4½ per cent. preference shares in Fison's, Ltd., and to purchase in equal shares at the price of £1,220 the investments and cash now representing the sum of £13,950 which was received by the trustees on the liquidation of Chemical Union, Ltd. in April, 1948, and any further sums payable by the liquidator in respect of the 122 shares.

The next gift which I have to consider is in the following terms:

"I devise my estate known as the 'Stutton Hall estate' including the 'Crepping Hall estate' and all my real estate situate in the parish of Stutton in the county of Suffolk unto and to the use of my said wife for and during her life she keeping the same in repair and insured against fire and I hereby direct and declare that from and after the decease of my said wife the said hereditaments and premises shall form part of the residue of my real estate hereinafter devised and shall after her decease be sold accordingly provided always and I hereby declare that before selling the said hereditaments so devised to my said wife for life as aforesaid my trustees shall after her decease offer the Stutton Hall estate at the price of £15,000 and the Crepping Hall estate at the price of £8,000 to my said son Frank Guy Clavering Fison if living."

Between the date of the codicil and the date of his death, the testator contracted to purchase seven cottages at Stutton for £751 10s. The contract had not been carried to completion at the date of his death, but was completed subsequently, and the property was conveyed, presumably to the trustees. The question for my decision is whether the option to the son, Frank, the first defendant, relating to the Stutton Hall estate, includes the seven cottages. Counsel for the residuary legatees says that it does not. He says that what the testator was dealing with under this direction in his will was property which he then had, which he was specifically describing, and which alone it was in his mind to deal with, and, therefore, the option could not include property which he did not possess at that time and which he had not even contracted to buy. I think that this is purely a question of the construction of the will. The testator appears to define the Stutton Hall estate as including the Crepping Hall estate and all the testator's real estate situate in the parish, in addition to what was, I assume, universally recognised as forming part of Stutton Hall estate. Part of the property included in that definition, viz., the Crepping Hall estate, is cut out of the totality, because of the £8,000 option, but subject, and subject only, to that excision, the whole of the Stutton Hall estate, so defined, appears to me to be within the ambit of the option for £15,000. Accordingly, had the testator bought this property, and had it been conveyed to him between the date of the codicil to his will and the date of his death, I think that the seven cottages, which, I am told, join the Stutton Hall estate itself, would plainly have been included in the option relating to the Stutton Hall estate, which the testator had previously defined as including "all my real estate situate in the parish of Stutton." That being so, having regard to the decision in Re Wakefield (6), I think that the testator's interest in the seven cottages under the contract at the date of his death can be properly regarded as forming part of the real estate "situate in the parish of Stutton," so that the position in that regard is the same as though the cottages had actually been conveyed to him before his death. Accordingly, I hold that the subject-matter of the option, relating to the Stutton Hall estate, includes the seven cottages.

The property which was subject to the option given to the first defendant, and exercisable by him on his mother's death, was subject at her death to certain charges or incumbrances. There was a charge for £3,531 which was owing to Barclays Bank by the testator at the time of his death, and was then secured to the bank on the Stutton Hall and Crepping Hall estates by a memorandum of deposit. This charge represented moneys borrowed by the testator for the balance of the purchase money of the Crepping Hall estate when purchased by him in 1912. The money was paid off out of the general estate on the testator's death, and presumably, therefore, in equity the charge would be kept alive in favour of the residuary estate. The trustees, then, by a mortgage on the estate, raised a sum for the payment of estate duty and for the payment of £751 10s. which was owing by the testator at the time he died in respect of his contract to purchase the seven cottages with which I have already dealt.

The question before me is whether, if the first defendant exercises his option to purchase the Stutton Hall estate for £15,000, and the Crepping Hall estate for £8,000—he has, in fact, exercised those options—he is entitled to have the properties conveyed to him free from, or subject to, the charges which I have mentioned. It appears to me that the answer to that question depends on whether the first defendant is to be regarded in this respect as a devisee under the testator's will, or whether he is to be regarded as a purchaser of the estate in pursuance of the contract of sale created between himself and the trustees in the exercise of his option. The matter is not free from complication and is rendered very uncertain because of the difficulty in reconciling some of the authorities which have a bearing on the case. It depends largely on the construction of the testator's will, so I will read once more the relevant passages:

"I devise my estate known as the 'Stutton Hall estate' including the 'Crepping Hall estate' and all my real estate situate in the parish of Stutton in the county of Suffolk unto and to the use of my said wife for and during her life she keeping the same in repair and insured against fire and I hereby direct and declare that from and after the decease of my said wife the said hereditaments and premises shall form part of the residue of my real estate hereinafter devised and shall after her decease be sold accordingly provided always and I hereby declare that before selling the said hereditaments so devised to my said wife for life as aforesaid my trustees shall after her decease offer the Stutton Hall estate at the price of £15,000 and the Crepping Hall estate at the price of £8,000 to my said son Frank Guy Clavering Fison if living."

The testator then provided for what was to happen if the first defendant was not then living, or if he did not accept the offer. There is a further proviso that:

"... no purchaser of any hereditaments under the trusts or provisions for sale hereinafter declared or contained shall be bound or concerned to see or inquire whether any such offer as aforesaid has been made to my sons or either of them."

Then there is a devise and bequest of all the testator's real and personal property "not hereby otherwise disposed of" to the trustees on the usual trust for sale and conversion with power to postpone. If the true position is that the first defendant is to be regarded as a devisee, then, by reason of the Real Estate Charges Act, 1854 (Locke King's Act), s. 1, he can only take these properties under his option subject to the incumbrances affecting them. On the other hand, if he is entitled to them as a purchaser, then he is entitled to a conveyance free from the incumbrances. I think I have sufficiently stated the matters of fact which are relevant in relation to the charges, but I should, perhaps, add this. Mr. John Fison, the plaintiff, in his affidavit says:

"The two estates, as they now are, subject to liability for discharging all moneys expended in improving them since the testator's death, and treating them as subject also to the said charges for £751 10s. and £3,531 3s. 3d., are believed to be of considerably greater value than their value as assessed for purposes of estate duty less the last-mentioned charges at the testator's death."

Counsel for the residuary legatees contended, first, that, as a question of construction, the first defendant, by exercising his option on the widow's death, became entitled only to the same subject-matter as that in which the widow had enjoyed a life interest, and that subject-matter was the Stutton Hall estate and the Crepping Hall estate subject to the charges imposed on them. If that be so, then that gives an answer to the question, because, in whatever light that property be regarded, he would only get the estates subject to the mortgages. I am, however, unable to accept that view of the matter. It appears to me to be putting too great a strain on the language used, which, in my view, was simply directed to identifying the property which the testator was intending to dispose of, viz., the Stutton Hall estate and the Crepping Hall estate. The mere fact that the widow was to take a life interest in the estates first and that an option relating to the estates was exercisable at her death does not, I think, mean, or even indicate, that the testator had in mind that the subject-matter should, in the case of the widow and in the case of the first defendant, be affected by the same incidents. Therefore, I do not think that I am much assisted by the description of the estates which the testator thought right to employ. Counsel for the residuary legatees then contended that there is authority for the proposition that, in such a case as the present, the person to whom the option is given should be regarded as a devisee, i.e., where an option, which is plainly a beneficial option, is given, then the recipient of that option would be treated as a devisee. He referred me to some observations of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Earl of Radnor v. Shafto (7), where the Lord Chancellor said (11 Ves. 455) in relation to rights of pre-emption:

"But my judgment upon this case is, that under the circumstances, that have taken place, no one is entitled by this will to the right of pre-emption proposed. In the case that has been put by the Attorney-General, of an estate, worth £50,000, offered to a particular person at £30,000, and the other case, where the testator directs the trustees to make an offer at a reasonable price, to be fixed by them, the court possibly to one intent would hold either will to amount in substance to a devise of the estate itself, if that person would accept it upon those terms: but, if the effect of the option could be construed as high in either case, that person must in his life do some act, denoting, that he accepts the benefit: or the court cannot consider him as being in the same circumstances, as if he had made a contract for the purchase of the estate. In this instance, if Mr. Duncombe had accepted the offer, and done any act, denoting that purpose, even by his own will, it might have been compared to the case of contract: but if that person dies without doing any act, it cannot be said, that the case is the same as if he had contracted for a purchase; or, that his real representatives could call upon his personal property to pay for that estate; as if it had been contracted for."

At the end of his judgment LORD ELDON, L.C., said (ibid., 458):

"Upon the whole, this right of pre-emption does not exist in any one at present. It is not necessary to say, what the court will do with rights of pre-emption in general, when that question may arise. This case does not call for a decision upon it."

I do not propose to go further into the effect of that case, but it suffices to say that these observations of LORD ELDON, L.C., were not necessary for the decision of the point which was before him and which was, indeed, quite a different question.

In Re Jolley (8), which was decided by JOYCE, J., in 1901 :

"... a question arose in the administration of the estate of the late Mr. Benjamin Jolley, of Cambridge. It came before the court upon an originating summons taken out for the purpose of determining how the estate duty payable in respect of certain property taken by two of the testator's sons, under an option given to them by the will, in satisfaction of their respective shares in the residuary estate of the testator should be borne as between them and the other persons interested in the residuary estate."

Among other things, the testator, by cl. 25 of his will, gave an option to his sons to appropriate to their original shares in his estate certain specific items of property, consisting partly of real estate and partly of personal estate, and including the goodwill and stock-in-trade of his business of a furniture broker:

"... but on the terms that his said sons should be liable to discharge and indemnify the rest of his estate from and against all debts and liabilities due or subsisting in respect of his said business at his decease. This option was exercised by the two sons on June 6, 1900, and the property which they elected to take thereunder was conveyed and assigned to them on July 24, 1900. The executors and trustees had paid the estate duty in respect of the whole estate, and the question was whether the sons were entitled to take the specified property freed and discharged from any proportion of that duty. The question turned to some extent upon s. 9 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894."

After some preliminary observations, JOYCE, J., said (17 T.L.R. 245) that:

"... the testator did direct payment by his trustees of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts. So far as personalty was concerned, his Lordship thought, under that direction the estate duty, including that upon the property subject to the option, was payable by the executors out of the general personal estate. Further the testator had directed that mortgage debts should be paid primarily out of the property charged therewith. His Lordship would therefore infer, but this was only conjecture, that the testator intended his sons, taking under the option, to bear the estate duty in respect of the real estate taken by them under the option. On the other hand, cl. 25 of the will did say that the option was to be exercised on the terms that the sons should be liable to discharge and indemnify the rest of the testator's estate from and against all debts and liabilities due and subsisting in respect of the business at his decease. It might be argued, therefore, that, as there was no mention of estate duty there, any intention on the part of the testator that the sons should bear that duty was excluded. But his Lordship had to deal with s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1894."

After setting out that section, he continues (ibid):

"The effect of that was, according to the decided cases, that a specific devisee must bear the estate duty in respect of the property which he took under the devise. It might be that the cases went further than that, but at any rate they went as far. What, then, was the effect of the exercise of the option by the sons under cl. 25 of the will? After some consideration his Lordship had come to the conclusion that its effect was to make the case the same as if the testator had devised his real and personal estate upon trust to sell everything except the property which was subject to the option, and there had been a specific devise to his two sons of the equitable fee in the real property subject to the option. His Lordship was of opinion in those circumstances that the charge created by s. 9 (1) of the Act remained until the real property subject to the option came to the hands of the beneficiaries and the duty was discharged by them."

In other words, he held that the estate duty in respect of the real estate comprised in the option was payable by the sons. That is a decision which points very much in the direction which counsel for the residuary legatees asks me to go.

There has, however, been a more recent decision on the subject—that of WARRINGTON, J., in Re Wilson (5). In that case:

"The testator, Ahab Wilson, by his will dated Sept. 1, 1890, after giving a legacy to his wife, devised and bequeathed two houses known as Stanley Villas and all other his real and personal estate to trustees upon certain trusts under which his widow was to be entitled to receive the income during her life, she thereout paying the interest of all principal moneys secured on the real estate. After her death or marriage the trustees were to hold the property upon trust for sale and conversion and to stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust for all his children who should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should marry. On Dec. 13, 1893, the testator made a codicil to his will, of which the material part was as follows:— 'This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me Ahab Wilson of Stanley Villas, Over, in the county of Chester, sawyer, which will bears date Sept. 1, 1890. I direct the trustees of my said will to allow my son Frank the option of purchasing at the death of my wife my two freehold dwelling houses known as Stanley Villas, Over, and the garden and land held therewith all belonging to me for the sum of £450 but I declare that my said son shall exercise the right of pre-emption hereby given to him within four months after the death of my said wife.' The testator died on Dec. 25, 1893, and his widow died on Nov. 27, 1907. The property called Stanley Villas was subject at the date of the codicil, and was still subject, to a mortgage for £300. On Dec. 17, 1907, Frank Wilson exercised his option by giving notice to the trustees of his intention to buy Stanley Villas for £450, and he took out a summons to determine the question whether the option to purchase the houses was an option to purchase them free from the incumbrances existing thereon at the date of the testator's death, or subject thereto."

It is to be observed from that citation of facts that the argument on construction with which I have already dealt in this case, viz., in regard to the subject-matter of the two dispositions being identical, could fairly have been raised in Re Wilson (5)—though the report does not show that it was—because, both in the will and in the codicil, the description of the subject-matter is given as "Stanley Villas, Over." WARRINGTON, J., said ([1908] 1 Ch. 841):

"This is certainly a curious case and one on which there appears to be no authority except the decision of PORTER, M.R., in Ireland, which is directly in point; and what I am in fact asked to do is to say that in my opinion that decision is not correct."

It is plain from that observation of the learned judge and from the rest of the report that Re Jolley (8) was not cited to him. He sets forth what the question was and said (ibid., 842):

"The point arose exactly in Given v. Massey (9). The facts in that case were these. The testator devised and bequeathed all his estate, real and personal, to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and he then directed as follows: 'I declare that the said Robert Loughrey shall have the option of purchasing part of the lands of Straw and part of the lands of Bonnanaboigh . . . at the price of £1,400, such option to be declared in writing within three months after my death.' These lands were subject to a judgment for £180 and a mortgage for £450. The testator then directed his trustees on payment of the £1,400 within six months after his death 'to assure the same hereditaments and premises to the said Robert Loughrey, his heirs and assigns, or as he shall direct.' Pausing there for a moment, there is in the present case no direction for the conveyance of this property, and that omission is in my opinion favourable to the contention of the son. The Master of the Rolls says (31 L.R. Ir. 130): 'There are no words purporting to devise the Straw and Bonnanaboigh property to Loughrey at all. It is plain that what the testator meant was that all his property should be sold; and that if Loughrey chose, he, and no one else, should be the purchaser of the lands at Straw and Bonnanaboigh at a fixed price; but I can see no indication of any intention that Loughrey should, when once the price was agreed to by him and paid, be on a different footing from any other purchaser. If he did not buy, the lands would have to be sold to some one else. On the language of this will, it is clear that the testator meant that Loughrey was to be a purchaser, and nothing else—a favoured purchaser no doubt, but still a purchaser. The element of bounty does enter into the matter; but the bounty conferred is the right to become a purchaser on advantageous terms, and not a devisee of the estate. And I may observe in passing that the idea of bounty would be entirely frustrated by a construction which would subject Loughrey to a burthen in respect of incumbrances which might render the bargain a losing one on his part.' The words of that part of the judgment apply to the facts in the present case, and the question is whether the decision is right. So far as construction is concerned this case is even stronger in favour of the purchaser than that before the Master of the Rolls."

WARRINGTON, J., then set out the relevant passage of the will and said (ibid., 843):

"Reading that power in connection with the trust for sale and conversion which is given to the trustees, the trustees, having that power to sell to any one they please, are bound in the first place to offer this property to the son. If he desires to have it and if he exercises his option, in my opinion he elects to become a purchaser and must be taken to have made an offer to the trustees which they are bound to accept and must be taken to have accepted. If they do not expressly accept it, it will be taken by intendment of law that they have done so as if it was their duty to do so. Thus it will be inferred from the facts that there is a contract by the trustees to sell and by the son to purchase the houses. It is said that that is not enough, because the son is a person claiming through or under the testator and can only take this property subject to existing charges under Locke King's Act [Real Estate Charges Act, 1854], s. 1."

The learned judge set out the first portion of that section and then proceeded (ibid., 844):

"I need not read further. The Master of the Rolls in Ireland came to the conclusion that it would be improper to treat a person in this position as a devisee of the property, and, therefore, that s. 1 of Locke King's Act did not apply to the case before him, and it could not be said that the donee of the option was not entitled to have the incumbrances paid off out of the estate. It is said now that the Master of the Rolls stopped too soon in his reading of the section, and that he ought to have gone on to consider the words 'but the land or hereditaments so charged shall, as between the different persons claiming through or under the deceased person, be primarily liable to the payment of all mortgage debts with which the same shall be charged.'"

After dealing with the argument on that point, to which, I think, I need not refer, WARRINGTON, J., said (ibid.):

"Therefore, with great respect, I think the Master of the Rolls was right in his opinion that as the purchaser could not be treated as the heir or devisee the provisions of the Act did not apply to him. But, whether that is the true view or not, on the construction of this codicil I think the intention of the testator was to place the son in the same position as any outside purchaser would have occupied. He made no other provision for him beyond a share of the residue, and he made it incumbent on the trustees, if the son expressed his desire to purchase the property, to sell it to him at a particular price. They are just as much acting under the trust for sale as in the case of any other purchaser. Therefore the son is entitled to have the property conveyed to him free from incumbrances."

With regard to the learned judge's reference to no other provision being made for the son beyond a share of residue, I am not quite sure what significance he intended to attach to that, because the will and codicil show that the son got precisely the same benefits and interests in the testator's estate as his brothers and sisters, but he got this option as well, so, in fact, he was better off than his brothers and sisters.

That case appears to me to have a striking resemblance to the present one, because the essential considerations apply to both. Here, as there, a trust for sale of the property was to take effect on the death of the widow, but, projected in front of that trust for sale, was the option. It seems to me that the observations of WARRINGTON, J., ([1908] 1 Ch. 843):

"... the trustees, having that power to sell to any one they please, are bound in the first place to offer this property to the son. If he desires to have it and if he exercises his option, in my opinion he elects to become a purchaser ..."

apply to the present will, as they apply to the will that was before him. I do not propose to go through Given v. Massey (9) in detail, because it is sufficiently cited by WARRINGTON, J., in Re Wilson (5). It is, however, to be observed that the observations of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Earl of Radnor v. Shafto (7) were cited to PORTER, M.R., in Given v. Massey (9), and PORTER, M.R., dealt with them by saying (31 L.R. Ir. 131):

"This declaration of opinion [by LORD ELDON] is entitled to weight; but it was not necessary for the decision of the question before the court, and the decision, in fact, went upon other and different grounds."

in Re Wilson (5), and he thought that it had been rightly decided. On a will which in all material respects bears a marked resemblance to the one before me, he expressed views which were at variance with those enunciated by LORD ELDON, L.C., in Earl of Radnor v. Shafto (7), and came to the conclusion that the true position of a person to whom an option of this kind is given is that of a purchaser, or, rather, of a person with a right to purchase, as distinct from being a devisee.

A So far as counsel are aware, and so far as I am aware, Re Wilson (5) has not come up for consideration by any other court on issues which can fairly be regarded as similar to the point which I have to decide, but it has been referred to more than once, and was cited to MORTON, J., in Re Wimbush (10). Accordingly, I have to give effect to what appears
B to be the law as I can best derive it from the cases cited. It is difficult in the extreme to reconcile Re Jolley (8) with Given v. Massey (9) and Re Wilson (5), but it appears to me that my duty is to follow the decision in Re Wilson (5) which, in my judgment, is binding on me and which governs the present case. In the first place, Re Wilson (5) was decided some seven years later than Re Jolley (8). In the second place, Re Jolley (8) is not very elaborately
C reported, and I do not know what the arguments were or what cases were cited, as none of them is mentioned in the report. In the third place, Re Wilson (5) does not stand by itself because it has the strong support of the authority—which is not, of course, binding on this court, but is entitled to considerable respect—of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in Given v. Massey (9). For these reasons, I think it is right that I should follow Re Wilson (5). If Re Wilson (5)
D is wrongly decided, then let it be reviewed by the Court of Appeal. In these circumstances, I do not propose to consider in detail the argument which counsel for the residuary legatees addressed to me on the unexpected results that might flow from the application of Re Wilson (5) in such a case as the present, because, as I am following the decision in Re Wilson (5), those matters do not become relevant for consideration. Accordingly, I will give effect to E the decision in Re Wilson (5) and hold that the first defendant is entitled to the conveyance of the estates free from any incumbrances.

Declaration accordingly. Costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the properties which were the subject-matter of the summons, if no notice of appeal be lodged within twenty-one days, but out of the residuary estate if notice of appeal be lodged.

STAG LINE, LTD. v. BOARD OF TRADE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), February 13, 1950.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Demurrage—When ship “arrived”—Ship “to proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers”—“Place”—Berth in port.

A charterparty required a vessel to “proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers,” or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there to load a cargo of pitprops. She was ordered to proceed to Miramichi, a port in East Canada, and on arrival there was told that she would be required to load at Millbank, a place within the port. As there was not then a berth for her she had to wait for six days. On a claim by the shipowners for demurrage in respect of those six days,

HELD: on construction, the charterparty gave the charterers an express right to nominate a “place” as the destination of the vessel; “place” meant a berth within the ports specified; and, therefore, the vessel did not become an arrived ship until arriving at the berth, and demurrage for the six days was not payable.

ACTION for demurrage.

The shipowners, who had chartered a vessel to the Board of Trade, claimed demurrage for six days during which the vessel had to wait for a berth at a place in a port to which the vessel had been ordered to proceed. They claimed that, on the true construction of the charterparty, the charterers' power to nominate the place of discharge extended only to the port of discharge and not to the berth, and that, accordingly, the vessel became an arrived ship on arrival at the port and demurrage was payable for the delay of six days which occurred after that arrival.

Mocatta for the shipowners.

E. W. Roskill for the charterers.

DEVLIN, J.: The shipowners' vessel, the Cydonia, was chartered to the Board of Trade, under a charterparty dated July 17, 1947, which required her to “... sail and proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers or so near thereunto as she may safely get,”

and there to load a cargo of pitprops. She was ordered, in the first instance, to proceed to Miramichi, a port in East Canada. When she arrived there on Aug. 6 she was told that she would be required to load at Millbank, a place within the port, but, as there was not then a berth ready for her, she had to wait for six days and did not begin her loading until Aug. 12.

The present claim by the shipowners is for demurrage in respect of those six days, and the whole question turns on whether she became an arrived ship on Aug. 6 when she arrived at Miramichi, or on Aug. 12 when she arrived at her berth at Millbank. The amount of demurrage, if any, is agreed at £863 3s. 6d. When she arrived at Miramichi on Aug. 6, she anchored off Chatham, and it is admitted that Chatham was one of the four loading berths in the Miramichi area at which the vessel could load cargo and was the usual place at Miramichi at which loading vessels lie. At that time she was ready to load the cargo. The question whether she was an arrived ship or not depends, first, on the construction of the charterparty, and, secondly, on whether, if she was not an arrived ship under the terms of the charterparty, taken by themselves, she was an arrived ship having regard to the custom of the port.

The principle of law which is applicable on the question of construction, and has not been disputed, is that, if the berth at which the vessel ultimately has to load or discharge is named in the charterparty either when originally drafted, or by virtue of a power of nomination expressly given by the charterparty, she is not an arrived ship until she arrives at the berth. If, on the other hand, no berth is named in the charterparty and no power of nomination is expressly given, and she proceeds to the berth ordered by the charterers merely by virtue of the implied right which the charterers have to select the loading berth, then she becomes an arrived ship when she arrives at the port or place named in the charterparty. That principle of law being well established and not being disputed in this case, it is not for me to investigate its merits, but it means that it is necessary to embark on the question whether or not this charterparty, properly construed, gives an express right of nomination or only an implied right of nomination.

The material words of the charterparty are:

"... and proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers ..."

There is no doubt that there is an express right given to the charterers to give an order regarding a "place." But "place" may be used as an alternative to a port, or as meaning a place in a port. The question which I have to determine is: What is its meaning here? The construction of the charterparty put forward by counsel for the charterers is the one which best conforms to the language of the charterparty as I read it. The construction of counsel for the shipowners, which requires me to read the word "place" as an alternative to "port," means that the charterparty is to be read as if it were "one or two safe ports or places East Canada or Newfoundland as ordered by the charterers." That requires altering the arrangement of the words and ignoring the comma which separates the words "place or places" from the words relating to ports. Having considered the other clauses in the charterparty I do not feel that there is sufficient ground for taking that course, and I think the view of counsel for the charterers is the better one, viz., that what the parties were endeavouring to say was that the ship was to proceed to one or two safe ports in East Canada or Newfoundland and then within those ports the charterers would name the place or places to which the vessel was to go. If "places" had meant an alternative to "ports" it would have been very easy, and a usual way of expressing it, for the parties to have said, "one or two safe ports or places," and I feel that, by adopting the phraseology which they have, they must have intended something more than that. Since I accept the charterers' construction of the charterparty, it follows that the defence succeeds and that the claim for demurrage fails.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the question of custom, and held that on the evidence the charterers had not discharged the burden of proving a custom.]

Re NAYLOR BENZON MINING CO., LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), December 14, 15, 1949, January 19, 20, February 8, 1950.]

Mine—Minerals—Right to work—Grant by Minister of Fuel and Power—Compensation—“Fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee”—Right of electricity board to have condition imposed on mineral undertaker not to withdraw support from pylons on the land—Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (c. 20), s. 8 (1), s. 9 (2), s. 11.

The N. Co. was the owner in fee simple of certain land, and since 1939 had as a “mineral undertaker” carried on “mining operations” thereon within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Regulations, 1948. The minerals on the land were almost worked out, and the N. Co. desired to extend its operations to adjoining land owned by D., which had since July 1, 1948, (the “appointed day” under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947) been used only for the purposes of winning clay and agriculture. Negotiations between the N. Co. and D. took place, but D. refused the terms offered. On May 7, 1949, the N. Co. applied to the Minister of Fuel and Power for a grant under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, of the right to work the minerals in question. By the present originating summons, the N. Co. sought an order that there should be granted to them the right to work the minerals in the terms of a draft lease exhibited to the affidavit in support of the summons. The substantial question between the parties was the quantum of the royalties and restoration payments, having regard to the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 9 (2), which provides for the assessment of compensation or consideration “on the basis of what would be fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee.”

HELD: in interpreting the basis of assessment provided for by s. 9 (2) of the Act of 1923 the same principles ought to be applied as were applicable to cases under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 63; and s. 9 of the Act of 1923, which, on its true construction, was a section directing the assessment of compensation, was, therefore, designed to give a man the fair value to him of what was being taken from him.

By an agreement in writing dated Feb. 28, 1949, made between D., of the one part, and the E.M. Electricity Board, of the other part, D. consented to the erection of a series of pylons and cables across the land with which this summons was concerned. The agreement provided: “(10) Subject as aforesaid this agreement shall remain in force until determined by either party giving to the other party at any time twelve calendar months’ previous notice in writing in that behalf but without prejudice to the rights of the board under s. 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and s. 11 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1922 . . . (12) Nothing in this agreement shall diminish affect or interfere with the right of the grantor and his lessees and tenants to use the said land or to work any mines or minerals therein or thereunder in as full and ample a manner as if this agreement had not been made and in working the said mines and minerals it shall be lawful for the grantor to withdraw vertical and lateral support from the works and the grantor shall not be liable to pay any compensation for damage that may be caused in working the said mines and minerals provided nevertheless that any support for electric lines above ground erected under this agreement shall be deemed to have been erected in pursuance of powers conferred on the board under s. 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and the board shall accordingly be entitled to the benefit of s. 44 (2) of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926.” The board asked that the grant to the N. Co. should be subject to a condition (under s. 8 of the Act of 1923) preserving support for the pylons.

HELD : having regard to s. 11 of the Act of 1923, the N. Co. would take the grant subject to all rights of the board under the agreement; the agreement was terminable at twelve months' notice, and, in the event of such termination, the board were able to take advantage of s. 22 of the Act of 1919 and s. 11 of the Act of 1922; and, therefore, the board was adequately protected, and no condition ought to be imposed on the grant.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for an order granting to the Naylor Benzon Mining Co., Ltd., the right to mine stone on the land of the respondent, H. M. Dunkerley.

D The main question was as to the quantum of the payment to be made by the company, but consideration was also given to the position arising under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, having regard to the fact that that Act contains no provisions applicable to a mining lease entered into after July 1, 1948, but before the approval of a relevant development plan which are comparable to those in s. 81 of the Act. The company put forward a draft lease with a view to the insertion therein of royalty payments on a scale which would have been fair and reasonable if the Act of 1947 had never been passed, and including machinery for adjusting the royalties and other payments when the development charge had been assessed. WYNN-PARRY, J., held that the amount of the royalties to be paid ought to be arrived at on the same basis as was applicable to cases under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that with the appropriate addition the draft lease ought to be executed by the parties.

E An objection by an electricity board, that conditions ought to be imposed on the company to preserve the support of certain pylons which the board had on the land in question, was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment.

H Feb. 8. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. This is an originating summons which, following on the passing of the Railway and Canal Commission (Abolition) Act, 1949, is brought in the High Court for an order that pursuant to the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, as amended by the Mines (Working Facilities) Act, 1934, there may be granted to the applicants

"the right to work the ironstone sand and gravel limestone building stone and any other stone existing and remaining unworked and ungotten under the lands situate in the parishes of Nassington and Yarwell in the county of Northampton which are delineated and coloured pink on the map which is intended to be exhibit 'H.G.B.1.' to the affidavit intended to be sworn in support of this summons by Hugh Gilbert Barnes on the terms subject to the conditions and for the period respectively mentioned in the draft lease which is intended to be exhibit 'H.G.B.6' to the said affidavit or on such other terms subject to such other conditions or for such other period as the court shall think fit."

The company is, and has since 1939 been, the owner in fee simple of the land edged red on the map, and has since that year continuously carried on on that land iron ore mining operations by surface working. These operations are "mining operations," and the company is a "mineral undertaker" within the meaning of those phrases as defined in the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1521). There are two lines of working on the land edged red, the present positions of which are shown by the green lines on the map marked No. 1 Face and No. 2 Face respectively. The land which has already been worked out is coloured brown. The stage has now been reached at the No. 2 Face at which the workings have almost reached the adjoining land coloured pink on the map, leaving space only for one further cut of ore and a margin of land necessary for the support of the land coloured pink. The respondent, Dunkerley, to whom I will refer as "Mr. Dunkerley," is the owner in fee simple of the whole of the land coloured pink and yellow on the map. The land coloured yellow on the map, which amounts in area to five acres, is used for the purposes of a farm house and buildings, and this summons is not concerned with this land, or the minerals under it. The land coloured pink which is hatched red on the map is the subject of a licence to Kingscliffe Super Refractories Ltd. (to whom I will refer as "the Refractory Company") for the purpose of winning clay therefrom. The Refractory Company entered an objection to the grant of the relief asked for on this summons, but the applicants have since come to terms with the Refractory Company and it has become unnecessary to consider this objection. The whole, or substantially the whole, of the remainder of the land coloured pink on the map is used for agricultural purposes. The winning of clay and agricultural purposes are the only uses to which the land coloured pink has been put since July 1, 1948, the appointed date under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The winning of iron ore from the land of the applicants lying to the east of the land coloured brown on the map is not considered to be an economic proposition, and, therefore, the company now desire an order which will enable them to conduct mining operations for iron ore on the land edged pink, or at any rate on a large part thereof.

The modus operandi followed by the applicants is

"the removal of overburden with a dragline excavator and the subsequent removal of the then exposed ironstone by means of a shovel excavator. The depth of overburden on the company's said land has varied to a maximum depth of fifty-two feet. The depth of overburden varies with the changes of contour of the surface, the bed of ironstone being at a comparatively constant datum level. The overburden is dealt with by the company just as earth is dealt with in double spit digging in a kitchen garden. The first cut of overburden down to the ironstone bed has to be placed on land which is not intended to be worked. The ironstone exposed by this first cut is then removed by rail to the sidings. The second cut of overburden is deposited in the cavity (known as the gullet) left after the removal of the first cut of overburden and ironstone. As each successive cut of overburden and ironstone is removed the overburden portion is thrown back into the cavity of the preceding cut. The depth of the ironstone bed varies from three feet to six feet six inches."

The pivot of the applicants' operations is at the western end of the land coloured brown, where are situated the office, weighbridge, locomotive sheds, shops and other operational buildings. South-east of these are sidings which are connected on the north-west to the lines which traverse the No. 1 Face and the No. 2 Face, and on the south-east to the Seaton and Wansford line of British Railways. It will thus be seen, and this is common ground between the applicants and Mr. Dunkerley, that the applicants are in a particularly favourable position to develop the land coloured pink, both as regards continuity of work and as regards saving of expense. Further, it is common ground that it is in the national interest that the applicants should be granted the necessary authority to conduct iron ore mining operations on the pink land by way of continuation of their present operations. Again it is common ground that, for reasons to which I shall later refer, the most convenient course will be for the court to approve a form of lease to be executed by Mr. Dunkerley as lessor, and the applicants as lessees, and authorise the applicants to work the ironstone and other specified minerals under the pink land on the terms of that form of lease.

Negotiations, to which I need not refer, took place between the applicants and Mr. Dunkerley, with a view to the grant of a lease by Mr. Dunkerley to the applicants on agreed terms. These negotiations came to nothing, and on May 7, 1949, the applicants made application to the Minister of Fuel and Power for a grant under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, of the right to work the minerals in question. As a result of the coming into force of the Railway and Canal Commission (Abolition) Act, 1949, this originating summons was issued on June 22, 1949, by which the applicants put forward for the consideration of the court the form of lease, being exhibit "H.G.B.6," to which I have already referred, as representing, at the date of the issue of the summons, fair and reasonable terms as between Mr. Dunkerley and themselves. The only terms which are in dispute between the parties are, first, the quantum of royalty payments and restoration payments, and, secondly, as to the necessity for providing, and as to the method of providing, against the position which will arise under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, if and when a development plan under that Act affecting the pink land comes into force.

The relevant provisions of the draft lease are:

"4. Yielding and paying therefor yearly and every year during the term the following rents royalties or sums of money clear of all deductions (except as hereinafter provided) half-yearly on Apr. 1 and Oct. 1 in every year. (i) The surface rent of £2 for every acre and so in proportion for any less quantity than an acre of the described lands of which the lessees may have taken possession for the purpose of this lease by notice as hereinafter provided such last mentioned rent to commence from the day when the lessees take possession thereof and to be paid until such land be handed back as hereinafter provided and the first half-yearly payment or a proportionate part thereof to be made on such one of the said half-yearly days appointed for the payment of rent as shall happen next after such taking of possession. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to render the lessees liable to pay surface rent under the provisions of this sub-clause in respect of any land which they now hold or may hereafter take on agricultural tenancy. (ii) In addition to the surface rent hereinbefore mentioned (but subject to the provisions hereinafter contained) the following royalties viz.:—(a) For every ton of 2,640 pounds (hereinafter referred to as 'a royalty ton') of raw ironstone raised or gotten during each year by the lessees out of the described lands a royalty of 5*d.* per royalty ton where the overburden does not exceed thirty-five feet in thickness 4*d.* per royalty ton where the overburden is between thirty-five feet and fifty feet and 3*d.* per royalty ton where the overburden exceeds fifty feet or the minerals are mined by underground operations. (b) For every royalty ton of gravel limestone building stone ganister or other stone or building sand raised or gotten during each year by the lessees out of the described lands a royalty of 3d. (c) A royalty by way of wayleave rent . . .”

By cl. 6 (h) it is provided that the applicants

“may on Apr. 1 or Oct. 1 in any year hand back to the lessor all or so much of the surface of the described lands which the lessees shall have entered upon and which they shall no longer require for the purpose of carrying on their works on the payment of the following amounts in respect of every acre and so in proportion for any less quantity than an acre of land so handed back to the lessor which shall not have been restored as aforesaid:—(i) Where the overburden is forty feet in thickness or under and the ironstone is not mined at the rate of £30 per acre; (ii) Where the overburden is over forty feet in thickness or the ironstone is mined at the rate of £20 per acre. Provided that if the lessee shall be required under the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 or any other statute or rule, order or regulation made thereunder, or under any planning permission or development plan to restore the demised lands or any part or parts thereof to agriculture and/or to level the same and/or to afforest the same and/or to effect any other restoration or rehabilitative treatment or reinstatement of the same then the amount payable under this sub-clause in respect of such lands when handed back to the lessor shall be reduced by such sum per acre as is provided for in cl. 8 (c) hereof to the intent that such abatement may be either of the amount payable under this sub-clause or of the royalties or both as may be just and appropriate having regard to the expenditure incurred or to be incurred.”

As regards these questions, the course of events since the issue of the originating summons is somewhat curious. It is clear from the evidence, first, that the applicants were anxious to come to an amicable agreement with Mr. Dunkerley if possible; secondly, that they considered what from the applicants' point of view would represent a good commercial transaction, taking into account that, for the reasons to which I have already referred, they were in a particularly favourable position to conduct mining operations on the pink land: and, thirdly, that, with this in mind, they put forward the suggested terms as to royalty payments in order to induce Mr. Dunkerley to come to an agreement. Mr. Dunkerley was not satisfied with the terms offered, either as regards royalty or restoration payments, and he persisted in his objection until the afternoon of the first day of this hearing, when he intimated through his counsel that he would be willing to accept the draft lease as it stood, with certain amendments made since the issue of the summons, and would not, therefore, oppose the quantum of the royalty or restoration payments. This, however, could not end the matter, because the applicants' offer was no longer open. In order to support their view that the terms of the draft lease were fair and reasonable between the parties the applicants retained the services of Mr. R. B. Beilby, a mining engineer, surveyor and valuer, having great experience, particularly in the district in question, and he swore an affidavit in these proceedings on Sept. 22, 1949. I shall have to consider his evidence in more detail later in this judgment. For the moment it is sufficient to say that, in his view, the scale of the royalty payments provided in the draft lease is higher than a mineral owner might reasonably expect to pay, and that the royalties which he would consider reasonable for ironstone of the class of that with which this application is concerned under a lease entered into before July 1, 1948, are as follows:

“Where the overburden is up to forty feet in depth—4d. per royalty ton of 2,640 lbs. Where the overburden is over forty feet in depth or where mined—2½d. per royalty ton of 2,640 lbs. With a reduction in royalty in respect of an agreed excess tonnage in the areas where there is less than forty feet of overburden for ironstone worked in any year to 3*d.* per royalty ton."

Mr. Beilby does not criticise the scale of restoration payments. It will, therefore, be seen that there is a substantial difference as regards royalty payments between the terms put forward in the draft lease and those which Mr. Beilby considers
A proper in a lease entered into before July 1, 1948.

The applicants do not desire to resile from the terms put forward in the draft lease, and I am quite satisfied that they obtained Mr. Beilby's affidavit to justify those terms and not in the least with a view to enabling them to make out a case for resiling. Their submission is that the combined effect of Mr. Beilby's evidence and ss. 13 and 25 of the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, assuming
B that it should come into operation, creates such a position that, although they do not seek to resile from the terms of the draft lease, they cannot safely consent thereto. With that submission I have every sympathy. The Iron and Steel Act, 1949, s. 13, reads as follows:

"(1) Where any company which comes into public ownership under this
C Part of this Act has made or varied an agreement or lease on or after Oct. 21, 1947, and before the date of transfer, and the agreement or lease remains unperformed or unexpired, in whole or in part, on the date of transfer, and the corporation are of the opinion that the making or variation of that agreement or lease was not reasonably necessary for the purposes of the activities of the company, or that the agreement or lease
D was made or varied with an unreasonable lack of prudence on the part of the company, regard being had in either case to the circumstances at the time, the company shall, if so directed by the corporation, by notice in writing given to the other parties to the agreement or lease at any time within six months after the date of transfer, disclaim the agreement or lease: Provided that any of the said other parties may, within two months after the date on which the notice is served, refer to arbitration under this E Act the question whether or not the agreement or lease ought to be disclaimed under this section, and the corporation (as well as the publicly-owned company) shall be made a party to the arbitration."

The vital provision in that sub-section is contained in the words "and the corporation are of opinion that the making or variation of that agreement or lease was not reasonably necessary for the purposes of the activities of the company." On the application of that provision may turn the rights of many parties involving, maybe, large sums of money, yet the corporation are invited to form an opinion one way or another on a test which, as expressed in the sub-section, does not begin to be expressed in the King's English. The words "reasonably necessary," used as a phrase in which the adverb is designed to
G qualify the adjective, are meaningless. A thing is necessary or it is not necessary. It may be regarded or treated as necessary in one context and not in another, but the context cannot be provided by merely preceding the word "necessary" with an adverb such as "reasonably." As it stands, the phrase, to me, is a contradiction in terms. The legislature, presumably, in its wisdom, has not thought fit to throw the burden of interpreting and applying this apparently H meaningless phrase on the High Court, but instead on the arbitration tribunal. I am, therefore, spared the task of considering it further. I felt it necessary to advert to it, because honest business men coming before the High Court on an application such as this are entitled to protection against the possible dangers with which they may in the future be faced as a result of the use in an Act of Parliament of such sloppy language as this. The urgency and importance of this aspect of the matter is only emphasised by the provisions of s. 25, under which "all parties to the transaction, and all persons who were directors of the company at the time when the transaction was entered into " may find their pockets threatened in regard to a transaction in respect of which the arbitration tribunal may have to express an opinion as to whether or not the transaction was " reasonably necessary." In face of these sections and the possibility that they may come into operation, I am of opinion that the applicants are justified in taking up the attitude which they do, namely, that they cannot actively consent to enter into a lease in the form of the draft, exhibit " H.G.B.6," but that they leave themselves entirely in the hands of the court.

For myself, I shall propose to approach and deal with the matter without any further regard to the provisions of the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, except that I make and proceed on the assumption that both the corporation and the tribunal, if the lease authorised by this order should come before them, would have regard to the substance and not merely the form of this order, namely, that it is an order for which this court takes full responsibility, and that it directs the execution of an agreement inter partes for purposes of convenience only. If I had any fear that a contrary view could possibly prevail, I should not hesitate to dispense with the document inter partes, and direct that every term should be set out in the body of the order. Counsel for Mr. Dunkerley pressed on me the submission that the applicants were bound by the terms of the draft lease, which they themselves had put forward, and that it was not open to the court to grant the authority asked for on terms which would be less favourable to Mr. Dunkerley. I cannot accept this contention. In exercising the present jurisdiction, the court is the guardian of the national interest and cannot be bound by any agreement between the parties before it, nor a fortiori by an offer put forward by one of them. If authority for this proposition be wanted, it will be found in Re Nunnery Colliery Company's Application (1) and Re J. and J. Charlesworth, Ltd. (2). I have already stated that it is common ground between the parties that the order should take the form of approving the form of a lease inter partes. It is also necessary that these terms should represent what would have been fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee (see the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 9 (2)) if the lease had been entered into immediately prior to July 1, 1948, the appointed date under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The adoption of this basis is necessitated, partly because of what the legislature has enacted, but even more because of what it has failed to enact.

The expropriation of all mineral rights in this country is effected by s. 81 of the Act of 1947 in these words:

" (1) In relation to development consisting of the winning and working of minerals, the provisions of this Act shall have effect subject to such adaptations and modifications as may be prescribed by regulations made under this Act with the consent of the Treasury . . . (3) Regulations made for the purposes of this section shall provide for securing—(a) that where a development charge is payable under Part VII of this Act in respect of the winning and working of minerals comprised in a mining lease which was in force on the appointed day, the royalty or other payment required to be made under the lease may be varied, by such tribunal as may be prescribed by the regulations, so far as may be just having regard to the amount of the charge; (b) that where a development charge is payable under the said Part VII in respect of the winning and working of minerals authorised by an order made under Part I of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, the provisions of the order may be varied by the Railway and Canal Commission so far as may be just having regard to the amount of the charge."

Sub-section (4) deals with the position where a development plan is in operation. Section 5 of the Act provides:

“(1) As soon as may be after the appointed day, every local planning authority shall carry out a survey of their area, and shall, not later than three years after the appointed day, or within such extended period as the Minister may in any particular case allow, submit to the Minister a report of the survey together with a plan (hereinafter called a ‘development plan’) indicating the manner in which they propose that land in that area should be used (whether by the carrying out thereon of development or otherwise) and the stages by which any such development should be carried out.”

Turning back to s. 81, it is manifest that there is a serious gap because there is no provision dealing with the case of a mining lease brought into existence in the period between the appointed date—the very case before this court—and the approval of a development plan in regard to the area comprised in such lease. In the present case, which is the first of its kind to come before the court, the ingenuity of the applicants has devised a method of avoiding the consequences of this gap, namely, of putting forward a draft lease substantially in the form in use in the district prior to the appointed date under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, with a view to the insertion therein of royalty payments on the scale which would have been fair and reasonable as between a willing grantor and a willing grantee if the Act had never been passed, and including machinery in the form of the proviso to sub-cl. (c) of cl. 8 providing for adjustment of the royalties and other payments when the development charge payable by the applicants under the Act as mineral undertakers has been assessed. Nevertheless, as many of these leases may be brought into existence, either voluntarily or as a result of an order of the court, before the development charge can be known, it would clearly be desirable that the gap in s. 81 of the Act, to which I have referred, should be filled by further legislation.

The whole matter has to some extent an atmosphere of unreality. The effect of the expropriation of the minerals under his land is that Mr. Dunkerley has nothing but a bare legal interest and no beneficial interest in them. His beneficial interest, for what it may be worth, has been converted into a claim to share in the £300,000,000 fund. It is conceded that, assuming the full operation of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, he would be entitled to some royalty, though not to one at more than a nominal rate. On the other hand, assuming that the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, comes into operation, the undertaking of the applicants will be expropriated. On this basis the amount of the royalty can be of no interest to them. Nevertheless, as I see it, the duty which is laid on me is to bring into existence a lease between Mr. Dunkerley, as lessor, and the applicants, as lessees, authorising the applicants to win by surface mining operations the iron ore and other minerals mentioned in the summons under the land coloured pink on the map, the lease containing provisions usual in mining leases in the district existing before July 1, 1948, and containing provisions as to surface rent, royalty and restoration and other payments which would represent in a lease granted before the above date a consideration fair and reasonable as between a willing grantor and a willing grantee.

As I have said, substantially nothing turns on the provisions of the lease other than the clauses dealing with the scales of the royalty and restoration payments. In order to fix these scales I have to turn again to the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 9, and my first task is to construe the phrase in s. 9 (2) “on the basis of what would be fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee.” Two views have been put forward. On behalf of Mr. Dunkerley it is said that the sub-section presupposes complete freedom of negotiation between the parties, in which event it is proper to take into account the favourable circumstances, to which I have already referred, in which the applicants are placed in regard to mining operations on the pink land, and thus justify the scale of royalty payments in the draft lease—exhibit “H.G.B.6”— even assuming they are higher than those prevailing in the district before July 1, 1948. On the other hand, it is submitted by the applicants for the consideration of the court that, in assessing compensation or consideration under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 9, the court should apply the principles enunciated by EVE, J., in Re South Eastern Ry. Co. and London County Council's Contract (3). The learned judge said ([1915] 2 Ch. 258):

"In answering such inquiry the following propositions may, I think, be treated as established by authorities binding on this court: (1.) The value to be ascertained is the value to the vendor, not its value to the purchaser; (2.) in fixing the value to the vendor all restrictions imposed on the user and enjoyment of the land in his hands are to be taken into account, but the possibility of such restrictions being modified or removed for his benefit is not to be overlooked; (3.) market price is not a conclusive test of real value; (4.) increase in value consequent on the execution of the undertaking for or in connection with which the purchase is made must be disregarded; (5.) the value to be ascertained is the price to be paid for the land with all its potentialities and with all the use made of it by the vendor; and (6.) the true contractual relation of the parties—that of purchaser and vendor—is not to be obscured by endeavouring to construe it as another contractual relation altogether—that of indemnifier and indemnified."

In Re Lucas and the Chesterfield Gas and Water Board (4) FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said ([1909] 1 K.B. 30):

"No better example of the problem could be found than that which we have in the present case. The land in question is by its position and conformation marked out as a favourable site for an impounding reservoir to collect water for the public supply of a district. The peculiarities which make it suitable for that purpose add nothing to its value as agricultural or grazing land, which I will assume to be the only alternative uses. A public authority obtains powers to take it for a reservoir; ought it to pay any higher price than is represented by its agricultural or grazing value? Is not any price in excess of this a violation of the canon that you are only to give that which represents its worth to the seller, and that you are to disregard all questions of its worth to the buyer? The decided cases seem to me to have hit upon the correct solution of this problem. To my mind they lay down the principle that where the special value exists only for the particular purchaser who has obtained powers of compulsory purchase it cannot be taken into consideration in fixing the price, because to do otherwise would be to allow the existence of the scheme to enhance the value of the lands to be purchased under it. But when the special value exists also for other possible purchasers, so that there is, so to speak, a market, real though limited, in which that special value goes towards fixing the market price, the owner is entitled to have this element of value taken into consideration, just as he would be entitled to have the fertility or the aspect of a piece of land capable of being used for agricultural purposes."

In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Corrie and Another v. MacDermott (5) LORD DUNEDIN said ([1914] A.C. 1065):

"Their Lordships cannot accede to this view, and they agree particularly with the reasoning of ISAACS, J., on this part of the case. In their opinion it puts upon the word 'value' an amplification of the bare word, treating it as if it was 'unrestricted value,' which it will not bear. And, further, the law of compensation being as they have stated it, namely, the value to the owner as he holds, which law has been so often laid down that it must be held to have been known to the contracting parties, it was, their Lordships think, incumbent on a party who wanted the valuation to proceed upon another footing to take care that the words used clearly so expressed it."

The first two cases arose under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 63 of which provides:

"In estimating the purchase money or compensation to be paid by the promoters of the undertaking, in any of the cases aforesaid, regard shall be had by the justices, arbitrators, or surveyors, as the case may be, not only to the value of the land to be purchased or taken by the promoters of the undertaking, but also to the damage, if any, to be sustained by the owner of the lands by reason of the severing of the lands taken from the other lands of such owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of the powers of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith."

Judicial interpretation of that section has given rise to the principles enunciated by EVE, J., which I have read, including the principle that the value to be ascertained is the value to the vendor not to the purchaser. I pass over the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, which gave statutory force to the views of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., as to special adaptability, but which, in my view, does not apply to this case, and I come back to the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 9. It is true that the words in this section are "on the basis of what would be fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee," which are to be compared with the words "the value of the land to be purchased" in the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 63, but it is to be observed that the words in s. 63 of the latter Act, "In estimating the purchase money or compensation", compare with the words "the compensation or consideration" in s. 9 of the former Act. As EVE, J., pointed out in Re South Eastern Ry. Co. and London County Council's Contract (3), the adoption in compensation cases of any other principles than those enunciated by him would lead to startling results, the most obvious one being that it would upset all uniformity of value, and further, as FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., pointed out in Re Lucas and the Chesterfield Gas and Water Board (4), it would offend against the principle that a man cannot give more than he has. There is no authority interpreting the effect of the phrase in s. 9 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, which I am considering, which directly binds me, but, in my judgment, the same principles which have been applied in the application of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 63, ought to be applied to cases under s. 9 of the Act of 1923, which, in my view, on its true construction, is a section directing the assessment of compensation, and, therefore, designed to give to a man the fair value to him of what is being taken from him.

Having armed myself with this interpretation of s. 9 of the Act of 1923, I now turn to consider the expert evidence. This consists of the affidavit of Mr. Beilby, to which I have already referred, and his evidence on cross-examination, on the one hand, and the affidavit evidence of Mr. Cowen, a Fellow of the Land Agents Society, a Mr. Lambert, an affidavit of Sir Frederick Villiers Robinson, and an affidavit of Mr. Henry Wing. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence and continued:] In the result, I have no evidence on which I feel that I can safely act, apart from the evidence of Mr. Beilby. I propose to accept his evidence, and conclude that in the circumstances the scale of royalty payments which he suggests is fair and reasonable in the circumstances and should be inserted in the form of lease in place of the scale of royalty payments specified in the draft lease. The lease to be executed will take the form of the exhibit "H.G.B.6" subject to any amendments which may have been agreed between the parties as to which I shall require to be informed.

I now turn to deal with a different point, namely, the objection of the East Midland Electricity Board, who contend that, as a condition of making the grant asked for, I should impose conditions on the applicants in favour of the board in exercise of my jurisdiction under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 8. The matter arises in this way. By an agreement in writing dated Feb. 28, 1949, and made between Mr. Dunkerley, of the one part, and the board, of the other part, Mr. Dunkerley consented to the erection of a series of pylons and cables across the pink land as shown on the map, for the purpose of enabling the board to supply electric power to the Refractory Company, which pylons and cables were duly erected. The agreement provides:

"(10) Subject as aforesaid this agreement shall remain in force until determined by either party giving to the other party at any time twelve calendar months' previous notice in writing in that behalf but without prejudice to the rights of the board under s. 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and s. 11 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1922, but in the latter case the periodical payments provided for under cl. 7 of this agreement shall not necessarily be deemed the annual value for the purpose of assessing the rental . . . (12) Nothing in this agreement shall diminish affect or interfere with the right of the grantor and his lessees and tenants to use the said land or to work any mines or minerals therein or thereunder in as full and ample a manner as if this agreement had not been made and in working the said mines and minerals it shall be lawful for the grantor to withdraw vertical and lateral support from the works and the grantor shall not be liable to pay any compensation for damage that may be caused in working the said mines and minerals provided nevertheless that any support for electric lines above ground erected under this agreement shall be deemed to have been erected in pursuance of powers conferred on the board under s. 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and the board shall accordingly be entitled to the benefit of s. 44 (2) of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926."

Section 8 of the Act of 1923 provides:

"(1) If any person having an interest in any land is not entitled to support or sufficient support, whether vertical or lateral, for any buildings or works, whether on or below the surface, erected or constructed, or intended to be erected or constructed, on or below the surface, and alleges that it is not reasonably practicable to obtain a right to such support by private arrangement for any of the reasons mentioned in s. 4 of this Act, he may send to the Board of Trade an application that such restrictions may be imposed on the working of the minerals under that land and the land adjacent thereto as he may consider necessary to secure sufficient support to the buildings or works."

There follow provisions giving jurisdiction to impose conditions.

In view of the agreement, the erection of the pylons and cables, and the intention of the applicants in due course to work the minerals under the pink land, the board ask that a condition be imposed preserving support for the pylons. The applicants are unwilling to agree to the imposition of any such condition, and submit that not only is there no precedent for the imposition of such a condition, but that the board are adequately protected by the terms of s. 11 of the Act of 1923, and the statutory provisions, namely the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, s. 22, and the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1922, s. 11, referred to in cl. 10 of the agreement. Section 11 of the Act of 1923 provides:

"A right granted under this Part of this Act shall not confer on the person to whom it is granted any greater or other power than if the right had been granted by a person legally entitled to grant the right, or relieve the grantee from any obligation or liability to which he would have been subject had the right been granted by such a person."

The effect of that section, to my mind, is that the applicants will take the grant which I propose to order in their favour, subject to the agreement and therefore subject to all rights of the board thereunder. On that short ground, I should be prepared to decide that this is not a case in which any condition should be imposed on the applicants at the instance of the board under s. 8 of the Act of 1923. I think, however, that the correctness of this conclusion is further demonstrated when one remembers that the agreement is terminable by either party on twelve months' notice, and further that, in the event of such termination, if the board desire to continue to maintain the pylons in their present position they will have the opportunity of satisfying the Minister of Fuel and Power that it is right and proper, subject to the provisions of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, s. 22, that they should remain there. On any such reference both parties can be heard. I might add that, if the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, comes into force and any such application is made to the Minister of Fuel and Power, the somewhat Gilbertian situation will arise of two government departments being parties to a dispute before the head of a third government department. Whether or not such a situation is one which in the words of that author "no man can view with equanimity" is fortunately not a question for decision.

Counsel for the Electricity Board pressed on me the provisions with which cl. 12 of the agreement ends. The Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, s. 44, provides:

"(2) Where the board or any authorised undertakers have in pursuance of powers conferred on them under s. 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, erected on any land supports for an electric line above ground, the board or undertakers shall, for the purposes of s. 8 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, be deemed to be persons having an interest in the land on which such supports are erected."

Counsel submitted that in view of that provision and the threat to work the minerals under the pylons, with which he said the board would in due course be faced, the board was entitled to protection under s. 8 of the Act of 1923. The answer to that contention appears to me again to be the terminable nature of the agreement, as provided by cl. 10 thereof and the protection afforded to the board on termination by the statutory provisions to which I have referred. In these circumstances and for these reasons, I conclude that this is not a case in which I should impose under s. 8 of the Act of 1923 any conditions on the applicants at the instance of the board, who, in my view, will be adequately protected by the conjoint effect of s. 11 of the Act of 1923, the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, s. 22, and the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1922, s. 11.

Landlord and Tenant—Requisition—Land—Requisition during lease—Covenant to repair—Breach—Measure of damages—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

By s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927: "Damages for a breach of covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair . . . shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid."

In 1945 the tenant took an assignment of a lease which contained a full repairing covenant on the part of the tenant. The premises were then under requisition, and they were still under requisition on the expiry of the lease in 1947, there being no indication when the requisition was likely to come to an end. At the date of the requisition, the premises were not in such a state of repair as was required under the covenant, and though some repairs had been done by the requisitioning authority during the currency of the lease, the premises were to some extent in a state of disrepair on the expiry of the lease. On the question of the measure of damages claimed by the landlord for breach of the covenant to repair:

HELD: (i) the diminution in the value of the reversion within the meaning of s. 18 (1) of the Act of 1927, must be assessed by reference to its value, not at the time when the land reverted in possession, but at the time when the lease expired.

(ii) accordingly, it was not permissible to speculate as to the possibility of the requisitioning authority doing repairs which it was under no legal liability to do, so lessening the damages to the landlord, but the premises had to be valued as at the date when the lease expired, having regard to the fact that they were under requisition, and the difference found between the value of the requisitioned premises at that date if the repairing covenant had not been broken and their reduced value owing to the breach was the measure of the landlord's damages.

A APPEAL by the tenant from an order of LYNSEY, J., made on Oct. 27, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 817, whereby he awarded £585 damages to the landlord for breach by the tenant of a repairing covenant contained in a lease of requisitioned property. The premises had been requisitioned before the assignment of the lease to the tenant and they continued under requisition until after the expiration of the lease. Liability was admitted, and the appeal
B was concerned with the measure of damages. The Court of Appeal, in dismissing the appeal, held that the learned judge had correctly applied the test of the diminution in the value of the reversion.

C BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises questions as to the proper measure of damages for breach of covenant to repair when the premises were under requisition at the material time.

The plaintiff landlord was at all material times the owner of the freehold of 31 Montpelier Square, Knightsbridge. Those premises were let in 1849 on a
D ninety-eight years' lease at a ground rent of £10 10s. 0d. The lease was due to expire on June 24, 1947. It contained full repairing covenants, and this action is brought for breach of those covenants when the lease came to an end. On Dec. 20, 1944, the premises were requisitioned by the Westminster City Council to house the homeless. They were then somewhat out of repair, but not badly
E so. The council made considerable alterations and did a certain amount of repairs to make the premises suitable for occupation by two or three families, and the premises were then occupied by those families as licensees of the council. The council not only retained possession of the premises up to the time when the lease came to an end on June 24, 1947, but they still retain possession. In May, 1945, the defendant tenant took an assignment of the lease, which had little more than two years to run. He received the compensation rent from the F council, but did no repairs himself. Now he is sued by the landlord for breach of the repairing covenants at the end of the lease, and the question is: What is his responsibility?

If the landlord had sued the person who held the lease in December, 1944, when the premises were originally requisitioned, there is no doubt that, as against that person, the landlord could have recovered considerable damages
G for breach of the covenant to keep in repair during the term, because his reversion was injured by reason of the dilapidations which existed in December, 1944. The presence of those dilapidations would mean that the requisitioning authority would pay a lower compensation rent, and that would affect the landlord after the lease fell in. They would also affect the compensation payable to the landlord when the council gave up the premises, because less compensation would
H be paid at the end of the requisitioning if the premises were already dilapidated at the beginning. The question is, however, not what is the responsibility of the previous lessee, but what is the responsibility of this assignee, who only took his assignment in May, 1945, after the premises had been requisitioned. He had no right to go into possession to do any repairs, even if he had wished to do them, and it might at one time have been said that, as it was impossible for him to do the repairs, he ought not to be liable. Since Matthey v. Curling (1), however, it has been settled that the fact that premises have been requisitioned is no answer for a tenant who is sued for breach of repairing covenants. He is just as responsible for the time during which the premises were requisitioned as he would have been if the premises had been sub-let. So, also, if the premises have been requisitioned, an assignee is responsible in law for seeing that the covenants are complied with during the period while he is assignee. That means that he must see that the premises are in repair. A covenant to keep in repair imports a covenant to put in repair, if repair is necessary. There is no doubt, therefore, that the assignee was responsible in point of law for seeing that the premises were kept in a good state of repair right up to the end of the lease in 1947, even though they were requisitioned. This is, however, subject to the qualification which has been introduced by s. 1 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944, by which the tenant is not liable for damage occurring to the land during the period of requisition. The defendant is not liable, therefore, for damage done during the time when the Westminster City Council were in, but he is liable for the previous want of repair in so far as it still continued during his time. If and in so far as structural or other alterations were made by the Westminster City Council before June 24, 1947, which would have rendered any of the covenanted repairs valueless, the tenant is not responsible, because that is damage done by the council for which he is not liable. If and in so far as the council before June 24, 1947, made good any of the previous want of repairs, he has the benefit of their work just as he would have the benefit of any repairs done by a sub-tenant, but, if and in so far as the premises remained unaltered and unrepaired—as, to some extent, they seem to have done—he remained responsible up to the end of the lease.

The question is: What is the proper measure of damages for that breach? It was strongly urged before us that the damages should be nominal. Counsel for the tenant argued that before 1927 the damages would have had to be assessed as at the end of the lease: Joyner v. Weeks (2), but that the effect of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, is that they must be assessed by reference to the time when the land actually reverts in possession to the landlord, and that, if, as here, that time has not yet arrived, the court must look into the future to see what the condition of the premises will be. It may be, said counsel, that in this case that the council will make good all the dilapidations. He points out that they have already done the outside painting. They may do more. They may do all. If they do so, the landlord will get his premises back fully repaired, so why should he get damages as well? He cannot, therefore, show that he will suffer any damage. Junior counsel for the tenant put the argument rather differently. He said that there could be no damage to the landlord from any want of decorative repair during the time of this assignment, because the landlord could not benefit from the doing of decorative repairs, or suffer by the omission of them. On the one hand, the landlord would not benefit, for, if the tenant had, in fact, done all the decorative repairs during his time (i.e., in 1945, 1946 or 1947), the landlord would not have benefited because, by the time that the requisition comes to an end, whenever that may be, the benefit of the repairs would have worn off. Indeed, Mr. Ward, the landlord's surveyor, in the course of cross-examination admitted that the value of the decorative work would have been exhausted in the course of a long requisition. On the other hand, the landlord would not suffer whether the tenant did the decorative repairs or not, because under s. 10 (1) of the Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948, he gets compensation for all dilapidations during the requisitioning. The landlord's compensation would, therefore, not be lessened one penny whether the tenant had done the decorative repairs in 1947 or not.

I appreciate the force of these arguments, and, if the correct measure of damages was such a sum as represents the damage which the landlord will sustain when he gets the premises back, they would have great weight, but the answer to them both is that the damages must be assessed, not by reference to

A the time when the land reverts in possession, but as at the end of the lease. I take it from authorities which this court is not at liberty to disregard that the proper measure of damages is the difference between the value of the reversion at the end of the lease with the premises in their then state of disrepair and its value with the premises in the state in which they would have been if the covenants had been fulfilled. That test was laid down by this court in Hanson v. Newman (3). What has to be considered is the diminution in value of the reversion at the end of the lease, and I take "reversion" to mean the landlord's then interest in the premises. If he is the owner and the premises are requisitioned, the reversion is his freehold subject to the existing requisition, because that is the landlord's then interest in the premises. The question is, therefore: How much was the market value of the landlord's interest diminished at the end of the lease by reason of the disrepair for which the then assignee was responsible? If we were to take, not the end of the lease, but the time when the land reverts in possession, there could be great difficulty. The future cost of repair would be the measure and the court would be asked to deduct the estimated amount of repairs which will be done by the council after the lease comes to an end, but the court cannot speculate as to what repairs may be done by the council during the period of requisition. It is entirely a matter of speculation how long the requisition will last, and whether the local authority is going to do any more repairs, and in that situation the words of LORD HERSCHELL ([1896] A.C. 495) in Conquest v. Ebbetts (4) are in point:

D "I do not think the court would do right, in assessing the damages in the present case, to involve itself at the instance of the appellants in considerations of that character . . . They have broken their covenant, and when sued for the breach they have, in my opinion, no right to demand that a speculative inquiry shall be entered upon as to what may possibly happen and what arrangements may possibly be come to, under the special circumstances of the case . . ."

E It has turned out that, since the lease came to an end, the council have, during the requisition, done the outside painting, so that is not matter of speculation, but it does not of itself alter the position, for, if the landlord is lucky enough to have some repairs done later by the local authority (or it may be in other cases by a fresh tenant under a reversionary lease: Terroni & Necchi v. Corsini (5)), that does not of itself affect the measure of damages as against an assignee who has broken his covenant. It is res inter alios acta. It is like the cases of the sale of goods where it has been held that a buyer of goods which are not up to contract is entitled to recover damages for the inferiority in quality even though he has made a profitable re-sale and has suffered no damage: see Slater v. Hoyle & Smith, Ltd. (6). In the course of the argument, BUCKNILL, L.J., gave another illustration. If a man's motor car is damaged by negligence and is out of repair, is the wrongdoer exempted because at some later date the car is destroyed by fire? The answer is clearly: No, and we are all familiar with the rule that insurance money does not go in reduction of damages: Bradburn v. Great Western Ry. Co. (7). There are, therefore, many cases in which things that happen after a breach of contract or after a wrong done cannot be prayed in aid by the man who breaks his contract or by the tortfeasor in diminution of damages, because it is res inter alios acta.

H It does not follow, however, from all this that, when one comes to apply the proper measure of damage—injury to the reversion—future events and probabilities are to be disregarded. They may have an important bearing on the value of the reversion at the end of the lease. Section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, shows that future events are to be regarded, for, if the premises are to be pulled down at or shortly after the end of the lease so that any repairs would have been valueless, that is a ground for depriving the landlord of any damages, but, in such cases, the subsequent event, when it happens, is not in itself sufficient to extinguish the damages. It is only evidence, albeit strong evidence, in retrospect, of the future as it appeared at the end of the lease. In Salisbury v. Gilmore (8) it was shown that the Marquess of Salisbury had the intention at the end of the lease of pulling down the premises, but a few days later he changed his mind and determined not to do so. The court said that the material time was at the end of the lease, and, if at the time of the end of the lease he had the intention to pull down, it did not matter that he changed his mind afterwards. The true view is, therefore, that matters happening subsequently to the end of the lease do not of themselves affect the damages. The only effect of subsequent demolition is that it shows in retrospect what was the future when the lease came to an end, and thus throws strong light on the injury to the reversion at that time.

Counsel for the tenant took another instance which is not covered by s. 18 (1). He took the example of a house let on a long lease which was, by reason of its large size and great number of rooms, not suitable for occupation as a dwelling-house at the present day, but only for use as a warehouse, for which decorative repairs would be valueless. If the decorations were not, in fact, done, he said that the court would take the use to which the premises were being put into account, even though it did not fall within s. 18. I agree that the court would do so, but the reason would be because in such a case the damage to the reversion would be nil. At the end of the lease the premises would be of as much value as a warehouse as a highly decorated dwelling-house. These illustrations show that, although future events or probabilities do not in themselves reduce or extinguish the damages, nevertheless, they may properly be regarded in so far as they throw light on the value of the reversion at the end of the lease. I think, therefore, that the judge directed himself quite properly. He asked himself what was the lack of repair at the end of the lease for which the defendant was responsible, and he inquired by what amount at that time was the value of the existing reversion, subject to the requisition, reduced by reason of that lack of repair. That was the proper test. It is, however, said that, even so, the learned judge did his calculation wrongly. He founded himself on the schedule of repairs at Dec. 20, 1944, and the cost of making good that schedule. He then made allowances for repairs done by the council before June 24, 1947, and thus arrived at his figure. It is said that he was wrong in basing himself on the cost of repairs.

In cases where it is plain that the repairs are not going to be done by the landlord, the cost of them is little or no guide to the diminution in value of the reversion, which may be nominal: see Espir v. Basil Street Hotel, Ltd. (9) and James v. Hutton (10). In cases where the repairs have been, or are going to be, done by the landlord, the cost may be a very real guide. That is shown by the recent case of Jones v. Herxheimer (11). In cases where it is open to question whether the repairs will be done by the landlord, as in the present case, the cost may afford a starting figure, but it should be scaled down according to the circumstances, remembering that the real question is: What is the injury to the reversion? That is what the judge did here. He used the cost merely as an aid in assessing the diminution in value of the reversion. I do not think that I would myself have given so much weight to the cost of repairs, or, at any rate, having regard to the requisition, I would have scaled down the figure considerably, just as damages for breach of covenant to keep in repair during the term are scaled down according to the length of time unexpired: see Conquest v. Ebbetts (4) ([1895] 2 Ch. 384, and [1896] A.C. 494); but the fact that I would have given less is not a ground for interfering with the assessment made by the judge. He has directed himself properly on the measure of damages and we cannot interfere merely on a question of quantum unless the figure is plainly wrong, which is not the case here. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will now ask SINGLETON, L.J., to deliver his judgment.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. The decision must depend on the interpretation of s. 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which provides:

A “(1) Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair . . . shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as afore-said.”

The attention of this court was directed also to s. 10 (1) of the Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948, which places a limit on the amount of compensation payable by the requisitioning authority in respect of making good requisitioned land.

B With regard to the interpretation of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, this court is bound by what was said in Hanson v. Newman (3). In that case, LAWRENCE, L.J., approving what had been said by LUXMOORE, J., in the court of first instance, said ([1934] Ch. 305):

C “A reversion may not be a reversion in possession (i.e., it may not be immediate) by reason of the freeholder having granted a reversionary lease, and in that case the reversionary lease is to be disregarded in assessing the damages. In my judgment, what the court has to do in assessing damages under the section in the circumstances of this case is to ascertain the actual value of the property at the date of re-entry and the value which the property would then have had if there had been no breach of covenant; and the difference between these two values is the amount of the damage sustained by the landlord (that is to say) the difference between the value of the property as it stands and the value which it would have had in case the tenant had fulfilled his obligations under the covenants in the lease.”

D In the present case LYNKEY, J., followed that test and he had before him evidence as to values. The landlord called one surveyor, Mr. Ward, and the tenant called another, Mr. Ling.

E The property in question here, which was a house in Montpelier Square, was requisitioned by the Westminster City Council on Dec. 20, 1944. The tenant became the assignee of the lease on May 11, 1945. That lease had two years and one month to run, and it expired on June 24, 1947. There was no complete schedule of dilapidations or of lack of repair as at the termination of the lease, which is the important time, but there was a schedule of condition as at the date of the requisition, and that was checked by both surveyors soon after the termination of the lease and it is on that that they base their figures. One argument on behalf of the tenant was of this nature. True, the tenant was under a liability to do repairs and those repairs were half done. Prima facie, it is said, there is damage to the reversion, but it may be only nominal damage. The only time that the tenant was able to do the repairs was after the property was requisitioned, because he was not assignee until after the requisition, and, if he had done those repairs at that time, the landlord would not have benefited one penny in actual money. Therefore, counsel submitted, the tenant could not be liable in this case for anything more than nominal damages.

H The answer to that may be dependent on whether there was damage to the reversion. Evidence was called on that matter, and I should not have been surprised if a surveyor had said: “In view of the nature of the lack of the repair or of the breaches of covenant, and the facts that this property was requisitioned by the Westminster City Council, that it has been altered to some extent, and that no one knows how long the requisition will last, the damages ought to be small or nominal.” I think it is difficult for anyone to say that lack of repair of that kind, particularly decorations, may have the effect of diminishing the value of a reversion, if the property is, in fact, requisitioned at the time and no one can say how long the requisition will last. It seems to me, however, that, when the court is asked to consider a matter such as that, it must be guided by the evidence unless there be some overriding consideration of law which compels the court to say, notwithstanding that evidence, that only nominal damages can be given because the damage to the reversion can only be nominal. Counsel for the tenant was really asking this court to do the work of witnesses. There was evidence on which LYNSKEY, J., decided and, unless he misdirected himself, this court ought not to say that he was wrong. Still less ought this court to be asked to take the place of experienced valuers.

Mr. Ward, the landlord's surveyor, was responsible for the original schedule, and, after the expiration of the lease, the tenant instructed Mr. Ling to examine that schedule from the point of view of his liability in respect of repairs. Mr. Ward and Mr. Ling agreed that, subject to any question under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, the liability in respect of repairs under the covenant in the lease was the sum of £585. They were agreed that at the expiration of the lease the premises were not in the order that they should have been. Both of them had to consider the question which arose under s. 18 (1) of the Act of 1927, and Mr. Ward was asked:

"Q.—As you know, the landlord is only entitled to damages to the reversion?

A.—Yes.

Q.—Can you help his Lordship about that? What do you say about the £585, as to whether that is damage to the reversion or not?

A.—I think the damage to the reversion in this particular case might easily have been more."

The learned judge then asked him to deal with the diminution in value of the reversion with the property (a) requisitioned and (b) not subject to requisition. The witness said that the value of the property as requisitioned was £5,000, and, if it had not been requisitioned, £7,000, subject to the question of lack of repair. He said that the diminution in the value through lack of repair was £750, with the property requisitioned, and I think that he put it as more if the property had been unrequisitioned, bringing the value of the property, in its state of disrepair, to a figure of £6,140. In either event, Mr. Ward said that the damage to the reversion was greater than the sum of £585.

On the question of the diminution in value, counsel for the tenant submitted that there was no evidence on which the court could decide it. There was, however, the evidence of Mr. Ward, who was not cross-examined on the point, though he was asked a question to show that, if the repairs had been done, the value of the repairs, particularly decorations, would have been exhausted before the date of de-requisition and so the landlord had suffered no damage. He was not cross-examined to show that his estimate of value was wrong, nor was he asked on what it was based. Mr. Ling, the tenant's surveyor did not deal in his examination-in-chief with the question of diminution in value, but, when he was cross-examined, LYNSKEY, J., asked him about the figure of £585 which he had agreed with Mr. Ward, and the witness answered: "It really means that I thought that was the correct method of assessing Mr. Townshend's liability in 1947." The learned judge asked:

"Q.—You thought that was the fair amount he ought to have paid, having regard to the schedule of condition?

A.—Yes, I did at the time."

Then counsel for the landlord resumed his cross-examination:

"Q.—And that that was a fair amount which he ought to pay as being the damage to the reversion?

A.—Yes."

While the witness was being re-examined the learned judge asked:

“Q.—Tell me this from the point of view of a surveyor. You were asked a question which you answered; you said that you agreed with £585, the value of making good the dilapidations; you thought that was a fair amount which he ought to pay as being damage to the reversion. When you are considering what amount you should be paid for dilapidations, do you take into account the value of damage to the reversion, or not?

A.—Yes. In this case I had thought, probably erroneously, that the damage to the reversion was equal to the amount by which the claim under s. 2 (1) (b) of the 1939 Act would be reduced by the dilapidations evidenced in the 1945 schedule. That is why I went ahead and agreed with Mr Ward the value of the dilapidations in the 1945 schedule provisionally at £585.

Q.—Does that mean, in effect, that the price was the price of making good the dilapidations shown in the schedule of condition, and that your view was that, taking into account any reduction that might be caused by what the council would have had to pay, that would affect the selling price of the reversion to a like amount. Is that approximately right, or not?

A.—Yes, approximately that was the view I took then.”

C There was, therefore, evidence of diminution in value given by the surveyors on both sides.

I have been interested in the discussions on the law which have taken place, but it is first essential to ascertain the facts. There was evidence on which the learned judge was asked to come to a conclusion. He has, as I think properly, said that before the termination of the lease some work had been done by the requisitioning authority to effect some of the repairs which ought to have been effected by the tenant or his predecessor in title or both. He assessed the amount of the work so done at the sum of £150. The tenant had already paid something on account of structural repairs which were necessary, and the learned judge deducted both those sums from the £585 and gave judgment for the difference. I think that that was right. It has been said that he ought to have taken into consideration things which were done by the requisitioning authority after the termination of the lease and before the date of the hearing, and that he must always bear in mind the fact that this property was requisitioned. With regard to the first of those propositions I thought at one time that the tenant ought not to be asked to pay for the outside painting, for instance, which was done by the requisitioning authority after the expiration of the lease but before the case was heard. That was a sum of £39, and it may well be that, if that outside painting ought to have been done long before it was in fact done, the damage to the property had already taken place, because the object of painting is to avoid damage to property. On the whole, I do not think it right to say that anything should be done with regard to that one item, particularly as it has not been raised as an individual item by the tenant's counsel. As to the suggestion that the learned judge ought to bear in mind that this property was requisitioned, I agree that he should. I think that he did. The evidence of the valuer was based on that, and it is on that evidence that the learned judge gave judgment.

This case was heard on Oct. 26 and 27, 1949, and one of the authorities to which we were referred, Landeau v. Marchbank (12), was before the same learned judge in June, 1948, his judgment being given in May, 1949. In that case the judge decided that, although there was evidence of lack of repair, in the circumstances the landlord had not proved diminution in the value of the reversion, and so he gave judgment for only nominal damages. In the course of his judgment in Landeau v. Marchbank (12), LYNKEY, J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 175):

“It seems to me that . . . the fact that repairs are necessary is not in itself even prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion.

In certain circumstances it may be an important factor, but of itself the fact that a certain amount of repair needs to be done does not, in my view, necessarily mean that there is damage to the reversion."

I agree with that judgment, except that in place of the words "even prima facie" there ought to be placed the word "conclusive." Evidence of lack of repair is not conclusive evidence of damage to the value of the reversion, but it may well be, and is generally held to be, some prima facie evidence of that damage. My reason for referring to this judgment is to show that the judge had the right test before him earlier in the year in Landeau v. Marchbank (12) and that he was not coming, in any sense, anew to the problem when he had before him the present case. In one case he decided that there was no evidence of diminution in value of the reversion, but in the case under appeal he had before him, as he found, evidence on both sides that there was diminution in value of the reversion. That being so, it was for him to say, on that evidence, how much that was, and he was satisfied that it was more than the cost of the repairs which he held ought to have been done under the covenant. In my view, the learned judge approached the question from the proper angle and he decided it on the evidence before him.

FALMOUTH BOAT CONSTRUCTION, LTD. v. HOWELL.

Ship—Repairs—Licence—Need to be in writing—Oral permission given by Admiralty licensing officer—Legality—Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1.

By the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1, the Admiralty, in pursuance of powers conferred on them by reg. 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, ordered that no ship repairer was to carry out any repairs or alterations to ships "except under the authority of a licence granted by the Admiralty." On June 24, 1942, the Director of Merchant Shipbuilding and Repairs at the Admiralty sent a circular letter to all licensing officers as follows: "I understand that it has been made clear to you that when you are dealing with reliable ship repairers and owners with a good record you ought not to delay the putting in hand of obvious repairs, merely pending the actual issue of a licence."

In or about May, 1947, the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiffs, a firm of ship repairers, for the conversion of a naval vessel into a passenger carrying vessel. Before they began any work on the ship, the plaintiffs applied to the licensing officer of the Admiralty for a licence, and from time to time that officer gave the plaintiffs verbal permission to proceed with the work, which they carried out under his inspection. On being presented with an account for work done, the defendant refused to pay on the ground that the work was illegal, it being alleged that the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940, required a written licence and this had not been obtained.

HELD: (i) assuming that the Order postulated a written licence, it should not be treated as an Act of Parliament, and it was not even a Defence Regulation, but merely an Order made under the authority of a regulation which could be revoked or varied without any formality or publicity; and, applying the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta, in view of the circular letter of June 24, 1942, the court should presume that the Order had been varied so as to enable verbal permission for the work to be given.

Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth ([1948] 2 All E.R. 558), distinguished.

(ii) on construction, the words "a licence granted by the Admiralty" were capable of meaning a verbal licence.

(iii) whenever government officers, in their dealings with a subject, take on themselves to assume authority in a matter with which he is concerned, the subject is entitled to rely on their having the authority which they assume; in the present case the plaintiffs, having acted on what they were told by the licensing officer, had not been guilty of an offence and they were entitled to claim payment for the work which they had carried out.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of His Honour SIR TOM EASTHAM, K.C., Official Referee, made on July 18, 1949, on a preliminary point.

The official referee found that certain work in connection with a ship, the property of the defendant, had been carried out by the plaintiffs without the written licence of the Admiralty, and was illegal and, therefore, that the plaintiffs could recover nothing from the defendant in respect of the work. The Court of Appeal now reversed this decision, holding that an oral licence was sufficient. The facts appear in the judgment of DENNING, L.J.

Ryder Richardson and S. H. Noakes for the plaintiffs.

Havers, K.C., C. H. Duveen and W. I. Percival for the defendant.

Feb. 10. The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: The plaintiffs, Falmouth Boat Construction Ltd., are ship repairers. The defendant is a gentleman who, in December, 1946, bought a sea-going naval vessel, M.L.229. His intention was to convert it into a passenger carrying vessel. In or about May, 1947, he entrusted the ship repairers with the work. They have done a great deal of it. Their account amounts to nearly £7,000, of which they have only received £2,500 on account. They now claim to be paid the balance of £4,371 11s. 7d. The defendant disputes the claim on several grounds, but this court is only concerned with one of them.

It is the defence of illegality. The defendant says that the work was illegal because there was no written licence granted by the Admiralty. If this defence is good, it defeats the greater part of the claim, and so the official referee has taken the convenient course of hearing it as a preliminary issue. He has held that the defence is good. From that finding the ship repairers appeal to this court.

Before considering the legal point, it is as well to set out the relevant facts. There is at Falmouth a Board of Trade surveyor, named Mr. Thompson, who is not only the surveyor of ships under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 724 (1), but was also at all material times the licensing officer for the Admiralty under the Orders restricting the repair of ships. He was, indeed, expressly authorised by the Admiralty to sign licences on their behalf. On Feb. 3, 1947, the plaintiffs, before they did any of the work on the ship, made written application to Mr. Thompson to grant them a licence for the work. Mr. Thompson told them that he could not grant a licence at that time because he was short of timber. The plaintiffs said that they had sufficient material in stock to carry on, and added that in any case there was a lot of stripping to do before materials were needed, and they asked Mr. Thompson if he had any objection to their carrying on in the meantime. He said that he had no objection and that he would give them a licence as soon as he had materials available. On the faith of what Mr. Thompson had told them, the plaintiffs got on with the work. They actually started in May, 1947. The work was all done under the eyes of Mr. Thompson and his assistant. Those gentlemen inspected it three or four times a week and gave oral permission for all that was done. In October, 1947, the plaintiffs needed materials. They wanted timber, and, bearing in mind what Mr. Thompson had told them, they made another written application for a licence. They filled in the printed application form with the words "to complete B.O.T. requirements for modified steam 3 certificate." Those words were not as precise as a lawyer could wish. The plaintiffs should have asked for a licence "to complete the alteration of the ship, such completion to be in accordance with the B.O.T. requirements for modified steam 3 certificate," but they were not lawyers. Nor was Mr. Thompson. They all took the application as covering the completion of the ship. It was more or less correct, because most of the work was, in fact, within the Board of Trade requirements, but there was a little of it which was not actually within those requirements. None of those concerned, however, noticed this defect in the application, and Mr. Thompson duly signed the printed form granting the application as asked. It was dated Oct. 11, 1947. Armed with this licence the plaintiffs were able to get the necessary materials and go on with the work. Mr. Thompson and his assistant still made their inspections and gave oral permission for all the work that was done. In January, 1948, for some reason with which we are not now concerned, the work on the ship ceased. The plaintiffs then brought this action claiming to be paid for what they had done, but the official referee has held that nearly the whole of it was illegal with the result that they are entitled to practically nothing.

This unjust result is reached by a logic which looks at first sight to be unanswerable, and I can well understand that the official referee felt bound to give effect to it. These are the steps in it: (i) by the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940, art. 1, the Admiralty, in pursuance of powers conferred on them by reg. 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, ordered that no ship repairer was to carry out any repairs or alterations to ships "except under the authority of a licence granted by the Admiralty." It is said that under that order, for any work to be lawful, there must be a written licence issued before the work is done, and that an oral permission, such as that given by Mr. Thompson, is not only ineffective in itself, but it also cannot be made good by a subsequent licence issued retrospectively. This argument is supported by a decision of this court on the wording of reg. 56A of the Defence (General)

Regulations which is said to be indistinguishable: see Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (1). Hence it is said that all the work done by the plaintiffs with Mr. Thompson's oral permission before the written licence was issued on Oct. 11, 1947, amounting to £4,400 worth, was illegal. (ii) It is said that most of the subsequent work also is illegal because the written licence was on a printed form which contained a standard condition saying that "this licence shall automatically determine if any unauthorised alterations or repairs are carried out." It is said that, shortly after the licence was issued, a small amount of work was done which was unauthorised because, although it was orally permitted by Mr. Thompson to complete the ship, it did not come within the precise words of the application "to complete Board of Trade requirements." Hence it is said that by reason of this standard condition, the licence was there and then automatically determined, and that all the work done thereafter, amounting to £2,300 worth, was illegal, even though nearly all of it was, in fact, done to complete B.O.T. requirements. (iii) It is said that the effect of this illegality is that the plaintiffs can recover nothing for any of the illegal work: see Bostel Bros. Ltd. v. Hurlock (2). It is perforce conceded by the defendant that the plaintiffs can keep the £2,500 which they have been paid on account, but that still leaves them over £4,000 out of pocket. The essence of all that argument is that a written licence was absolutely necessary, that no oral permission could take its place, nor would any of its terms or conditions be waived by any oral dispensation. The steps by which that result is reached are logical enough, but these courts have never been disposed to give effect to a ruthless logic if it means that injustice will thereby be done. So it was sought to strengthen the logic by the argument of expediency.

Resort was had to the observations of SCOTT, L.J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 560) in Jackson Stansfield v. Butterworth (1), and it was said that this court would be quite justified in ignoring the oral permission given by the licensing officer because "... the effective enforcement of the licensing system could never be achieved except by means of written licences."

Further that

"If the licence were merely an unrecorded oral permission, the certainty needed for a criminal prosecution would not be a practical possibility."

Whatever the merits of that argument under the Building Regulations—and I confess that the view of JENKINS, J., appeals much to me—the argument has no merits whatever under the ship repairing Order because there is overwhelming evidence that it was administratively very convenient—indeed, almost essential—that the licensing officers should be able to give oral permission for work to be done before they issued a written licence. The reason was because it took some time to get out a licence, and it would be quite intolerable that ships in need of repair should be held up in port idle and waiting for a licence when it was most important to get on with the work. The Admiralty themselves acted on this sensible view. On June 24, 1942, the Director of Merchant Ship Shipbuilding and Repairs writing from the Admiralty sent a circular letter to all licensing officers in which he said:

"I understand that it has been made clear to you that when you are dealing with reliable ship repairers and owners with a good record you ought not to delay the putting in hand of obvious repairs, merely pending the actual issue of a licence."

Mr. Thompson said that he had granted permission in that way ever since the beginning of the war. Let me quote his actual words:

"I was the only licensing officer at Falmouth. Sometimes I had as many as twenty to twenty-five ships in for repair at one time and it was almost impossible to deal with the licences immediately because I had to go through the ships repair list and cut out what I thought was unnecessary to get the ship in operation. Therefore, it was quite a fairly common practice with me to defer the issue of the licence until time permitted for the licence to be issued. In the meantime, I would give permission for the work to carry on. If I had not done that, ships would have had to spend rather longer in port than was necessary."

That shows the way in which the Admiralty and their licensing officers acted. To avoid delay to ships, they gave oral permission for the work and followed it up later by a written licence. It was a very sensible thing to do. Yet we are asked to say it was illegal and that the plaintiffs were guilty of a criminal offence when all that they did was to do as they were told by the licensing officer. If they were guilty, then surely the Admiralty and their licensing officer were even more guilty for leading them astray. The truth is, in my opinion, that none of them was guilty of a criminal offence at all. Let me explain why. It really depends on the nature of the Order issued by the Admiralty in 1940. That was not an Act of Parliament and should not be treated as such, nor was it even a Defence Regulation such as reg. 56A which was considered by this court in the Jackson Stansfield case (1). It was merely an Order made by the Admiralty under the authority of the regulation. As such it was not discussed in Parliament or laid on the table of the House. It was not even necessary that it should be made public: see Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker (3). It could be made without any formality or publicity and—this is the point—it could be revoked or varied likewise: see Defence (General) Regulations, reg. 98. Assuming, therefore, as I am prepared to assume, that the original Order postulated a licence in writing, nevertheless, it could be varied without any formality or publicity. The circular letter of June 24, 1942, is cogent evidence that it was so varied. That letter issued from the Admiralty and it showed clearly that licensing officers were authorised to grant oral permission for repairs pending the actual issue of a licence. It seems to me quite plain that that letter could not, or, at any rate, should not, have been circulated unless the original Order had been varied so as to enable oral permission to be given. In these circumstances in point of law I think that this court should presume that it had been so varied. If there ever was a case in which the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta should apply, it is this case, because licensing officers, ship repairers and shipowners have assumed throughout that oral permission could validly be given. Every reasonable presumption should be made to support their action rather than it should be held that all of them have over all these years been acting illegally.

Let me assume, however, that I am wrong about this and that we ought not to presume that the original order had been varied. Nevertheless, I decline to believe that the plaintiffs were guilty of any illegality. They acted on what they were told by the licensing officer. They did not know what Orders had actually been made by the Admiralty, or what variations had been made in them. They had no means of knowing the Orders, or, at any rate, they had no sure means, because the Admiralty was not bound to publish them. They could only rely on what they were told by the licensing officer. Can it be seriously suggested, that, having relied on him, they have been guilty of an offence? In my judgment, there is a principle of law which protects them from such an injustice. It is a principle of particular importance in these days when the officers of government departments are given much authority by Orders and circulars which are not available to the public. The principle is this: Whenever government officers, in their dealings with a subject, take on themselves to assume authority in a matter with which the subject is concerned, he is entitled to rely on their having the authority which they assume. He does not know, and cannot be expected to know, the limits of their authority and he ought not to suffer if they exceed it. That was the principle which I applied in Robertson v. Minister of Pensions (4) and it is applicable in the present case also. It was not canvassed in Jackson Stansfield v. Butterworth (1) and that case is, therefore, no obstacle to its adoption.

In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs were guilty of no illegality, and their claim is not to be defeated on that account. The appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree that this appeal should be allowed. It is right that I should give my reasons for coming to that conclusion in view of the fact that we are differing from the learned official referee who took great trouble with the case and who stated his findings with admirable clarity.

The question before the court arises from the defendant's plea in the amended defence that the repairs or alterations executed by the plaintiffs before Oct. 11, 1947, were illegal, and that, consequently, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the cost of them from the defendant. This plea is based on the principle enunciated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Langton v. Hughes (5) (1 M. & S. 593, 596) and stated by SOMERVELL, L.J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 313) in Bostel Bros., Ltd. v. Hurlock (2):

“What is done in contravention of the provisions of an Act of Parliament, cannot be made the subject-matter of an action.”

The relevant Order is the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1. The defendant says that the plaintiffs had no licence to do the repairs or alterations at the time they (or the greater part of them) were done, and that the doing of them without a licence granted by the Admiralty was in contravention of the Order. It is for the defendant to establish this, and he seeks to do so by saying that the word “licence” in the Order means “written licence,” and that it is common ground that the plaintiff did not have a written licence until Oct. 11, 1947, whereas work to the value of £4,000, or thereabouts, was done before that date. Thus the question depends on whether “licence” in the Order ought to be read, or must be read, as meaning “written licence.” Prima facie he who sets up that a criminal offence has been committed must prove it, and yet I do not think that anything really turns on onus of proof in this case. At the same time that question of construction cannot be determined without regard to the surrounding circumstances and to the exigencies of the times at the date of the Order. Perhaps I should say that one is entitled to bear those matters in mind if there be ambiguity, as I think there is: see Watcham v. A.-G. of East Africa Protectorate (6).

On behalf of the defendant reliance was placed on the decision of this court in Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (1) in which the court (by a majority) held that the words “a licence granted by a Minister” in reg. 56A (2) meant a licence in writing, and it was submitted that that decision covered the present case. It is right to point out that JENKINS, J., in the course of a dissenting judgment, said that he was unable to find anything in reg. 56A which constrained him to construe para. (2) of that regulation as requiring that the licence must be in writing. He thought that the regulation should be construed strictly in favour of the subject. Regulation 56A deals with the control of building operations and, as was pointed out by counsel for the plaintiff, it provides a complete code, and, in particular, it gives an accused person a defence under para. (6) (a) if he had reasonable grounds for believing that the cost would not exceed the amount stated, and under para. (6) (b) if the acts done without authorisation or licence were urgently necessary and were done in circumstances of emergency which rendered it impracticable to obtain authorisation thereof or a licence therefor. There is nothing of this kind in the Order now under consideration, which was made by virtue of reg. 55, which provides that Orders may be made for the general control of industry. And how different is the subject-matter. Regulation 56A, as I have said, provides a code for the control of building operations, and building operations are seldom a matter of extreme urgency. Ship repairs, on the other hand, often must be done immediately sometimes to keep a ship afloat, and in war time because of the urgent need for all available shipping, and, again, no one can tell the extent of the repair necessary until he has commenced the repairs. In such cases it would be hampering the efforts of those who were endeavouring to keep shipping afloat and active to say that no repairs could be done by ship repairers without a written licence. It may well be possible for the ship repairer to see, or to speak by telephone to, the proper authority (in this case the ship surveyor) and to obtain verbal authority or licence to do what is necessary, it being understood that the surveyor would give a written licence at some later stage after he had inspected the ship. Only thus was the Order workable, as I think. If I am right in this view, that which is given in the first instance in such a case is an oral licence. In the normal case it is followed by a written licence, which is important for purposes of record, if for no other purpose. If it were otherwise, the ship repairer would be committing an offence every time he did a small repair to keep a ship afloat unless he had a licence in writing which, maybe, could not be obtained in time to be of use, and which the surveyor might refuse to give until he had inspected. The Order ought not to be read in that way unless it is necessary so to read it. Moreover, the practice is shown by the letter from the Admiralty of June 22, 1942, signed by the Director of Merchant Shipbuilding and Repairs. Paragraph 3 of that letter reads:

"On the other hand, I understand that it has been made clear to you that where you are dealing with reliable ship repairers and owners with a good record you ought not to delay the putting in hand of obvious repairs merely pending the actual issue of a licence."

This I take to mean: You may give an oral licence to reliable ship repairers (as the plaintiffs were) pending the giving of a written licence. To read it in any other way would be equivalent to saying that the department encouraged the licensing officer to aid and abet the ship repairers in committing offences against the Order. I do not see that on this wholly different subject-matter and under a different Order and regulation we are bound by the decision in Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (1). I respectfully agree with ASQUITH, L.J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 566) that normally, when one is considering a licence granted by the Minister (or by the Admiralty) one thinks of a written instrument, but that does not mean that an oral licence can never be a licence within the meaning of the word "licence" in a statutory Order. This case must be decided on a fair view of the Order itself, regard being had to that with which it was dealing.

Everything in the way of alterations or repairs done to the ship was done under the eye of Mr. Thompson, a surveyor of ships under s. 724 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the licensing authority under the Admiralty. Incidentally, Mr. Thompson is a Board of Trade surveyor, and at the time he was also the Ministry of Transport's senior surveyor at Falmouth. He said in evidence that he inspected the work from time to time and that no unauthorised work was done. There were no unauthorised repairs. In other words, he had given an oral licence for all that was done. Written application had been made on Form M.S.4 on Feb. 3, 1947. Some £4,000 worth of work was done under oral licences. A further application to complete Board of Trade requirements for modified steam 3 certificate was made on Oct. 7, 1947, and this was authorised, and written licence given on Oct. 11, 1947. In view of the evidence, I do not think that it can be shown that the repairs, etc., were carried out without a licence granted by the Admiralty. The oral licences given from time to time were sufficient. In considering the authority of Mr. Thompson one must look at the letter of June 22, 1942, from the department of the Admiralty dealing with these matters, as well as at the documents referred to by the official referee. Certainly I am not prepared to say that there was any contravention of the Order by the plaintiffs. It is interesting to consider what would be the direction to the jury if, on these facts, there was a committal for trial. Counsel for the defendant submitted that it would be the duty of the judge to direct the jury that "licence" in the order means "written licence," and, it being admitted that a great part of the repairs were done without a written licence having been first obtained, it would be the duty of the judge to direct the jury to convict. I am not disposed to take that view. I regard the word "licence" in the Order as capable of meaning either a written or an oral licence. I think it would be the duty of the judge in such a case to point out to the jury that though "a licence granted by the Admiralty" would normally connote a written instrument, it need not of necessity bear that meaning if it was capable of another meaning, and if so to read it would make the carrying out of urgent repairs in war time impossible without committing a breach of the Order. After all, common sense must apply to construction, and, if there are two possible meanings of the word, the one which makes sense of the Order and renders its working practically possible should be given. In other words, I do not think the judge would be right if he directed the jury to convict. It would be for them to say whether there was a licence in fact; and I have no doubt as to what their answer would be—indeed, it is more than likely that the case would not get so far. It is impossible to think of the Admiralty prosecuting in circumstances such as these. The defendant, in an effort to escape paying for work which has been done for him, sets up a plea of illegality on the part of the plaintiffs. For the reasons I have given, I consider that is a bad plea, and I would allow the appeal of the plaintiffs.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree that this appeal should be allowed. The main question at issue seems to me to lie in a small compass, viz.: Did the plaintiffs commit an unlawful act when they started work on the ship in question for the purpose of altering her from an armed motor vessel to a passenger ship? I need not set out the facts which have been fully stated by DENNING, L.J., in his judgment. The result of the conversations between the plaintiffs and Mr. Thompson, the licensing officer, was, to quote from the judgment of the official referee:

"They, the plaintiffs, proceeded with the work on the oral permission of Mr. Thompson, the licensing officer. Mr. Thompson and his assistant inspected the work as it was being carried out, and if any work was being done which was not permitted, they could and would have stopped it. They inspected the work three or four times a week. In their official capacity Mr. Thompson and his assistant gave the plaintiffs instructions to carry out certain work which the Board of Trade would require, and the plaintiffs complied with their instructions."

Can it be said in these circumstances that this work, which was done by the plaintiffs before Oct. 11, 1947, when the written licence was granted by Mr. Thompson, was illegal because it contravened the Order issued by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty on Feb. 1, 1940?

The answer to that question seems to me to turn on the ordinary and natural meaning which a man, whose business is to repair, alter or dry dock ships, would give to the words of para. 1 of the Order—"a licence granted by the Admiralty?" In my opinion, these words are clearly capable of including a verbal licence, and ought not to be construed as limited to a licence set out in a written, typed or printed document. I cannot think that the framers of the Order intended these words to have such limitation. Take, for instance, the very simple case of the dry docking of a ship. This is a task which often can only be done at high water, that is to say, once in every twelve hours. Dry docking a ship does not involve the use of any material other than the temporary use of the appliances of the dry dock, or of much labour. It may be that the ship is to be dry docked solely for inspection of her bottom, and will only stay in the dry dock for one tide. It may be that the dry docking is a matter of urgency. The suggestion that the Order was intended to impose on the owners or users of the dry dock the duty of obtaining a formal licence in writing to dry dock the ship, and that a verbal permission to dry dock her from the representative of the Admiralty was invalid, and that a man acting on such a verbal permission was doing something which might amount to a criminal offence, seems to me very unreasonable. At the time when the Order was made, it was just as necessary that essential work to ships should not be impeded by the necessity of obtaining formal documents as it was necessary that all shipyard facilities should be available for such work on ships as would promote the war effort of the country.

The official referee, when dealing with the second point, made on behalf of the defendant, viz., that the licence was automatically determined when the first of the unauthorised repairs, alterations, or dry docking was carried out, said in his judgment:

“If the licensing officer can authorise repairs, alterations or dry docking by giving oral permission for such work to be done, then there were no unauthorised repairs and the licence was not automatically determined.”

A little earlier in his judgment he had said:

“I am satisfied that he (the licensing officer) gave oral permission to the plaintiffs to do all the work.”

I think that in this case also an oral permission or licence was sufficient to comply with the Order. For these reasons I think that the defendant has failed to establish the plea in his amended defence that the work done by the plaintiffs for the defendant before Oct. 11, 1947, was illegal and/or irrecoverable in law, and that so much of the claim as related to repairs and/or alterations as were carried out after Oct. 11, 1947, were illegal and/or irrecoverable in law. I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of SINGLETON and DENNING, L.JJ., and I respectfully agree with the reasoning therein set out whereby the present case is distinguished from Jackson Stansfield v. Butterworth (1) and the different nature of the two Orders is pointed out.

Criminal Law—Suspected person—Previous convictions—Character not known to police before arrest—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4.

A person who is proved to have frequented or loitered about a “place” within the meaning of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, with intent to commit a felony and to have been previously convicted can be properly described as a “suspected person” within the section although the police officers who give evidence of his frequenting or loitering with that intent and who arrested him were then unaware of the previous convictions.

APPEAL against conviction.

B Feb. 13. HUMPHREYS, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at Middlesex Quarter Sessions and appeals from that conviction by virtue of a certificate granted by the deputy chairman who presided at his trial. The indictment contained one count, charging the appellant under s. 23 (2) of the Firearms Act, 1937, with the composite offence created by that section which provides, inter alia, that a person who has in his possession any imitation firearm at the time of his committing an offence referred to in sched. III to the Act shall, unless he shows that he had it in his possession for a lawful object, be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years in addition to any penalty to which he may be sentenced for the offence mentioned in the schedule. One of the offences in sched. III is an offence under the provisions of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, D 1824, as amended by s. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and s. 7 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1891. Section 4 provides that:

E " . . . every suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting or loitering about any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, . . . with intent to commit felony . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond . . . "

By s. 6 such a person may be arrested without warrant.

The sole point raised by this case is whether a person who loiters about such a place with intent to commit a felony can be properly described as a "suspected person" because he has been previously convicted of theft or dishonesty although the police officers who give evidence of his loitering with F that intent are unaware of those previous convictions. The appellant was kept under observation by two police officers for some twenty minutes at about 2 a.m. on Nov. 6, 1949, in different parts of the Great West Road, London. He was seen to be loitering in and about various streets in circumstances which satisfied the jury that he was loitering with intent to commit a felony. He was arrested, and an imitation firearm was found in his G possession. In order to establish that he was a suspected person it was proposed to prove that on Aug. 17, 1942, he had been convicted at Leicester City Quarter Sessions of larceny, that he then admitted twelve other cases of larceny which he asked to be taken into consideration, and that he was sentenced to three years' Borstal detention, and, further, that on July 22, 1948, at the same court, he was convicted of shopbreaking and stealing and was sentenced to H eighteen months' imprisonment. Those convictions were unknown to the police officers who watched him on Nov. 6, 1949. Before any witness was called, the question of the admissibility of the evidence of the convictions at Leicester was discussed in the absence of the jury, counsel for the appellant contending that it was inadmissible.

The evidence objected to was plainly admissible on this charge as evidence of intent to commit a felony, since by s. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, it is provided that " . . . in proving the intent to commit a felony it shall not be necessary to show that the person suspected was guilty of any particular act or acts tending to show his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case, and from his known character as proved . . . it appears . . . that his intent was to commit a felony."

It was argued for the appellant on his trial and before us that such evidence could not show that he was a suspected person within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, unless the previous convictions were known to the police officers who arrested him. It was, apparently, admitted by counsel for the prosecution that he could not rely on the evidence of the police as proving antecedent acts of the appellant before the time when they, being satisfied that he was loitering with intent, arrested him. It would have been better if that admission had not been made before the evidence had been called, because, in truth, when the evidence came to be called, the police officers were able to give in evidence certain facts which might well have been found by the jury to be proof of antecedent acts showing the appellant's purpose. Nor was it necessary that the argument should proceed in the absence of the jury, since the real objection was that the evidence, when given, did not create a prima facie case on which the jury could find that the appellant was a suspected person. However, as the case went to the jury on the basis that the sole ground for alleging the appellant to be a suspected person depended on his previous convictions, the appeal was argued on that footing.

The words "suspected person" in s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and their meaning have been discussed in many cases, to most of which we think it unnecessary to refer. No case would seem to have been reported which has raised this point, but, in our opinion, there is nothing in the Act or in any of the authorities to which our attention has been drawn to suggest that the previous convictions must be known to the arresting officers in order to prove that as the result of those convictions the person convicted became a suspected person. Any such decision would, in our view, tend to make the provisions of s. 4 useless since a thief might change his venue and the places where he chose to loiter with sufficient frequency to make it unlikely that the local police officers would recognise him or know anything about him. Counsel for the appellant relied on Ledwith v. Roberts (1), the facts of which were very different from those in this case. That was an appeal from a decision of the presiding judge of the Liverpool Court of Passage who had held that the facts alleged in the defence to an action for wrongful imprisonment, even if proved, would afford no defence in law to the action. No evidence was called and the case was decided on the basis that the allegations in the defence were assumed to be true. The case, however, is, in our opinion, the leading decision on the question of the meaning and effect of the words "suspected person" in s. 4. GREER, L.J., in his judgment, said ([1936] 3 All E.R. 575):

"In my judgment . . . the special powers given to constables are confined to a class of persons described as 'suspected persons' or 'reputed thieves.' They can only be apprehended without warrant if they already are at the time of their arrest and imprisonment suspected persons or reputed thieves. I do not think this means that if the constable suspects the person whom he apprehends he is entitled to arrest and imprison him without warrant . . . I think 'suspected person' means a person who has acquired the character of a suspect . . . In my judgment, the powers of a constable to arrest without warrant are confined to cases in which he finds frequenting or loitering, etc., a person who has by his previous conduct become a suspected person."

That case was followed in 1949 by R. v. Fairbairn (2), the headnote of which is as follows ([1949] 2 K.B. 690):

“Evidence of a previous conviction is admissible to establish that a person who is arrested under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, on a charge of loitering with intent to commit a felony, is a ‘suspected person’ within the meaning of the section at the time of his arrest.”

A LORD GODDARD, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, discussed many of the cases, including Ledwith v. Roberts (1). It is true that in that particular case the evidence of the police officers was that they knew the two persons who were arrested as convicted persons, but the judgment of the court, in our opinion, clearly did not proceed on the ground of their knowledge, and there are many passages in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., which are quite inconsistent with any such view. Dealing with Ledwith v. Roberts (1), he observed that that case laid down that the conduct or character of the people concerned must be such that they come fairly within the category of B being suspected persons, and added ([1949] 2 K.B. 694):

“If people who have been previously convicted of theft are found loitering in the streets and their conduct is such as to give rise to a proper and reasonable suspicion that they are there for the intention of committing a felony, they are guilty of an offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and can be dealt with as suspected persons loitering with intent C to commit a felony.”

After observing that SCOTT, L.J., in Ledwith v. Roberts (1) obviously had in mind the fact that it would be possible to show that a person was a suspected person by proving his previous record and character, LORD GODDARD, C.J., added (ibid. 694):

D “... as a matter of common sense that must be so. If a man is found loitering in the street and acting in a suspicious manner and it is also found that he has had half a dozen previous convictions, obviously he can rightly be regarded as a suspected person by reason of his previous convictions.”

E Later in his judgment there is the following expression of opinion (ibid., 695):

“... it must, we think, be obvious that the prosecution must be allowed to prove a man’s previous convictions, to show that he was a suspected person. It is those previous convictions that make him a suspected person and previous convictions can always be proved if they are relevant to F the charge before the court.”

No case was brought to our attention in which any judge has expressed any view as to knowledge on the part of police officers of the past character of the accused person being required. In our opinion, the two cases cited show that such knowledge on the part of the police is irrelevant, and, certainly, is not G essential. For those reasons this appeal is dismissed.

"SUNNUCKS v. SMITH. SAME v. SAME.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), February 16, 1950.]

Costs—Counsel's fees—Fee on appeal—Allowance of fee less than that allowed at first instance.

In taxing the costs of an action at first instance a taxing master allowed a fee of thirty guineas on the brief of counsel for the defendant. Counsel's brief on the appeal (which was by the plaintiff) was also marked thirty guineas, and the taxing master reduced the fee to twenty guineas. The defendant objected to the reduction, and, in overruling the objection, the taxing master gave as his reason " . . . I consider the work counsel had to do did not merit more. Counsel appeared against [the plaintiff] previously always with success and there was no expectation that she would win in the Court of Appeal." On a summons to review taxation,

HELD : while there were exceptions to the rule that counsel's fee should be the same in the Court of Appeal as at first instance, there was no indication in this case that the taxing master had found valid grounds for regarding counsel's work in the Court of Appeal as of less value than that in the court below, and, therefore, the prima facie rule ought to be applied and the brief fee restored.

Sturgis v. Morse (No. 2) (1859) (33 L.T.O.S. 5), applied.

[AS TO ALLOWANCE OF FEES ON TAXATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 548-554, paras. 753-763 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 932-940, Nos. 4722-4807.]

Case referred to:

(1) Sturgis v. Morse (No. 2), (1859), 26 Beav. 562; 33 L.T.O.S. 5.

SUMMONSES to review taxation.

By the first of these summonses the plaintiff in an action (against whom costs were awarded at first instance and on appeal) inter alia asked that the brief fee for the hearing at first instance of counsel for the defendant be reduced. By the second summons the defendant asked that he be allowed the full amount of the fee marked on his counsel's brief on appeal, which fee the taxing master had reduced. VAISEY, J., dismissed the first summons, but accepted the defendant's objection on the second.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

W. F. Waite for the defendant.

VAISEY, J. (having dismissed the summons issued by the plaintiff to review the taxation of the costs of the action by reducing the fee payable to counsel for the defendant): In the action with which these summonses are concerned, there were originally two defendants, the surviving defendant being the respondent in the Court of Appeal. On the taxation of the costs of the appeal the master reduced the fee of counsel for this defendant from thirty guineas to twenty guineas. The defendant objects to the reduction, and says that it is wrongful because of the principle in Sturgis v. Morse (No. 2) (1). That case, undoubtedly, does lay down that, prima facie, counsel is entitled to the same fee in the Court of Appeal as he was entitled to be paid in the court below. The taxing master had disallowed £44 out of a fee of £100 to leading counsel and £23 out of a fee of £77 to junior counsel, although the larger sums, amounting to £177, were allowed by the master on the original hearing of the cause. The taxing master stated the grounds and reasons for his decision at length. He said (26 Beav. 563):

"Firstly. Because the fees to counsel on the original hearing were given in respect of the whole case, as it then stood, between the plaintiff and the whole of the defendants, and as the appeal was the appeal of one defendant only, whose interest was separate and distinct from all the rest, and the other defendants could not be heard except to support the decree, I arrived at the conclusion, after having carefully looked through the briefs, that the answers of all the other defendants (except that of the defendant Ling, which was read by order as an affidavit), and the evidence and exhibits used on the part of those defendants, were not necessary for the plaintiff's counsel on the hearing of the defendant Morse's appeal ; and such answers and evidence, amounting to upwards of two hundred sheets, I feel that the objection taken to the amount of the fees given was a valid one, and I accordingly reduced those fees in proportion to what I considered might and ought to have been the briefs given to counsel on the appeal. Secondly. I consider the understanding, that there has existed a rule, that counsel are entitled to the same fees on the argument of an appeal as were given on the original hearing, can only have been applicable to a period when a year and upwards elapsed between the two hearings, and could then only apply to cases where the same briefs were necessarily given. Whereas, in the present instance, the appeal was heard in the term immediately following that in which the decree was pronounced, a circumstance in itself, in my judgment, a ground for giving less fees than those given on the original hearing, as counsel would not have the labour of making themselves masters of the case as in the first instance."

"I think the master has, through misapprehension, come to a wrong conclusion. The master seems to have thought that the fees paid to the plaintiff's counsel on the original hearing were proper and has allowed them. The principal defendant appealed from the whole decree, I call it the whole decree, because, except a small portion, it was so, and the whole matter was really before the Court of Appeal. The master has disallowed a portion of the fees paid with the briefs on the appeal, on the ground that it was 'the appeal of one defendant only, whose interest was separate and distinct from all the rest, and that the answers of the other defendants were not necessary for the plaintiffs' counsel on the appeal.' But I apprehend that evidence given for any defendant is evidence for the whole cause, and that the plaintiff may make use of it both in argument or comment. I have known it done repeatedly, and I think that any evidence in the cause may be made use of by the plaintiffs against the defendants, and by the defendants against the plaintiffs. That being so, I do not see how the master could come to a right conclusion in determining that any part of the evidence was unnecessary without hearing the cause itself. Where there is an appeal from a small portion of a decree, as in respect of parties or as to a trifling matter, I can understand that the fees to counsel may be much less than on the original hearing, and I have no doubt that this would be a matter of quantum quite in the discretion of the taxing master. But as he states the rule to be this, viz., to allow the same fee on an appeal from whole decree as on the original hearing, I do not see how he could decide that a portion of the brief which was necessary on the first hearing was unnecessary on the appeal, without hearing the cause ; nor do I see how the solicitor could take upon himself to decide that any part of the original brief might prudently be omitted from the brief on the appeal. The master, as a second reason, attributes something to the rapidity with which the appeal was brought to a hearing, and thinks that therefore there would be less labour to counsel to master the case. I dissent from that view of the case also, and as I disagree with the master, I must either allow the fee to counsel, or direct a review of the taxation."

I think it is going much too far to say there is a universal rule that the fee in the Court of Appeal should be the same as in the court below. In my view, the matter has to be looked at to see whether there were the same issues and the same matters to go into in the Court of Appeal as there were in the court below. I have not been able to do that here. When I look at the master's note on the objection to the taxation, the objection being that there is such a rule of uniformity between the briefs in the two courts, I find some difficulty in following it. He says:

"In taxing the bill on the appeal, I reduce counsel's fees to twenty guineas on the ground that I consider the work counsel had to do did not merit more. Counsel appeared against Mrs. Sunnucks previously always with success and there was no expectation that she would win in the Court of Appeal."

If the master had stopped at the words "did not merit more," I think I should have had great difficulty in interfering with his discretion, but when he gives as a further reason that counsel appeared against the same defendant on previous occasions and goes on further to allege as some ground for his decision that the lady's appeal was, apparently, hopeless, I find some difficulty in following it.

Having regard to the grounds stated by the taxing master, I think that the general rule that the fee should be the same ought to prevail. I have seen no reason whatever for reducing the fee in the court below. This was a case brought against a solicitor accusing him of conduct the proof of which would have been prejudicial to his career, and I think he was entitled to have an experienced counsel to protect his interests. A fee of thirty guineas in the Court of Appeal does not seem to be too much. Why should it be less in the Court of Appeal than in the court below? If the master had said that the issues were greatly limited or that a smaller fee would be adequate to cover the argument as compared with that in the court below, I am inclined to think he would be justified in saying a lower fee should be allowed, but he does not say that. He says that counsel had had previous experience of this plaintiff, that he had always been successful, and that her appeal was hopeless. None of those grounds seems to me to be in the least bit relevant. I have known appeals to succeed unexpectedly, and it is all the more advisable for counsel, presented with the brief in a case in which his success seems certain, to take particular care not to be taken by surprise.

It seems to me very difficult indeed on these grounds to suggest that the fee in the Court of Appeal should be any less than the fee in the court below, and I propose to restore the fee of thirty guineas which was marked on the brief. I wish to make it perfectly clear for the master's guidance that, although there is a prima facie rule that the fee should be the same in both courts, it is a rule to which there may be many exceptions, and, if the taxing master finds that there are valid grounds for regarding the work as of less value in the Court of Appeal than in the court below, it is open to him, and it is within his discretion, to proceed accordingly. In the present case I find no suggestion that the master has applied his mind to that kind of consideration which would have justified a lower fee.

KING v. SMITH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 10, 1950.]

Land—Encroachment on adjoining land by tenant of house—Purchase by tenant of house subject to tenancy—Sale by landlord of adjoining land—Right of purchaser of land to possession.

A In 1930, M., the owner of a partially developed building estate, let a house on the estate known as Gunnislake to the defendant on a weekly tenancy. The defendant encroached on a portion of waste land, which was part of the estate, and continued in possession of this land for over twelve years. In 1938 the building estate became vested in C. who, on June 11, 1947, sold the estate by auction. At the sale the waste land was bought by the plaintiff
B with vacant possession on completion, and Gunnislake was bought by an investment company. On Oct. 6, 1947, the investment company conveyed Gunnislake to the defendant, who continued to occupy the waste land, but offered to buy or rent the land from the plaintiff. The plaintiff rejected the defendant's proposals and brought proceedings for possession.

C HELD: (i) the presumption that the encroachment accrued to the holding of Gunnislake, so that the defendant had no interest therein beyond a leasehold interest coterminous with his tenancy and that the landlord could recover possession of the disputed parcel of land on the termination of the tenancy, applied up to the moment of the conveyance of Gunnislake; the merger of the defendant's leasehold interest in Gunnislake in the freehold in Gunnislake which was conveyed to him and the fact that the landlord then lost for ever any right to recover possession of Gunnislake did not result in the conversion of the defendant's leasehold interest in the disputed parcel of land into a freehold interest in it, and so render the presumption inapplicable; but on the merger the plaintiff became entitled to recover possession of the disputed parcel, and the defendant was thenceforth a trespasser.

E Dictum of THESIGER, L.J., in A.-G. v. Tomline (15 Ch.D. 161), applied.
Dictum of CHANNELL, J., in East Stonehouse Urban Council v. Willoughby Brothers, Ltd. ([1902] 2 K.B. 336), approved.

F (ii) on the facts, the conduct of the parties (in particular, the action of the landlord in offering the waste land for sale with vacant possession, and that of the defendant in negotiating with the plaintiff for a sale or lease of the land) did not indicate that at the material time either the landlord or the defendant regarded the encroachment as having been made for the defendant's benefit, and, therefore, the presumption in favour of the landlord was not rebutted, and the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE-SMITH made at Barnet County Court on Nov. 8, 1949, granting possession to the plaintiff of certain land the subject of encroachment by the defendant. A

The defendant, while the tenant of a house adjoining land which was also the property of the landlord, encroached on the land more than twelve years prior to its purchase by the plaintiff. The defendant contended that the plaintiff's claim to possession of this land was statute barred and that any presumption that the encroachment enured for the benefit of the defendant's landlord was rebutted when the defendant purchased the reversion of the house of which he had hitherto been tenant. The Court of Appeal, in dismissing the appeal, held that although, after twelve years, the tenant had acquired a leasehold interest in the disputed land, on the defendant purchasing the house, the landlord was entitled to recover possession of the land and to convey it to the plaintiff free from the defendant's interest. COHEN, L.J.: I will ask ROXBURGH, J., to deliver the first judgment.

ROXBURGH, J.: This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE-SMITH made at Barnet County Court on Nov. 8, 1949, and it raises a question of title to a small parcel of land. Alexandra Road and Well End Road are two parallel roads on a partially developed building estate at Well End, Borehamwood, Hertfordshire. There are some houses in each road with gardens in the rear and between the gardens there is a long, narrow, irregular strip of back land. In 1930 William Andrew Marsh was the owner of the estate, and he let a house in Well End Road, known as Gunnislake, to the defendant on a weekly tenancy. The defendant carried on the business of poultry farming, he proceeded to encroach on a small portion of the back land which belonged to his landlord, and he remained in continuous and exclusive possession of that portion for more than twelve years. In 1935 Marsh conveyed the building estate to Mrs. Alice Lucy Clay. In 1937 the plaintiff bought a plot in Alexandra Road and built a house known as Puck's Hill. On May 27, 1937, Mrs. Clay died, having devised the estate to her daughter Doris Helen Clay, who shortly afterwards became Mrs. Carter. On Aug. 11, 1938, a vesting deed was made in favour of Mrs. Carter. In 1947 Mrs. Carter advertised the estate for sale by auction on June 11, 1947. Before the auction the whole estate was sold to Pedigree Stock Farm Development, Ltd., who became the vendors at the auction sale which later took place. At the sale the plaintiff bought the back land numbered Lot 27, which included the land the subject of the encroachment. On that date Pedigree Stock Farm Development, Ltd., were entitled in equity to Gunnislake in reversion expectant on the then still existing tenancy of the defendant. One Ernest Joyce, an agent for North London Property Investment Co., Ltd., bought Lots 12 to 17. Lot 17 was Gunnislake. North London Property Investment Co., Ltd., then sold Gunnislake to the defendant, and it was conveyed to him on Oct. 6, 1947. D

Two things are clear—(i) that the defendant's weekly tenancy terminated on Oct. 6 by merger in his freehold estate; (ii) that the conveyance did not comprise the disputed parcel. On Sept. 4, 1947, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows: E

"Further to our conversation, I have now seen my solicitor, and I am prepared to allow you to rent the land in question at a ground rent of F

H

£7 10s. 0d. per annum, exclusive of rates, payable half-yearly, on a six-monthly tenancy to terminate at any date. First payment in advance due at Michaelmas, Sept. 29. The land is subject to the usual restrictions and stipulations contained in the schedule of the conveyance of this land. The above cancels the terms set out in my previous letter dated Aug. 29. Unless you can agree to this, the matter will have to be referred to the agents' solicitor, Mr. Lloyd-Jones, who will be obliged to give me vacant possession. I hope this will not be necessary."

On Oct. 14, 1947, Lloyd-Jones & Sons wrote to the defendant's solicitors as follows:

"We are writing to you as you acted for Mr. E. R. Smith on his recent purchase of 'Gunnislake.' We are instructed that Mr. Smith has encroached on other land forming part of Lot 27. We are informed that your client has large poultry houses on the land, and that he offered to purchase the land from the purchaser of Lot 27 (a Miss King) for £40. She told him that she did not want to sell, but would rent it to him for £10 p.a.—subsequently reducing this to £7 10s. p.a., but your client is not prepared to pay more than £5 p.a. In the meantime your client's poultry houses are still on the land and he is still using it. Our client sold Lot 27 with vacant possession on completion and Miss King will not complete her purchase until she gets vacant possession and is threatening proceedings to enforce the contract. The land purchased by Mr. Smith was, as you know, clearly defined on his conveyance plan. We shall therefore be obliged if you will inform Mr. Smith that unless he vacates the land and removes his chicken houses by Monday, Oct. 27; our client will have to institute proceedings."

On Dec. 10, 1948, Lot 27, including the disputed parcel, was conveyed to the plaintiff. As the defendant was a weekly tenant of Gunnislake from 1930 to Oct. 6, 1947, there is a presumption that the encroachment which he made accrued to the holding or, in other words, that he had no interest therein beyond a leasehold interest coterminous with his tenancy, and that his landlord could recover possession of the disputed parcel on the termination of the tenancy. That presumption can be rebutted by proving that the landlord and the tenant so conducted themselves as to show that the landlord treated the encroachment as not enuring for her benefit. This is, in effect, the principle laid down in a number of cases to which we have been referred. In A.-G. v. Tomline (1) THESIGER, L.J. said (15 Ch.D. 161):

"It appears from the cases cited by Mr. Cookson that there is a difference of opinion among judges as to the exact grounds of the doctrine that encroachments made by tenants enure for the benefit of their landlords. This much at least is clear, and all judges are agreed, that the doctrine involves a presumption of fact which is capable of being rebutted. Now here it appears to me that the facts necessary to support the presumption do not exist, and for two reasons."

After holding that there was no encroachment, he said (id.):

"... even assuming that not to be so, it seems to me clear that inasmuch as the principle that encroachments by tenants enure for the benefit of their landlords is founded upon a presumption of fact, a landlord and tenant may so conduct themselves in the course of transactions either by deed or otherwise as to show that the landlord treated the encroachment as not enuring to his benefit. Now, is not that the position of things here? It appears that since the encroachment (because upon this branch of the case I will assume it was an encroachment) there have been surrenders of the land which was the subject of the original copyhold grant, and admittances in pursuance of such surrenders. Now, we find that the new surrenders and admittances included only the land which was the subject of the old surrender, so that the person who is assumed to have the right to take the benefit of the encroachment did not take the benefit of it, but treated it as not enuring for his benefit."

Again, in East Stonehouse Urban Council v. Willoughby Brothers, Ltd. (2) a lessor had two adjoining properties referred to as the stable property and the foundry property. The tenant of the foundry property encroached on the stable property which was also in the possession of a tenant. CHANNELL, J., said ([1902] 2 K.B. 336):

"Assuming, however, that the statute did begin to run in 1856 against Lord Mount Edgcumbe, so that he would be barred when his tenant of the stable property was barred, still the statute ran in favour of another tenant (or the cestui que trust of another tenant, which I think is the same thing) of the other property, and all the authorities show that a presumption would arise that the encroachment was an accretion to the holding. The result therefore would, in my opinion, be that, if Lord Mount Edgcumbe had a right of entry in August, 1856, on these two disputed parcels, these parcels would, when the statute ran out, be presumed to be held with the foundry property, and when that lease determined or was surrendered he could resume possession. That lease did not determine until July 24, 1890, or shortly before, when the third life is said to have dropped. He would then have acquired a new right of possession, and it would be within twelve years of this action, unless the third life dropped before July 18, 1889. Mr. Foote answers this point as to accretion to the tenancy by referring to the observations of all the lords justices in A.-G. v. Tomline (1), to the effect that this presumption of accretion to the holding is a question of fact, and if on the facts proved in any particular case the landlord and tenant are shown to have 'so conducted themselves as to show that the landlord treated the encroachment as not enuring for his benefit,' then the presumption would be rebutted."

Counsel for the defendant has submitted two quite separate arguments. First, he says that in the present case the presumption ceased to apply when the landlord, by conveying Gunnislake to the defendant, lost for ever any right to recover possession of Gunnislake. I cannot accept that argument. The presumption, unless rebutted, applied up to the moment of the conveyance. The defendant's interest in the disputed parcel up to the moment of conveyance was an interest coterminous with the defendant's interest in Gunnislake. When his leasehold interest in Gunnislake merged in the freehold in Gunnislake which was conveyed to him, nothing happened, so far as I can see, which could automatically convert the defendant's leasehold interest in the disputed strip into a freehold interest in the disputed strip and so render the presumption inapplicable. On the contrary, unless the presumption is rebutted, it appears to me that on the merger the plaintiff became entitled to recover possession of the disputed parcel, and the defendant was thenceforth a trespasser.

Counsel's second point is that, by their conduct immediately before, at, and after the auction sale the landlord and the defendant so acted as to show that they were treating the encroachment as not enuring for the landlord's benefit, or, in other words, as having been made by the defendant for himself alone. I have already described in detail what the conduct of both parties was. The landlord's actions both before, at, and after the auction were really dictated by the erroneous view that the defendant had no interest at all in the disputed parcel—not even a weekly tenancy—but such an attitude, and, in particular, the action of the landlord, in offering the disputed land for sale with vacant possession was, as the county court judge says, a complete negation of the proposition that the encroachment had been made for the defendant alone.

Nor did the defendant act at the time of the conveyance of Gunnislake to himself as though he thought that the encroachment had been made for himself alone. He was prepared to bargain for a sale or lease of the disputed land, and he did not put forward any claim to a possessory title until after the conveyance. There is, in my view, nothing to rebut the presumption. Mrs. Carter first became entitled to recover possession (for she was still the legal owner of the estate, though not the equitable owner) on Oct. 6, 1947, and the plaintiff became entitled so to do on Dec. 10, 1948. I think the learned county court judge came to a right conclusion.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the defendant asks us to reverse the learned county court judge's order on two grounds. First, he says the presumption ceased to apply when the defendant purchased the reversion of Gunnislake. He says that the defendant then acquired all the rights of the landlord, including such rights as the landlord had in the disputed strip on which the defendant had encroached. Secondly, he said that the presumption was rebutted by the circumstances to which my Lord has referred. I do not wish to add anything on the second point, but I do desire to add just a few observations on the first point, which is a matter of law pure and simple and not one of fact, and, therefore, the more important of the two. I think counsel for the plaintiff supplied the right answer to this point when he said that the true effect of the presumption was that, from the time of the encroachment, the disputed strip became an accretion to the demised premises, and at the expiration of twelve years from the date of the encroachment, the defendant acquired a leasehold interest in the disputed strip and the landlord had the freehold reversion therein. This reading of the presumption, as he rightly said, would fit not only the case where the land on which the encroachment was made was the property of the landlord, but also the case where it belonged to an outside party who would lose his whole interest at the end of the twelve years period. If that be so, the landlord can plainly deal with the reversion in the disputed strip separately. This is what I think he did in the present case. True, he purported to deal with the reversion free from the defendant's leasehold interest. The effect (if any) of that would be that the plaintiff, if she had not already done so, might have to give notice to the defendant terminating his leasehold interest. It would not enable the defendant as purchaser of the demised premises to claim the freehold of the disputed strip which was plainly not included in the conveyance to him. For these reasons, as well as the reasons given by my Lord, in my opinion, this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree and have nothing to add.

KORNER v. WITKOWITZER BERGBAU UND EISENHUETTEN GEWERKSCHAFT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Denning, L.J.J.), January 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, February 13, 1950.]

Practice—Service—Service out of jurisdiction—Breach of contract committed within jurisdiction—Proof of such breach—Contract to pay pension—Contract made in Czechoslovakia—Pension payable in England—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e)—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4.

The plaintiff applied under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), for leave to serve notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction on a Czechoslovak company in an action claiming inter alia sums of money alleged to be due to him under an agreement for a pension, on the ground that, under the contract between the parties, the pension was, in the events that had happened, payable in England. The plaintiff had been an officer of the company and the agreement was made in Czechoslovakia. Shortly after his retirement in March, 1938, he came to live in England, where he had remained ever since. In support of his allegation that the pension was payable to him in England, the plaintiff, in his original affidavit, sworn on Apr. 17, 1946, relied on a letter from the company, dated Jan. 18, 1929, which stated that "should the value of the Czech crown be reduced by more than ten per cent. of its present gold value, the difference in value will be made good to you . . ." In a letter, dated Nov. 23, 1938, which was written by the plaintiff to the company in the course of a dispute in regard to the correct manner of calculating his pension, he stated that he had particularly requested the gold clause to be inserted as he was going overseas. The plaintiff had not kept a copy of this letter, but it was exhibited to an affidavit sworn on behalf of the company, and on re-reading it he swore a second affidavit, on June 9, 1948, saying that the letter had brought to his mind details of an oral agreement, made in January, 1929, between him and the manager of the company, whereby it was agreed that he was to receive his pension abroad in the country in which he was living at the time it accrued, and it was for this reason that the clause providing for the payment of the full gold value of the Czechoslovak crown was inserted in the letter of Jan. 18, 1929, which contained the agreement between him and the company on the matter.

HELD: (i) [BUCKNILL, L.J., dissenting] on an application under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), unless the plaintiff could show to the satisfaction of the court that a breach of contract, if there was one, was committed within the jurisdiction, the case was not a "proper one for service out of the jurisdiction," within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4.

Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska ([1946] 2 All E.R. 663), applied.

Per BUCKNILL, L.J. [dissenting]: "On principle, I do not see why there should be a different standard of proof on the issue whether the act or omission on which the jurisdiction is alleged to be based occurred within the jurisdiction from the standard of proof required of the act or omission of the defendants which is alleged to give rise to their liability to the plaintiff. It may well be that the same set of facts will be relied on, both to found liability and to found jurisdiction. I do not see why there should be a different standard of proof required for each allegation . . . In each case the plaintiff must, as I think, make out a prima facie case, and, if that case is based on facts which are put in issue, nevertheless leave should be given."

(ii) [DENNING, L.J., dissenting] on the plaintiff's affidavits it was shown that the breach, or breaches, of contract had been committed within the jurisdiction, and, therefore, he was entitled to an order for service out of the jurisdiction.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of SLADE, J., made in chambers, and dated June 28, 1949, dismissing an appeal from an order of MASTER GRUNDY allowing an application by the defendants, a Czechoslovak company, to set aside an order, made under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), giving leave to serve notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction. The plaintiff claimed (inter alia) sums of money alleged to be due to him from the defendants under an agreement for a pension made in Czechoslovakia, on the ground that, in the events that had happened, the pension was payable to him in England, and in an affidavit, sworn on Apr. 17, 1946, he relied on a written agreement contained in a letter, dated Jan. 18, 1929, written to him by the defendants. After re-reading a letter, dated Nov. 23, 1938, which was written by him to the defendants and was exhibited in support of an affidavit sworn on behalf of the defendants, the plaintiff swore a second affidavit, on June 9, 1948, in which he relied on an oral agreement, on which, he alleged, the agreement contained in the letter of Jan. 18, 1929, was based. SLADE, J., held that, where the contract was not made within the jurisdiction, R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, required him to be satisfied that a breach had been committed within the jurisdiction. He stated that he was not satisfied that there was a contractual obligation to pay the pension only in this country, and, therefore, he refused to give leave for service out of the jurisdiction. The majority of the Court of Appeal (DENNING, L.J., dissenting) now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., Gahan, and Dennis Lloyd for the plaintiff.
Clive Burt for the defendants.

Feb. 13. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments (to be delivered) of SINGLETON, L.J., and DENNING, L.J. I adopt the statement of the material facts as set out in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J. As SLADE, J., said in his judgment, the crucial questions for determination in the case of each of the two contracts are: (i) Was there a contract at the date of the issue of the writ? (ii) Was there a breach of that contract? (iii) If there was a breach of that contract, was the breach committed within the jurisdiction of the English courts? In the case of the pension agreement, the judge said that the pension agreement was operative at the date of the issue of the writ, and continued:

“Was there a breach of it? Again I apply the prima facie standard, and I answer that question in the affirmative, because on the evidence I think there is certainly a prima facie case that no payment under it has even been made. Certainly not all the payments under it have been made.”

I think, therefore, that the sole question as regards the pension agreement is whether the breach was committed within this jurisdiction. On this point I think that our decision should turn on the weight which we attach to the allegation of the plaintiff in para. 3 of the affidavit sworn by him on June 9, 1948. This paragraph is as follows:

“When I negotiated the pension agreement of Jan. 18, 1929, with the defendants, I stated that I intended to enjoy my pension abroad, although I did not then know in which country, and it was expressly agreed by Dr. Sonnenschein, who was the general manager of the defendants, and who was acting on their behalf, that I should receive payment of my pension in the country in which I might be living at the time it accrued.”

SLADE, J., when referring to this allegation, said:

“That sets out an alleged express agreement by Dr. Sonnenschein that there should be a contractual obligation on the part of the defendants to make payment in the country in which the plaintiff might be living at the time it accrued.”

If, therefore, that allegation is established, the breach within the jurisdiction is also established.

In these circumstances what ought the court to do where such an allegation is made? I think that the allegation is not on the face of it unreasonable, for the reasons given by SINGLETON, L.J., in his judgment. SLADE, J., in his judgment does not say that he rejected this statement by the plaintiff as untrue or unreasonable. He dealt with the point in these words:

“I have to ask myself whether I am satisfied, and again I say that I am not satisfied, that there was any express term of the agreement or any manifestation of intention which ought, according to Czech law, to be treated as though it were part of the agreement, and still less am I satisfied that, if there were any such manifestation of intention, it was a contractual obligation to pay and to pay only in this country."

A Having regard to the judge's interpretation of the allegation by the plaintiff, to which I have already referred, I read the first part of this statement as meaning that the judge is not satisfied that the allegations by the plaintiff are true. The judge does not give any reasons why he is not satisfied, but the reasons may be inferred from his statement in the paragraph immediately preceding the passage which I have quoted in which he says that he is not satisfied. The judge there said:

B "The defendants' answer to that [viz., the plaintiff's allegation of an express agreement] is: 'Well, Dr. Sonnenschein has been dead a long while and it is very convenient for [the plaintiff], who made no reference to that in his first affidavit, when he finds himself in difficulty, to come along with an express verbal agreement attributed to this gentleman who is long since deceased.' That is the way they put it."

C I think that the judge considered that it was his duty to take into account such matters as those put forward by the defendants by way of criticism of the veracity of the plaintiff when deciding whether he was satisfied that a breach of contract had been committed within the jurisdiction, and, if he decided that there was weight in them, he was entitled to say that he was not satisfied, and on that ground refuse to give leave to issue the writ. The crucial question, as I see it, is whether the judge, in exercising his discretion, applied a wrong principle as regards standard of proof.

D It is clear from the judgment that the judge drew a distinction between the standard of proof required of the plaintiff as regards the formation of the contract with the defendants, which is sued on, and its breach, on the one hand, and the proof required to establish that the breach was committed within the jurisdiction, on the other hand. On this point SLADE, J., said:

E "I emphasise that all that is required in the first part of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, is that the deponent shall depose to his belief that the plaintiff has a good cause of action. What is involved in a good cause of action in an action in contract? Two things, and two things only: (i) that there should be a contract between the parties, and (ii) that there should be a breach of that contract. Those two matters are, of course, if they are disputed in the pleadings, matters which will have to be decided at the trial, wherever the trial takes place. But, where the contract is not one made within the jurisdiction, even though there be a contract and a breach, the case does not fall within the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, unless the breach relied on is a breach within the jurisdiction of a contract which ought to have been performed within the jurisdiction. I, therefore, have to ask myself
G at the outset the question as to the standard of proof which I ought to apply in considering the evidence before me as to whether the contract is one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and whether the alleged breach of that contract was, or was not, a breach within the jurisdiction."

He quoted the concluding words of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4:

H "... no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear ... that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this Order."

He decided that these words required him to be satisfied that there was a breach within the jurisdiction. Again, he said:

"To make it quite clear, I apply the prima facie case test to the alleged contract, and the alleged breach. I apply the test that I must be satisfied as to the place where the breach occurred."

Unless there is authority which this court ought to follow for this conclusion of the judge, I think that it is erroneous. On principle, I do not see why there should be a different standard of proof on the issue whether the act or omission on which the jurisdiction is alleged to be based occurred within the jurisdiction from the standard of proof required of the act or omission of the defendants, which is alleged to give rise to their liability to the plaintiff. It may well be that the same set of facts will be relied on, both to found liability and to found jurisdiction. I do not see why there should be a different standard of proof required for each allegation.

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, sched. I, contains the Rules of Court. Order 11, r. 4, then was the same as the present Ord. 11, r. 5 (except that it did not contain the last few words of the present r. 5) and r. 3 (now the first part of r. 4) did not contain the words relied on by SLADE, J. Rule 4, in its present form, came into existence when the Rules of the Supreme Court, as revised, came into operation on Oct. 24, 1883: see STATUTORY RULES AND ORDERS (Revised to 1890), Vol. VII, p. 7. No reason for the addition of these words appears in any reported case, so far as I know, but the facts in Fowler v. Barstow (1) show that some such words were needed, because it was doubtful what course the court should adopt in cases where there was merely an affidavit stating that in the belief of the plaintiff he had a good cause of action. The point was decided in Fowler v. Barstow (1). The plaintiff, Fowler, sued the defendant, Barstow, who resided in Edinburgh, to recover a sum of money which Fowler had paid to Barstow and to two other persons, Larchin and Lynch, for an interest in a colliery. Fowler founded his claim on alleged misrepresentations made by the defendant as to the value of the colliery and the sum which it had cost. On an ex parte application, the vacation judge gave Fowler leave to serve the defendant in Scotland, and in support of his application Fowler swore an affidavit that he was induced to buy this interest by the misrepresentations of Barstow and Lynch and Larchin, and that the whole of the negotiations which resulted in his paying the purchase price took place in the city of London. Barstow then entered a conditional appearance, and moved the court to discharge the order. In support of his application he filed an affidavit denying all the allegations of the plaintiff, and also stating that he was not in London in the latter part of 1875, and never saw Fowler in his life till February, 1876. Fowler filed an affidavit in reply, in which he said that the representations were made to him by Larchin and Lynch, adding:

"I was further informed by them, who I claim were the agents of the defendant [Barstow] in the representations they made to me, that they were in communication with [Barstow] as to the terms upon which I should be sold an interest in the colliery."

CHITTY, J., did not allow Barstow's affidavit, or Fowler's affidavit in reply, to be read, and refused the application to discharge the order for service. On appeal the Court of Appeal held that the affidavits of Barstow and of Fowler in reply might be put in, and allowed the appeal. JESSEL, M.R., in the course of his judgment, said (20 Ch.D. 246):

"On the main point as to whether or not there was a cause of action within the jurisdiction, I am in favour of the appellant [Barstow] . . . On the first affidavit I agree that if the plaintiff had not retired from it there would have been a case. But it appears to me plain upon reading all these affidavits that the statement made by the plaintiff in his first affidavit is now admitted by him to be incorrect, and there is no longer any allegation whatever by anybody that the defendant Barstow made any representation within the jurisdiction."

BAGGALLAY, L.J., said (ibid., 247):

"As I am at present advised . . . I think that the original affidavit filed by the plaintiff was sufficient to obtain leave to serve out of the jurisdiction . . . But then the defendant puts in an affidavit in which he makes a statement which, if true, shows that there was no jurisdiction whatever to make an order, because, he says, he never made any misrepresentation at all . . . Noy, I quite think that upon an application to discharge such an order as was made in this case, an affidavit may be made for the purpose of showing that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order . . ."

LUSH, L.J., said (ibid., 250):

"The defendant is allowed to show that no cause of action did accrue within the jurisdiction. That is what the defendant proposes to do here, and that has been the established practice."

After dealing with the allegations in the affidavits, LUSH, L.J., continued (ibid.):

"It therefore stands admitted on the affidavit in reply that the defendant did not make a representation to the plaintiff, that he did not make it by letter, and that he did not make it by agency at all. The defendant has clearly shown to my mind that a cause of action, as far as he is concerned, did not occur within the jurisdiction. That is the question we have to decide, and upon that I entertain no doubt."

Apart from some remarks of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in his judgment in Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (2), there was not brought to our notice any reported case during the sixty-six years that have passed since R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, appeared in its present form to suggest that there was such a different standard of proof as SLADE, J., has required. In every case to which we were referred, the concluding words of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, appear to have been treated as of general application when the court considered whether the case was one in which leave to serve out of the jurisdiction should be given. The proper interpretation of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, was considered by the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3). In that case FIELD, J., in chambers, had given the plaintiff leave to serve a writ on the defendant, who was a foreigner, residing out of the jurisdiction, claiming a balance in respect of the price of goods supplied. The defendant duly applied to DAY, J., in chambers to rescind or vary the order of FIELD, J., and to set aside the subsequent proceedings thereon. The matter in dispute on the affidavits was whether the price for the goods was, by the terms of the sale, made payable in this country or abroad. DAY, J., refused to set aside the service of the writ, but ordered that the plaintiff's claim in the action should be limited to the recovery of the price of goods in respect of which it might appear at the trial that a writ could have been properly served out of the jurisdiction. On appeal to the Divisional Court, composed of FIELD, J., and BUTT, J., the plaintiff argued that DAY, J., ought not to have imposed this limitation on the claim. In his judgment FIELD, J., said (17 Q.B.D. 594):

"Upon the affidavits before me when I made the order for service out of the jurisdiction I was satisfied that the breach of contract . . . was within the jurisdiction as required by the rule, and consequently I made the order. The defendant subsequently applied on affidavit to set aside that order . . . It was competent to the judge . . . to set aside the order . . . if not satisfied that the breach of contract arose within the jurisdiction. He did not, however, take that course, but not being altogether satisfied as to whether the breach . . . arose within the jurisdiction or not he imposed [the limitation on the claim]."

FIELD, J., decided that in general it was not right, as a matter of principle, to impose such a limitation, because it postponed until the trial a preliminary question of procedure which ought properly to be determined at the outset of the litigation. He was, therefore, in favour of allowing the appeal. The appeal was allowed, but on appeal to the Court of Appeal the decision of the Divisional Court was reversed. LORD ESHER, M.R., said (ibid., 595):

"In such a case ... a judge ... is not bound to make the order for service ... out of the jurisdiction. He has a discretion whether, under all the circumstances, he will make it or not ... Orders similar to that in question here ... have only been made where the judge is left in doubt."

LORD ESHER, M.R., concluded his judgment by saying (ibid., 596):

"I think that DAY, J., was right in entertaining doubt whether on the affidavits any breach of the contract was shown to have taken place in England, and having that doubt I think that it was competent to him to make the order he did make, and that it should be restored."

BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid.) that he thought that DAY, J., was justified in entertaining great doubt whether any breach of the contract was shown to have occurred in England, and, after reading the affidavits and hearing the arguments, he himself entertained the same doubt. He went on to say that it was a matter for the discretion of the judge whether he should allow service out of the jurisdiction, and that what DAY, J., had done was a very natural and simple mode of exercising the discretion. FRY, L.J., agreed. If this decision of the Court of Appeal still stands, it seems to me that it shows clearly that SLADE, J., was not bound to refuse leave unless he was satisfied, and that he was in error when he said that he must be satisfied, that there was an obligation to pay only within the jurisdiction before he could give leave for the writ to issue.

The interpretation of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, was also considered in 1904 in Chemische Fabrik vormals Sandoz v. Badische Anilin und Soda Fabriks (4). The plaintiffs, a German company, owned letters patent for the United Kingdom relating to the manufacture of aniline dyes. The defendants were manufacturers of aniline dyes at Basle, in Switzerland, and had agents permanently resident in England. The plaintiffs asserted that the defendants in selling some of their aniline dyes in England had infringed the patent rights of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs obtained an order giving leave to serve on the defendants notice of a writ to restrain them from this infringement. The defendants then applied to the court to discharge the order on the ground that they had not infringed the plaintiff's patent by sales of their dyes in England. JOYCE, J., refused to discharge the order, and his decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. COLLINS, M.R., in his judgment, said (88 L.T. 494):

"Now, it does not appear to me that in conferring this jurisdiction—which I agree is an important one and one to be carefully exercised—the legislature has imposed on the courts the duty of trying the case before they allow the plaintiff to put it in suit. That would be going much too far in favour of persons outside the jurisdiction. The legislature has thought fit to allow persons outside the jurisdiction to be brought into it under certain conditions. It has fenced them round with a good many conditions which have to be fulfilled in order to allow them to be brought within the jurisdiction. But if prima facie evidence by persons against whom nothing can be urged touching their veracity of information and belief is brought to show that these conditions have been fulfilled, and that there has been that special breach within the jurisdiction which lets in the jurisdiction of the court over foreigners, then it seems to me that the court is not called upon there and then to try that case. It has the right to, and it is necessary that it should, see what the other side have got to say about the matter. But when that has been said, and there is an apparent conflict of fact raised, it seems to me that it is not [the] function of the court there and then to decide upon the issue of fact. If the court has got before it a prima facie case which is not completely displaced by the evidence on the other side, then it seems to me that the plaintiff has not lost his right to have that case tried."

In the House of Lords LORD DAVEY, after stating that the case was alleged to come under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (f), said (90 L.T. 735):

- A "Rule 4 of the same Order [R.S.C., Ord. 11] prescribes that the application is to be supported by evidence stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action, and no such leave is to be granted unless it be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order. This does not, of course, mean that a mere statement by any deponent who is put forward to make the affidavit that he believes that there is a good cause of action is sufficient. On the other hand, the court is not, on an application for leave to serve out of the jurisdiction . . . called upon to try the action or express a premature opinion on its merits . . . The words at the end of the Order do not, I think, mean more than that the court is to be satisfied that the case comes within the class of cases in which service abroad may be made under r. 1 of the Order."
- B
- C There is nothing in these general statements of principle to indicate that the words at the end of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, should have a different interpretation, when applied to the question whether the wrong complained of has been committed, from the interpretation to be given to them when the question is whether the wrong has been committed within the jurisdiction. It may be said that in the case which I have just cited the question was whether any
- D infringement of the patent had taken place, as to which prima facie proof was sufficient, and that the court did not deal with the point that it must be satisfied that the infringement took place within the jurisdiction, because that point was not in dispute. But it seems strange to me that no such suggestion was mentioned in any of the judgments, if, in fact, such a difference in the standard of proof was there recognised.
- E In the most recent case in the House of Lords Tyne Improvement Comrs. v. Armement Anversoils S.A., The Brabo (5), the question which the court had to consider was whether an action had been "properly brought" against a party within the jurisdiction. It will be noted that the words "properly brought" bear a marked similarity to the words at the end of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4: "the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction." The House of Lords
- F decided that the action was not "properly brought" because there was no dispute about the facts, and on those facts the law was clear that the defendants sued within the jurisdiction were not liable. It is clear from the speech of LORD PORTER that, if the alleged liability of the defendants within the jurisdiction had depended on disputed facts, he would have regarded it as an action "properly brought" within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g). If, then, an action may be "properly
- G brought" although the material facts are in dispute, I do not see why the case should not be "a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction," if there is a prima facie case made out by the plaintiff that the admitted breach of contract is a breach of a term which ought to have been performed within the jurisdiction, although the truth of the facts alleged by the plaintiff is disputed. On the principle adopted by SLADE, J., an odd legal position would have arisen in
- H The Brabo (5) if it had appeared from the affidavits that there was a serious issue of fact whether the defendants sued within the jurisdiction were liable or not. The judge would then, presumably, have been faced with this position: "I think the case is properly brought against the defendants here, although the material facts are in dispute, but, on the other hand, I am not satisfied that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction, because the same material facts, on which the defendants within the jurisdiction are being sued, are in dispute." Although R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, was discussed during the course of the argument in The Brabo (5) before the House of Lords, and is the basis of the speech of LORD MACDERMOTT, it nowhere appears in any of the speeches that r. 4 raised a different standard of proof as regards jurisdiction, such as SLADE, J., has accepted in this case.

I must now consider Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (2). The facts in that case were somewhat similar to the facts in the present case. Malik, a Czechoslovak subject, came to England, and then sought leave to issue a writ claiming damages for breach of contract against the defendant bank in Czechoslovakia to pay him his salary in England. But there was one vital difference between Malik's case (2) and the present case. In Malik's case (2) there was no allegation of any contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants that the defendants should pay the sums claimed under the contract to the plaintiff in England. This is quite clear from the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., when he said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 665) that there was no vestige of a case for saying that there was any trace of a contract by the defendants to pay the plaintiff his salary in London, and, in those circumstances, the failure to pay him in London was no breach of the contract sued on. MORTON, L.J., in his judgment, said (ibid., 667) that he agreed that the notice of writ should not issue because it was not shown that a breach of contract had been committed within the jurisdiction. TUCKER, L.J., said that it was clear that under the subsisting contract the obligation was to pay the plaintiff in the currency of his own country, and that payment was to be made there. He said (ibid.):

"... the original contract remains the operative contract, and under it it is clear that payment had to be made in Czechoslovakia."

It is clear, therefore, that, whatever the standard of proof required by the law that a breach had been committed of a contract to pay in England, the proof failed for the simple reason that there was no proof at all. In the course of his judgment LORD GODDARD, C.J., made some remarks on the standard of proof required in cases such as this, which were adopted by SLADE, J., in his judgment. LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 664):

"... I cannot accede to ... the argument ... that the question whether there is a breach, and the question whether it is committed within the jurisdiction, stand exactly on the same footing. The court in these cases must approach the matter on the footing of the assumption that there has been a breach, and then they have to consider whether or not the breach has been committed within the jurisdiction because it is only if the breach has been committed within the jurisdiction that this court can allow the writ to be served out of the jurisdiction."

After referring to Hemelryck v. William Lyall Shipbuilding Co. (6) LORD GODDARD, C.J., continued ([1946] 2 All E.R. 665):

"No doubt, when the court is considering whether it will give leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction the court wants to see that there is, at least, an arguable case. If it can see, by what appears on the affidavits, that the case put up is a groundless or frivolous one, the court can refuse to give leave because it can say: Whether you allege a breach within the jurisdiction or not, you are putting up a case which on the face of it is groundless and we are not going to allow notice of a writ to be served, wherever the breach took place. On the other hand, the court, having looked at the affidavits, could say that there were disclosed on the affidavits facts which, if they were proved at the trial, would show that there had been a contract and breach of the contract. The action has to be in respect of the breach of contract. The court on this application is not going to inquire whether the case is one in which the plaintiff must necessarily succeed, but, if they see on the face of the proceedings that it is a groundless action, no doubt, they will not allow an order to go for service out of the jurisdiction. As a general rule, the court will approach the case on the footing that the plaintiff has got a case which can be properly put before the court and argued, and one in which, if the court finds in accordance with the facts alleged by him, the result would probably be judgment for him. When, however, it comes to the question whether a breach has been committed within the jurisdiction, that is another and very different proposition . . . r. 4 of Ord. 11 expressly says that: ' . . . no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this Order.' Therefore, the court has to be satisfied on the affidavits that the action is brought in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction."

H

If these remarks of LORD GODDARD, C.J., have the meaning attributed to them by SLADE, J., which I doubt, I think they were obiter in that they were not necessary for the decision of the court. As I have already said, however low the standard of proof required, the plaintiff failed to reach it, because he produced no evidence at all of a contract to pay him in England. If they were not obiter, I think that they lay down a rule of construction of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, which is inconsistent with the decisions to which I have referred.

I, therefore, do not think that this court is bound to accept the view put forward by SLADE, J., that there is a special standard of proof required which must satisfy him that there has been a breach of contract within the jurisdiction, before he will allow service of the writ outside the jurisdiction. Where the facts are disputed or open to criticism, it seems to me that such satisfaction can only be reached by trial and determination of those facts. I think that the concluding words of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, applicable as they are to all the instances of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, only require that in each case and on every material part of it the court must not act merely on vague statements, such as statements based on information and belief, or on statements which are obviously untrue, or, as contended in The Brabo (5), on statements that the law as to the liability of the party sued here is difficult and complicated, and that the matter had better be left to be decided by the trial judge. Having regard to the general principles laid down in The Hagen (7), that will not suffice. In each case the plaintiff must, as I think, make out a prima facie case, and, if that case is based on facts which are put in issue, nevertheless leave should be given.

For these reasons, I think that SLADE, J., was wrong in refusing leave on the ground that he was not satisfied that there was any express term of the agreement about payment of the pension in London, and that he misdirected himself in the exercise of the discretion vested in him. I also think that the judge was wrong when he said:

"Still less am I satisfied that, if there were any such manifestation of intention, it was a contractual obligation to pay and to pay only in this country."

The verbal contract, as alleged in the plaintiff's affidavit, was that he should receive payment of his pension in the country in which he might be living at the time it accrued. In 1938 the defendants knew that the plaintiff was living in England. On Nov. 11, 1938, they sent him, at the Cumberland Hotel in London, a credit note in respect of his pension for the period from August to November, 1938, and in February, 1939, they wrote to the plaintiff at 93, Redington Road, Hampstead, a house which the plaintiff had bought as his residence and which he still owns. The defendants have also exhibited in their affidavits letters written by the plaintiff to the defendants in April, May, July and August, 1939, all from the same address, 93, Redington Road, Hampstead. If the verbal agreement as regards payment of his pension was made, as alleged by the plaintiff, I think that the agreement must be taken as an agreement to pay in London, if the plaintiff was living in London to the knowledge of the defendants. For these reasons, I think that leave should be given to the plaintiff to serve notice of his writ in respect of his claim for breach of contract to pay his pension. This will involve a trial in London, and the attendance of such witnesses as the defendants see fit to send to London to contest the plaintiff's claim.

As regards the claim under the service contract, I do not think that the plaintiff has made out a clear prima facie agreement that there has been a breach of that contract for payments in London, but I would give leave to serve notice of the writ, which includes his claim in respect of the alleged breach of the service agreement, but would limit the leave by including words such as:

"... with regard to the claim under the service agreement, leave is limited to the extent that the plaintiff undertakes that, if it appears that his claim under the service agreement was not payable within the jurisdiction, he is not to obtain judgment on that head of claim."

As regards the question of forum conveniens, I think that it will be much easier for the defendants to get their witnesses here than it will be for the plaintiff to go there to attend the trial of his claim. There are good reasons for this view, which are set out in the documents filed on behalf of the plaintiff. To quote the words of MORTON, L.J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 667) in Malik's case (2): "... there were strong grounds of justice for allowing the plaintiff to bring his action here." I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

SINGLETON, L.J.: On May 15, 1946, the plaintiff obtained leave to serve the defendants (a company incorporated according to the laws of Czechoslovakia) with notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. The defendants entered a conditional appearance and moved to set aside service of the writ and all subsequent proceedings. They succeeded before the master, and the order of the master was upheld by SLADE, J. The plaintiff appeals to this court and contends that the case falls within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and r. 4, and that he ought to be allowed to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction. By the writ the plaintiff claims sums of money said to be due (a) under a pension agreement, and (b) as salary under a service agreement. He also claims damages for breach of contract. His case, put shortly, is that both pension and salary were, in the events which happened, payable to him in London, and that non-payment was a breach of contract and that the breach (or breaches) took place within the jurisdiction of the court, namely, in London. In support of the original application, the plaintiff filed two affidavits, one sworn by himself on Apr. 17, 1946, and one by Dr. Bobasch, a Czech lawyer. The defendants have filed a number of affidavits, and further affidavits have been filed by or on behalf of the plaintiff. I do not propose to go into these in detail. It is, however, necessary to consider carefully the circumstances in which it is claimed that payments had to be made to the plaintiff in London.

The plaintiff held high office with the defendants, whose undertaking is now nationalised. In 1929 the question of his pension was discussed, and ultimately the defendants wrote him a letter, dated Jan. 18, 1929, on which the plaintiff relies. The concluding paragraph of this letter is:

"Should the value of the Czech crown be reduced by more than ten per cent. of its present gold value, the difference in value will be made good to you and/or your successors in the particular case."

In September, 1936, the plaintiff gave notice of his intention to retire by Dec. 31, 1937, and, as he deposes, to leave Czechoslovakia. He says that he was asked by Dr. Fuchs and Mr. Keesing to stay on for a period, and that in January, 1938, he informed Dr. Fuchs (who appears to have done the negotiating on behalf of the defendants) that he intended to go to America. Dr. Fuchs told him that the defendants were anxious that after his retirement his services should be available to them in Europe, and asked whether he would enter into an agreement with the defendants under which it would be necessary for him to reside in Zurich, Paris or London. The plaintiff ultimately agreed, and the letter of Mar. 25, 1938, was written to him. Under this he was to be consultant in the defendant's re-organisation, and was to be available to the defendants' combine for a period of thirty days during each year. He was to be paid an annual fee of £2,000 sterling. The plaintiff retired in or about March, 1938, and he became entitled to a pension of 120,000 Czech crowns (increased to 171,408 through the fall in gold value of the Czech crown), and, as from May 1, 1938, he was entitled to salary as consultant. He went to Zurich for a short time but soon came to England and bought, and lived in, a house, No. 93 Redington Road, Hampstead. Czechoslovakia was occupied by the Germans in March, 1939, and war broke out on Sept. 3, 1939. After the outbreak of war he acquired a place in Scotland for his family and took a flat in London for himself. His Hampstead house was requisitioned. At the time of his retirement he had an account, or accounts, with the defendants on which he owed them money as the result of his having borrowed from them in order to build a house, and amounts which became due to him were credited by the defendants to his account or accounts, so that payments of pension or salary were not made to him direct either in Zurich or in London. His indebtedness to the defendants was cleared off, he says, in 1940, though it may have been a little later.

In his original affidavit of Apr. 17, 1946, the plaintiff relied on the letters of Jan. 18, 1929, and Mar. 25, 1938, and he was supported by an affidavit of Dr. Bobasch, who referred to art. 905 of the Czechoslovakian General Civil Code (which provides that, in case of doubt as to place of payment, the debtor has to transmit the money owed by him to the creditor at the latter's residence), and who said that, if the facts deposed to in the plaintiff's affidavit were correctly stated, it was the duty of the defendants, according to Czech law, to pay in England, and that failure to do so constituted a breach of contract according to the law of that country. The position has changed in some degree. To one of the defendants' affidavits there is exhibited a letter of Nov. 23, 1938. That letter was written by the plaintiff in the course of a dispute in regard to the correct manner of calculation of his pension, and it contains the following passage (as translated):

"The gold clause was requested with the express argumentation that I am going to oversea and that the matter was for me to receive the full gold value in case that nominal value of the Kc. [Czechoslovak crown] stated by law deviate from the effective rate of exchange as per international rate of exchange."

The plaintiff had not kept a copy of this letter. In his second affidavit, sworn on June 9, 1948, he says that, when he saw this letter, it brought to his mind details of a conversation he had with Dr. Sonnenschein, the defendants' general manager, in January, 1929, and of the agreement at which they arrived which resulted in the letter of Jan. 18, 1929. Paragraph 3 of the plaintiff's second affidavit is in these terms:

"When I negotiated the pension agreement of Jan. 18, 1929, with the defendants I stated that I intended to enjoy my pension abroad, although I did not then know in which country, and it was expressly agreed by Dr. A. Sonnenschein, who was the general manager of the defendants and was acting on their behalf, that I should receive payment of my pension in the country in which I might be living at the time it accrued. It was for this reason that at my request the clause providing for the payment of the full gold value was inserted in the said agreement, in order to protect me while living abroad against any possible devaluation of the Czech currency. This was stated by me in my letter of Nov. 23, 1938, contained in exhibit A to the said affidavit of Hofirek, which was written at a time when the defendants were controlled and managed by persons who had knowledge of the agreement reached and it was not disputed by the defendants in their letter in reply, which is the letter dated Feb. 17, 1939, in exhibit 'E.K.1' to my said former affidavit. It was only when I saw the said letter dated Nov. 23, 1938, that I remembered the said agreement with Dr. Sonnenschein. In addition the heading of my pension account, as set out in para. 5 of the said affidavit of Hofirek, confirms the agreement to this effect for it contains the words 'Ausl. Kc.' which means 'foreign Czech crowns.' I am familiar with the practice of bookkeepers and accountants in Czechoslovakia and I say that according to the universal practice in that country those words are used to indicate accounts payment of which is to be made abroad."

This is of great importance. It is not easy for the defendants to refute it now, for Dr. Sonnenschein died on Sept. 26, 1939. Still, they could have communicated with him in regard to the letter of Nov. 23, 1938—we do not know whether they did so or not, but the letter raised questions on which it would have been a natural thing for them to do. The main question for consideration seems to me to be whether the court ought to accept the plaintiff's account of that which took place between him and Dr. Sonnenschein and, in particular, of the statement

" . . . it was expressly agreed by Dr. A. Sonnenschein, who was the general manager of the defendants and was acting on their behalf, that I should receive payment of my pension in the country in which I might be living at the time it accrued. It was for this reason that at my request the clause providing for the payment of the full gold value was inserted . . . "

Speaking for myself, I think it is the most natural thing in the world that sight of his letter of Nov. 23, 1938, should bring to the mind of the plaintiff the circumstances in which he wrote it, and how and why he put into it the words:

"The gold clause was requested with the express argumentation that I am going to oversea . . . "

It seems to me to bear out the conversation which he says he had with Dr. Sonnenschein in 1929. In this respect I find myself differing from SLADE, J., who stated in his judgment that he was not satisfied " . . . that there was any express term of the agreement or any manifestation of intention which ought, according to Czech law, to be treated as though it were part of the agreement."

I assume that this means that the learned judge did not accept para. 3 of the second affidavit sworn by the plaintiff. I take the view that there is no reason why the court should not accept it. Indeed, I think we ought to accept it. It does not appear to me to be the weaker, or less likely to be true, because it appears for the first time in the second affidavit of the plaintiff. No question of failure to make full disclosure arises. No one can be expected to remember accurately the details of a conversation, or the precise terms of an agreement, made ten or twenty years earlier, and the production of a document such as the letter of Nov. 23, 1938, may well lead to a much more complete account. It may, of course, give rise to a false account, but there is nothing to lead me to the view that it has done so in this case. It was open to the defendants, if there was doubt as to the plaintiff's veracity, to apply that he should attend for cross-examination on his affidavit, but no such application was made.

The plaintiff's evidence is assisted (a) by the gold clause in the letter of Jan. 18, 1929, (b) by the fact that he was to be paid in sterling under the consultant agreement of March, 1938, and (c) to a less degree by the fact that the pension account in the defendants' records is marked "Ausl. Kc." If one accepts the plaintiff's account of his conversation with Dr. Sonnenschein and his uncontradicted account of his conversations with Dr. Fuchs and Mr. Keesing, it is clear that the defendants knew of his intention to live abroad—indeed, in regard to the consultant agreement they wished him to live in one of three named places in Europe. In his second affidavit Dr. Bobasch sets out art. 914 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code. Paragraph 3 of that affidavit is:

"In Czech law the intentions of the parties at the time of contracting and the agreements then made by them form part of the contract and are enforceable as such even though they are not expressly included in the written document which may be drawn up subsequently as a record of the contract. This is considered to be a matter of interpretation in accordance with art. 914 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code, which provides: 'In the interpretation of contracts one should not adhere to the literal meaning of expressions, but should examine the intention of the parties and interpret the contract in a manner consistent with fair dealing.' It follows from this principle that, if at the time the plaintiff's pension agreement was made the parties contemplated that he would live abroad when he drew the pension and intended that it should be paid to him where he might live, it would be so payable. The defendants would therefore be in breach of contract if they failed to pay him his pension at his place of residence and in accordance with the rates of exchange prevailing there."

I do not find that Dr. Bobasch's statement of the law in this respect is in dispute.

Counsel for the plaintiff put his case on the pension claim as depending on a verbal agreement of which the letter of Jan. 18, 1929, was evidence in support. Accepting, as I do, the plaintiff's sworn testimony, I consider that the intention of the parties in 1929 was that the pension should be paid abroad at the place at which the plaintiff should be living and that according to Czech law there was an agreement to that effect. That agreement was certainly not weakened by the 1938 agreement, rather otherwise. At that time the defendants wished the plaintiff to live either in Zurich, Paris or London, and they agreed to pay him his remuneration quarterly in sterling. Again, applying art. 914 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code, I think that there was agreement to pay him at the one of those three places at which he should be residing—and since 1938 that place has been London and the defendants have had his address.

Having regard to the view I have expressed, it is not necessary for me to deal with the arguments addressed to the court on art. 905 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code. Mr. Pelc, a Czech lawyer, who swore two affidavits on behalf of the defendants, raises a point to the effect that an agreement to oust the application of art. 905 could be constituted by the crediting of the payments to the plaintiff's account in Czechoslovakia without objection by him. I doubt whether the crediting of amounts over a short period during which the plaintiff was indebted to the defendants could have any such effect. In any event, such a course of action could not avoid the agreement to pay abroad (or in London) which, in my view, was the true position.

I respectfully agree with SLADE, J., in his statement of the law. There are two entirely separate questions for consideration. In the first place, it is for the plaintiff to show that he has a case fit and proper to be tried with a reasonable chance of success. It is not for the court on this application to try the case or to be sure that the plaintiff will succeed on his claim. I refer to the speech of LORD PORTER ([1949] 1 All E.R. 298, 299) in Tyne Improve- ment Comrs. v. Armement Anversois S.A., The Brabo (5). LORD PORTER'S view is summarised at the end of the headnote ([1949] A.C. 327) in these words:

"... though leave should be given when a substantial question of fact is in issue and possibly also when there is an exceptionally difficult and doubtful point of law."

I do not propose to go into this part of the case further than to say that it is clear that there are substantial questions of fact in issue on which the plaintiff may well succeed, and that involved questions in regard to the law of Czechoslovakia arise. Prima facie, the plaintiff is entitled to payment of the pension, and it would appear that there is money due on the consultant's agreement even though it was put an end to by the outbreak of war. Secondly, it is for the plaintiff to show that the breach of contract, if there was one, took place within the jurisdiction. It is only on this application that this point falls to be decided, and, unless the plaintiff can show it to the satisfaction of the court, under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, he ought not to be given leave to serve his writ out of the jurisdiction in a case under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e). Something arising within the jurisdiction—in this case the breach—is essential to the plaintiff's application.

In Malik's case (2) the facts were quite different from those of the case now before the court and leave was refused. LORD GODDARD, C.J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 665):

"Therefore, the court has to be satisfied on the affidavits that the action is brought in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction."

Later in his judgment he said (ibid. 666):

"Certainly, since I have known anything about the practice the court has always asked itself the single question: Is it shown clearly on the affidavits that the breach occurred within the jurisdiction or is it not so shown? If it is shown that the breach occurred within the jurisdiction, leave can be given. If it is not so shown, as I have always understood it, leave cannot be given."

MORTON, L.J., said (ibid. 667):

"I agree that this appeal should be dismissed because it is not shown that a breach of contract has been committed within the jurisdiction. That being so, this court has no discretion to allow service of notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction."

These expressions of opinion are in complete accord with the view of the House of Lords in Comber v. Leyland (8), and of the Privy Council in Hemeltryck v. William Lyall Shipbuilding Co. (6), per LORD BUCKMASTER ([1921] 1 A.C. 701).

Let me add this. I take the view that the plaintiff has shown that a breach, or breaches, of contract took place within the jurisdiction. I do not disguise from myself that it may be extraordinarily difficult in some cases to be certain of this on evidence given by affidavits. A different complexion might be put on the matter when witnesses are heard and when they are cross-examined. I do not think that that ought to stand in the way of leave being given in a case such as this, if it is felt that there is no sound reason shown for disbelieving that to which the plaintiff has deposed, especially so when no application to cross-examine him has been made. Though, for the reasons I have given, I think that leave ought to be given unconditionally, I am not unmindful of the fact that the course suggested by BUCKNILL, L.J., of giving conditional leave—a course which was approved by this court in 1886 in Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3)—is one which would preserve the defendants' rights completely and would at the same time enable the plaintiff to have his claim heard. I do not think that in any event that course would result in hardship to the defendants, scattered as the witnesses appear to be.

A I take a different view of the facts from that which SLADE, J., took. It is essential to make up one's mind whether one accepts the statement of the plaintiff. If one does—as I do—effect must be given to it. The only real criticism which I venture to make of the judgment of the learned judge arises from his rejection of, or his passing over, that part of the plaintiff's second affidavit which deals with the conversation and oral agreement said to have been made with Dr. Sonnenschein, and in his failure to apply that along with the written documents, in accordance with art. 914 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code. It may be said that this is largely a matter of discretion, though I look on it rather as failure to give due, or any, weight to the uncontradicted evidence of a witness against whose honour, so far as I know, no one can say one word. The same applies in a less degree to the conversations with Dr. Fuchs and Mr. Keesing.

B On the question of forum conveniens and the general discretion of the court, I hold the view that on the evidence the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction. That was the view which MORTON, L.J., formed in Malik's case (2). I consider that the facts in the present case point even more strongly to this as being the right course. In my opinion, the plaintiff brings himself within the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 11, and I would allow the appeal.

C DENNING, L.J. (read by SINGLETON, L.J.): The first question in this case raises a nice problem in the doctrine of precedent. Is this court bound to accept the test laid down by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (2), or is what he said merely obiter dictum? In my opinion, the test was part of the ratio decidendi. The court was there faced with two rival tests and chose one of them, which it then applied to the facts, and reached a certain conclusion. The selection of the right test was, therefore, one of the links in the chain of reasoning, and I do not think it would be right for us to dismiss it as mere obiter dictum, i.e., as a statement made merely by the way: see per TALBOT, J. ([1934] 2 K.B. 154) in Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron and Coal Co. (9). It is said that, if the court had chosen the other test, they would still have come to the same conclusion. I am not so sure of that, because I have not seen the evidence which was before them, but, even if they would have done, it does not mean that their test is of no authority. It may not be absolutely binding on us, but we ought to follow it unless there are strong reasons for not doing so. One such strong reason would be any comments or reasoning by the House of Lords tending to throw doubt on it. It was, indeed, suggested to us that the House of Lords in The Brabo (5) had laid down a different test, and, if the headnote ([1949] A.C. 327) were correct, it would look as if LORD PORTER had done so. But, when his speech is read carefully, it becomes clear that his remarks were confined to the question when an action could be said to be "properly brought" within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and have no application to R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

G Another strong reason would arise if it could be demonstrated that the test laid down in Malik's case (2) was wrong, but I do not think that that has been demonstrated. That case was concerned, as this case is also, with a contract made by foreigners in a foreign country and governed by the law of that foreign country, and one of the parties to it now seeks to compel the other to come to this country to litigate it against his wish. As matter of high policy, I do not think that in such a case these courts should lend their aid to this course unless they are satisfied that they have jurisdiction to do so. Even if we disapprove of the way that justice is administered in the foreign country, that is no justification for our usurping a jurisdiction which does not properly belong to us. The only possible ground that is put forward for saying that this court has jurisdiction is that it is said that the contracts were to be performed in this country and were broken here. If the written contracts had contained a term requiring performance here, that would be a safe ground on which to act. But when the written contracts are examined, it is seen that in this case, as in Malik's case (2), there is no term in either contract requiring it to be performed here. Resort is, therefore, had to implications and inferences and oral conversations. This is not very promising material with which to build a safe foundation for an extended jurisdiction, and I should not myself think that the case is a "proper one for service out of the jurisdiction" within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, unless I was satisfied that the foundation was safe. At any rate, that was the view of this court in Malik's case (2), and I am certainly not prepared to say that they were wrong. In my opinion, therefore, in cases such as Malik's case (2) and the present case, this court should accept and apply the test laid down by LORD GODDARD, C.J. A

The next question is whether there is sufficient material to satisfy the court that the contract was to be performed here. It is said that the moneys due under the pension agreement and the service agreement were payable to the plaintiff at the place where he was living, and, as he was living here, they were payable here. On the point much reliance was placed on the law of Czechoslovakia, but on the evidence I agree with TUCKER, L.J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 667) in Malik's case (2) that it is very similar to English law on the subject. If there is no stipulation as to the place of payment, it is in general, there as here, the duty of the debtor to seek out the creditor at whatever place he happens to be. In English law, however, that is subject to the qualification that, if the contract is an English one, and the creditor was within the realm when it was made, then the debtor is not in general bound to follow him to a foreign country to pay him: see Fessard v. Mugnier (10) per ERLE, C.J. (18 C.B.N.S. 305). The debtor would, no doubt, satisfy his obligation by holding the amount here in readiness for the creditor's return, or by placing it to his credit here, or by remitting it on request to the foreign address of the creditor, at the creditor's risk and expense. If he failed to do any of these things, the breach would be committed in this country and not abroad, because the duty is not to pay abroad, but to pay here or to remit from here. As I read the evidence, there is nothing in the General Civil Code of Czechoslovakia which deals expressly with the position where the creditor, after making the contract in Czechoslovakia, goes abroad; but art. 905 of the Code does say that, if the creditor changes his residence, the debtor is to remit the money to the new residence at the creditor's risk and expense. That looks as if, even if the creditor goes to a new residence in Czechoslovakia, the debtor is not bound to follow the creditor to the new residence but only bound to remit to him there. The evidence is that the same rule applies where the creditor goes abroad, so that it looks as if the debtor is not bound to follow the creditor abroad but only to remit to him there. Moreover, art. 1425 of the Code says that, if a debt cannot be paid because the creditor is absent, the debtor can get a good discharge by depositing the money in court. These provisions show, to my mind, that the debtor is not bound to follow the creditor abroad. At any rate, I see no evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption that the law of Czechoslovakia is the same as English law on the point. B C D E F G

Nor do I think that the plaintiff derives any assistance from the presence of the gold clause in the pensions agreement or the fact that after 1938 his account was kept in Ausland Kronen or that the 1938 service agreement provided for payment in sterling. Those features certainly show that he wanted to safeguard himself from depreciation of the Czechoslovakian currency. They also support his story that he intended to live abroad and told the company of his intention. But they do not show that the company agreed to follow him to a foreign country to pay him. All those features are quite consistent with the view that the duty of the company was to remit from Czechoslovakia to him abroad. Their duty was done in Czechoslovakia, when they posted the money to him, or otherwise remitted it to him. Thereafter it was at his risk and expense. If they were bound to pay him in England, or any other country H where he happened to be, it would mean that they would have to see that the money actually reached him abroad, which would mean that whilst in transit it would be at their own risk and expense, but art. 905 of their Code shows that that is not their law. This distinction—between paying in another country and remitting to that other country—has frequently been recognised and forms the basis of the decision in Comber v. Leyland (8), and St. Pierre v. South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd. and Chilean Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd. (11). I am confirmed in this view by the practice of the parties. It is quite plain that never in the course of these agreements did the company follow him abroad to pay him. They credited his account in Czechoslovakia and made remittances from that account in accordance with his instructions. It is most significant that in 1939, when they stopped payment under the service agreement, his only complaint was that they had not placed the amounts to his credit in Czechoslovakia: see his letters from April to August, 1939. The whole course of conduct of the parties shows, to my mind, that the obligation of the company was to credit him in Czechoslovakia and to remit from there—quite the reverse of the position in Rein v. Stein (12). The plaintiff sought to overcome this difficulty by saying that he was indebted to the company on contra-account and that the credits were made in Czechoslovakia in order to discharge the contra-account. That explanation, however, will not work, because the accounts and letters show that the credits were used not merely to discharge the contra-account, but also to make remittances from Czechoslovakia to relatives and others in Czechoslovakia and abroad.

All these points failing, therefore, the plaintiff relies on an oral agreement that he should receive payment of his pension in the country in which he might be living at the time that it accrued. This is, as SINGLETON, L.J., has said, the main point for consideration. I cannot regard it as a safe foundation for an extended jurisdiction for these reasons. (i) It was not mentioned in the writ or in the affidavit on which the application was based. It is an indulgence, therefore, to allow him to set it up at all: see Bremer Oeltransport G.m.b.H. v. Drewry (13), per SLESSER, L.J. ([1933] 1 K.B. 765). (ii) It is impossible to suppose that the plaintiff can have any accurate recollection about it, for, even according to him, it was made twenty years ago in the course of a conversation with a man who is now dead and unable to contradict the plaintiff's account of it. He has no memorandum of it and he admitted that in April, 1946, when he brought this action, he had forgotten its existence. He remembered it later in the action after May, 1947, i.e., after Malik's case (2) had been decided, and when it was very much in his interest to find, if he could, a firm contract to pay him here. (iii) According to English law, the alleged oral agreement would be inadmissible in evidence. The plaintiff says that it was made in the course of the negotiations before the terms were set down in writing. The company's letter of Jan. 18, 1929, by the very wording of it, shows that that letter was intended to record in writing that which had been agreed. It says that:

“ . . . the agreements hitherto in force are annulled and the following covenants shall apply in place and stead thereof.”

It was, I should have thought, plainly a written contract: see L'Estrange v. F. Graucob, Ltd. (14); and, accordingly, in English law no evidence of prior negotiations would be admissible to add to it or to vary it. This is no technical rule. It is based on sound sense, because when people, after preliminary negotiations, set down their agreement in writing, they record those terms by which they intend to be bound and put aside the rest. The writing is the grand criterion of what terms were intended to be contractual and what were not. This applies with especial force in this case because the previous oral agreement is said to have been made in the course of negotiations between the plaintiff, who was the managing director of the company, and Mr. Sonnenschein, who was the general manager. Can anyone suppose that this oral agreement was put before the board of management of the company? The letter presumably was put before the board, because it contained the contractual terms, but it is very unlikely that the oral conversations were put before the board. There was, and is, no record of them, and I cannot believe that they contained any contractual terms. (iv) If I am right in thinking that in English law no evidence of this oral agreement can be admitted, it means that it cannot be admitted at the trial of this action, if it is allowed to proceed. The rule of our law which says that documents are exclusive evidence of the transaction which they embody is a rule of evidence, and, as such, it is to be applied by our courts even when they deal with foreign contracts, because, by private international law, the court of trial applies its own rules of evidence, just as it applies its own mode of trial: see Yates v. Thomson (15), Bain v. Whitehaven and Furness Ry. Co. (16), and Leroux v. Brown (17). In contrast, I must point out that our rules for the interpretation of contracts—by which we usually exclude oral evidence, except to explain technical terms—are not, strictly speaking, rules of evidence at all—because they deal with construction and not proof. The distinction is well pointed out in STEPHEN'S DIGEST OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE, in the notes to arts. 97 and 98 (notes xiv and xv). When it comes, therefore, to the interpretation of a foreign contract, our courts apply the foreign law, and, if by the foreign law—as by art. 914 of the Czechoslovak Civil Code—oral evidence is admissible to interpret the document, it will be admitted here: see St. Pierre's case (11). The present case, however, is one, not of interpretation, but of adding a term to a written contract, and our rules of evidence apply so as to prevent that addition. (v) Even if the oral evidence is admitted, I am not satisfied that there was any agreement which required the company to follow the plaintiff into whatever country he may be living. Much would depend on the precise words used. It would need very strong words to put on the company an obligation, not only to remit from Czechoslovakia, but also to pay in any other country. I do not think that the words to which the plaintiff speaks are sufficient for the purpose.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the evidence is either not admissible or, if admissible, is valueless. I am, therefore, not satisfied that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction. I can appreciate the desire of the plaintiff to get payment from the assets in this country, and, if there really was a promise to pay him here, all well and good, we ought to make the foreigner pay him here. But, if there was no such promise—if the supposed promise is only an afterthought put forward to bolster up his case—then, however good his object, it is vitiated by the means he has employed to achieve it. This court has never allowed a good end to justify a bad means, and I trust it never will. I find myself, therefore, in full agreement with SLADE, J., and I would dismiss the appeal. Even if leave is to be given, I should have thought that the case was open to such doubt that there should at least be a condition precluding the plaintiff from recovering except in regard to such breaches, if any, as are proved to have occurred within the jurisdiction: see Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3). I would prefer, however, to refuse leave altogether, because I agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., that it is undesirable to attach such a condition. The question whether there has been a breach within the jurisdiction is a preliminary point going to jurisdiction only, and it should be decided here and now before the expense of a trial is incurred.

Appeal allowed with costs, with a condition, in regard to the claim under the service agreement, that, if it appeared that the claim was not payable within the jurisdiction, the plaintiff was not to obtain judgment on that head of claim.

KNIGHTSBRIDGE ESTATES TRUST, LTD. v. DEELEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), February 14, 15, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Sub-letting—Dwelling-house let at rent less than two-thirds of rateable value—Sub-letting at rent more than two-thirds—Expiry of head-lease—Right of landlords to possession—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (7), s. 15 (3).

A A dwelling-house which had a rateable value which brought it within the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1949, was let to a tenant for a term of seventeen years at a rent which was less than two-thirds of the rateable value so that the tenancy was excluded from the protection of the Acts by s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The tenant had sub-let the premises to a sub-tenant at a rent in excess of two-thirds of the rateable value. On the expiry of the head-lease the landlord claimed possession, but the sub-tenant relied on the protection afforded by s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 which provides: "Where the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies is determined, either as the result of an order or judgment for possession or ejectment, or for any other reason, any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to become the tenant of the landlord on the same terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy had continued."

D HELD: the rent paid by the tenant under the lease being less than two-thirds of the rateable value, by s. 12 (7) of the Act of 1920 that Act applied in respect of the dwelling-house as if the lease had not existed; as the tenant had never held a tenancy to which the Act applied, it could not be said that her tenancy had "determined," within the meaning of s. 15 (3); and, therefore, the sub-tenant could not bring himself within the provisions of that sub-section when the head-lease expired and was not protected against eviction.

APPEAL by a sub-tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE DRUCQUER, made at Westminster County Court on Nov. 11, 1949, for possession of a dwelling-house in favour of the landlords. The facts appear in the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J.

H Sofer for the sub-tenant.

Pearl and Basil Austin for the landlords.

COHEN, L.J. : I will ask ASQUITH, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

ASQUITH, L.J. : This is the sub-tenant's appeal against an order for possession of certain premises near Hanover Square, London, made by His Honour JUDGE DRUCQUER, at Westminster County Court. The facts are, in substance, unchallenged. On Dec. 9, 1931, the landlords let the premises to a Miss Strutt for seventeen years from Dec. 25, 1931, at an annual rent of £20 a year, payable quarterly. In November, 1943, Miss Strutt assigned her lease to a Mr. Ellis who, in July, 1946, re-assigned the lease to a Mr. Wade. During her term Miss Strutt had sub-let the premises to the sub-tenant at £35 a year, rising ultimately to £75. On Dec. 25, 1948, the head-lease of which Wade was then the assignee expired by effluxion of time. The landlords claim possession from the sub-tenant who sets up s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which provides:

"Where the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies is determined, either as the result of an order or judgment for possession or ejection, or for any other reason, any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to become the tenant of the landlord on the same terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy had continued."

The sub-lease in question in this case had been made in breach of the covenant not to under-let, but no point is now taken on that. No point is taken that it was not a lawful sub-letting within s. 15 (3) because, since the material time, it is conceded that this breach has been waived by acceptance of rent.

The question raised in the appeal is whether the sub-tenant can claim to retain possession by virtue of s. 15 (3) having regard to the terms of s. 12 (7). The county court judge has held that he cannot. At common law, of course, a sub-lessee's interest would automatically be extinguished when the head-lease from which it was carved had expired, and, if it is not extinguished in this case, this can only be by the operation of s. 15 (3). Can the sub-tenant bring himself within the terms of that provision? The protection which the sub-section accords to a sub-tenant is only available in cases where, as is said in the first two lines of the sub-section, "the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies is determined." "The tenant" here clearly means the head tenant. It can mean nothing else in a case like the present where there are only three dramatis personae, the landlord, the head tenant, and the sub-tenant. It is conceded that the dwelling-house is a dwelling-house to which the Act applies, but what the sub-tenant has further to establish is that the person from whom he took the sub-lease of such a dwelling-house (i) had the "interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house," and (ii) that that interest had determined." Now "the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house" is simply his tenancy. What else can it be? The wording of s. 15 (3) supports that view, because, while it speaks in the first line of "the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house," in the last line it uses the words "the same terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy had continued," obviously drawing no distinction between the word "tenancy" and "interest of a tenant." The draftsman seems to treat them as synonyms.

Section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920 makes provision as to certain tenancies. Omitting immaterial words, it reads thus:

"Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy . . . and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed."

I think it is fairly clear that the object of that provision was to deal with a case in which the head-lease on foot at the material date—Aug. 4, 1914—was at a ground rent or some abnormally low rent. In such a case, unless provision were made to the contrary, that very low rent would become the standard rent. The object was to prevent it becoming the standard rent, for this would be most unfair to the head landlord, but, on the other hand, to provide that, if there were a sub-tenancy, not at a ground rent, but at a commercial rack rent, the sub-tenant should be able to treat the rent at which he held as the standard rent, and the head rent should be ignored in fixing that standard rent. That, I think, is plainly the object of the sub-section, but its wording may well be such that it begets a number of other consequences which were, perhaps, un contemplated and unintended by the draftsman.

A In the present case the rent payable by the head lessee, Miss Strutt, and her two successive assigns, was less than two-thirds of the rateable value. The Act, therefore, applies in respect of the dwelling-house as if the head-lease had never existed. If the head tenancy had never existed, the condition precedent to the application of s. 15 (3), viz., the determination of the interest of the tenant, the head-lessee, must necessarily go unfulfilled. The de facto head tenant must be deemed never in law to have had the "interest of a tenant of the dwelling-house," and, if she never had such an interest, the interest in question cannot have been "determined," for a thing cannot die if it has never been born. This seems to me an insurmountable obstacle in the way of the otherwise most attractive argument presented by counsel for the sub-tenant. I agree with him that the result I have indicated is almost certainly unintended. I agree with him that it is unjust, and that it does nothing to promote the objects of this legislation which are too well-known to need re-statement here, but it seems to me to be an ineluctable conclusion when one considers the wording of these two provisions. True, s. 12 (7) is, in itself, a perfectly reasonable provision to prevent low ground rents under building leases which were being paid at the material date, Aug. 4, 1914, from being stereotyped as the standard rent. D The observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Brookes v. Liffen (1) make this point very clear. The effect of the impact of s. 12 (7) on s. 15 (3) is most unreasonable. There is no reason why the sub-lessee at a rack rent from a head lessee who pays a ground rent to his landlord should be any the less entitled to protection than a sub-lessee who holds from a head lessee who pays a rack rent to his landlord. The one sub-tenant is as meritorious as the other, but the wording of the two sub-sections leads to a distinction between them as arbitrary as that which ordains that, of two women grinding at the mill, "the one should be taken and the other left."

E Counsel for the sub-tenant cited a number of authorities including Wright v. Arnold (2), and Cow v. Casey (3). Those two cases, so far as relevant, decide that where premises, part of which has been sub-let, are not a dwelling-house to which the Act applies at all, for instance, if the rateable value is over £100, then s. 15 (3) confers no protection on the sub-tenant. F Counsel for the sub-tenant appeared to me to deduce from this that if the premises were a dwelling-house to which the Act applies, that was all that mattered and the protection of s. 15 (3) would automatically be attracted. That, in my judgment, is not so. There are two distinct pre-requisites set out in the first two lines of s. 15 (3) G for the application of that sub-section. First, the dwelling-house must be one to which the Act applies, and, secondly, the head lessee must have the interest of a tenant in that dwelling-house, i.e., he must have a tenancy. If such a tenancy is at a rent which is less than two-thirds of the rateable value, it must be deemed not to exist and never to have existed. Therefore, no one had the interest of a tenant at any time in these premises, nor could any such interest have been determined, nor, consequently, could s. 15 (3) apply. H If the language of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Cow v. Casey (3), is carefully examined, I think it will appear that he had these two cumulative and distinct requirements of s. 15 (3) in mind and that he was not merely inquiring whether the requirement that the dwelling-house should be one to which the Act applies was satisfied. Take, for instance, this passage, where he says ([1949] 1 All E.R. 198):

"... the sub-section is clearly limited to a case where the head-tenant whose tenancy is determined is tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts apply. Here the company was not a tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply. It was tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Acts did not apply."

Counsel for the sub-tenant, to my mind, extracts no material reinforcement in meeting this central objection from other cases which he cited, such as Watson v. Saunders-Roe (4). In that case the main issue, though not the sole issue, was whether the premises were lawfully sub-let. In the present case, ex concessis they were. Nor do I think the attempted trichotomy of the first two lines of s. 15 (3) (which certainly derives no support from their punctuation) carries counsel for the sub-tenant any further. A Reliance was also placed on the wording, which differs somewhat from that of s. 15 (3), of s. 2 (3) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, but the language of the material provisions of the Act of 1920 seems to me too clear for any subtle construction, and I do not see how it can be altered or any light thrown on it by the terms of the later statute. Finally, counsel for the sub-tenant painted an alarming picture of the consequences which might ensue if the county court judge's construction were upheld. Such an argument is, in its nature, inconclusive, but for what it is worth it was to the effect that long building leases at ground rents in London will be falling in in great numbers in the next decade. Many lessees at ground rents have let to sub-tenants at commercial rack rents. When the head-leases of the builders fall in, if the judge's view is affirmed and the sub-tenants become expellable, the landlords will be free, having expelled them, to re-let at exorbitant rents untrammelled by the restrictions of the Acts. I do not feel this bug-bear has any reality. The effect of s. 15 (3) and s. 12 (7) combined would, no doubt, be, if the view I have taken of them is right, that the existing sub-tenants could in those cases be ejected, but, if they were ejected, the rents at which they had held would become the standard rents of the houses in question. There would be no question of the landlords being able to re-let at any rent they could obtain. For these reasons, in my view, the appeal fails and must be dismissed. B

COHEN, L.J.: I agree. E

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree on all points except one, as to which I should like to reserve my view, and that is whether the result at which we have arrived is wholly unintended (a matter which cannot affect the question of construction). Many of these leases at ground rents are long leases, at the end of which premises require re-building, and it may well be that Parliament thought it right that a landlord who wanted to re-build at the end of a long ground lease should not be encumbered by sub-tenants who had a statutory right to remain in occupation. I am not saying that that is so. I merely wish to reserve my view on that matter. F

A In an action for wrongful dismissal the plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, pleaded an oral agreement of employment and that it was an implied term thereof that the plaintiffs' service should be terminable only by reasonable notice, which, they alleged, was six months. The plaintiffs then alleged that they had been summarily dismissed without notice, and in the prayer claimed, inter alia, "damages for wrongful dismissal."

B It appeared that the damage in respect of which they sought to recover was the loss of salary and commission which they would have earned during the period of notice to which they claimed to be entitled, if it had been given.

HELD: the damage complained of was special damage, and, as it had not been specifically pleaded, the statement of claim was defective.

D ACTION for damages for wrongful dismissal.

In their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged the contract and its breach, and included a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal in the prayer, but there was no separate paragraph specifically alleging damage through loss of salary and commission. At the trial the defendants objected that this damage was special damage and no evidence could be given of it as it was not specifically pleaded.

F. D. L. McIntyre for the defendants.

F DEVLIN, J.: The plaintiffs desire to claim, by way of damages for wrongful dismissal, the loss of the salary and commission they would have earned during the period of reasonable notice if it had been given. Counsel for the defendants objects, and has asked me to rule on the objection, that it is not open to the plaintiffs on their form of pleading to ask for damages in that way. The pleading alleges the contract and the breach. It does not contain any paragraph specifically alleging damage, but in the prayer there is a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal. It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiffs, and I think rightly, that he cannot recover in respect of any special damage unless that special damage is pleaded. The only question, therefore, which I have to determine is whether damages of the nature described are general or special. In my judgment, it is clear from the case which has been cited to me by counsel for the defendants, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Monk v. Redwing Aircraft Co., Ltd. (1), that damage of this nature is special damage, and, accordingly, I think that the statement of claim is defective in that it does not cover a claim for special damage of this sort. Counsel for the plaintiffs has relied on the precedent that is set out in BULLEN AND LEAKE, 9th ed., p. 253, but I think, at any rate since the decision of the Court of Appeal to which I have referred, that it is clear that that precedent no longer governs the matter. It is, of course, extremely common, when damage is alleged in general terms, for an application to be made to obtain particulars of the special damage, if any, relied on, but there can be no obligation to ask for such particulars, and I think the true position is that, unless they are contained in the statement of claim, evidence leading to damage in respect of which damages are claimed cannot technically be relied on at the trial. I am dealing purely with the technical position. I have not to consider at this stage whether anybody has been prejudiced as a result of the pleading in its present form. Counsel for the plaintiffs has indicated that, if I rule against him, he will apply for leave to amend, and I shall consider such matters on that application. A

Re BLATHWAYT'S WILL TRUSTS. BLATHWAYT AND OTHERS v. BLATHWAYT AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 22, 1950.] B

Will—Forfeiture—Gift to C. for life with remainder to first and other sons in tail male, and remainders over—Forfeiture of C.'s life interest, while C. a bachelor—Acceleration of second life estate—Accelerated life estate not determined by birth of son to C.

By his will, dated Aug. 7, 1934, the testator settled certain property on trust for C. for life, with remainder on trust for the first and other sons of C. successively, in order of seniority, in tail male, with remainder on trust for J. for life, with remainders over. The will contained a forfeiture clause whereby "if any person who under the trusts hereof shall become entitled as tenant for life or tenant in tail male by purchase to the possession" of the settled property "be or become a Roman Catholic . . . the estate hereby limited to him shall cease and determine and be utterly void" and the settled property "shall thereupon go to the person next entitled under the trusts hereinbefore declared in the same manner as if the person whose estate shall so cease determine and become void being a tenant for life were then dead or being a tenant in tail male were then dead without issue inheritable under the estate tail." D
The testator died on Nov. 2, 1936, and in 1939, C., the tenant for life, who was then a bachelor, became a Roman Catholic, thereby forfeiting his interest in the property. By an order of the court, dated June 5, 1940, it was declared that the life interest of J. in the settled property was accelerated. In 1948 C. married, and a son, M., was born to him on June 8, 1949. ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine a question arising under the will of the testator, Robert Wynter Blathwayt.

A By his will the testator settled certain property on trust for Christopher Blathwayt for life, with remainder on trust for Christopher's first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder on trust for the first defendant, Justin Blathwayt, for life, with remainders over. Under a forfeiture clause in the will Christopher, the first tenant for life, forfeited his interest in the settled property in 1939, while still a bachelor, and by an order of FARWELL, J., dated June 5, 1940, it was declared that the life interest of the first defendant in the property was accelerated subject to determination in the event of the birth of a son to Christopher. Christopher subsequently married, and on June 8, 1949, a son (the second defendant, Mark Blathwayt) was born to him. The question now was whether the first defendant's interest in the settled property determined on and by reason of the birth of the second defendant. The facts appear in the judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J.

C Wilfrid Hunt for the trustees.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and T. A. C. Burgess for the first defendant, Justin Blathwayt.

McMullen for the second defendant, Mark Blathwayt.

D WYNN-PARRY, J.: As this matter has developed, the only question with which I have to deal to-day is one purely of construction arising on certain passages in the will of the testator, who died on Nov. 2, 1936. The will was made on Aug. 7, 1934, and the first relevant clause is cl. 6, by which the testator devised and bequeathed to his trustees all his "freehold lands and hereditaments situate or arising in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester or elsewhere (hereinafter collectively referred to as 'my principal estate')," which, by the operation of cl. 5, included the residue of his personal estate

E "... upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions following namely: (a) upon trust for Christopher George Wynter Blathwayt (the elder son of my late cousin Henry Wynter Blathwayt) during his life with remainder (b) upon trust for his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male with remainder (c) upon trust for Justin Robert Wynter Blathwayt (the younger son of my said late cousin) during his life ..."

F Then follow certain remainders over, to which it is unnecessary to refer. By cl. 9, the testator declared as follows:

G "I further declare that if any person who under the trusts hereof shall become entitled as tenant for life or tenant in tail male by purchase to the possession of my principal estate shall (a) be or become a Roman Catholic or (b) disuse the surname and arms of Blathwayt then and in either of such cases the estate hereby limited to him shall cease and determine and be utterly void and my principal estate shall thereupon go to the person next entitled under the trusts hereinbefore declared in the same manner as if the person whose estate shall so cease determine and become void being a tenant for life were then dead or being a tenant in tail male were then dead without issue inheritable under the estate tail ..."

H In November, 1939, Christopher George Wynter Blathwayt, the first tenant for life, who was then a bachelor, was received into the Roman Catholic Church, and, by an order made on June 5, 1940, by FARWELL, J., on an originating summons, it was declared that

"... upon the true construction of the ... will [of the testator] and in the event which has happened namely of the defendant Christopher George Wynter Blathwayt being received into the Roman Catholic Church . . . he had forfeited his life interest in the property settled by the . . . will."

It was further declared that the life interest of Justin Robert Wynter Blathwayt in the settled property was accelerated

" . . . subject to determination in the event of the birth of a son to the defendant Christopher George Wynter Blathwayt and the defendant Justin Robert Wynter Blathwayt is entitled to the income thereof and to the usual vesting deed."

The parties to that summons were the trustees of the will, as plaintiffs, and Christopher Blathwayt and Justin Blathwayt, as defendants.

On Apr. 10, 1948, Christopher Blathwayt married, his wife being also a Roman Catholic. On June 8, 1949, they had a son, the infant defendant to this summons, Mark Henry Wynter Blathwayt. It is a fact, as has been agreed for the purposes of this summons, that on June 26, 1949, that infant was baptised into the Roman Catholic Church, but, for the purposes of the question which arises to-day, that is not a material fact. The only question which I am now asked to answer, is: "Whether upon and by reason of the birth on June 8, 1949, of the infant defendant the life interest" of Justin Blathwayt in the settled estates determined. It is clear that there is established by the authorities a prima facie rule of construction, viz., that, where a gap occurs in a succession of interests, a subsequent interest can be accelerated temporarily. An example of that general rule is to be found in Re Brooke (1), but the rule is one of construction, its object being to give effect, so far as is possible, to the intention of the testator, as manifested by the language which he has used in his will. It appears that until now, the cases which have come before the court have been cases where there has been a competition between the beneficiaries under the settlement, on the one hand, and those interested on an intestacy, on the other. This case appears to me to be somewhat different because the possibility of a gap is created by the very language of the will, and the testator, who has created the possibility of that gap, has designed to provide for the filling of it. He provides in cl. 9 that, if any person who under the trusts of the will has become entitled as tenant for life (which is the case before me) shall be or become a Roman Catholic—the event which happened—then the estate thereby limited to him should cease and determine and be utterly void, and the settled estate should thereupon go to the person next entitled under the trusts thereinbefore declared. Having regard to the dates of the events to which I have referred, the person fulfilling the description as the "person next entitled under the trusts hereinbefore declared" is Justin Blathwayt. If it is clear that that is the true construction of the clause—and, in my view, it is so clear—then that general rule, which is only the rule of construction, must give way to the express and clear provision in the will.

In my judgment, looking for the moment merely at the will, I would answer the question which I have to decide in the negative. I have, however, to deal with the position created by the form of the second declaration in the order of FARWELL, J., because the order not only declared that the life interest of Justin Blathwayt was accelerated, but added the qualification "subject to determination in the event of the birth of a son to the defendant Christopher George Wynter Blathwayt . . ." There is no report extant of the judgment of the learned judge, but some light is thrown on the matter by the form of the summons. Question 1 asked whether in the event which had happened, namely of Christopher Blathwayt being received into the Roman Catholic Church, he had forfeited his life interest, and no difficulty arises on that. But question 2 was in this form:

"In the event of the answer to question 1 being in the affirmative whether upon the true construction of the said will and of s. 175 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and pending the birth of a son to the first defendant (a) the life interest of the second defendant [Justin Blathwayt] in the said settled property is accelerated subject to determination in the event of the birth of a son to the first defendant [Christopher Blathwayt] and the second defendant is entitled to the income thereof and to the usual vesting deed or (b) s. 175 aforesaid is applicable and the plaintiffs should accumulate the income of the said settled property for a period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator or until the previous birth of a son to the first defendant . . . ”

Thus the real question was whether there was an acceleration of the life interest of Justin Blathwayt, or whether s. 175 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, applied, and accumulation should be directed. The question of the length of the accelerated interest of Justin Blathwayt was, at the date of the summons, a future question.

It appears that the only case which was cited to FARWELL, J., was Re Conyngham (2). It is clear that the debate in that case was between the heir-at-law and a subsequent interest claiming acceleration, so that it does not bear directly on the question which I have to consider (viz., whether the life interest of Justin has determined by reason of the birth of a son to Christopher), which was, as I have said, a future question at the date of the hearing before FARWELL, J. Further, as the only defendants to the previous summons were Christopher Blathwayt and Justin Blathwayt (the infant, Mark Blathwayt, not then being alive), the second declaration in the order of June, 1940, is not, and it is admitted that it is not, res judicata as between the parties to this summons. On the somewhat unsatisfactory state of one's knowledge, I cannot feel justified in coming to the conclusion that the question which has been debated before me to-day, and on which I have to pronounce, was debated before FARWELL, J., or that he intended to pronounce on the question whether or not the fact of the birth of the child to Christopher Blathwayt would operate to destroy the accelerated interest of Justin Blathwayt. Therefore, I feel free to place my own construction on cl. 9 of the will in the events which have happened, and to make the declaration in the sense in which I earlier stated that I was inclined to make it, namely, in effect, by answering question 1 of the summons in the negative. Had I taken a different view on this question, somewhat difficult and complicated questions would have arisen. But it appears, and it is accepted by counsel for both the defendants, that those considerations would really relate to what can properly be regarded as a future question. It is for that reason that I have been asked to do no more to-day than to express an opinion one way or the other on question 1 of the summons. I say nothing in regard to the interests arising on the death of Christopher, or in regard to what would then happen, but merely say that the interest of Justin did not determine on the birth of Christopher's son, Mark.

LUCAS v. LINEHAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), February 8, 17, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Claim as landlord for own occupation—Grantee of head-lease subject to tenant's tenancy—Grantor a purchaser after Sept. 1, 1939—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I).

The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I), provides that an order may be made for possession, without suitable alternative accommodation being available, where "the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Sept. 1, 1939), for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself . . ."

In 1932 M. Co. purchased a dwelling-house, and, on Aug. 14, 1946, let it for three years to A. On July 21, 1947, M. Co. sold the freehold reversion to Mrs. B. On Aug. 14, 1949, A.'s lease expired, and it was accepted that he thereupon became a statutory tenant of the house. By an agreement dated Aug. 30, 1949, Mrs. B. granted a lease of the house for three years to her husband, B., subject to A.'s statutory tenancy. B. now claimed possession of the house for his own occupation under para. (h) without proof of suitable alternative accommodation for A.

HELD: B., having derived title from Mrs. B. who had "become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house . . . after Sept. 1, 1939" and who, therefore, could not rely on para. (h), was in no better position than Mrs. B. and also could not rely on para. (h).

APPEAL by a tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Croydon County Court and dated Oct. 27, 1949, whereby possession was ordered to be given to the landlord, subject to a suspension of seven months. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Feb. 17. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is the defendant's appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., at Croydon County Court, whereby he granted an order for possession of certain premises subject to a suspension for seven months. The premises in question appear to have been bought in 1932 by a gentleman called Davey trading as Marwick & Co. On Aug. 14, 1946, Marwick & Co., by a written lease, let them for three years to the defendant. On Aug. 14, 1949, that lease expired by effluxion of time, and the defendant became a statutory tenant, if he had not done so earlier. Meanwhile, on July 21, 1947, Marwick & Co. had sold the premises to a Mrs. Lucas, wife of the plaintiff. By an agreement of Aug. 30, 1949, Mrs. Lucas granted a lease for three years to her husband, the plaintiff (hereinafter called "the landlord") subject to the defendant's statutory tenancy.

The landlord desired possession of the premises for occupation by himself, and, accordingly, he brought proceedings claiming an order for possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h). That Act provides that an order for possession can be made without suitable alternative accommodation being available if any of the conditions set out in paras. (a) to (h) of the schedule are satisfied. The schedule, so far as relevant, provides (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I):

"A court shall . . . have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house . . . without proof of suitable alternative accommodation . . . if—(h) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Sept. 1, 1939) for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself . . . Provided that an order or judgment shall not be made or given on any ground specified in para. (h) of the foregoing provisions of this schedule if the court is satisfied that having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the question whether other accommodation is available for the landlord or the tenant, greater hardship would be caused by granting the order or judgment than by refusing to grant it."

The defendant (hereinafter called "the tenant") does not question the learned county court judge's finding of fact that it would cause the landlord greater hardship in this case to refuse an order for possession (due regard being had to the seven months' suspension) than it would cause to the tenant to grant such an order, nor does he dispute that, if the landlord can in other respects bring himself within para. (h), it was reasonable to make the order. What the tenant argued below and in this court was that the landlord was disabled from taking advantage of this provision. He relied for this purpose on the words in para. (h) itself which exclude from the class of landlords who can avail themselves of it any landlord "who has become a landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Sept. 1, 1939." The tenant does not argue that the landlord falls directly within the class of persons disabled by these words, i.e., that the landlord was himself a "purchaser." The argument is that the landlord derived his title as landlord from a person who was so disabled, and is, therefore, tainted with the disability of his predecessor in title. Before, however, considering whether the disqualification can be transmitted in the manner suggested, it is necessary to consider the nature of the disqualification itself and the class whom it primarily affects. The words attaching the disqualification have on several occasions been considered by this court. The decisions may be taken in chronological order. Mostly they decide who does not fall within the disqualified category.

In Epps v. Rothnie (1) the Court of Appeal decided that a purchaser after the material date—Sept. 1, 1939—of premises which were unoccupied at the time of the purchase, who lets them later to the defendant, does not fall within the exception and is not disabled from claiming possession under para. (h), for, since the premises were unlet at the date of the purchase, the purchaser cannot be a landlord "who has become landlord by purchasing." In Fowle v. Bell (2), this principle was extended so as to exclude from the disqualified class of landlords persons who, purchasing the dwelling-house after the material date, nevertheless purchase it at a time when the sitting tenant is someone other than the defendant, but subsequently, on the premises falling vacant, let them to the defendant.

Powell v. Cleland (3) is a case which proceeded on facts practically identical with those of the present case. A limited company acquired premises at some unascertained time before 1941. In 1941 the company let them to the defendant, Mrs. Cleland, who became a statutory tenant. In 1946 the company executed (in favour of the plaintiff, Powell) a reversionary lease dependent on the defendant's statutory tenancy, as in the present case. It was not doubted that Powell thereby became the "landlord" of Mrs. Cleland. The question was whether Powell was a landlord who had "become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Sept. 1, 1939," and was, therefore, disqualified from relying on para. (h) of the schedule. The Court of Appeal held he was not because he had not purchased the premises or any interest therein. The material part of the headnote reads as follows ([1948] 1 K.B. 262):

"The word 'purchasing' in para. (h) is used with the ordinary, popular but precise meaning of that word—viz., the buying of a dwelling-house or of any already existing interest therein. It does not in that paragraph connote the acquisition for money or money's worth of some interest which only comes into existence by the very transaction. The meaning of the word cannot be derived from the definitions of the word 'purchaser' contained in the several Property Acts of 1925, since (1) those definitions are not in each case the same and there is no reason for selecting one rather than another, and (2) the Property Acts of 1925 and the Rent Restriction Acts are not in pari materia. Accordingly, where the landlord of a quarterly tenant of a dwelling-house, who has become a statutory tenant under the Rent Restrictions Acts, grants a lease of the dwelling-house to X. from year to year (subject to the rights of the sitting tenant), at a rent, but without payment of any premium or other monetary consideration, so that X. becomes lessee of the reversion expectant on the statutory tenancy and the landlord of that tenant within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and X., claiming that he reasonably requires the house for occupation as a residence for himself, sues the tenant to recover possession of the house, X. has not become landlord by 'purchasing' the dwelling-house or any interest therein within the meaning of para. (h)."

The court thus held that "purchasing" meant "buying" in the popular sense, and was not a term apt to describe acquiring a lease of a reversion dependent on an existing tenancy, unless, indeed, a premium—that is, a purchase price—was paid for the reversionary lease.

The procedure adopted in the present case is precisely that which might be expected to be adopted by a plaintiff who has, or whose legal advisers have, imbibed the lessons of Powell v. Cleland (3), and who, by following the same procedure, hope to achieve the same result. One thing is clear and was, very reasonably, conceded on behalf of the tenant, namely, that Powell v. Cleland (3) precludes him from contending that the plaintiff in this case is himself what may be called for short a "disqualified purchaser" within the exception to para. (h). The way he puts his case is somewhat different, and it depends on a later decision of the Court of Appeal, Littlechild v. Holt (4). In that case a Mr. Littlechild in 1944 bought a house occupied by a Mr. Mills, a statutory tenant. Littlechild was, therefore, himself a "disqualified purchaser," and could not have availed himself of para. (h) to obtain possession without offering suitable alternative accommodation. He, nevertheless, sought to bring such an action against the defendant, who was Mr. Mills' successor in title as tenant. Littlechild died before judgment, but his widow obtained letters of administration and was enabled to continue the action. It was held that the widow was in no better position as a plaintiff than her late husband, and inherited or shared his disability to rely on para. (h). In the course of the leading judgment, LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1950] 1 K.B. 5):

A “The question then arises—and this is the point on which this court disagrees with the county court judge—whether Mrs. Littlechild is in a better position than her husband would have been. It certainly would be a very remarkable hiatus in the Act if she were. This provision that a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the house after Dec. 6, 1937 [the material date for the house in question] cannot obtain an order for the recovery of possession of a dwelling-house without proof of suitable alternative accommodation was inserted in the Act for the protection of the tenant. The ‘tenant’ is, of course, a convenient expression, but it is B the expression used all the way through the Acts as meaning the person who is holding the property. It would certainly be somewhat remarkable if the tenant were protected against a landlord, who himself had sought to recover possession of the house, but was not protected because the landlord had died and his interest had passed over on an intestacy or by will to his wife C or to some other person. The sitting tenant admittedly has that protection as long as the person who bought the property since Dec. 6, 1937, remains the landlord of the property, but the moment he has disposed of his interest in the property otherwise than by sale, it is said that the new landlord has this right, which the former landlord had not got.”

D The learned Lord Chief Justice then goes on to distinguish Baker v. Lewis (5) and Fowle v. Bell (2) thus (ibid., 6):

“The persons who succeeded to the property by will in those cases took the property from a person whose title had not the clog upon it (if I may use that expression) that was on Mr. Littlechild’s title in this case.”

E There was nothing to show (in other words) that the testator in either of these cases was a “disqualified purchaser” within para. (h). The Lord Chief Justice continued (ibid.):

“But in this case, the landlord from whom Mrs. Littlechild acquired title was in the position that his title was, as I have already said, clogged: he could not apply for an order for possession because of this provision in F para. (h) . . .”

This conclusion of the learned Lord Chief Justice appears to base itself on principle—the principle non dat qui non habet. What follows is, in our view, a makeweight and an afterthought, not the basis of the whole decision. The learned Lord Chief Justice goes on to claim support for his conclusion from the terms of s. 12 (1) (f), but, in our view, as has just been indicated, the terms of G his judgment imply that he would have decided the case in the same sense if s. 12 (1) (f) had not existed. Nor would BIRKETT, J.’s judgment seem to rest on that provision, though the judgment of DENNING, L.J., may in part do so. We will revert to s. 12 (1) (f) in a moment.

H We think that this decision, which binds us, governs the present case and precludes the landlord from succeeding. In both cases the landlord, though not a disqualified purchaser, himself derived title from a predecessor who was a disqualified purchaser. The fact that the landlord derived it in Littlechild’s case (4) by transmission on the intestacy of such a purchaser, and in the present case by having taken a reversionary lease from such a purchaser can make no difference. If Mrs. Littlechild was affected by the clog (as the Lord Chief Justice calls it), so also was Mr. Lucas.

The argument for the landlord assumed that the decision in Littlechild’s case (4) rested essentially on the operation of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (f). We have seen reason to doubt whether this is so; but we will consider the argument which the landlord builds on that assumption. Section 12 (1) (f) provides:

"The expressions 'landlord,' 'tenant,' 'mortgagee,' and 'mortgagor' include any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, tenant, mortgagee or mortgagor."

The landlord relies on the word "original" before the word "landlord." The person deriving title is to be identified, he argues, with the original landlord in the sense of the person who first let to the defendant. Suppose X. was the first lessor to the defendant, and Y. succeeded to X. by purchasing the freehold from X. over the head of the defendant sitting tenant after the disqualifying date, and then suppose that the plaintiff succeeded to Y. by will, or otherwise without "purchasing," then, so the argument for the landlord runs, although Y. is a disqualified purchaser, it is not his status, but that of X., the original lessor, which is material to the landlord's rights under para. (h). Marwick & Co., in this case on this argument were the "original lessors," and Marwick & Co. were not affected with any disability—hence neither is the landlord, and it matters not what was the position of the intermediate landlord, Mrs. Lucas. It is quite clear, however, that the Lord Chief Justice assumed that the words "original landlord" aptly described the intermediate landlord, the immediate predecessor in title of the plaintiff. He did not go back to, or consider in any way, the position of the person who in the first instance let to Mr. Mills. He speaks (ibid., 7) of the "original landlord, Mr. Littlechild," but Mr. Littlechild was certainly not the "original landlord" in the sense in which counsel for the landlord in this case invited us to construe that term. The same applies to the judgment of DENNING, L.J., but we would repeat that in any case it seems more than doubtful whether any argument founded on s. 12 (1) (f) was necessary to the decision in that case. Any such argument indeed involves a somewhat radical re-writing of the terms of para. (h). The paragraph would have to be re-written as though, after the words "required by the landlord, not being a landlord who has become" there followed the words "or whose original landlord became landlord by purchasing"—a complicated result and one which would be easier to reach if s. 12 (1) (f) had read "the expression 'landlord' includes a predecessor in title of the existing landlord" than on its existing wording, namely, "the expression 'landlord' includes any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord." However, these difficulties do not arise, as, if we are right in concluding (i) that s. 12 (1) (f) was not necessary to the decision in Littlechild's case (4), or (ii) that if it was, it is a decision that the "original landlord" is, or includes, the intermediate landlord, the immediate predecessor in title of the plaintiff landlord. For these reasons, we think the appeal should be allowed.

Crown—Relief against the Crown—Interlocutory proceedings—Declaration in lieu of injunction—Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), s. 21 (1) (a).

A The plaintiffs, suing on behalf of themselves and the members of an association of manufacturers of unrationed sweets, by motion sought an order that the Ministry of Food, the defendants in the action, might be restrained, until the trial of the action or further order, from putting into effect, or purporting to put into effect, or further publishing their intention to put into effect, the proposal, announced in a certain notice published in the Press, to bring within the rationing system under the Chocolate, Sugar Confectionery and Cocoa Products Order, 1949, and the Rationing (Personal Points) Order, 1949, sweets made from unallocated ingredients not previously subject to the controls of the rationing system, or, alternatively, for a declaration that the Ministry were not entitled until trial or further order to put into effect, or to purport to put into effect, or to publish their intention to put into effect, the said proposal. It was conceded at the hearing that the plaintiffs could not be granted an interlocutory injunction.

MOTION.

E The plaintiffs brought the action on behalf of themselves and other members of the Free (Food) Manufacturers Association, the members of which manufactured sweets from ingredients not hitherto subject to controls provided for under the rationing system, consequent on the announcement, on Jan. 20, 1950, by the Ministry of Food that in the near future such sweets would be brought within the rationing system. The plaintiffs now sought an interlocutory injunction to restrain the Ministry from carrying out its proposal, or, in lieu, a declaration that the Ministry was not entitled to carry it out. The Ministry took the point that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order.

F Beyfus, K.C., and Sebag Shaw for the plaintiffs.

Denys Buckley for the Ministry.

G ROMER, J.: This is a motion brought before the court in an action against the Ministry of Food, in which Mr. Dennis Underhill and Mr. James Waywell are plaintiffs, and sue on behalf of themselves and on behalf of the Free (Food) Manufacturers Association, of which I am told there are about forty-three members. The motion asks for an order:

H " . . . that the defendants may be restrained until the trial of this action or further order from putting into effect or purporting to put into effect or further publishing their intention to put into effect the proposal announced by them in a Press notice dated Jan. 24, 1950, to bring within the rationing system under the Chocolate, Sugar Confectionery and Cocoa Products Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 781), and the Rationing (Personal Points) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1523), as from Feb. 26, 1950, sweets made from unallocated ingredients and hitherto not subject to the controls provided by the said rationing system or alternatively for a declaration that the defendants are not entitled until trial or further order to put into effect or to purport to put into effect or to publish their intention to put into effect the said proposal."

Counsel for the plaintiffs, in opening the case, said that he was going to ask for the alternative form of relief, namely, a declaration instead of an injunction, because of the provisions of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 21. So far as material, that section provides:

"(1) In any civil proceedings by or against the Crown the court shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have power to make all such orders as it has power to make in proceedings between subjects, and otherwise to give such appropriate relief as the case may require: Provided that:— (a) where in any proceedings against the Crown any such relief is sought as might in proceedings between subjects be granted by way of injunction or specific performance, the court shall not grant an injunction or make an order for specific performance, but may in lieu thereof make an order declaratory of the rights of the parties . . . (2) The court shall not in any civil proceedings grant any injunction or make any order against an officer of the Crown if the effect of granting the injunction or making the order would be to give any relief against the Crown which could not have been obtained in proceedings against the Crown."

Having regard to that it is quite plain that, in so far as the motion was founded on a claim for an injunction, this court would have no jurisdiction to entertain it. So I am asked in effect to make an interim declaration of the plaintiffs' rights.

The Press notice which is referred to in the notice of motion was issued on Jan. 24, 1950, and is as follows:

"The Ministry of Food announced on Jan. 20 that sweets which are made from unallocated ingredients and which are substantially similar to the types of confectionery hitherto rationed would, in the near future, be brought within the rationing system. Manufacturers of such sweets now being sold free of control are asked to submit by Jan. 31 for classification samples of their products together with full specifications of the ingredients to the Director, Chocolate and Sugar Confectionery Division, Ministry of Food, London Road, Stanmore, Middlesex. Chocolate or sugar confectionery, even though made from unallocated materials, may not be manufactured as from Feb. 26 except under licence from the Ministry of Food, and may not be sold from that date except in accordance with the provisions of the Rationing (Personal Points) Order, 1949. The products must also be clearly described in accordance with art. 5 of the Chocolate, Sugar Confectionery and Cocoa Products Order, 1949. A licence to manufacture will be issued to the manufacturer of any product classified as chocolate or sugar confectionery if he is not already licensed under the Chocolate, Sugar Confectionery and Cocoa Products Order, 1949. The licence will be limited to the production of sweets made wholly from unallocated ingredients. Present arrangements do not contemplate the fixing of maximum consumer prices for such products."

Since that Press notice certain other documents have emanated from the Ministry of Food with a view to implementing the proposal. For example, a form was sent to all retailers and wholesalers of personal points foods and to institutions which purchase sweets in bulk, and a circular letter was also sent to the manufacturers concerned and others. It is the intention of the Ministry to put that proposal into effect unless anything falls from this court by way of a declaration, in the light of which they might consider it desirable to adopt a different course.

In brief, the plaintiffs have three points on which they rely. In the first place, they say that the proposal is ultra vires the defendants' relevant powers, i.e., the powers which are conferred on them by the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, s. 1. So far as relevant that section is as follows:

"(1) If it appears to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient that any Defence Regulation to which this section applies should have effect for the purpose of so maintaining controlling and regulating supplies and services as—(a) to secure a sufficiency of those essential to the wellbeing of the community or their equitable distribution or their availability at fair prices . . . he may by Order in Council direct that the regulation shall have effect by virtue of this Act whether or not it is for the time being necessary or expedient for the purposes specified in s. 1 (1) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939."

E

F

H

The plaintiffs say that the Minister is acting outside his powers under those provisions because he must know, and does know, that, if his present proposal is carried into effect, the manufacturers of the products concerned will cease to manufacture them, and that, even if they do not, the public will not buy them, and accordingly there will be none of these products to distribute. The plaintiffs say in general that, having regard to the matters to which their evidence is directed, the Minister cannot fairly have arrived at a conclusion which is justified under these statutory provisions. They say that the established facts are such that the position is not brought within the purview of s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945. Secondly, they desire to impugn the Minister's good faith in arriving at the intention which he proposes to put into effect. Thirdly, the plaintiffs say that under the doctrine of estoppel they are entitled to the relief which they are seeking to-day. The alleged estoppel arises out of certain assurances or representations made to the plaintiffs, or some of them, by some representative or representatives of the Ministry. It is to those matters that the affidavit evidence, which is voluminous, has been directed. I may say at once that, so far as the second point which the plaintiffs rely on is concerned, viz., the want of good faith on the part of the defendants, it is a matter which clearly cannot be gone into on affidavit evidence and will have to be pursued, if pursued at all, at the trial of the action, when the matter can be gone into in the light of such oral evidence as may be adduced. Consequently, I only mention the second point in order to leave it for present purposes.

At the outset, counsel for the Ministry of Food says that this court has no jurisdiction to do what it is invited to do, i.e., to make a kind of interim declaration in substitution for the interlocutory injunction which clearly it has no power to grant. He says that when the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 21, refers to the court making a declaration, it refers to a final declaration, and it is an unheard of suggestion that an interlocutory declaration should be made which might be in precisely the opposite sense of the final declaration made at the trial. He says, and I think rightly says, that what is usually done on the hearing of an interlocutory application is to grant some form of temporary remedy which will keep matters in statu quo until the rights of the parties are ultimately found and declared, and that, accordingly, the reference to making a declaration of rights means a declaration at the trial as distinct from a declaration on some interlocutory application. Accordingly, he says that, just as I cannot grant an interlocutory injunction against the defendants, even if in all respects a prima facie case has been made out, I cannot as an alternative make an interim declaration either. In my judgment, that submission is right. I do not think that this court has jurisdiction under s. 21 of the Act to make something in the nature of an interim declaration of right which would have no legal effect, and which, as I say, might be the very opposite of the final declaration of right made at the trial after hearing all the evidence and after all the matters in issue had been gone into at length. Therefore, just as I am of opinion—and this, of course, was conceded—that I cannot grant by way of injunction the relief which is asked for in the first part of the notice of motion, equally I cannot grant the declaration "until trial or further order", as the notice of motion says, in accordance with the second part of that notice.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that that was sufficient to dispose of the motion, but, having regard to the elaborate arguments advanced, he would make some further observations. Having considered the arguments, HIS LORDSHIP said that the Ministry's proposal could not be ultra vires, in view of the terms of s. 1 of the Act of 1945, unless it was mala fide, and that he was unable to see how the plaintiff's claim could be based on estoppel.]

KAYE AND OTHERS v. LEVINSON AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins, L.J., and Hodson, J.), February 20, 21, 1950.]

Pleading—Time for delivery—Order dismissing action unless statement of claim be served on or before specified date—Delivery after 4 p.m. on specified date—R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11.

On an application by the plaintiffs for an extension of time for delivery of the statement of claim in an action, the judge made an order, dated Nov. 21, 1949, that, unless the statement of claim was delivered on or before Nov. 28, 1949, the action was to stand dismissed. The statement of claim was delivered at 5.45 p.m. on Monday, Nov. 28, 1949, and it was contended by the defendants that delivery was not made within the time specified in the judge's order, as it was not made before 4 p.m. in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11 (as amended by R.S.C. (No. 2), 1939, which substituted 4 p.m. for 6 p.m.). The plaintiffs contended that the computation of time prescribed by R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, did not necessarily apply to the dismissal of an action for want of prosecution, as that was not one of the purposes specified in the rule.

HELD: an order, which involved a dismissal in limine of an action unless a condition was complied with, should state the condition in clear and unambiguous terms; as it was open to doubt whether the order of Nov. 21, 1949, would be complied with by the delivery of the statement of claim at any time on Nov. 28, 1949, or whether it was essential for the purposes of the order that delivery should be made before 4 p.m. of that day, in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11 (as amended), there was an ambiguity in the terms of the order, and it was undesirable that it should stand; and, therefore, the court would exercise the jurisdiction which it had to vary the order and would extend the time for delivery of the statement of claim.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., made in chambers, and dated Nov. 21, 1949, on an application by the plaintiffs for an extension of time for delivery of the statement of claim in an action commenced on June 2, 1949.

At the request of the defendants the learned judge made an order that, unless the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim on or before Nov. 28, 1949, the action was to stand dismissed. The statement of claim was delivered at 5.45 p.m. on Nov. 28, and the defendants refused to accept it on the ground that, under R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, the time for delivery had expired at 4 p.m. on that day. On Dec. 2, the plaintiffs applied to WYNN-PARRY, J., to extend the time for delivery of pleadings, but the learned judge held that he had no jurisdiction to do so, because, under the terms of his order of Nov. 21, the action stood dismissed, but he enlarged the time for appealing from the order. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Richmount for the plaintiffs.

Levy, K.C., and H. J. Astell Burt for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This is an appeal by leave from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Nov. 21, 1949. The order was in these terms:

"Upon the application of the plaintiffs by summons dated Nov. 8, 1949 . . . it is ordered that unless the plaintiffs do deliver their statement of claim on or before Nov. 28, 1949, this action do stand dismissed out of this court with costs to be taxed by the taxing master and paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants."

There was a further direction in regard to costs. It appears that the statement of claim was delivered, in the sense of being handed in at the office of the defendants' solicitors, at 5.45 p.m. on Nov. 28, 1949. Attention, however, has been drawn to the fact that by certain rules it appears that, at least for some purposes, good delivery of a pleading can only be effected on a weekday other than a Saturday (and Nov. 28 was a Monday), if the delivery occurs before 4 p.m. The change to 4 o'clock from what previously had been 6 o'clock was a war-time measure (introduced by R.S.C. (No. 2), 1939), which still remains part of the rules.

The material rule is R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, which is as follows:

"Service of pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, and other proceedings, shall be effected before the hour of four in the afternoon, except on Saturdays, when it shall be effected before the hour of twelve noon. Service effected after four in the afternoon on any week-day except Saturday shall, for the purpose of computing any period of time subsequent to such service, be deemed to have been effected on the following day."

Then there is a provision about Saturdays. Counsel for the defendants has also drawn attention to R.S.C., Ord. 67, r. 2, which says:

"All writs, notices, pleadings, orders, summonses, warrants, and other documents, proceedings, and written communications in respect of which personal service is not requisite shall be sufficiently served if left within the prescribed hours, at the address for service of the person to be served as defined by Ords. 4 and 12 . . ."

One other rule may be looked at, R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 10, which says:

"Every pleading or other document required to be delivered to a party, or between parties, shall be delivered in the manner now in use to the solicitor of every party who appears by a solicitor . . ."

It is the fact, perhaps surprising to discover, that the phrase "now in use" means "in use in 1875" [the present r. 10 having been r. 6 of the original Ord. 19, contained in the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, sched. I.]

These rules are, plainly, not quite happily drafted. In particular, though the word "delivered" (which is the appropriate word as regards pleadings) is used in R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 10, R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, speaks of "service," and so also does R.S.C., Ord. 67, r. 2, but counsel for the plaintiffs has conceded that in their context both Ord. 64, r. 11, and Ord. 67, r. 2, in using the word "service" also comprehend "delivery," and I assume that that concession is well founded. The result, therefore, is that, for certain purposes, at any rate, delivery of pleadings after 4 p.m. on a particular day is treated as delivery not on that day but on the following day. The question, therefore, in the present case is whether, the statement of claim having been delivered in the way that I have stated at 5.45 p.m. on Nov. 28, the condition stated in the order of Nov. 21, 1949, was not satisfied, with the result that the action is dead. If, on a true view of the rules, the time 4 p.m. need not be inserted in the order of Nov. 21, 1949, then, of course, the action is not dead, and, as counsel for the defendants says, the whole of this appeal is unnecessary. On the other hand, if the action is dead, then, if the plaintiffs desire to prosecute the existing action, it is clear that they are bound to come to this court.

I must say something about the facts, because I want to make it plain that I am quite unmoved by any of the considerations which counsel for the plaintiffs has put forward by way of excusing the grave delay which has occurred since the issue of the writ on June 2, 1949. I accept entirely what he says about his own difficulty in framing a statement of claim, and, having read the writ, I am not in the least surprised. The writ contains twelve paragraphs of the most involved character. The defendants, who are a firm of solicitors, are accused of various malpractices, all of them fraudulent, and many of the paragraphs, I confess, remain to me still unintelligible. I assume, however, that, as a statement of claim does exist, counsel for the plaintiffs has found it possible to formulate in a statement of claim the necessary facts on which to found a prayer for the appropriate relief. I think, however, that counsel for the defendants is fully justified in saying that, having regard to the nature of the writ and the length of time since it was issued, it is natural and proper that he should rely, if he can, on the strict letter of the order which was made and that it cannot be imputed to his clients, as solicitors, that they are thereby seeking to rely on something technical so as to avoid the ventilation of the charges made against their good faith.

I return to the real question which we have to consider: What is the effect of the order of Nov. 21, 1949? The form of the order, which involved an anticipatory dismissal of the action on failure of performance of a condition, is, I think, one which should be used cautiously. It seems to me not entirely satisfactory that, if at any time it has to be decided whether the action has, or has not, been dismissed, it is necessary to prove facts which may be not always free from controversy. I do not doubt that the learned judge had power, under R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 7, in the exercise of his discretion, to impose terms, and, in particular, to impose the term that, unless the statement of claim was delivered by a certain time, then the action should die. There are numerous instances of the discretion having been so exercised. One of them was in Abalian v. Innous (1), which was before this court in 1936. That case was very different in detail, but the substance of the matter was that an order had been made dismissing the action unless something were done within a certain time. In that case, as in this, the question was: Had the thing specified been done or not? In reference to that state of affairs, GREENE, L.J., used this language ([1936] 2 All E.R. 838), which I respectfully desire to adopt and re-affirm:

A "Speaking for myself, I think that any order dealing with the dismissal of an action unless something is done should be absolutely and perfectly precise in its terms. The dismissal of an action at an interlocutory stage is a very serious matter and may well work serious injustice. If an order is to be made in the form that, unless one party or another party does something, the action will be dismissed, it is imperative that the thing to be done in order to avoid dismissal of the action should be specified in the clearest and most precise language, so that it may be possible for the party on whom the necessity of doing the act lies—which would normally be the plaintiff—to be in no doubt whatsoever as to the steps which he is to take if he is to avoid his action being dismissed. Looking at it in another way: where the defendant, in reliance on such order, goes to the court and asks it to say that, as a result of the order, the action stands dismissed and is no longer existent, he must be able to show first of all, that the language of the order is sufficiently precise, and, secondly, that the facts which the order contemplates have occurred."

C I do not think that the order of Nov. 21, 1949, satisfies the requirements which GREENE, L.J., indicated. I feel that there is very great force in the contention of counsel for the defendants that, when one looks at the rules and then at the order, the proper conclusion is that, when the judge said "delivery on Nov. 28," he meant "delivery at such a time on that date as the rules provide for the purposes there specified." I find it unnecessary to decide that question. But there is, I think, a formidable argument to be addressed in the other direction. One may test it, I think, by supposing that the learned judge had said: "on or before 6 p.m. on Nov. 28." No one, I think, could have suggested that an order in that form was repugnant on the face of it. The gist of the point put on behalf of the plaintiffs is briefly this. True, that for the purposes specified in R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, service at 5.45 p.m. would be treated as service on Tuesday, Nov. 29, but the dismissal of the action for want of prosecution is not one of the purposes specified in R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11. That was the point which appealed to the Irish judges in Browne v. Reid (2), a somewhat similar case, referred to in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, p. 1461, in the note to R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11.

E If it were not for the doubt that I feel about the meaning of the order of Nov. 21, 1949, I think that there would be much to be said for the view on the facts of this case that it was better to let this action die, or remain dead, and that the plaintiffs should then issue a writ which might well be in a form improving on their previous performance, but the worst of that order is that it still leaves unresolved the doubt whether this action is, in truth, dead. In that state of affairs, I have on the whole come to the conclusion that it is more satisfactory that this court should exercise the discretion, which counsel for the defendants concedes it has, to vary the order in such a way as will make it clear that the statement of claim has, in truth, been delivered. After my brethren have delivered their judgments, we will consider how best the matter should be formulated. I am the more inclined to take that view by the language which, I gather from counsel for both parties, the learned judge himself used when this matter last came before him [on Dec. 2, 1949, on an application by the plaintiffs to extend the time for delivery of pleadings]. I think that, when he exercised his discretion by making the order of Nov. 21, 1949, it was not present to his mind that delivery would have to be by 4 p.m., and, from his own words, I gravely doubt whether he would have allowed the action to be treated as dismissed in the present circumstances, had he felt himself free to hold otherwise. As counsel for the defendants has justly pointed out, counsel for the plaintiffs can, strictly, only come here on the footing that the action is dead, otherwise there is no need for him to come. If it be so, nobody is to blame but himself. It was open to him to contest the proposition that it was dead. He could have said that the order had been complied with. He has, however, been disposed to accept the view that the action is dead in order to found jurisdiction in this court. As I have already said, however, I do not think it necessary to express a concluded opinion, because I think, the matter being in doubt, the court has jurisdiction in its discretion to vary the form of the order to remove all doubt and that in the special circumstances it ought to exercise that discretion. Bearing all these matters in mind (including, not the least, the grave delay since the issue of the writ and my sympathy with the position in which the defendants have been put ever since June 2, 1949), I think that, in making the order that I have suggested in the exercise of my discretion, I would, at the least, not allow the plaintiffs any costs of this appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. I confess that I have no sympathy at all for the plaintiffs who, as my Lord has said, have chosen to issue a writ against professional defendants, making serious charges of a most involved character. Having thought fit to do that, they have not thought it necessary to pursue their action with anything approaching the diligence which is reasonably to be expected. These circumstances suggest that the plaintiffs are willing to wound and yet afraid to strike. However that may be, the question before this court is whether in all the circumstances of the case the order made by WYNN-PARRY, J., on Nov. 21, 1949, should stand. In my judgment, it should not, for the following reasons. First, as my Lord has said, there is an ambiguity in the terms of the order. It is left open to doubt whether the order would be complied with by delivery of the statement of claim at any time on Nov. 28, 1949, or whether it was essential that delivery for the purposes of this order and its penal consequences must be made before 4 p.m. in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, as amended by R.S.C. (No. 2), 1939, to allow for war-time difficulties. I think that that ambiguity in itself makes it undesirable that this order should stand, on the principle referred to by my Lord that orders which involve a dismissal in limine of actions unless conditions are complied with should state those conditions in perfectly clear and unambiguous terms.

Secondly, I do not doubt that a judge, in a proper case, has discretion, when extending time, to impose a condition to the effect that, if the thing to be done is not done within the extended time, the action shall stand dismissed. I think that that appears from the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 7, and it is only reasonable that it should be so. After all, the judge could, if so minded, refuse altogether to extend time, and that would automatically result in the action being dismissed, subject to the defendants taking the appropriate formal step. There is, in my view, no serious doubt in regard to the jurisdiction to make an order in the form of the order which WYNN-PARRY, J., made on Nov. 21, 1949. At the same time, I think that it is, on the whole, the more usual practice in such cases to make a final order extending the time with an intimation that no further extension will be granted. If a plaintiff in default does not comply with that order, then it is open to the defendant to apply to dismiss the action. If that more usual course had been taken in the present case, I venture to think that the present difficulty would not have arisen. The plaintiffs, at long last, succeeded in delivering their statement of claim on Nov. 28, 1949, but after 4 p.m. I ask myself whether, in those circumstances, the defendants would have had any prospect at all of getting an order dismissing the action merely because on one construction of the order of WYNN-PARRY, J., the statement of claim was delivered too late, inasmuch as delivery, while effected on the day specified, took place rather less than two hours after the close of the statutory hours for service on that day. In my judgment, the court would have refused an application to dismiss the action on that ground and would have treated the delivery of the statement of claim on Nov. 28, 1949, as a sufficient delivery.

Thirdly and finally, I think that the circumstances in which the order was made were not entirely satisfactory, as the learned judge himself seems to have thought. It was the plaintiffs who applied for an extension of time, and the

A learned judge did not have before him any application by the defendants to dismiss the action. It seems that there was some discussion in regard to the order which the learned judge finally made, in which he made the plaintiffs' solicitors personally liable for the costs of the application. Counsel for the plaintiffs seems to have been pre-occupied with that suggestion, and not to have appreciated that the learned judge was being asked by counsel for the defendants to insert in the order this provision as to the dismissal of the action. I think that, if counsel for the plaintiffs had appreciated the fact that the learned judge was being asked to do that, it may very well be that, had the point been specifically argued before the learned judge, he would have taken the more usual course to which I have adverted instead of including, as he did, the provision in regard to dismissal in the order extending the time. For these reasons, as well as those which have been given by my Lord, I agree with him that the appeal in this case should be allowed on suitable terms as to costs, which I think should be by no means more favourable to the plaintiffs than is absolutely necessary.

HODSON, J.: I agree that there is an ambiguity in the order of Nov. 21, 1949. At the same time, unless this court expresses a view in regard to the matter, it seems to me impossible to determine whether the appeal lies or not, because, unless the action was in fact dismissed by that order, there is no appeal. For my part I would, therefore, think it desirable to say that it appears to me that on the construction of the relevant orders, R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, and R.S.C., Ord. 67, r. 2, the action has, in fact, been dismissed. I would for my part, notwithstanding the argument based on the judgment of HOLMES, J. (30 L.R.Ir. 622), in Browne v. Reid (2), have taken the view that the action was dismissed. R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11, contains in the first sentence these words:

"Service of pleadings . . . shall be effected before the hour of four in the afternoon, except on Saturdays . . ."

It has been conceded that service includes delivery. R.S.C., Ord. 67, r. 2, begins:

E "All writs, notices, pleadings . . . of which personal service is not requisite shall be sufficiently served if left within the prescribed hours . . ."

It would, in my opinion, appear that, as the statement of claim was delivered after the expiration of the prescribed hours, it was not delivered effectively on Nov. 28, 1949, so that the action is dismissed. But the circumstances in which that came about, for the reasons which my Lord has given, appear to me to be unsatisfactory, and I think that the time for delivery of the statement of claim ought to be extended on stringent terms.

Divorce—Adultery—Onus of proof—Charge of adultery by husband—Plea by wife that adultery committed without her consent during a rape on her by the co-respondent.

If, in a husband's suit for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, the husband proves that an act of intercourse between the wife and the co-respondent has taken place, the burden then shifts to the wife to prove that that act occurred against her will and in the course of a rape committed on her by the co-respondent. APPEAL by the husband against a decision of PILCHER, J.

The husband, John Redpath, sought a divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, Milligan. By her answer the wife denied the adultery and prayed for a divorce from her husband on the ground of his desertion. PILCHER, J., dismissed the husband's petition and also the wife's prayer. C

The parties were married on Sept. 24, 1938. In June, 1944, while the husband was abroad serving in the army, the wife arrived at her parents' house at night with her hair dishevelled, with mud on her dress and stockings, and crying, and she informed her parents that she had been raped by the co-respondent. The police were informed, and the co-respondent was charged at Chelmsford Assizes with the rape, but he was acquitted. In April, 1948, the husband filed his petition, alleging that on the occasion mentioned in June, 1944, the wife committed adultery with the co-respondent. D

PILCHER, J., dismissed the charge of adultery on the ground that, once the act of intercourse had been proved, the burden was on the husband to prove that the wife was a willing participator. He said: E

"I am quite satisfied that it is not sufficient for a husband in this type of case, where the issue is whether the wife committed adultery or whether she was raped, to prove that an act of intercourse took place and then to leave it to the wife to satisfy the court that that act of intercourse was against her will. The onus starts with the husband and is not discharged until he has proved an act of intercourse in which his wife was a willing participator . . . The onus of satisfying me that this was an act of adultery, not an act of rape, being on the husband, I am not satisfied that it is discharged in this case. So that disposes of that particular allegation of adultery." F

The husband appealed. The case is only reported on the point dealt with in the headnote. G

Bayne-Powell for the husband.

The wife did not appear.

BUCKNILL, L.J., dealing with this point in the course of his judgment, said: Sexual intercourse is normally a consensual act, that is to say, it requires the consenting minds and bodies of both parties. In my view, once the act of intercourse is established, the burden is on the wife to show that that act was one to which she was forced against her will. I do not think a husband can be expected to prove the state of the wife's mind when the sexual intercourse took place. On the other hand, under s. 4 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, the court has to be satisfied that adultery has been committed. If at the end of the case there is a doubt in the judge's mind H whether adultery has taken place or whether it is a case of rape, it is his duty to dismiss the petition. In the present case I think the learned judge has put an unnecessary burden of proof on the husband and that that has, in part, led him to arrive at a wrong decision. In all the circumstances I am satisfied that the wife committed adultery and that PILCHER, J., was in error in finding that adultery had not been proved.

- A SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. Although, of course, the onus is always on the petitioner to satisfy the court that adultery has been committed I think that the learned judge in this case put too great an onus on the husband, namely, the onus of establishing that the wife was a consenting party to the act of intercourse with the co-respondent. I am not sure that there would be any single principle of onus which one could usefully lay down. I agree with what my Lord has said, if I may say so, on that point. One can consider
- B a case at one end of the scale. If, while a husband is overseas during any possible period of conception, a child is born, the proof of that in ordinary circumstances would be regarded as sufficient evidence to satisfy the court that adultery had been committed. That would be the conclusion if that was the only evidence. Intercourse having been established, consent would be
- C presumed. If, however, the wife sought to say that the birth of the child was the result of intercourse having taken place by force—the result of rape—the onus would be on her to bring evidence to satisfy the court that that was so. In the present case the learned judge, I think, came to the conclusion to which he did because of his view that the husband had not discharged the onus which was on him. The onus of proof in a case may shift from side to side as
- D evidence is given in one direction or the other, but the learned judge regarded the husband as still having on him a very difficult onus to discharge.

- VAISEY, J. : This is, to my mind, rather a difficult case. On the evidence, however, I am satisfied that the onus of proving the commission of an act of adultery on the part of the wife has been sufficiently discharged by the husband. I am in full agreement with everything which has fallen
- E from my Lords, but I venture with some temerity to add one or two observations of my own. In my judgment, an act of sexual intercourse is prima facie consensual, and thus we get a presumption which has to be rebutted by evidence if it is sought to show that a particular act of intercourse was involuntary on the part of the woman. What evidence? Principally, of necessity, the woman's own evidence. In the present case, the learned judge
- F has found himself unable to accept the wife as a witness of truth. Her evidence of the alleged rape would, therefore, appear to be, if not excluded, at least very severely discounted. The other evidence seems to me on the whole to be insufficient to displace the presumption to which I have referred. If I am right on this matter of presumption, it would seem to me to follow that what I think a most important sentence in the learned judge's judgment is, if I may
- G say so with the greatest respect, not quite happily expressed. He said:

"Now I have heard not only the evidence for the petitioner but also the evidence for the respondent, and it is from all this that I have to make up my mind whether I am satisfied that the fact that the wife's admitted intercourse in June, 1944, was voluntary is established."

- H I myself would have posed the question thus:

"Am I satisfied that the wife's admitted intercourse was involuntary?"

The ultimate problem is, on either view, the same. It is the approach that is different and, in my view, vitally different. I agree with my Lords in thinking that this appeal should succeed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Singleton, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), February 14, 15, 1950.]

Divorce—Connivance—Encouragement of situations likely to lead to adultery—Only motive to obtain conclusive evidence.

In 1947 Mr. and Mrs. M., a married couple, became friendly with Mr. and Mrs. F., another married couple, and the following summer the two families took their holidays together. On this occasion a certain degree of familiarity developed between each husband and the other's wife, but neither husband resented the conduct of the other. In July, 1948, M. and Mrs. F., having begun to suspect an adulterous association between their respective spouses, consulted their solicitor and, thereafter, acted on his advice. In August, 1948, Mrs. M., realising that she was having an increasing affection for F., requested her husband to help her to break the association, but he refused to take any steps in the matter and permitted F. to continue to visit his house, frequently leaving the two alone together. About this time M. set up a microphone in his sitting-room with wires leading to the garage. On Sept. 21, 1948, by means of this device, M. and Mrs. F. overheard a conversation between their spouses suggesting that adultery was likely to take place. On entering the room and finding that nothing untoward had occurred, M. and Mrs. F. pretended to accept the explanation of the couple as to their presence together. On Oct. 2, having told his wife that he would be away for the night, M. went to the the garage and, as a result of what he then heard, he entered the room to find F. and Mrs. M. in the act of adultery. At no time up to this date had M. or Mrs. F. given any indication of their suspicions and they had continued to have intercourse with their respective spouses. On petitions by M. and Mrs. F. for divorce,

HELD: the petitioners had allowed and encouraged certain situations to arise which they knew were likely to lead to adultery; the fact that their motive in so acting was to obtain conclusive evidence of the offence was immaterial; the principle volenti non fit injuria applied; and they had connived at the adultery and were not entitled to relief.

APPEALS by the petitioners from orders made by WILLMER, J., dated June 21, 1949, dismissing petitions for divorce on the ground that the petitioners had connived in the adultery of which he found the respondents guilty. Counsel for the petitioners contended that the creation by them of situations in which adultery was likely to take place did not constitute connivance when the only purpose of such action was to obtain conclusive evidence of adultery. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Henry Burton for the petitioners.

Thomas Dewar for the respondent, Manning.

Kenneth Burke for the respondent, Fellows.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : These are two appeals from orders of WILLMER, J., made on June 21, 1949. The two petitions were, in the one case by Mr. Manning asking for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with Mr. Fellows, and in the other case by Mrs. Fellows asking for a decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery with Mrs. Manning. The adultery in each case was admitted and the only issue before the learned judge was whether the two petitioners had connived at their spouses' adultery.

A There is only one allegation of adultery in the two petitions, namely, on the night of Oct. 2-3, 1948, at Mr. Manning's house. The learned judge summed up the evidence in the following words:

B "Having regard to this conclusion I have not the slightest hesitation in finding that the act of adultery complained of was conducted to by the conduct of the two petitioners. Further than that, I feel bound to conclude that the conduct of Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows falls clearly within the definition of connivance as contained in the authorities to which I have referred. These two petitioners, suspecting their spouses of forming an adulterous association, and knowing that that association would almost inevitably lead to adultery, if, indeed, adultery had not already taken place, not only made no effort to stop the association, not only acquiesced in its continuance, but actually took part in promoting and encouraging it, for the purpose of secretly spying on their spouses to obtain evidence for divorce, while at the same time deceiving them by maintaining a false facade of normal married life. From such petitioners this court is bound to withhold relief, and my judgment accordingly is that both

C petitions must be dismissed."

D

I asked counsel for the petitioners whether he quarrelled with that finding of fact of the learned judge, and he said that he was prepared to accept it for the purposes of his argument which was that there cannot be connivance if the action of the petitioner is taken merely to obtain conclusive proof of adultery, but there must be proof that the two spouses intended to promote the adultery for some corrupt purpose. In support of his argument that there was no corrupt behaviour by the petitioners, he pointed out that Mr. Manning, at any rate, was acting throughout, from July 27, 1948, when he and Mrs. Fellows consulted their solicitor, on the advice of the solicitor, and that his only desire was to find out whether the wife was unfaithful and, if so, to obtain conclusive evidence for a divorce. The point that Mr. Manning was acting on the advice of his solicitor seems to me to be irrelevant, because it may be that the solicitor gave erroneous advice. As regards Mr. Manning's only desire being to find out whether the wife was unfaithful, again I think that his desire is immaterial. The question is whether he encouraged and promoted the adultery which took place on the night of Oct. 2, 1948.

F

There are certain aspects of the case which, to my mind, show conclusively that there was connivance on the part of both Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows. The Mannings were married in 1940. Mr. Manning is now thirty-two and his wife is twenty-eight years of age, and there are two children, a boy, born in 1943, and a girl, born in 1947. Mr. Fellows is thirty-nine years of age. He was married to his wife (who is now thirty-eight) in 1934, and there are no children of that marriage. Mr. Manning is a detective in the Manchester Police Force.

G Mr. Fellows is a wholesale florist. Mr. Manning met Mr. Fellows in October, 1947, and the two families became friends. In the following summer they all went on a caravan holiday to Abersoch. A conversation was proved to have taken place after the holiday between Mr. Fellows and a man called Brown, in the course of which Mr. Fellows said he had seduced Mrs. Manning twice during the holiday. Mrs. Fellows overheard this and she reported it to Mr. Manning. There was a dispute whether Mr. Manning taxed his wife with this alleged intrigue. She denied it absolutely, and it is fair to her to say that the judge said that she was a good witness and impressed him favourably. By July 27, 1948, the suspicion of Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows had risen to such an extent that they consulted their solicitor, and, according to them, thereafter acted on his advice. At the beginning of August, Mr. Bowden, who was Mrs. Manning's father, saw his daughter and warned her to cease her friendship with Mr. Fellows. The husband, Mr. Manning, was present at that time. Mrs. Manning told her father, in effect, to mind his own business. About that time there was an important conversation between Mr. and Mrs. Manning, and the learned judge deals with that in this way. He says :

"I find as a fact that she did, as she says, request her husband to be allowed to drop the friendship with the Fellows. The fact that this request was refused confirms me in concluding that from a time certainly as early as August Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows, so far from attempting to stop the association between their spouses, not only acquiesced in its continuance, but did all they could to foster and encourage it, while at the same time taking pains to conceal from their spouses what they already knew and suspected."

Mrs. Manning shows that Mr. Manning had some reason to think that his wife was falling in love with Mr. Fellows, that Mrs. Manning herself realised the danger, and that she appealed to her husband to help her to stop the association, which he could have done easily by telling Mr. Fellows to discontinue his visits to the house. Instead of that, Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows, I think deliberately, set about trying to obtain evidence against the wife, and even to promote it in the sense that they made opportunities for adultery to take place. In pursuance of that plan, they set out to behave as though nothing had happened to excite suspicion. Mr. Manning set up in his sitting-room a microphone, which he hid in the piano, with wires leading to the garage. On Sept. 21, 1948, Mr. Manning, Mrs. Fellows and a detective sat in the garage with ear-phones and heard a conversation between Mrs. Manning and Mr. Fellows of a highly indecent character. They entered the room but only found that the appearance of Mrs. Manning was rather dishevelled. Thereupon Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows acted as if nothing had happened and pretended to believe Mrs. Manning's account that she and Mr. Fellows had fallen asleep while looking at some photographs. By doing that they allayed any suspicion which otherwise might have arisen in the minds of Mrs. Manning and Mr. Fellows. Furthermore, they took every opportunity to go out together so as to leave Mrs. Manning and Mr. Fellows alone, and, indeed, so far as the Fellows were concerned, Mrs. Fellows, in order to allay any suspicion, continued to have intercourse with her husband right up to Oct. 2.

On Oct. 2, Mr. Manning said that he was going to stay the night with his father and Mrs. Fellows said that she was going to nurse her sick father. The result of that was to leave the way clear for Mrs. Manning and her lover, but instead of going to see his father Mr. Manning took some colleagues in the police force to the garage and listened. They rushed into the sitting-room and caught Mrs. Manning and Mr. Fellows in the act of adultery. That seems to me to be a very good illustration of a deliberate encouragement and promotion of adultery on the part of Mr. Manning and, to a lesser extent, on the part of Mrs. Fellows, and that the finding of the learned judge is abundantly justified on the evidence.

Is the submission established that, even on those facts, connivance had not been made out? It has not been suggested here that the learned judge has misdirected himself as to the law. He has based himself on the statement made in the House of Lords by LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Gipps v. Gipps and Hume (1), where LORD WESTBURY, L.C. said (11 H.L. Cas. 14):

"The word 'conniving' is not to be limited to the literal meaning of wilfully refusing to see, or affecting not to see or become acquainted with, that which you know or believe is happening, or about to happen. It must include the case of a husband acquiescing in, by wilfully abstaining from taking any steps to prevent, that adulterous intercourse which, from what passes before his eyes, he cannot but believe or reasonably suspect is likely to occur."

- A It may be said that when one is considering the meaning of the word "connivance," it does not help very much to say that it includes the case of a husband acquiescing in the adulterous intercourse by wilfully abstaining from taking any steps to prevent it, because one then says: "What does 'acquiesce' mean?" and "What does 'wilful' mean?" The principle which
- B underlies the doctrine of connivance which was cited by WILLMER, J., was laid down by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in Glennie v. Glennie & Bowles (2), in which he said (32 L.J.P.M. & A. 20):

- C "I think that to establish connivance it is requisite, not that the party conniving should be actually an accessory before the fact, so as to have taken any active measures to bring about the result of adultery, but that he should be cognisant that such a result would follow from certain transactions that he approved of and consented to; and, therefore, on the principle volenti non fit injuria, he cannot complain of any act he passively assented to."

- D It seems to me that when one looks at the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 178 (2), which follows very closely the words of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 31, which set up the Divorce Court, there are three degrees of blameworthy conduct on the part of the petitioning spouse. In the first place he must not be an "accessory" to the adultery. That is at one end of the scale, and I take "accessory" to mean an active promoter of the adultery. At the other end of the scale there is "conduct conducing" to the adultery, which may be mere slackness, inattention and neglect of such a kind as to contribute to the adultery. Somewhere between those two extremes lies the rather undefined area of "connivance," conduct which seems to me to be largely a question of fact. No useful purpose is served in considering what in one case did constitute connivance and in another case did not, but if it is something worse than mere neglect conducing to adultery and yet not as bad as being an accessory to it, I think that the learned judge is entitled to say:
- F "Well, this, in my opinion, is connivance within the definition as given by LORD WESTBURY, which has, I think, been generally accepted, and I hold that there was connivance in fact and in law." That is what the learned judge has done in this case, and I myself see no ground on which this court could say he was wrong. For these reasons, in my judgment, these appeals should be dismissed.

- G SINGLETON, L.J. [after stating the facts]: The submission to this court of counsel for the petitioners was that there was no connivance in law, because, on the true view of that which had taken place, each of the petitioners was merely endeavouring to find evidence to support a petition. Counsel referred the court to a number of old authorities, one of which was Rogers v. Rogers (3), in which SIR JOHN NICHOLL said (3 Hag. Ecc. 58):

- H "Without doubt, connivance on the part of the husband will, in point of law, bar him from obtaining relief on account of the adultery which he has allowed to take place. Volenti non fit injuria is the principle on which the rule has been founded."

* The report has a footnote (ibid.) to this effect:

"In Forster v. Forster (4) SIR WILLIAM SCOTT says (1 Hag. Con. 146):
 "A fourth defence is, that he has connived at, encouraged, and promoted, his own dishonour; for in that case the general rule of law comes in—"Volenti non fit injuria"—no injury has been done, and therefore there is nothing to redress."

The finding of the learned judge makes it clear that this is not a case in which the petitioners were merely seeking evidence on which each of them could base a petition. If the concluding paragraph of the judgment is examined it shows without doubt that there was something more than that. The learned judge, who saw the witnesses and was able to form his view of them, and had before him the letters, which gave some support to the case of Mrs. Manning, said:

"These two petitioners, suspecting their spouses of forming an adulterous association, and knowing that that association would almost inevitably lead to adultery, if indeed adultery had not already taken place, not only made no effort to stop the association, not only acquiesced in its continuance, but actually took part in promoting and encouraging it, for the purpose of secretly spying on their spouses to obtain evidence for divorce, while at the same time deceiving them by maintaining a false facade of normal married life. From such petitioners this court is bound to withhold relief, and my judgment accordingly is that both petitions must be dismissed."

That passage shows that the learned judge found, first, that both petitioners knew that the association between Mrs. Manning and Mr. Fellows would almost inevitably lead to adultery—Mrs. Manning had twice asked her husband to break off the friendship with the Fellows but he declined to do so. Secondly, that the petitioners (Mr. Manning first and foremost) made no effort to stop the association. Thirdly, that they acquiesced in its continuance; and, further, that they actually took part in promoting and encouraging it. The learned judge's findings of fact are not seriously attacked—they cannot be, in the circumstances. If a husband promotes and encourages the adultery of his wife, relief ought not to be granted to that husband. I agree that the appeals fail.

HODSON, J.: It is important to bear in mind that this case, as pleaded and fought, concerned an act of adultery on Oct. 2, 1948. It is clear from the findings of the learned judge that he was abundantly justified in coming to the conclusion that that act of adultery was connived at. He uses the phrase that the guilty parties were lulled into a sense of security, and I think they were lulled in three ways: (i) by the fact that their respective spouses continued to have intercourse with them till very near the crucial date after, according to them, they had become practically certain that adultery had been committed and were trying to get evidence; (ii) on Sept. 21, 1948, when the petitioners had heard a conversation which, taken at its face value, plainly meant that these people were admitting adultery, they pretended to both of them that they accepted their explanations and did not suspect anything; and (iii) (and this affects Mr. Manning only) Mrs. Manning had in August, 1948, asked her husband to stop the association which existed between herself and Mr. Fellows, realising the danger which she ran, a request which was ignored by Mr. Manning. Although that affects Mr. Manning only, both these petitioners were continuing to promote and encourage the association by continuing the regular meetings with the families which had been taking place over the period of the friendship. I do not think the petitioners can, therefore, succeed on this appeal by arguing that the position is different because adultery must almost certainly have taken place before Oct. 2, and, therefore, the petitioners, if merely seeking to establish adultery, could not be guilty of a corrupt intention. The issue whether adultery took place before Oct. 2 has never been tried, and it was not pleaded. Moreover, the learned judge at the trial refused an application for an amendment and the respondent Mrs. Manning was not asked any questions about previous adultery. The adultery, if any, committed by these people before Oct. 2 has not been made the subject-matter of any plea of connivance, and the decision in this case has no bearing on it. I agree that the appeals fail and should be dismissed.

MUDGE v. MUDGE AND HONEYSETT (GOODWIN cited).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson, J.), February 6, 7, 1950.]

C Divorce—Connivance—“Passive acquiescence”—Wife watched by husband—Act of adultery observed—No intervention by husband.

D A husband, who was living apart from his wife, had reason to believe that she was living in adultery. On the night of Dec. 8, 1948, he and certain detectives concealed themselves outside the house where the wife was living and on looking through the window they saw her and the co-respondent in the act of adultery. The husband having filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the adultery in question, the wife, by her answer, denied the charge and also pleaded that, if she had committed adultery, the husband had connived at it in that he had failed to intervene and prevent the commission of the act.

E HELD: the position was the same as if the husband had not kept watch personally, but had merely sent agents to watch his wife; the husband had not lulled his wife into a sense of security to enable himself to obtain evidence against her; he had not passively acquiesced in her adultery with the intention of promoting its initiation or encouraging its continuance; and, therefore, he was not guilty of connivance.

PETITION by the husband for divorce on the ground of adultery.

H By her answer, the wife denied having committed adultery and alleged that the husband, by concealing himself in a position from which he could observe the alleged act of adultery and failing to take steps to prevent its commission, had been guilty of connivance.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., Andrew Lyell, and W. Scrivens for the wife.

HODSON, J.: The husband, Raymond Mudge, is seeking a divorce from his wife, Mary Lavinia Mudge, on the ground of her adultery with one Douglas Honeysett who has not taken any part in the proceedings. By her answer the wife, in the first place, denied adultery, but by an amendment she added to the denial a statement that, if she had committed adultery, the husband had connived at and was accessory to the adultery in that, on the night of Dec. 9, 1948, he was present at the house "Foxpitts," West Farley, Maidstone, Kent, where the wife was living, and at all material times kept out of sight or hearing of the wife and the co-respondent, and neglected or failed to prevent the wife committing adultery with the co-respondent.

Adultery by the wife has been clearly proved. So far as connivance is concerned, there are difficulties in laying down general propositions about what is or is not connivance. The fact that the husband was watching on the night in question, in company with detectives, is not disputed, nor is it disputed that, while he was watching through the window, adultery, if it took place, occurred between the wife and the co-respondent. It is said that a man who does nothing in those circumstances to stop his wife committing adultery is conniving at her adultery by passive acquiescence. To my mind, the situation would have been exactly the same if the husband had not been there himself, but had merely sent agents to have his wife watched, he being suspicious of his wife's chastity and having reason to believe that she had committed adultery in the past.

The question, therefore, is: By simply doing nothing to stop his wife committing adultery did he connive at her adultery? The most recent case on the subject of connivance is Churchman v. Churchman (1) in which LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 194):

"... it is of the essence of connivance that it precedes the event and, generally speaking, the material event is the inception of the adultery and not its repetition, although the facts may be such that connivance at the continuance of an adulterous association shows that the husband must be taken to have connived at it from the first."

Later he said (ibid., 195):

"Much of the difficulty in dealing with the question of connivance arises from the fact that in the past judges have gone beyond the facts of the particular case in an attempt to lay down general principles of wider application. In our opinion it is of the utmost importance to bear in mind that the issue is whether on the facts of the particular case the husband was or was not guilty of the corrupt intention of promoting or encouraging either the initiation or the continuance of the wife's adultery; and that the court should not allow its judgment to be affected by importing, as principles of universal application, pronouncements made with regard to wholly different circumstances, and so be led to a conclusion contrary to the justice of the case."

It is desirable to read that passage before referring to some of the language used in older cases which is said to lay a foundation for the argument that a man who does nothing and watches to see whether his suspicions are confirmed is guilty of connivance.

The phrase "passive acquiescence" appears in the judgment of SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Rogers v. Rogers (2). He says (3 Hag. Ecc. 59):

"Passive acquiescence would be sufficient to bar the husband, provided it appeared to be done with the intention and in the expectation that [the wife] would be guilty of the crime; but on the other hand it has always been held that there must be a consent. The injury must be volenti ... Thus in Walker v. Walker (3), LORD STOWELL [stated]: 'The defence is not a denial of the fact, but that which, if established, is said to be equivalent in law. It is said, that the husband connived; but they do not impute active means, but a passive consent. I take the position laid down by Dr.

ARNOLD, to be the true doctrine—that passive consent is sufficient; but there must be a consent, an acquiescence of his will; not mere negligence; not too high a confidence, or a misplaced confidence:—there must be evidence that he was passively concurrent; that he saw the train laid for the corruption of his wife; that he saw it with pleasure, and gave a degree of passive concurrence to it’.”

- A Some comment has been made in a later case about the apparent irrelevance of the emotion aroused in the petitioner by what he sees, but the use of the term “passive acquiescence,” if one leaves out of account the reference to intention, may, perhaps, be misleading. If a man does nothing, without lulling into a sense of security the wife about whom he is suspicious, but watches her, he is not by any means necessarily guilty of passive acquiescence with a corrupt
- B intent which would satisfy the language of LORD MERRIMAN in Churchman v. Churchman (1). In the present case the wife was not lulled into a false sense of security, because she had no knowledge of the observation of her husband and, as I have already indicated, it seems to me to make no difference whether the watching or the passivity was that of the husband himself or that of his agents. Qui facit per alium facit per se. In Pearl v. Pearl and Lees (4), a
- C Canadian case, the opposite conclusion was reached in circumstances very like the present, but I cannot see that the actual method by which the husband watches—whether he instals himself inside the house or outside the house, or whether he employs others to do the watching for him—can make any difference, although, I would add, I agree with LAIDLAW, J.A., who was shocked by the circumstances of the case with which he had to deal. It is obviously revolting
- D to consider circumstances where a man is driven to keep watch in order to see whether or not his wife has fallen, but it does not follow that because the circumstances of the particular case are unattractive the standard of duty which the law imposes varies. The law does not always set such a high standard in the conduct of persons as may conceivably be set by ethics, and if I were to hold that a man who acted as the husband did in the present case and watched his wife to
- E see whether his suspicions were well founded or unfounded was guilty of connivance, I should be doing the equivalent of what has never been done in this country, viz., rejecting the petition of a person who, while not doing the watching himself, employs other people to do it for him.
- F For these reasons I see no ground for the allegation that the husband has either connived at or been an accessory to his wife’s adultery, and, therefore, I reject the prayer of the answer and there must be a decree nisi in favour of the husband.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Sellers, JJ.), February 20, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Confession—Confession of two crimes—Admissibility on trial for one crime—Murder—Charges of murder of wife and child—Trial on charge relating to child—Admissibility of confession of murder of wife. A

Following the apparent disappearance of his wife and child the appellant made several statements to the police in the last of which he confessed that he had murdered both of them. At the trial separate indictments were preferred against the appellant, charging him with the murders, and the prosecution elected to proceed on the charge of murdering the child. When the prosecution sought to put in evidence the appellant's confession that he had murdered his wife and child the defence objected that it was inadmissible. B

HELD: that the evidence was relevant and, therefore, admissible.

Per curiam: In the opinion of the court, the real test we have to apply is: Was the evidence relevant, i.e., did the statements which the appellant made with regard to the death of his wife bear on the question whether he was guilty or not guilty of the death of the child? In our opinion, it is impossible to say that the evidence was not relevant. Indeed, it was highly relevant in a case where, as here, two bodies, the body of the mother and the child, were found together in a house in which the appellant had been living. If the bodies of a mother and an infant child are found lying together, murdered, in a place, surely the evidence with regard to the death of the mother must be relevant to the question how the death of the child occurred and by whom the deaths were caused. APPEAL against conviction at the Central Criminal Court before LEWIS, J., of murder.

The appellant was convicted of the murder of his infant daughter. Evidence was given that he had confessed to having murdered both his wife and the child, and at the trial objection was taken to the admission of that part of the confession which related to the death of the wife. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J. G

Malcolm Morris for the appellant.

Christmas Humphreys and Elam for the Crown. H

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court before LEWIS, J., of the murder of his infant daughter. A variety of grounds of appeal have been urged on his behalf, but there is only one point with which it is necessary to deal at any length, and that is whether or not evidence with regard to statements which he made with regard to the death of his wife and his admission that he had caused her death was admissible in the case.

A One cannot deal with this sort of question in an academic manner because it depends entirely on the nature of the case. The appellant and his wife and child were living in a house in which there were also living a Mr. and Mrs. Christie. At some time on the material date in November, 1949, the wife and child apparently disappeared from the house. I say "apparently" because their bodies were afterwards found there. They disappeared after Christie had heard during the night in the flat where the appellant lived noises of a description which caused him to get up and look out of the window to see if he could see what was happening. The explanation of the noises became only too apparent later. Next day, or the day after, Christie saw the appellant and B was told by him that Mrs. Evans had gone to Bristol with the child. On Christie's expressing some surprise that she had not even said "goodbye"—because, apparently, they were living on terms of friendship—the appellant explained that she had to go off in a hurry and that she would write. The appellant himself went away, but some days afterwards he came back and said that his wife was still down at Bristol or South Wales, it matters not where. C Mrs. Evans and the child were never seen alive again. The metropolitan police, who had been informed, communicated with the police in South Wales where the appellant had gone, and he was subsequently arrested at Merthyr Tydfil. From that time on he proceeded to make various statements to account for the disappearance of his wife.

D When the appellant was arrested he proceeded to make a variety of statements, the first of which was this. Owing to his wife being pregnant, he said, he had discussed the matter with a stranger who had given him a bottle of pills for her to take, that she took the pills, and that the next day he found her lying dead on her bed; he first took her body to the flat below, which was at that time vacant, the owner being away ill; and later that night after Mr. and Mrs. Christie had gone to bed, he took the body downstairs and put it E head first down the drain in the front of the house. Later that day he told the police that that story was untrue and he wanted to make another statement. On Nov. 30, which was the same day as he made the first statement, he said that Christie, who lived with his own wife on the ground floor, offered to perform an operation for abortion on his (the appellant's) wife, but he refused to have anything to do with the suggestion. However, the appellant's wife told F the appellant that she had arranged with Christie to perform this operation, and that it was to be done on the morning of Nov. 8. On the appellant's return from work that day Christie met him at the door, took him upstairs, and showed him his wife lying dead on her bed. Then Christie took the body down to the flat below and left it there, and told the appellant he would put the body down one of the drains to avoid trouble. The appellant stayed upstairs and fed G and looked after the baby, and then went to bed himself. The next morning he went to work, and during his absence Christie arranged for a young couple in East Acton to take charge of the child. Christie said this couple would come for the baby the next morning, which they did. That would show that this baby was alive for a whole day after the mother was dead. As I have already said, so far as the evidence goes, no one saw the child alive. On his return from work, Christie told him that the baby had been taken away, and that he had H put Mrs. Evans' body down the drain. Christie then advised him to sell his furniture and leave the district. The appellant followed his advice and went and stayed with his aunt in Wales where he remained. It is material now to say that the bodies of the wife and child were found together concealed in the boiler-room of this house where the appellant lived.

When the appellant was taken into custody by the metropolitan police after his arrest in Wales, he made a further statement. This time he said that on Nov. 8 he had strangled his wife with a piece of rope and had taken the body down to the flat below, and that after the Christies had gone to bed he took the body down into the yard and hid it in the wash-house, where it was found. The statement describes how, on Nov. 10, he came home and strangled the baby and hid her in the wash-house. Whether he strangled her on Nov. 8 or Nov. 10 is not, in the opinion of the court, in the least material. He said he strangled her on Nov. 10. I have already pointed out that the wife disappeared and the child disappeared, as far as any evidence goes, at the same time, but it does not matter which story is true on that particular issue. The appellant who had previously said that his wife's body had been put into a drain (by which I suppose he meant a sewer outside), and that Christie had taken the body and put it into the drain because he had performed an operation for abortion, now admitted that he strangled his wife—and her death was due to strangulation and not an operation for abortion—and that he put her body in the very place where her body was found, and alongside her body was found the body of the child which also, he said, he had strangled. Finally, he made a statement in which he described how he killed his wife and what he did with her body, and how he later murdered the child in his own room, and so on.

He was charged with the murder both of his wife and child and brought before an examining magistrate. The depositions were taken with regard to both charges, and the magistrate committed him for trial on both charges. Although two charges of murder can be included in one indictment this court has strongly expressed the view that not more than one murder should be included in one indictment. Accordingly, two indictments were preferred against the appellant, one for the murder of the wife and the other for murder of the child. The prosecution, electing, as they had the right to elect, decided that they would proceed with the indictment charging the murder of the child. Before the case was open to the jury, a submission was made to LEWIS, J., that no evidence with regard to the murder of the wife could be given before the jury on the charge relating to the murder of the child. LEWIS, J., overruled that submission, and allowed to be given in evidence on that charge the statements which the appellant had made relating to the murder of his wife. It is argued by counsel for the appellant that that was wrong, that the prosecution had no right to lead that evidence, and, that LEWIS, J., should not have admitted it. He submitted that the evidence would only have been admissible to show system, as has been done in some well known murder cases, but no system was alleged here, nor, it was argued, was there any evidence that the two murders were committed at one and the same time, but, so far as there was any evidence, there was the statement of the man that he killed the child two days afterwards.

In the opinion of the court, the real test we have to apply is: Was the evidence relevant, that is to say, did the statements which the appellant made with regard to the death of his wife bear on the question whether he was guilty or not guilty of the death of the child? In our opinion, it is impossible to say that the evidence was not relevant. Indeed, it was highly relevant in a case where, as here, two bodies, the body of the mother and the child, were found together in a house in which the appellant had been living. To account for the bodies of his wife and child being found there, both strangled, the appellant gave three explanations to the police, in two of which he accused first a stranger and then Christie of being responsible for the killing of the mother. Then came the third story in which he confessed both to the murder of the wife and to that of the child. In those circumstances it was most material that evidence should be given as to what the appellant had said in accounting for the bodies being found. If the bodies of a mother and an infant child are found lying together, murdered, in a place, surely evidence with regard to the death of the mother must be relevant to the question how the death of the child occurred and by whom the deaths were caused. It is not a question of system. It is a question of relevance, and this evidence was relevant to show that the third statement which the appellant made was a true confession, because (as, perhaps, it is hardly necessary to say) in the witness-box he went back on it and said the confession was not true. It is material for that purpose to see what he said with regard to the whole matter for which he had to account. It was no good in a case of this sort accounting for the body of the child and not that of the mother. The appellant himself said: "I murdered the mother, my wife, by strangling, and thereafter I murdered my daughter by strangling her."

In our opinion, LEWIS, J., was right in admitting the evidence, because it was relevant and not on any such ground as that it would be very inconvenient to try to disentangle the sentences which dealt with the daughter and not the mother. It was one and the same story and, in our opinion, that evidence was clearly relevant. In our view, the appellant was properly convicted, there is no ground for interfering with the conviction, and the appeal is dismissed.

Re JOHNSTON'S APPLICATION. JOHNSTON v. SHOBROOK.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), February 3, 21, 1950.]

War Damage—Value payment—Apportionment—Proprietary interest—"Incident" of proprietary interest—Option to lessee to purchase freehold reversion—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 12 (3).

By a lease, dated Jan. 1, 1936, A., the freeholder of certain premises which were a "developed hereditament" within the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 5, demised them to B. for a term of eight years from Christmas, 1935. The lease contained a proviso entitling B., by notice in writing given before the expiration of the term, to purchase the freehold reversion for £2,750. On Mar. 22, 1941, the premises became a total loss owing to war damage, and as a result a value payment of £2,380 became payable. B. did not serve notice either of disclaimer or retention of the lease, and the option to purchase was not exercised. On a question as to the apportionment of the value payment between A. and B. as the owners of the proprietary interests, HELD: the option to purchase the freehold reversion was an incident which B.'s proprietary interest had at the material date within the meaning of s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1943, and it must, therefore, be taken into account in making the apportionment.

CASE STATED pursuant to the War Damage (Valuation Appeals) Act, 1945, sched., para. 11, and R.S.C., Ord. 55c, r. 3, to determine whether an option to purchase the reversion in fee simple contained in a lease dated Jan. 1, 1936, was an incident which the proprietary interests in the demised premises had at the material date for the purposes of the apportionment of compensation payable under the War Damage Act, 1943. The tribunal set up under the Act of 1945 found that the option was such an incident, but stated this Case at the instance of the (then surviving) lessor.

Feb. 21. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. This is a Case stated under R.S.C., Ord. 55c, r. 3, by the tribunal set up under the War Damage (Valuation Appeals) Act, 1945, which substituted that tribunal for the referee constituted under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 32, for the purpose of determining questions arising in giving effect to certain of the provisions of that Act. The Case is stated at the instance of the then surviving freeholder of some property situate in Church Street, Plymouth, consisting of an office, shop, store and a warehouse with a yard. This kind of property is defined in s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1943 as "a developed hereditament." It became a total loss by war damage on Mar. 22, 1941, as a result of which a value payment is to be made under the Act of 1943 amounting to £2,380. It is as to the division of this sum that the dispute has arisen. Immediately before the material date the property was in the possession of the respondent lessee under a lease of Jan. 1, 1936, for the unexpired residue of a term of eight years from Christmas, 1935. The lease contained a proviso entitling the tenant, if so minded, by written notice given before the expiration of the term to purchase the reversion in fee simple on the term for £2,750. This option was never exercised, nor did the lessee serve any notice of disclaimer or of retention after the damage occurred. The lease expired in the ordinary course at Christmas, 1943. The site then reverted to the freeholders, then the two original lessors but now the representatives of the surviving lessor.

It is clear from s. 10 of the Act of 1943 that the relevant unit for the purposes of awarding the value payment was the developed hereditament as a whole, i.e., the entire subject-matter of the demise, and that it was with this alone that the War Damage Commission was concerned and in respect of damage to which the sum I have mentioned has been paid without regard to the interests subsisting in the hereditament. These interests are in the Act styled "proprietary interests," of which, having regard to s. 123, there may be two, namely, the fee simple and the lease, this being a tenancy other than a short tenancy within the meaning of that section. It is further clear enough that, under s. 12 (2) (b) of the Act, the war damage payment is to be apportioned between these two proprietary interests, and the difference which has arisen concerns the method of apportionment, and is, in short, whether the option to which I have referred should be taken into account as the tribunal has decided, or whether, as the appellant lessor contends, it should be disregarded. The difference to the contending parties is considerable.

The answer to this question, which I have not found an easy one to resolve, depends on the construction of the Act of 1943, which was a consolidating Act, its main predecessor being the War Damage Act, 1941, described in its title as "An Act to make provision with respect to war damage to immovable property." Now, immediately before the material date, there were two interests in this immovable property, one the freehold subject to the option, and the other the leasehold with the benefit of the option. Either or both of these interests could be sold in the open market, and there can be no doubt that the existence of the option, which was at a favourable price, must have been an element which decreased the freeholder's, but increased the leaseholder's, interest. When the war damage occurred, the freeholder suffered damage to his reversion, but, in effect, he got rid of the option, for it ceased to be favourable to the lessee, who, on the other hand, lost everything, for the two remaining years of the lease were valueless or worse having regard to the destruction of the buildings, while the option ceased to be worth exercising. On general principles, therefore, one would expect each party to be compensated according to what he had lost, and this would necessarily involve taking the option into account, even though it might be obvious that it would never be exercised once the damage had occurred.

I turn, therefore, to the Act to see whether it has the operation which I should expect. I start with this, that the option is not itself a proprietary interest within the definition section (s. 123). Apportionment is regulated by s. 12 (2) (b) which provides:

"... in any other case, the payment shall be apportioned between the several proprietary interests subsisting in the hereditament or in any part thereof at the material time which were depreciated in value by reason of the war damage in shares proportionate to the extent to which they were respectively so depreciated, and a right to receive the share of the payment apportioned to each of those proprietary interests and a like share of the interest on the payment shall vest in the person who was at the material time the owner of that proprietary interest, subject as aforesaid."

For the purpose of measuring the depreciation caused by the war damage, the relevant section is s. 12 (3), and it is, I think, agreed that the option, if it is to be taken into account, must come in as being, in the inelegant language of the sub-section, an incident which the leasehold interest had at the material time, and, accordingly, the question stated in the Case is in these terms:

"Whether the option to purchase the reversion in fee simple contained in the said lease dated Jan. 1, 1936, is an incident which the proprietary interests had at the material time."

What, then, is the meaning of the word "incident" as used in the Act of 1943? Apart from s. 12, it is to be found many times in the valuation provisions in sched. II to the Act where the cross-heading to para. 3 is: "Valuation of proprietary interests: incidents under Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Acts, etc." In para. 3 (1) one finds again the expression "the like incidents as a proprietary interest therein had": in para. 3 (2) and (4) are mentioned "incidents arising" under certain Acts, and in the latter "incidents so arising which in fact attach to the interest." In para. 3 (5) certain "incidents" are to be disregarded, and here the word, apparently, refers to certain facts about the hereditament as, for instance, that it is, or is not, subject to a mortgage or a rentcharge, or to restrictions under certain enactments, or to a liability to become so subject. This is loose language, and it is urged on me by counsel for the lessee that the word is not used in any strict sense, and that any fact affecting the value of a proprietary interest is, for the purposes of this Act, described as an incident of that interest. This, he says, is an excellent description of the option here, the existence of the option being a fact constituting an incident which each proprietary interest had.

Counsel for the lessor, on the other hand, argued that the word should be more strictly interpreted. He submitted that an option contained in a lease to purchase the freehold reversion expectant on the term is no part of the lease, but is a collateral bargain independent of it. Such an option might have been granted to a lessee by an independent deed, or to a stranger to the lease, or there might exist an option without any lease at all. In none of these cases could it be described as an incident which the lease had, nor could it have ranked for a share of the value payment because it is not itself a proprietary interest. In support of these propositions I was referred to authority, and, in particular, to Woodall v. Clifton (1). In that case, the assign of a lease for a term of ninety-nine years sought to enforce, against the assign of the lessor, an option to purchase the fee simple contained in the lease, and it was clear that, unless the burden of the option was so annexed to the reversion as to run with the land, it would not bind the assigns of the reversion and would also be void as infringing the rule against perpetuities. The Court of Appeal decided the case on the footing that the liability to perform the covenant did not run with the land, and ROMER, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1905] 2 Ch. 279):

"The question in the present case is whether the statute was intended to cover, or can be construed as covering, such a covenant or proviso as we have now to consider, so as to make the liability to perform it run with the reversion. We have come to the conclusion that that question must be answered in the negative. The covenant is aimed at creating, at a future time, the position of vendor and purchaser of the reversion between the owner and the tenant for the time being. It is in reality not a covenant concerning the tenancy or its terms. Properly regarded, it cannot, in our opinion, be said to directly affect or concern the land, regarded as the subject-matter of the lease, any more than a covenant with the tenant for the sale of the reversion to a stranger to the lease could be said to do so. It is not a provision for the continuance of the term, like a covenant to renew, which has been held to run with the reversion, though the fact that a covenant to renew should be held to run with the land has by many been considered as an anomaly, which it is too late now to question, though it is difficult to justify. An option to purchase is not a provision for the shortening of the term of the lease, like a notice to determine or a power of re-entry, though the result of the option, if exercised, would or might be to destroy the tenancy. It is, to our minds, concerned with something wholly outside the relation of landlord and tenant with which the statute of Henry VIII was dealing [32 Hen. 8, c. 34, dealing with grantees of reversions: repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 207 and sched. VII.]

To the like effect is Re Leeds and Batley Breweries, etc. (2), of which I need only read the headnote, which is as follows:

"An option contained in a lease to purchase the reversion and so destroy the tenancy is not one of the terms of the tenancy. It is a provision outside of the terms which regulate the relations between the landlord as landlord and the tenant as tenant, and is not one of the terms of the original tenancy which will be incorporated into the terms of the yearly tenancy created by the tenant holding over after the expiration of the lease."

My attention was also drawn to certain further sections of the Act of 1943 with a view to showing that where the legislature intended the owner of a proprietary interest to be bound to share the value payment with, or pay it to, some other person, special provisions are found for that purpose. Thus, s. 24 gives rights over the value payment to a mortgagee, while s. 25 similarly protects the interest of an owner of a rentcharge. Section 27 deals with settled land, s. 29 gives rights to a devisee under a will, and s. 30 gives rights to a purchaser under a contract pending at the time of the damage. This last was particularly relied on on the ground that, if it was necessary to make special provision that the vendor under a pending contract should hold the value payment in trust for the purchaser, this must imply that, even where the equitable interest has passed by virtue of the contract, the vendor as estate owner of the proprietary interest in the freehold is, or might, but for the section, be entitled to retain the value payment. It was said to follow that, as under an option not exercised no contract exists and no equitable interest has passed, the grantor of the option, having the legal estate and the equitable interest, ought not to forfeit any part of the value payment to the grantee of the option, there being no equity in the grantee to pass any of it to him. This, of course, is true where there is an option unconnected with a lease, but it does not solve the problem where the option and the lease are coupled together, so that, as here, the assign of the lease could have exercised the option without any express assignment to him of the benefit of it: see Batchelor v. Murphy (3). In that case SIR ERNEST POLLOCK, M.R., speaking of an option to purchase the freehold reversion on a lease, said ([1925] Ch. 226), after referring to the Leeds and Batley Breweries' case (2):

"... an option to purchase the reversion and so destroy the tenancy is not really one of the terms of the tenancy. It is a provision which is outside the terms which regulate the relations between landlord as landlord and tenant as tenant. It is in truth and in fact a collateral bargain. It is not one of the terms of the demise. It is incidental but collateral to the demise. In the present case—and this I think is the only outside matter which has any weight upon my mind—there is this. It is quite clear that if the Murphys had taken by assignment of the original lease of Oct. 17, 1913, they would have acquired this option. It would have passed to them under an assignment."

C SARGANT, L.J., in the same case said (ibid., 231):

"Now it is to be noticed that if there had been a mere assignment by Clarkson to the Murphys, the necessary result would have been that the Murphys would have been entitled to the option of purchase given to Clarkson by the lease to him..."

Finally, it was submitted that an incident must be something affecting the legal estate in the freehold, for otherwise the sections just mentioned would have been unnecessary, as the word "incident" would have sufficiently protected the rights of the persons mentioned. I feel the force of these arguments, but, on the whole, in my judgment, it is not enough to outweigh what I should have considered the natural meaning of the section which must, I think, have been intended to apportion the compensation in proportion to the loss suffered. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the tribunal was right, and that this option was an incident which the proprietary interests had at the material date, or, in other words, that, on the true construction of s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1943, an incident must be taken to mean any factor connected with the proprietary interests which, immediately before the war damage, would have affected the value of each of them in the market. I, therefore, propose to answer the question in the case by declaring that the option to purchase the reversion in fee simple contained in the lease is an incident which the proprietary interest had at the material time. The appellants will pay the costs of the application as between party and party.

A wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, which he did not deny, but she later decided not to proceed with the suit and withdrew the petition. The husband then petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty, and asked for the exercise of the court's discretion in his favour by reason of his adultery. The learned commissioner by whom the petition was heard found the charges of cruelty proved, exercised his discretion in the husband's favour, and pronounced a decree of divorce. The wife appealed.

HELD: there was evidence on which the learned commissioner could find that the wife had been guilty of cruelty, and the Court of Appeal could not interfere with his decision.

PER DENNING, L.J. (in reference to the suggestion of the wife that she would be deprived of maintenance by reason of having a decree made against her): "There is nothing in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which says that a wife against whom a decree has been made cannot be awarded maintenance, and there is nothing in it about discretion being exercised 'in favour of' one side or the other, or about 'a compassionate allowance.' All s. 190 (1) of that Act says is that, on a decree of divorce, the court may award maintenance to the wife, and, ever since 1902, it has been settled that this includes a wife against whom a decree has been made, and she is not bound to show special circumstances (Ashcroft v. Ashcroft [1902] P. 270). The court has, of course, to have regard to 'the conduct of the parties,' but the form of the decree is not conclusive on that. If, on an investigation of the facts, it appears ... that the conduct of the wife has been much less blameworthy than that of the husband, then, even though a decree has been pronounced against her, she is entitled to ask for maintenance as fully as if a decree had been pronounced in her favour, or at least as if it had been pronounced in favour of both parties. I wish that questions of maintenance could be dealt with by the judges who try these cases, but, no matter on whose petition they grant the divorce, they can at least—and they should, in my opinion—express their views on the conduct of the parties so as to assist those who have to deal with maintenance."

HODGKINS v. HODGKINS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Singleton, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), February 16, 1950.]

Nullity—Impotence—Sole evidence of petitioner—Need of corroboration.

In 1935 the parties went through a ceremony of marriage, but the husband failed to consummate the marriage, and in February, 1949, he left the matrimonial home. On a petition by him for a decree of nullity on the ground of his own impotence, the only evidence as to his physical condition was the uncontradicted evidence of the husband himself and of a doctor. The learned commissioner disregarded the medical evidence and held that the uncorroborated evidence of the husband was insufficient on which to found a decree.

HELD: no higher standard of proof was required in a case of nullity than in one of divorce; in the present case, corroboration of the husband's evidence, although desirable, was not essential; and there should be a new trial.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of His Honour JUDGE WILLES sitting as a commissioner in divorce, dated July 27, 1949, dismissing his petition for nullity on the ground of his own impotence.

Victor Russell for the husband.

The wife was not represented.

BUCKNILL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: We have looked at a number of authorities on the question how far a judge, though not legally bound, ought to accept the testimony given on oath in open court by a man, like the husband here, who is prepared to come into court and to admit that he is to some extent impotent, against whom there is nothing to show that he is an unreliable witness, and who gives his evidence straightforwardly. How far is a judge justified in rejecting the husband's evidence because he thinks that there are elements of doubt raised by the husband's conduct in not discussing such an unsavoury matter with somebody else? In PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 8th edn., p. 476, under the heading "Number of Witnesses, Corroboration" there appears the following:

"As a general rule, courts may act on the testimony of a single witness, even though uncorroborated; or upon duly proved documentary evidence without such testimony at all . . . And where that testimony is unimpeached they should act on it (Morrow v. Morrow (1)), and need not leave its credit to the jury . . . But whenever there are circumstances of suspicion, or the testimony of a witness is challenged by cross-examination or otherwise, corroboration thereof is allowed; and in the several cases mentioned below corroboration is required either by law or well-established rule of practice."

The headnote to Morrow v. Morrow (1) states:

"There is no rule of law precluding a jury in an action for criminal conversation from acting on the uncorroborated evidence of the plaintiff's wife as to acts of adultery committed with the defendant."

As regards corroboration in general, CHERRY, C.J., said in that case ([1914] 2 I.R. 188):

"On the second point, I cannot find that any court has ever laid down as a rule of law that in an action for criminal conversation corroboration of the wife's evidence is necessary. It is most unusual to examine the wife as a witness to prove her own guilt; and the cases cited by Mr. MacLoone are authorities only for the proposition that the confession of the wife to the husband, or a third party, is not evidence as against the adulterer, it being merely hearsay as against him, and upon that ground not admissible at all. It is clearly established by Robinson v. Robinson (2) that in proceedings for divorce the admissions or confessions of the respondent are not admissible evidence against the co-respondent. That is a question of the admissibility of evidence, and not a question of corroboration. The same case decides that in a suit for the dissolution of a marriage the court may act on the confession of the wife alone. COCKBURN, C.J., puts that very strongly at p. 393. 'Now' (he says) 'the evidence, as has been before observed, consists entirely of admissions made by the wife herself; and here a question presents itself as to how far admissions of a wife charged with adultery, unsupported by any confirmatory proof, can be acted upon as conclusive evidence on which to pronounce a divorce. If this court had been a court of purely ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the 105th canon, which prohibits the granting of a divorce on the sole and unsupported testimony of the wife, would have precluded us from acting on this evidence. But, as this court is not a court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, nor bound in cases of divorce a vinculo by rules of merely ecclesiastical authority, it is at liberty to act, and bound to act, on any evidence legally admissible by which the fact of adultery is established; and if, therefore, there is evidence, not open to exception, of admissions of adultery by the principal respondent, it would be the duty of the court to act on such admissions, although there might be a total absence of all other evidence to support them'."

The difficulty which arises in the present case is that it is a petition, not for divorce, but for nullity, and in cases of nullity the court has to act in accordance with the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts acted and gave relief. That is laid down in s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which was in the following terms:

"In all suits and proceedings, other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the said court shall proceed and act and give relief on principles and rules which in the opinion of the said court shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts have heretofore acted and given relief, but subject to the provisions herein contained and to the rules and orders under this Act."

That section was repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation)

Act, 1925, s. 226 and sched. VI, but it was in substance re-enacted by s. 32 of that Act which says:

A "The jurisdiction vested in the High Court and the Court of Appeal respectively shall, so far as regards procedure and practice, be exercised in the manner provided by this Act or by rules of court, and where no special provision is contained in this Act or in rules of court with reference thereto, any such jurisdiction shall be exercised as nearly as may be in the same manner as that in which it might have been exercised by the court to which it formerly appertained."

So the court has to find out what was the practice in ecclesiastical courts in cases of nullity before the Act of 1857. In RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th edn., p. 87, para. 87, it is stated:

B "Corroboration of the petitioner's evidence is probably not required as an absolute rule of law; but the court in practice requires it, unless the absence of corroborating witnesses can be satisfactorily accounted for."

The note to that paragraph says:

C "The ecclesiastical courts invariably required corroboration by an independent witness: see BURNS, ECCLESIASTICAL LAW, 9th edn., Vol. III, pp. 304 et seq.; but as to the inapplicability of the ecclesiastical rule in this respect to suits for dissolution of marriage or applications in courts of summary jurisdiction: see Robinson v. Robinson and Lane (2). Query, whether the ecclesiastical rule still applies to suits of judicial separation."

D We have considered the question how the Divorce Court dealt with the matter when the Act of 1857 was passed and the court had not only to exercise jurisdiction in granting for the first time divorces which no court except the High Court of Parliament had had power to do previously, but also had to deal with suits of nullity which ecclesiastical courts had dealt with before that time. It seems to me, whatever the ecclesiastical courts did before 1857, it is clear that the practice of the Divorce Court after 1857 was to adopt the same rule as to corroboration in cases of divorce and in cases of nullity. To my mind, it would be impracticable and unreasonable to say that a higher standard of proof was required in the case of nullity than in the case of divorce. That is borne out by what was said in U. (falsely called J.) v. J. (3), which was decided in 1867 by LORD PENZANCE, Judge Ordinary. The headnote states

E (L.R. 1 P. & D. 460):

F "In a suit by a wife for nullity, on the ground of the husband's impotence, the only evidence of the alleged impotence was that of the petitioner, which was contradicted by the respondent. The evidence of the medical witnesses and the report of the inspectors was not inconsistent with either case. The court declined to grant a decree on the unsupported

G testimony of the petitioner."

On the general point as to the kind of corroboration required, LORD PENZANCE said (ibid. 461):

H "To pronounce a marriage invalid on the unsupported oath of the party who seeks to be relieved from its obligations is a serious matter, within the province of the court, no doubt, but only to be done when the last trace of reasonable doubt as to the truth and bona fides of the case has been removed. If there be a direct conflict of testimony between the two parties who alone know the truth, as in this case, the difficulties are much increased."

It is clear from that judgment that corroboration is not required. It is not even required when the respondent denies the allegations of the petitioner, but, of course, the matter must be examined with the greatest care.

That judgment was referred to with approval by LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., in C. (otherwise H.) v. C. (4), which established that a man may be impotent as regards one woman, but not as regards another. In that case LORD BIRKENHEAD said ([1921] P. 400):

"The petitioner must remove all reasonable doubt, for she has undertaken the burden of proof, and it is important in such a case that she should be compelled to discharge the burden, for the charge made, though physical and not moral, is nevertheless a grave and wounding imputation that the respondent is lacking, at least quoad hanc, in the power of reproducing his species, a power which is commonly and rightly considered to be the most characteristic quality of manhood."

I cite that to reinforce my own view that it seems unlikely that a young man would come to the court and admit his impotence unless there was some truth in it. It is not suggested in the present case that the husband wanted to get rid of his wife or to marry somebody else. The fact that he has come to the court and admitted his impotence does seem to me to be worthy of some consideration in deciding whether his evidence is true or not. Harthan v. Harthan (5) decided that a man can obtain a decree of nullity on the ground of his own impotence, and it is doubtful whether in that case there was any more corroboration than in the present case.

I think that the husband in the present case has not got from the court what he is entitled to get, which, if his evidence is believed, is a decree. The judge could have said: "I disbelieve your evidence" and proceed to give some reasons, but he has done neither of those things. He has not said he disbelieved the husband's evidence. He simply says that he is not satisfied. If he did not disbelieve the witness, I think that in this case he should have been satisfied. That being so, I think that justice requires that there should be a new trial before another judge where these matters can be gone into more fully, and, perhaps, some evidence can be called to substantiate what the husband said. In my view, the appeal should be allowed and a new trial ordered.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. In C. v. C. (4), LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., sitting as a judge in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in 1921, said ([1921] P. 400):

"Doubts were formerly entertained whether an averment that a respondent is impotent quoad hanc is valid to support a decree of nullity.

Both before and after the Council of Trent, the doctrine of the church admitted, and indeed enjoined, nullity on such a ground."

Later in his judgment LORD BIRKENHEAD cited the passage which my Lord has read from U. (falsely called J.) v. J. (3). I think it is a matter for regret that in the report of LORD BIRKENHEAD's judgment in [1921] P. 403, and also in the report in 37 T.L.R. 759, certain words of LORD PENZANCE are left out from the citation. The citation begins:

"To pronounce a marriage invalid on the unsupported oath of the party who seeks to be relieved from its obligations is a serious matter . . ."

The words which should then appear are "within the province of the court, no doubt." That makes it clear, as my Lord has pointed out, that LORD PENZANCE in 1867 regarded corroboration as not necessary in a case of this nature. I feel sure that, if LORD BIRKENHEAD had thought that that was wrong when he made this citation, he would have said so. Therefore, I think it is right to say that, in a case of this nature, corroboration is not essential. At the same time every judge looks for corroboration. If there be no corroboration—and for myself I regard this as a case where substantially there is no corroboration—then the judge will exercise even greater care than he normally does to make sure that the case is proved before granting the relief which is prayed.

In Harthan v. Harthan (5) the headnote reads ([1948] 2 All E.R. 639):

“Provided that there are no circumstances which bar him or her, e.g., knowledge of the defect at the date of the marriage, an impotent spouse is entitled to petition for a decree of nullity, and the right to do so is not conditional on the repudiation of the marriage by the other spouse.”

A In the present case the spouse who deposed to the fact that he was impotent claimed a decree of nullity on that ground. It was said that it was a peculiar thing that he had not discussed his condition with his father or with his friends. I should have thought it a most difficult subject for a man to discuss with his father, or with his friends. Certainly I should have thought that it is one of the last things that a man would like to depose to in the witness box. The learned commissioner seems to me to be satisfied that the husband was a man worthy
B of credence, and to have accepted him as a man of honesty. At the end of his judgment, however, the learned commissioner said:

“I am not satisfied that this man is impotent and I refuse this decree.”

C It is a little difficult to ascertain precisely what the learned commissioner did find in this case. It would not be right for this court, as an appellate tribunal, to put itself in the place of the learned commissioner and to say that there must be a decree. The court has power under Ord. 58, r. 5, to order a new trial, and I believe that to be the right course in this case, for two reasons. The first is so that the husband and the wife may know what is the position. The second is so that, if it be necessary, the husband may have an opportunity of calling further evidence. I think he is entitled to that
D opportunity, even if he closed his case beforehand, because it is uncertain on this judgment what the finding is. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed and a new trial ordered.

HODSON, J.: In so far as the learned commissioner has founded himself on absence of corroboration, which is not clear, I would respectfully disagree with him, because I think that there is some corroboration of the E husband's physical condition in the evidence given by the doctor who was called. It is desirable, however, that this court should make it clear that, in this class of case, corroboration is in practice required unless its absence can be satisfactorily accounted for. I have used the words which appear in F RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th edn., p. 87, in connection with cruelty, and I think the position is exactly the same with regard to nullity. It is quite true, as G SINGLETON, L.J., has just pointed out, that it may not be easy to get corroboration, particularly where a man is the petitioner and the suit is undefended, in a case of this kind. It may be that there are many cases heard where there is no corroboration, but the court in practice requires it if it is available. That seems to me important having regard to the peculiar nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the court, in that so often there is no contest and only witnesses from one side are produced.

Assuming that there is no corroboration in this case, I agree that, although the 105th canon laid down that corroboration was required by the ecclesiastical courts, it does not appear that that rule has been made part of the law of England. I have in mind what LORD HALE said in his HISTORY OF THE COMMON LAW in the passage quoted by TINDAL, C.J., in R. v. Millis (6)
H (10 Cl. & Fin. 680):

“‘The rule . . . by which they proceed is the canon law, but not in its full latitude, and only so far as it stands uncorrected either by contrary Acts of Parliament or the common law and custom of England; for there are divers canons made in ancient times, and decretals of the Popes, that never were admitted here in England’.”

The cases already referred to show quite clearly that this court has acted in the past on independent evidence apparently in direct contravention of the 105th canon, and I do not wish to be taken as saying that corroboration is necessary in law.

On the findings of the learned commissioner, I share the difficulty which my Lords have felt in appreciating why at the conclusion of his judgment he said: "I am not satisfied that this man is impotent." He had previously said in effect that he was not guilty of perjury, which must have meant that he was not wilfully lying. If not, what was he doing? It could not have been a case of want of recollection. It could hardly have been a case of a man giving evidence out of his imagination. Therefore, for my part, I am unable to understand why, having said in effect that the husband was a truthful man, he came to the conclusion that he was not satisfied he was impotent. I agree that there must be a new trial when it will be open to the husband at the further hearing to take steps to get evidence, if evidence is available, either of live witnesses or of documents, to support his case other than the rather slender medical evidence which he has already been able to call.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), February 24, 1950.]

Will—Investment clause—"Shares of public company"—Inclusion of stock.

By his will a testator directed that all moneys to be invested under his will might, in addition to the investments allowed by law to trustees, be invested in or on, inter alia, "the debentures or debenture stock or shares of any public company which shall have paid dividends upon its ordinary capital for at least three years prior to the time of investment . . . but not in any stocks funds bonds shares or securities to bearer."

HELD: prima facie the reference to the shares of any public company included a reference to the stock of such a company, and, there being nothing in the context of the will to displace that construction, the trustees' power of investment extended to stock in a public company having the qualification indicated.

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testator, moneys liable to be invested under the will might be invested in or on (a) preference stock (b) ordinary stock of any public company which should have paid dividends on its ordinary capital for at least three years from the time of investment.

C ROMER, J.: The question raised by this summons involves quite a short point. It arises out of the investment clause in the will of the testator, Mr. John Chilcott Boys, which he made on Mar. 3, 1943. He died on Oct. 29, 1946. I am not concerned with the beneficial interests given by the will. It is enough to say that he provided for his children and remoter issue. There are at present children and remoter issue of the testator, and they are before the court. The investment clause is in this form:

D "All moneys liable to be invested under this my will may in addition to the investments allowed by law to trustees be invested in or upon the debentures debenture or rent charge stock of any railway dock harbour gas water or other company or body incorporated by special Act of the Imperial Parliament or the legislature of any British colony or dependency or by royal charter or in or upon the debentures or debenture stock or shares of any public company which shall have paid dividends upon its ordinary capital for at least three years prior to the time of investment or on the security of any life or contingent interest in any real or personal property together with an insurance on the life or other event but not in any stocks funds bonds shares or securities to bearer."

E Such difficulty as there is arises from the fact that the testator has not in express terms authorised an investment in the stock of any public company which shall have paid dividends on its ordinary capital for three years before the time of investment, the clause referring only to shares of such a company. Many companies have recently converted their shares into stock, and other companies are likely to do so in the future, and it will be a convenience and advantage to the beneficiaries under this will if the trustees can invest properly in the stock of a public company should they desire to do so and have power to do so.

F It appears to me that on the proper construction of this clause, and in the light of authority, that they have power to do so. It is suggested by counsel G for the children of the testator that, in fact, apart from authority, it is sufficiently plain here that the testator had in mind an investment either in the loan capital or share capital of the company which conforms with the qualification as to payment of dividends for three years past, and I think it is highly probable that that is so. But, apart from that, it seems to me that the result of the authorities is, as one would expect it to be in the absence of authority, that H there is no difference at all between the stock of a company and shares in a company. There may be a difference between the debentures and debenture stock of a company, but one can readily understand that so far as stocks and shares in a company are concerned, the rights of the holder of stock are precisely the same in every respect as the rights of the holder of shares. It is merely for the convenience of marketing investments that shares are from time to time converted into stock.

The only case I need refer to is the decision of BENNETT, J., in Re McEacharn's

Settlement Trusts (1). That also was a case where an investment clause under a settlement had to be construed. The investment clause, so far as material, was that the moneys might be invested "in or upon such stocks funds and securities" as the trustees should think fit, and the trustees at any time or times might with "such consent or at such discretion as aforesaid vary any investment or investments made as aforesaid for any other or others." From that it will be seen that the position was the converse of the present case, because investment in stocks was authorised, but no reference was made to shares. In the present case, investment in shares is authorised and no reference is made to stocks. The question in that case was whether the trustees had under that provision a power to invest funds in the fully paid shares of a limited company. BENNETT, J., said ([1939] Ch. 859):

"In my judgment the answer to the question should be in the affirmative. There is, in my opinion, no real distinction between stock of a limited company and fully paid shares of a limited company. The stock is merely capital of a company consolidated into a mass for purposes of convenience so far as a transfer of it is concerned. I think that the reasoning of LORD CAIRNS and JAMES, L.J., in Morrice v. Aylmer (2) affords a foundation on which I can base my decision in the present case. The decision of LORD PEARSON in Henderson v. Henderson's Trustees (3) seems to me to be in accordance with that decision."

He distinguishes the case from Re Willis (4) which came before EVE, J. There power was given to invest in preference stock, and EVE, J., held that, that being a reference to a specific type of investment, he was unable to say that the trustees could properly invest in preference shares as well, there being some distinction, though a small one, between the two forms of security. BENNETT, J., goes on to say (ibid., 860):

"In the absence of a context showing that the meaning of the word is to be narrowed, the word 'stocks' ought in my judgment to be so interpreted as to include fully paid shares, and I so decide for the reasons which are set out in the judgment of LORD CAIRNS in Morrice v. Aylmer (2)."

It seems to me that the logical corollary of that is that where you have an express power to invest in shares, that is a reference to a form of investment which is not in any material or real respect different from stock, the two things being substantially identical. Accordingly, unless I find a context to the contrary, I ought to interpret this in the sense that the testator intended to include in shares the form of investment which is known as stock, and, in my judgment, there is no sufficient context to the contrary to displace that prima facie view. I, therefore, hold that, on the true construction of this will, the trustees may invest in preference stock or ordinary stock of any public company which shall have paid dividends on its ordinary capital for at least three years prior to the time of investment.

CARTER v. GREEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 13, 14, 22, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Sub-letting—“Lawfully sub-let”—Sub-letting in breach of covenant—Acceptance by landlord of rent from head lessee after knowledge of breach—Qualified acceptance—Question of fact whether such acceptance to be treated as unequivocal act of affirmation of tenancy—“Unlawful sub-letting”—No right of re-entry—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (3).

A dwelling-house within the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920-1939, was let in 1940 at a weekly rent, the rent book containing the following covenant: “The tenant shall not assign his interest in or sub-let or part with possession of the premises or any part thereof . . . without written consent being previously obtained from the landlord.” In 1945, in breach of this covenant, the tenant sub-let part of the premises. In 1947 the tenancy became a statutory tenancy. It was found as a fact by the county court judge that the landlord became aware of the unlawful sub-letting before January, 1948, but continued to accept rent without in any way qualifying his acceptance until Oct. 6, 1948, when he wrote in the rent book: “The acceptance of the rent does not constitute a waiver of my objection to an unauthorised sub-letting.” On a claim by the landlord for possession the question arose whether the premises had been lawfully sub-let so as to entitle the sub-tenant to the protection of s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

HELD: (i) an unqualified acceptance of rent was as much an affirmation of a statutory tenancy as it would be of a common law tenancy, but, if the acceptance of rent were qualified, it was a question of fact for the county court judge to determine whether that qualified acceptance must be treated in all the circumstances as an unequivocal act of affirmation of the tenancy.

(ii) on the evidence the landlord knew of the sub-letting before January, 1948, and received substantial payments of rent between that date and the date when he qualified his acceptance, and so, even if the sub-letting was originally unlawful, he had waived the illegality before bringing proceedings against the sub-tenant for possession.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order made by His Honour JUDGE DAYNES, K.C., at Dartford County Court on Nov. 10, 1949, whereby he refused to grant to the landlord possession of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The landlord contended that, in breach of a covenant against sub-letting, the tenant had sub-let part of the premises and that the acceptance of rent after knowledge of the breach was not a waiver of the objection to the sub-letting. The sub-tenant relied on the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (3), and pleaded that his sub-tenancy was lawful. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Feb. 22. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This appeal raises the oft recurring question whether a sub-tenant is a sub-tenant to whom the premises, or any part thereof, have been lawfully sub-let within the meaning of s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The history of the matter is as follows. In November or December, 1940, the landlord let 67, High Street, Bexley, to a Mrs. Warren at a weekly rent of 25s. The terms of the tenancy are printed on the inner cover of the rent book and contain a provision to the following effect:

"The tenant shall not assign his interest in or sub-let or part with possession of the premises or any part thereof or take in lodgers or paying guests without written consent being previously obtained from the landlord."

In 1945 Mrs. Warren sub-let to the sub-tenant two rooms on the first floor of the premises together with a lavatory and kitchen on the ground floor. She did not obtain the consent of the landlord to the sub-letting, but the judge found that he became aware of it in the year 1947. The judge does not specify at what period in the year the landlord became aware of the sub-letting, but he rejected the sub-tenant's evidence which was that he did not become aware of it until October, 1948, when he made an entry in the rent book to which we shall refer later. In the meantime the rent was increased from 25s. to 35s. per week as from Apr. 5, 1947. There was no evidence how this increase came to be made, but it was agreed by counsel that, applying the principles laid down in Summers v. Donohue (1), we must assume that the increase had been properly made and that the appropriate notice had been given with the result that as from Apr. 5, 1947, the tenancy became a statutory tenancy.

The landlord, as we have said, became aware of the sub-tenant's tenancy before January 1, 1948. The rent was not regularly paid, but it is plain from the rent book that in April, 1948, the landlord received £17 10s. by way of rent reducing the arrears to £5 5s. It necessarily follows that rent had been paid and received by the landlord up to the beginning of March, 1948. He received sums totalling a further £10 10s. in June and July, 1948, a further £7 15s. on Aug. 5, £7 on Sept. 1, and £3 10s. on Sept. 27. On Oct. 6 he received a further £6 15s. and then for the first time qualified his acceptance of rent with the following endorsement on the rent book: "The acceptance of the rent does not constitute a waiver of my objection to an unauthorised sub-letting." As the sub-tenant in his evidence before the county court judge denied that the landlord knew of the sub-letting before Oct. 6, 1948, the landlord naturally gave no evidence, and could give no evidence, that he had qualified his acceptance of the payments of rent he had received in the earlier part of the year 1948.

A Those being the facts established by the documents or found by the judge, the first question that he had to consider was whether or not, apart from any question of waiver, the premises were lawfully sub-let to the sub-tenant within the meaning of s. 15 (3). He answered that question in favour of the sub-tenant, and did not, therefore, find it necessary to consider in any detail the question whether, assuming the sub-letting to be originally unlawful, the defect was cured by subsequent waiver through the acceptance of rent. The judge supported his finding on the first point by three decisions, Norman v. Simpson (2), Wright v. Arnold (3) and Watson v. Sanders-Roe (4). These decisions, he said, compelled him to find that the sub-letting, which, in his opinion, was merely in breach of contract and not fortified by a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant, was not unlawful within the meaning of the section. That conclusion is at first sight supported by some observations of MORTON, L.J. (as he then was) in Norman v. Simpson (2), where he said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 76):

C "It is not easy to see exactly what sub-tenants fall within the latter class, but we think the most reasonable explanation of the sub-section is that premises are in a state of being 'unlawfully sub-let' within the sub-section if the head lessor has a subsisting right of re-entry, and are in a state of being 'lawfully sub-let' when the head lessor has no such right."

D It is, however, to be observed that in Norman v. Simpson (2) as well as in the other two cases relied on by the judge there was, or was assumed by the court to be found in the contract, a proviso for re-entry and it was not necessary for the court to determine what the position would have been had the covenants not been fortified by such a proviso.

E That question was discussed by this court in Maley v. Fearn (5). In that case also, as the court inferred from the evidence, the term which prohibited sub-letting without consent amounted to a condition enforceable by re-entry. At the beginning of his judgment SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 585):

"As will be seen, in that statement the category of unlawful tenant is restricted to those whose sub-letting gives a right of re-entry."

He continues:

F "It is, I think, plain that in that case no argument was addressed to the court as to the stipulations which give rise to a right of re-entry for one reason or another and those which do not. If one looks at the extract from the lease, the covenant against sub-letting seems to be to all material extent in the same terms as the covenant which is referred to on p. 230 of WOODFALL ON LANDLORD AND TENANT as a covenant which does not constitute a condition, and, there being no express provision, so far as I can see, for re-entry, would not have itself afforded a right of re-entry. I have thought it right to refer to this because it seems to me that it would be wrong to take what was said by MORTON, L.J., as deciding that a sub-tenancy is not unlawful within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts when it comes into existence in consequence of the breach of a covenant which does not give a right of re-entry."

H Moreover, MORTON, L.J., added some observations at the end of the judgments in which he said with regard to the passage in his judgment in Norman v. Simpson (2), which we have already cited ([1946] 2 All E.R. 585):

"I think that in the passage he has quoted (which was obiter) the definition of what is an unlawful sub-letting was given in too narrow terms. I am disposed to think (although again what I say is obiter) that, if a sub-letting is contrary to the terms of the tenancy, it may well be that it is an unlawful sub-letting, even although under the terms of the tenancy the sub-letting does not give rise to a right of re-entry."

In the present case the county court judge says with regard to these dicta that he could not read them as implying that the decision in Norman v. Simpson (2) was erroneous or that it did not depend on the loss by the material time of an effective right of re-entry to which the breach had originally given rise. In one sense it is true that the decision in Norman v. Simpson (2) depended on the existence of an effective right of re-entry, but we think only in the sense that it made it unnecessary to consider what the position would have been had that right not existed. We incline to agree with the obiter dictum of MORTON, L.J., at the end of Maley v. Fearn (5), and should have been prepared, if necessary, to decide in the present case that the sub-letting to the sub-tenant was initially unlawful especially as we are unable to distinguish the terms of the tenancy in the present case from those in the tenancy which was under consideration by the court in Maley v. Fearn (5). It is not, however, necessary for us to express a concluded opinion on this point since we are clearly of opinion that the judge's decision ought to be upheld on the second ground which was argued before us, namely, that any unlawfulness was cured by the subsequent acceptance of rent with full knowledge of the facts.

This point was argued before us on the basis that at the time when the landlord accepted rent with knowledge of the fact Mrs. Warren's tenancy had become a statutory tenancy. Counsel for the landlord contended that on this basis the decision must be in his favour having regard to a principle laid down in Oak Property Co., Ltd. v. Chapman (6). A number of questions arose in that case, but the particular point with which we are now concerned was dealt with at [1947] 2 All E.R. 5-7. SOMERVELL, L.J., reading the judgment of the court, first stated the rule at common law under which acceptance of any rent accrued due after the landlord's knowledge of the tenant's breach was regarded necessarily as inconsistent with an election to avoid the lease and consistent only with its affirmance. He pointed out that so unequivocal was the act of acceptance of rent that the landlord was held disentitled to get the best of both worlds by attempts to qualify his acceptance, that is, by stating that he accepted the rent without prejudice to his rights of forfeiture. He then went on to consider the position as regards a statutory tenancy saying:

"It must, in our judgment, be conceded that the principles of the common law above stated cannot apply, or cannot wholly apply, to a statutory tenancy. In the first place, the landlord of a statutory tenant has no right to avoid the tenancy. His only right is to invoke the jurisdiction of the court to make an order for possession and the tenancy continues until at least the date of the order. Secondly—and consequentially—the obligation of the tenant to pay rent and the right of the landlord to accept it continues notwithstanding the breach of covenant and notwithstanding the landlord's election to invoke the court's jurisdiction and the issue by him of his summons pursuant to his election. In our judgment, therefore, it may fairly be said that the acceptance of rent by a landlord after knowledge of a non-continuing breach of covenant by a tenant entitling the landlord to go to the court is not so unequivocal an act of affirmance of the tenancy as is acceptance of rent in like circumstances from a contractual tenant. On the other hand, it is, we think, important to bear in mind that, under the scheme of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the incidents of tenancy as understood by our law continue to apply to a statutory tenancy so far as they are consistent with the provisions of the Acts. From long usage the acceptance of rent by a landlord after knowledge of circumstances giving rise to a claim for possession has come to be regarded by landlords and tenants alike as evidence of an intention to affirm the tenancy. Moreover, the landlord has, in the case of a statutory tenancy, a choice—he may either rely on the breach and go to the courts, or he may waive it—though his choice is not the same as that presented to the common law landlord. Finally (and to this extent Elliott v. Boynton (7), in our view, assists the sub-tenant), the continuance of the obligation to pay rent under a contractual tenancy accruing after the breach for some period is not itself inconsistent with the landlord's election to forfeit. If, therefore, it is not justifiable to treat the common law rule as entirely applicable to a statutory tenancy (as the county court judge implied), we think that the question whether, in any case, the acceptance of rent by the landlord is an unequivocal act of affirmance of the tenancy is a question of fact for the judge to determine in the circumstances of the case, and, if he decides that question of fact affirmatively, then the ordinary legal consequences would, prima facie, follow. Thus, we are strongly inclined to think that the strict common law rule in regard to a qualified acceptance of rent is not applicable to a statutory tenancy, and that a qualified acceptance of rent from a statutory tenant is not necessarily fatal to the landlord's rights to seek an order for possession. As at present advised, we think that the fair rule is that a landlord who has acquired full knowledge of a non-continuing breach of covenant by a statutory tenant entitling him to invoke the court's jurisdiction should be entitled thereafter to receive rent and should not, by reason of such receipt, be held to have waived the breach, provided that he makes it clear to the tenant at the time of, or prior to, the receipt that his receipt is without prejudice to his right to go to the court, and provided that he issues his summons for possession within such time as, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the court hearing the summons regards as reasonable."

It is a little difficult to be certain how far the court was laying down that the question whether acceptance of rent by the landlord amounts to an affirmance of the tenancy is one of law, and how far it is one of fact. We think, however, it is reasonably clear that they were only deciding that the principles of the common law cannot wholly apply to a statutory tenancy, and the question is how far the court intended to hold that they do apply. We find guidance on this point in the statement that "we are strongly inclined to think that the strict common law rule in regard to a qualified acceptance of rent is not applicable to a statutory tenancy, and that a qualified acceptance of rent from a statutory tenant is not necessarily fatal to the landlord's rights to seek an order for possession." From this passage we infer that what the court meant was that an unqualified acceptance of rent is as much an affirmance of the statutory tenancy as it would be in the case of a common law tenancy, but that, if the acceptance of rent is qualified, it would be a question of fact for the county court judge to determine whether that qualified acceptance must be treated in all the circumstances as an unequivocal act of affirmance of the tenancy. This view is, we think, supported by what the court indicated as being a fair rule to guide the judge in reaching his conclusion on the facts.

If that be the true view, how ought we to apply the principle to the present case? Counsel for the landlord suggested that, as the judge had not gone really fully into this matter, or found definitely when rent was first received with knowledge of the contract, we ought to direct a new trial limited to that issue. We do not, however, think that we should be justified in putting the parties to the expense of a new trial. The judge has found quite plainly that the landlord had knowledge of the facts by the end of 1947. It is impossible for us, we think, to say that there was no evidence on which he could so find. Quite plainly the landlord would be in the greatest difficulty, in view of his evidence at the trial before the county court judge that he did not know of the sub-letting until Oct. 6, 1948, if he were to give evidence that he had qualified his acceptance of rent during the period between Jan. 1, 1948, and Oct. 6, 1948. In these circumstances it seems to us that the position is that the judge has found that the landlord knew of the sub-letting before Jan. 1, 1948, and it is plain from the evidence that he received substantial payments of rent without in any way qualifying his receipt thereof between that date and Oct. 6, 1948. We think, therefore, that we are bound to conclude that, even if the sub-demise was originally unlawful, the landlord had waived the illegality before he commenced the present action and thus the sub-tenancy had become a lawful sub-tenancy. That being so the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

AUSTIN MOTOR CO., LTD. v. BRITISH STEAMSHIP INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD. AND OTHERS.

Company—Dividend—Computation—Payment of dividend tax free up to 6s. in the £.

The articles of a company provided: "The profits of the company available from time to time for distribution in respect of each year ... shall ... be applicable ... secondly to the payment of the cumulative preferential dividend on the £1,000,000 six per cent. 'B' cumulative preference shares at such rate that after deduction of income tax thereon at the current rate for the time being (irrespective of any allowance of rebate in the case of any particular shareholder) the amount remaining shall be the sum of six per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up or credited as paid up on the said six per cent. 'B' cumulative preference shares, less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of six shillings in the pound computed on a gross sum of six pounds per cent. per annum on such capital, together with any outstanding arrears." In 1936 the "B" cumulative preference shares were converted into six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stock. At the material time the standard rate of tax was 9s. in the pound.

HELD: the intention of the articles was to produce the result commonly called a payment of dividend tax free up to six shillings in the pound. The proper method of carrying out that intention was to reduce the amount of the dividend of six per cent. by the amount of the excess of the standard rate of tax over six shillings in the pound, the net figure thus arrived at, being £5 2s. per £100 stock, and this dividend was equal to £9 5s. 5d. gross, or £5 2s. net.

Case referred to:

(1) Godfrey Phillips, Ltd. v. Investment Trust Corpn., Ltd. unrep. Feb. 23, 1949.

APPEAL by the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Nov. 9, 1949, concerning the construction of the articles of association of the Austin Motor Co., Ltd., as they related to the method of calculating the net dividend payable to those stockholders. The learned judge, considering himself bound by the decision of VAISEY, J., in Godfrey

Phillips, Ltd. v. Investment Trust Corpn., Ltd. (supra), expressed no opinion of his own on the construction of the article.

Grant, K.C., and Philip Sykes for the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders.

Talbot, K.C., and W. Gordon Brown for the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders.

A Cyril King, K.C., and Kenneth Mackinnon for the company.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This originating summons raises a question of the construction of the articles of the Austin Motor Co., Ltd., and the answer to the question affects the rights inter se of the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders and the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders. The words which we have to construe are these:

B "The profits of the company available from time to time for distribution in respect of each year ... shall ... be applicable ... secondly to the payment of the cumulative preferential dividend on the £1,000,000 six per cent. 'B' cumulative preference shares at such rate that after deduction of income tax thereon at the current rate for the time being (irrespective of any allowance of rebate in the case of any particular shareholder) the amount remaining shall be the sum of six per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up or credited as paid up on the said six per cent. 'B' cumulative preference shares, less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of six shillings in the pound computed on a gross sum of six pounds per cent. per annum on such capital, together with any outstanding arrears."

D By resolutions of the company passed on Oct. 12, 1936, the issued shares of the company were all converted into stock.

E The method of construction for which counsel for the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders contends and which was adopted by the company for some years until there was a decision of the courts (to which I will refer later) is this. The earlier words which I have read point in the first instance to a gross sum which is to lead one, as it were, first to £6 per £100 and then to that £6 less a further figure. The method adopted is conveniently set out in a letter which was sent to the holders of this stock dated May 2, 1949. It starts with the six per cent. which is referred to about half way through the passage I have read. It then deducts from that the sum which has to result, F whatever the construction may be, from the words which follow the word "less." I will read those words again. As they are read by counsel for the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders they are read as pointing to one single sum or item: "less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of 6s. in the £ computed on a gross sum of £6 per cent." G Taking the figures with which we are concerned, the amount of income tax for the time being payable in excess of 6s. in the £ is 3s. in the £, the standard rate being 9s. That is computed under his system on the £6. It is said that the word "gross" is contrasted in this context with the word "net" and removes any doubt that might have arisen if it had not been there. It negatives, on this view, the possibility of what is called "grossing up" the £6 in order to find the figure on which the 3s. would operate. Therefore, on this system the 3s. in the £ is taken and applied to the £6. That figure, which comes to 18s., is deducted from the £6, leaving £5 2s. To discover what the actual gross dividend is the £5 2s. is "grossed up," which gives a figure of £9 5s. 5d. From that tax at 9s. is deducted and there is left £5 2s. Apparently nobody has complained about that.

H In the case of another company Godfrey Phillips, Ltd. (1) with articles which, in my opinion, so far as the point of construction is concerned, are identical with these, VAISEY, J., said that the method which I have described was not the right way of construing similar words in the articles of that company. The result of his system on this figure of six per cent. is set out also very conveniently and clearly in the letter of May 2, 1949. I will describe first what is the result of that method, because it has a certain attraction in logic. The present rate of tax to which I have referred leads to a gross figure which, less tax at 6s. in the £, leaves £6, and then, as tax at 3s. in the £ on the gross figure also has to be paid, that comes off the £6, and the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholder gets a sum of £4 14s. 4d., which is £6 less tax at 3s. in the £ on the gross figure. That is quite a neat, logical scheme which people might provide for in this class of case, but, in my opinion, it is impossible to get it out of these words. It involves grossing up the sum of £6, which is described as "a gross sum of £6," on the basis that income tax was 6s. in the £. That seems to me an impossible construction to put on this phrase, and, although I appreciate what I might describe as the logic and the neatness of the result, I find it impossible to obtain that result out of these words. Indeed, counsel for the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders, who had given very careful consideration to this matter and attacked what I call the old procedure (the method supported by counsel for the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders), admitted that, having regard to the words used in this article, he felt great difficulty in making them fit the scheme of VAISEY, J.

So I will pass from that to the third suggestion which was put before us by counsel for the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders. This results in the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders getting less than they do under the scheme supported by their counsel. Again, the scheme of the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary, stockholders was conveniently set out in the table in the letter of May 2, 1949. Coming to the words after "less" in the article under the formula of the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders all the words that follow are treated as leading to a single item. Counsel for the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders treats the words that follow as leading to two items. He says it is, first of all, "less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable." That phrase, he says, refers back to the amount of income tax to be deducted from the yet unascertained gross figure. So that the £6 is to be less 9/20ths of X, taking income tax at 9s. in the £. There is a further deduction, in that it is less the extent by which that amount is in excess of 6s. in the £ computed on a gross sum of £6 per cent. So the result is £6 minus 9/20ths of X minus 6/20ths of £6. These things can be elaborated, but that is not, to my mind, the natural reading or construction of the words which follow "less." I think they do, as the scheme for the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders contends, point to a single figure. I think there is difficulty in the way of the formula of counsel for the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders by reason of the word "any." Even apart from that, I think the natural construction is to treat the words as directed to a single sum.

There are other difficulties in the way of the scheme of the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders. For the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders it was submitted, I think with force, that on the true construction of these words it was clearly intended that, so long as income tax was 6s. or below, the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholder should get £6. No doubt, although that intention may be clear, words might have been used in this rather complicated subject-matter which defeated it, but I accept the view that that is the intention to be derived from the paragraph as a whole. Under the scheme of the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders, with income tax at 5s. in the £ or at 5s. 6d. in the £ the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholder will get a sum less than £6. Of course, if the words compelled one to that result one would have to apply them as they are, but, having regard to the fact that, in my view, the construction forces the words in any event into an unnatural meaning, the fact that they also lead to a result which the parties cannot have contemplated makes it, to my mind, impossible to adopt it as a proper construction. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed, and the declaration in the appropriate form asked for by the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders should be made.

- A JENKINS, L.J. : I agree. The article seeks to produce the result which is commonly called a payment of dividend tax free up to 6s. in the £. That is the general intention, but it is an intention which can be carried out in more than one way. It seems to me, that either of the formulae consisting, on the one hand, of the company's old practice, now supported by the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders, and, on the other hand, of the practice held by VAISEY, J., to be right in the Godfrey Phillips case (1) might be said to carry out what was intended. The method propounded by the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders has the merit of simplicity. The stockholders' dividend of six per cent. is reduced by the amount of tax appropriate to a gross dividend of that amount in excess of 6s. in the £, and the net figure is thus arrived at, being, with tax at 9s. in the £, £5 2s. 0d. That figure is then grossed up, and the amount of the gross sum to be paid is thus arrived at. That seems to me to carry out the literal meaning of the article, because it does give a remaining amount consisting of six per cent. on the capital in question, less the amount of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of 6s. in the £, computed on a gross sum of £6 per cent. on such capital. The method adopted by D VAISEY, J., on the other hand, while, as I have said, it is a perfectly reasonable method, seems to me to be one which it is impossible to extract as a matter of construction from the language used. The construction he places on the article involves computing the excess of tax over 6s. in the £, not on a gross sum of £6, but on a net sum of £6 which has to be grossed up for the purpose of arriving at the amount of the tax. For my part, I cannot extract that E process from the language used, and I, therefore, agree that the method of VAISEY, J., should be rejected in favour of the method advocated by the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders. The method which I am rejecting is, as I have said, quite reasonable, and it provides an attractive scheme which the company might very properly have adopted had they chosen to do so and had they framed the article accordingly. It is attractive because F it consistently ensures that the gross payment to be made by the company will be such a sum as, with tax at 6s. in the £, will produce the desired net amount. However, in my view, the company has not so provided. As regards the third possibility propounded by the preferred ordinary, ordinary, and "A" ordinary stockholders, in my judgment, it should not be adopted, first, because it does not seem to me that it can fairly be got out of the language used, and, G secondly, because, as distinct from either of the other two methods, it does not seem to me to produce a result which can reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the company. For these reasons I agree with the conclusion stated by SOMERVELL, L.J.

- SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I also agree, and I do not feel that I can usefully add anything to the reasons given by my brethren, with H which I find myself in full accord. The result will be that the appeal of the six per cent. "B" cumulative preference stockholders will be allowed.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Devlin, J.J.), February 20, 24, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Irregularity—Communication from jury to judge—Jury's question while considering verdict—Answer by judge—Question and answer not announced in court until after verdict and discharge of jury—Irregularity not going to root of case.

While enclosed to consider their verdict the jury sent a written question to the judge asking whether they could convict one of the appellants of stealing some, but not all, of the property. The answer written by the judge was "Yes, certainly, if that was what you found." Question and answer were not read in open court until after the jury had been discharged, but they were read in the presence of the appellants before sentence was passed. The Court of Criminal Appeal took the view that no argument could possibly have taken place on the question and answer.

HELD: the irregularity did not go to the root of the case, and the appeal would be dismissed.

APPEAL against conviction before HUMPHREYS, J., at the Essex Autumn Assizes.

The appellants were charged with conspiracy to steal and stealing. After their retirement to consider their verdict the jury sent a written question to the learned judge and received an answer written on the same piece of paper, but the question and answer were not read out in open court until after the jury had been discharged. For the appellants it was argued that this was an irregularity which rendered the trial unlawful. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Feb. 24. LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellants were convicted before HUMPHREYS, J., at Essex Autumn Assizes on certain counts in an indictment which charged them with conspiracy to steal and with stealing. This appeal has nothing to do with the merits of the case. No attempt has been made to say that there was any misdirection on the part of HUMPHREYS, J., or that there was any misreception of evidence, or that anything could be said to point to a miscarriage of justice, except in the following respect. The jury, in the course of their deliberations, desired to ask the learned judge a question. At that time HUMPHREYS, J., had gone to his lodgings which are very close to the court, and he directed his clerk to go to the court and ask the jury to put their question in writing. The jury put the question in writing, and it was handed to the bailiff, and we are quite satisfied that the judge's clerk did not enter the jury room. Even if he had, we do not think that that would have been in itself an irregularity, because the court has power always to allow somebody to make a communication to the jury, if it is a communication proper to be made and is made by the direction of the court. The oath sworn by a jury bailiff is that "he shall suffer no person to speak to them nor speak to them himself unless it be to ask whether they are agreed upon a verdict, without leave of the court." That has been the jury bailiff's oath for at least a hundred years, though it was altered because at one time the bailiff used to be sworn to keep the jury without light, food, or water.

A In 1860 the jury were allowed to get refreshment at their own expense, and no doubt the jury bailiff's oath now leaves out those words.

We are quite satisfied that so far there was no irregularity at all. The jury asked this question which they put in writing. HUMPHREYS, J., went to the court immediately he had written his answer to the question, and that answer was taken to the jury. HUMPHREYS, J., has reported to us that he meant to announce in court what the question was, but the jury came back into court before he had the opportunity of doing so, and he accepted their verdict. It would have been much better, I think we may say, if before the jury had given their verdict HUMPHREYS, J., had said what were the question and the answer, because we desire to say that we are in no way departing from the rules which have been laid down in this court and that the right practice to follow is this:

C If a jury, when it is considering its verdict, wishes to ask a question or to have more information or to make any request about the case, it should do so in open court, and the judge should answer only in open court in the presence of the prisoner. A jury may put their request into writing or be asked by the judge so to do, but in such a case the communication should always be read and answered in open court. It is entirely in the judge's discretion whether he asks

D or permits counsel or the prisoner, if undefended, to address him on the jury's communication. The question that was asked by the jury in this case was whether they could convict the appellant, Pickard, of stealing some, but not all, of the property. That is a question which sometimes is asked by juries, and, no one doubts that the only answer is: "Yes, of course you can." It would have been better if that question and his answer (which was, "Yes, certainly")

E had been read out by HUMPHREYS, J., before the jury actually returned their verdict. In fact, it was read out by him in court, though after the jury returned their verdict.

There was, therefore, no secrecy. The sort of question that has arisen in this case has to be considered in relation to the rule which has always been laid down in criminal law and, indeed, in civil law, that all proceedings in court must be

F open and in public. The question asked in this case was an elementary one on which no argument possibly could have taken place, and, as HUMPHREYS, J., has said, he would not have allowed argument. It is true that the appellants were entitled to know what the question was, and they did know, because HUMPHREYS, J., announced it in court in these words after he had allowed the jury to be discharged :

G "I will sentence these men tomorrow morning. The jury asked me to give them some assistance—their question merely was this—I have not got it because I wrote upon it and sent it back to them—but it was merely a request to know whether, on count 15, on which they were satisfied that Pickard had stolen some property, they could say that he had not stolen

H all the property in the indictment but only four out of the sixty articles, to which my answer was: 'Yes, certainly, if that was what you found.' That was all the question was about."

It is impossible to say that every irregularity in a trial is a ground for quashing a conviction. It may, not infrequently it does, happen that something is done in the course of a trial which is not strictly in accordance with recognised procedure. If that is so, the court must consider whether or not it is an irregularity which goes to the root of the case, as, for instance, in R. v. Neal (1) which was cited to us by counsel for the appellants, where a jury, having been enclosed to consider their verdict, were allowed by the recorder during their enclosure to leave the court and have their lunch in the town. That was such a grave departure from the recognised practice and procedure of criminal law that the court felt that the verdict could not stand. In R. v. Green (2) a question had been sent by the jury to the recorder at quarter sessions, and he had sent back an answer without announcing it in open court at all. When the case came before this court the recorder could not remember what the question was, and nobody except the recorder and the members of the jury ever knew before the trial concluded what the question was which the jury had asked. Accordingly, this court quashed the conviction, and in giving judgment I said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 38):

"This court and the Divisional Court has said on more than one occasion that any communication between a jury and the presiding judge must be read out in court, so that both parties, the prosecution and the defence, may know what the jury are asking and what is the judge's answer. Very likely, in the present case, the communication was quite immaterial, and, if the recorder had been able to tell this court what was the question asked by the jury, we might have been able to consider it, although nothing that I say now should be taken in any way to authorise a departure from the well recognised rule that these matters must be dealt with openly in court."

After referring to R. v. Bodmin Justices, Ex parte McEwen (3) in which magistrates had called a witness into their room and asked him a question, and no one else knew what the question was because it was never stated in open court, and the Divisional Court said that the conviction must be brought up on certiorari and quashed, I continued (ibid., 39):

"In the present case the court feels the same difficulty. The communication made to the recorder was not read out in court and the appellant, therefore, did not, and does not, know what it was."

In the present case the appellants do know what the communication was. It was stated in court before the trial was concluded, and its nature was such that no possible argument could have been taken on it in court if it had been read out before the jury gave their verdict and not after. In this case, therefore, we cannot say that justice was not seen to be done, and, in our opinion, there is no ground for quashing the conviction.

HOUGHTON-LE TOUZEL v. MECCA, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), February 20, 1950.]

Theatres and Entertainments—Sunday entertainment—Offence—Penalty—Liability of limited company—Evidence against company—Sunday Observance Act, 1780 (21 Geo. 3, c. 49), s. 1, s. 2.

A common informer brought an action against a company, Mecca, Ltd., under the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, s. 1, claiming a penalty for a breach of the section. Evidence was given on his behalf that, at the dance hall where the breach was alleged to have been committed, (a) the words, "Mecca, Ltd." were painted in large lettering in two places in front of the building, (b) there were also on the building several trade signs with the words, "Mecca, Ltd., 76 Southwark Street" (which was the address of the company's head office), and (c) on the side of the building was a sign "Mecca Dances." Evidence was also given that in the latest balance sheet of the company the dance hall was mentioned as being one of its properties.

HELD: (i) a limited company was within the ambit of s. 1 of the Act of 1780 and could be sued by a common informer for a penalty under the section.

(ii) there was evidence to go to the jury that the company was the "keeper" of the premises, within the meaning of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act of 1780.

PRELIMINARY ISSUES OF LAW in an action by a common informer against a limited company for recovery of a penalty under the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, s. 1.

The plaintiff alleged that a dance hall at Brighton was used on Apr. 17, 1949, for public dancing, to which persons were admitted by tickets for which they paid at the entrance, and that the defendant company was the keeper, or the joint keeper, of the dance hall, within the meaning of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act of 1780. At the close of the plaintiff's case, counsel for the defendant company submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, on the grounds (a) that a limited company could not be sued under s. 1 of the Act of 1780, and (b) that the evidence given by the plaintiff did not show that the company was the "keeper" of the dance hall within the meaning of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

Salmon, K.C., and J. MacMillan for the defendant company.

BIRKETT, J.: Counsel for the defendant company, Mecca, Ltd., submits that the company, being a limited company, cannot be sued successfully in this action, which is brought under the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, because a limited company cannot be sued under the Act. By s. 1 of the Act:

"... any house, room or other place which shall be opened or used for public entertainment or amusement, or for publicly debating on any subject whatsoever, upon any part of the Lord's Day, called Sunday, and to which persons shall be admitted by the payment of money or by tickets sold for money, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place; and the keeper of such house, room or place shall forfeit the sum of £200 for every day that such house, room or place shall be opened or used as aforesaid on the Lord's Day, to such person as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punishable as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses . . . "

Counsel for the defendant company contends that, in view of the punishment prescribed for keeping a disorderly house, a limited company cannot come within the ambit of the section. A

In Orpen v. Haymarket Capitol, Ltd. (1), a common informer claimed penalties under the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, from a limited company which was the proprietor of a cinematograph. In a considered judgment ROWLATT, J., held that a limited company was liable to the penalties under the Act and the informer was entitled to succeed. Using language very similar to what I have used in this case ROWLATT, J., said (145 L.T. 616): B

"The claim is made against a limited company who own and manage a cinema and open it on Sundays, and against four gentlemen who are directors of that company. It was ultimately agreed by Sir Patrick Hastings, who appeared for the company, after he had legitimately thrown every difficulty which he could in the way of the plaintiff proving her case, that evidence had been produced that this hall was opened on Sunday for the exhibition of cinematograph films by the defendant company. The only substantial point which he took was that the Act of Parliament does not impose any penalties upon the company because the word 'person' in the Act of Parliament does not in this connection include a company. Now everybody agrees that prima facie the word 'person' in an Act of Parliament includes that artificial kind of person which is called a limited company, but there may be points in the particular statute or in the subject-matter which show that in a particular case the word 'person' does not include a limited company." C

ROWLATT, J., then went on to say that, in his view, a limited company could be liable under the Sunday Observance Act, 1780, and held the defendant company liable in the case before him. He said (ibid., 617): D

"... it seems to me that a company is liable under this Act and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed against the company. I should add that, as a matter of fact, in three cases the penalties under this section have been recovered against a company. These cases which were brought against the Brighton Aquarium when it was a limited company have been reported, and were cited by Sir Thomas Inskip in argument, and the point was never taken although the defendants in those cases were represented by able counsel. The point not having been taken, the cases are not authority before me, but they certainly tend to confirm my view that there is nothing in the objection which is taken." E

In A.-G. v. Walkergate Press, Ltd. (2), which was decided a year before Orpen v. Haymarket Capitol, Ltd. (1), HORRIDGE, J., had come to the opposite conclusion on the same point. In the Walkergate Press case (2), informations were preferred against a limited company and its directors, charging them with having published a scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery not authorised by the Lotteries Act, 1823, and HORRIDGE, J., held that the company could not be sued. That case, apparently, was not cited to ROWLATT, J., in Orpen's case (1), but both Orpen's case (1) and the Walkergate Press case (2) were cited to GODDARD, J., in Green v. Kursaal (Southend-on-Sea) Estates, Ltd. (3), which was an action brought by a common informer against a company which was the printer and publisher of a newspaper issued on Aug. 8, 1936, in which the following advertisement appeared: "Kursaal Gardens. Amusement park and attractions open daily (including Sundays). Dancing." The common informer claimed penalties F from the company, under s. 3 of the Act of 1780, for advertising entertainments on Sundays, but GODDARD, J., held that the company was not an advertiser within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act. In the course of his judgment, however, GODDARD, J., said ([1937] 1 All E.R. 734):

A "... [counsel for the company] takes three points in substance. First of all, he says, a limited company cannot commit those offences, because the Act not only provides for penalties but also provides that persons who commit the offences shall be liable to the other penalties which may be imposed upon the keepers of disorderly houses. I do not think it is necessary to give a concluded decision upon this point, because, in my view, I find the claim fails upon other grounds. But, if I had to give a decision on whether or not a limited company could commit this offence, I should follow the decision of ROWLATT, J., in Orpen v. Haymarket Capitol, Ltd. (1) rather than that of HORRIDGE, J., in A.-G. v. Walkergate Press, Ltd. (2). It is true that the decision of HORRIDGE, J., does not appear to have been cited to ROWLATT, J., but the case ROWLATT, J., decided was a case under the Sunday Observance Act, whereas the case HORRIDGE, J., decided was a case under the Lotteries Act. HORRIDGE, J., in his decision, laid great stress on the fact that, under the Lotteries Act, a person promoting a lottery was liable to be treated as a rogue and vagabond, and I think that was the main ground on which he held that a limited company could not be a person within the meaning of the Lotteries Act. ROWLATT, J., had this very Act under consideration, and he thought, and, if I may say so, I respectfully agree with the learned judge, so far as it is necessary for me to express any opinion upon it at all, that a limited company could be liable for penalties under this Act, and that an informer is entitled to succeed in a claim against a company ..."

In Reid v. Wilson (4), which is a decision of the Court of Appeal and, therefore, binding on me, LORD ESHER, M.R., said ([1895] 1 Q.B. 320):

E "The jury have found facts from which it was contended that the house was to be deemed to be a 'disorderly house,' and we have to see whether, applying the Act strictly to the evidence, Wilson was the 'keeper' of this house which is to be deemed disorderly. He had been the secretary of a company which had the power of letting the house. If he had let the house when he was secretary and when the company were his masters, though he had actually made the bargain for the letting, he would not have been the person who let the house. It would have been the company who let the house, and the company could not have been sued for penalties under the Act."

F Counsel for the defendant company in the case now before the court relies on that statement of LORD ESHER, M.R., as an authority for his contention that a limited company cannot be sued for penalties under the Act. The question whether a company could be sued was not, however, the main point for decision in Reid v. Wilson (4), and one does not know whether, if a full argument had been addressed to LORD ESHER, M.R., on the point, his decision on that question would have been the same, and, therefore, Reid v. Wilson (4) cannot be regarded as an authority which is binding on me on this point.

G I am greatly impressed by the careful considered judgment of ROWLATT, J., in Orpen v. Haymarket Capitol, Ltd. (1), with which I find myself in agreement, and I am very much influenced by the fact that GODDARD, J., in deciding Green's case (3) on another ground, went out of his way to say that, if he had been required to decide the question whether a limited company could be liable under the Act of 1780, he would have decided it as ROWLATT, J., did in Orpen's case (1). I, therefore, hold that a limited company is within the ambit of s. 1 of the Act of 1780, and that, in a proper case, a common informer may sue a limited company in the circumstances laid down in the Act.

The second point taken by counsel for the defendant company is that there is no evidence to go to the jury and, therefore, I should stop the case and enter judgment for the company. The evidence, which was given by the plaintiff's wife—to which counsel for the defendant company took objection at the time it was given—was (a) that "Mecca, Ltd." was painted in two places in large lettering in front of the building in which the offence is alleged to have taken place, (b) that there were also on the building at least half a dozen trade signs (glass signs, about as large as a plate), on which were the words "Mecca, Ltd., 76, Southwark Street" (i.e., the head office of the company), and (c) that, high up, on the side of the building, apparently designed to catch the eye of people on the sea front, was "Mecca Dances." Counsel for the defendant company submits that, although "Mecca, Ltd." was, so to speak, emblazoned all round the building, the plaintiff failed to prove that the defendant company, Mecca, Ltd., put out those signs, and he says that there is no evidence that the company is the "keeper" of the premises within the meaning of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act of 1780. He relies for this submission on Green v. Berliner (5), a decision of DU PARCQ, J., in which a limited company, Salisbury Press, Ltd., was sued, under s. 3 of the Act of 1780, for advertising a boxing match which was to take place on a Sunday, the allegation being that the company had printed a hand-bill advertising the match. The only evidence against the company was the hand-bill, which was presented to one of the witnesses for the plaintiff, and on which appeared the words "Salisbury Press, London." DU PARCQ, J., held that that was not in itself sufficient evidence that Salisbury Press, Ltd. had printed the hand-bill, and he dismissed the action against the company on the ground that there was no evidence against it. Counsel for the defendant company in the case now before the court contends that, mutatis mutandis, the emblazoned signs outside the building must be regarded in the same light as the hand-bill in the case before DU PARCQ, J. The plaintiff, however, distinguishes that case, on the ground that the notices outside the building are not the only evidence in this case, as he has also produced evidence in regard to the defendant company's balance sheet of Dec. 31, 1947 (which was the company's current balance sheet as on Apr. 18, 1949, the balance sheet for 1948 not having then been filed). Counsel for the defendant company submits that this evidence should also be disregarded. On the back of the balance sheet is: "A list of the company's branches," followed by a full list under the heading, "Cafes and restaurants not licensed," and, under that, another full list under the heading, "Licensed premises." Under a third heading, "Dance halls," is another full list, which includes "Sherry's, West Street, Brighton," (the place where the offence is alleged to have been committed). In view of the evidence (a) that at Sherry's dance hall at Brighton there were the signs, "Mecca, Ltd.", to which I have referred, and (b) that in the defendant company's balance sheet there was a specific reference to "Sherry's, West Street, Brighton", as being a dance hall and one of the company's branches, I cannot say that there is no evidence to go to the jury that the company was the "keeper" of the premises within the meaning of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act, and, therefore, I overrule the submission of counsel for the defendant company on that point.

Re BRADSHAW (deceased). BRADSHAW v. BRADSHAW.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.J.J.), February 13, 14, 1950.]

Administration—Lunatic—Distribution of estate—Lunatic entitled, on father's death in 1906, to undivided share in freehold estates—Freeholds unsold and held by trustees on statutory trusts—Nature of lunatic's interest—"Beneficial interest in real estate"—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 51 (2).

By his will, dated Jan. 22, 1853, W.B., who died in 1855, devised certain freehold estates on trust for his son, T.B., for life, and, on the death of T.B. (in the events which happened), on trust for the children of T.B. equally. In 1906 T.B. died, leaving five children, one of whom, C.B., was born in 1877, and now became entitled to a one-fifth undivided share in the property. In 1912 C.B. became of unsound mind, and in 1935 a receiver was appointed of her property and had not been discharged when, on Sept. 2, 1948, she died, a spinster and intestate. The freehold property was still unsold, and, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 39 and sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1, was vested in the trustees of W.B.'s will on the statutory trusts for sale set out in s. 35 of that Act. The question arose whether the application of pt. IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (dealing with the distribution of an intestate's residuary estate) was precluded by s. 51 (2) of that Act.

HELD: C.B.'s interest in the property existed and belonged to her on Jan. 1, 1926, and at the date of her death; it was such that on, or immediately before, the coming into operation of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, it would have devolved as real property; and (JENKINS, L.J., dissenting) her interest was a "beneficial interest in real estate" within the meaning of s. 51 (2), and, therefore, it devolved on her heir-at-law in accordance with the general law in force before 1926 applicable to freehold land.

APPEAL by the heir-at-law of an intestate from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Nov. 3, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 905.

The originating summons was issued to determine the nature of the interest of the intestate, Constance Mary Bradshaw, in freehold properties to which she and her brothers became entitled in undivided shares on the death in 1906 of their father, and which were now held by trustees on statutory trusts under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 39 and sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1. The intestate was of unsound mind from before Jan. 1, 1926, until her death on Sept. 2, 1948.

DANCKWERTS, J., held that the intestate's interest was not a "beneficial interest in real estate" within the meaning of the Administration of Estates Act, s. 51 (2), and that the interest would devolve in accordance with pt. IV of that Act.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The question which we have to determine in this appeal is one of the many problems, now happily diminishing, which have arisen out of the effect and construction of the real property legislation of 1925. It relates to the application to the facts of the case (which I will presently state) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51 (2). It is a difficult and somewhat complex problem and since, as I read the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., from whom the appeal comes, he would for himself have inclined in another direction if he had not conceived himself bound by an earlier decision of ROXBURGH, J., it may be said to have given rise already to some divergence of judicial opinion. I am sorry to say that that divergence persists in this court, for the view which I am about to express I express with the diffidence due to my awareness of the different view taken by JENKINS, L.J. A

The facts, so far as relevant, can be briefly stated. A Miss Bradshaw died intestate on Sept. 2, 1948. At the date of her death she was, within the meaning of the words as used in s. 51, a lunatic having no testamentary capacity, and she had been such consistently since the Act came into force on Jan. 1, 1926. Her property, at the date of her death, included what would, had it not been for the Act, have been an undivided share in certain freehold property which came to her via her father from her grandfather. It is conceded on all hands that, as a result of the real property legislation of 1925, her beneficial interest in the property was a personalty interest at her death. The grandfather had died many years ago, and the father died in 1906. It was at his death, equally beyond question, an interest which all conveyancers and lawyers would have regarded as a species of real property, namely, an undivided fifth share in freehold land. But, as I have said, by reason of the converting process of the Law of Property Act, 1925, on Jan. 1, 1926, her beneficial interest in the property became a one-fifth undivided share in the proceeds of sale of the self-same property which became thereafter held by the trustees of the grandfather's will on the statutory trusts. B C D

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51, provides:

"(2) The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act do not apply to any beneficial interest in real estate (not including chattels real) to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age at the commencement of this Act, and unable, by reason of his incapacity, to make a will, who thereafter dies intestate in respect of such interest without having recovered his testamentary capacity, was entitled at his death, and any such beneficial interest (not being an interest ceasing on his death) shall, without prejudice to any will of the deceased, devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case. For the purposes of this sub-section, a lunatic or defective who dies intestate as respects any beneficial interest in real estate shall not be deemed to have recovered his testamentary capacity unless his committee or receiver has been discharged." E F

The question is: Was the lady's undivided share in the proceeds of sale of her grandfather's freeholds at the date of her death a beneficial interest in real estate comprised in that sub-section which, by the terms of the sub-section, devolved in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of the Act applicable to land? If yea, then the appellant here, her heir-at-law and the first defendant in the action, is entitled to the property. If nay, then it is divided in accordance with the general scheme of distribution of estates under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, pt. IV, and the heir-at-law shares the property equally with the plaintiff and the second defendant. G H

It must be confessed, on reading the sub-section, that it is couched in terms of a somewhat complex character. First, I point out that the opening words, "The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act," is a reference to the language of the earlier sections of pt. IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, a Part of the Act exclusively concerned with the distribution of the residuary estate of deceased persons. In other words, it is a Part providing for the distribution, among the persons entitled, of the property of which a deceased person was entitled to dispose as his own beneficial property; and, in approaching the problem, I venture to think that the framers of the legislation of 1925 have made the task of the court more difficult by the somewhat oblique method by which, if at all, they have introduced into the sub-section the definition provisions relative to the term "real estate." As this matter is not without significance, I will deal with it. In s. 55 (1) of the Act, in pt. V, is to be found a number of definition paragraphs, and para. xix is:

" 'Real estate' save as provided in pt. IV of this Act means real estate, including chattels real, which by virtue of pt. I of this Act devolves on the personal representative of a deceased person."

It is clear that that paragraph, though it may not strictly be called a definition so much as, perhaps, an exposition of the phrase, does not in terms wholly exclude its application to pt. IV. It is only saying, as I read it, that except as otherwise provided for in pt. IV, it shall apply thereto. The difficulties are not yet over, because if you look at pt. I of the Act, there is a definition of "real estate" in s. 3 which, however, is only in terms to apply in that Part of the Act. Section 3 provides:

"(1) In this Part of this Act 'real estate' includes—(i) Chattels real, and land in possession, remainder, or reversion, and every interest in or over land to which a deceased person was entitled at the time of his death; and (ii) Real estate held on trust (including settled land) or by way of mortgage or security, but not money to arise under a trust for sale of land, nor money secured or charged on land."

Counsel for the second defendant, a niece of the intestate, has contended that the effect of these definitions is that you must read the phrase "real estate" in s. 51 as having the meaning assigned to real estate, albeit expressed only as applying for the purposes of pt. I, in s. 3. Counsel for the heir-at-law has contended that those definitions really do not apply at all, and that (particularly when you pay regard to the subject-matter with which pt. IV is dealing) real estate means real estate in the strict sense, which under the common law descended to the heir-at-law. I do not think that it matters for the decision of this case which view is taken. I have referred to it because I think DANCKWERTS, J., as I read his judgment, was disposed to take the view that the language of s. 55 (1) (xix) and particularly the words "save as provided in pt. IV," excluded that definition paragraph from the section altogether. Even, however, if you read into "real estate," with the exception of the reference to chattels real, the full definition of s. 3, it does not seem to me that the solution of the problem facing the court is materially advanced. At least, there will be included, by the terms of the definition, real estate held on trust; and I do not read that as meaning held on trust by the lunatic exclusively, nor does it seem to me that it is held any less or more "on trust" if it happens to be held on trust for sale. Whatever definition is given to the phrase "real estate" in s. 51, the vital question in the case is whether the somewhat larger phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate" covers this particular subject-matter. As I have already stated, the learned judge seems to me to have indicated that his own view, unshackled by any authority, would have favoured the contention of counsel for the heir-at-law. If I read his judgment correctly, he thought that, prima facie, the words in the paragraph applied all the more since there is judicial authority for the view that an interest in the proceeds of sale of real estate may, in an appropriate context, properly be described as an interest, or a beneficial interest, in real estate. He did not think he was prevented from coming to such a conclusion by the terms of the above-mentioned definition, but he thought himself bound by a decision of ROXBURGH, J., in the earlier case of Re Donkin (1).

I think I shall best formulate the points which have been taken, and the answers which suggest themselves to my mind to those points, if I now refer to that case. It was not parallel to the present case on its facts, for it was a case where a lunatic, who had been such since Jan. 1, 1926—in that respect it was like the present case—succeeded, in the interval between Jan. 1, 1926, and her own death, which took place two years later, to an interest which descended to her from her brother, of whom she was the sole next of kin. The brother's estate consisted in part of freehold houses. As a result of the operation of the legislation of 1925, that property had to be administered in accordance with the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. Those provisions (I refer to s. 33) require that the property should first be sold and then the proceeds applied in the payment of debts, costs, and testamentary expenses and thereafter handed over to the persons beneficially interested. So that, passing for the moment over s. 51 and any effect it may have, the interest to which the lunatic became entitled on her brother's death in 1928 was, inter alia, the balance of the proceeds of sale of her brother's freeholds, after the primary trust for conversion and payment of debts had been carried into effect. Therefore, the question which ROXBURGH, J., had to decide was whether s. 51 applied to a beneficial interest, derived though it was from freehold property, which came to her after the operation on that property of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 33, and which, so far as she was concerned, came into existence for the first time after these provisions had come into operation. It will be seen, therefore, that there is this vital distinction between Re Donkin (1) and the present case on their facts. In the present case, the lunatic's interest, whatever its quality, real or personal, existed on Jan. 1, 1926, and continued to exist thereafter. In Re Donkin (1), it came into existence for the first time after Jan. 1, 1926.

The point is one of great importance, because, on one view of the reading of the relevant sub-section, it might be said that devolution according to the old law would be preserved in the case of any beneficial interest in real estate to which a lunatic succeeded, however long after the converting operations of the Act of 1925 had come into operation, so long, of course, as the lunatic remained a lunatic till her death, and had continuously been so since 1925. To take an illustration, it would be possible that in 1975, a lunatic, having been a lunatic all her life and before 1926, then acquired by gift or succession an absolute interest in freehold property. In those circumstances, it might be said that on her death that freehold property, unlike any other freehold property, would go to her heir-at-law at her death (i.e., to the person who, under the old law, would have answered that description).

So far as Re Donkin (1) was concerned, the decision of ROXBURGH, J., faced as he was with that possibility, turns on one phrase. He says ([1947] 2 All E.R. 692), after reading s. 51 (2):

"It seems to me that, to make sense of that provision, it is necessary to confine the beneficial interests indicated to such interests as would under the general law in force before the commencement of the Act have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to freehold land."

That phrase, which is the turning point in the judgment, is, I think, capable of two constructions. It might mean that the phrase "beneficial interest" is confined to such an interest as existed at the commencement of the Act, and would then have devolved as freehold land. Or it might mean a beneficial interest which, whenever it came into the lunatic's possession, would, if it had not been for the Act, have devolved to the heir-at-law. If the learned judge had meant the former, I should have agreed with him, and I think DANCKWERTS, J., would have agreed with him also. But, in my judgment, ROXBURGH, J., undoubtedly used the phrase in the latter sense, and, so used, it seems to me (though it is sufficient to decide Re Donkin (1)), it would leave it open to question whether the property to which the lunatic succeeded, and which at that time was undoubtedly real estate, would devolve on the heir. I think that Re Donkin (1) was correctly decided, but I venture to base my reason for so deciding on grounds somewhat different from those which ROXBURGH, J., if I rightly understand him, expressed. The grounds on which I would decide Re Donkin (1) would not have obliged DANCKWERTS, J., to decide the present case as he did, and as, indeed, I think this case ought to be decided, namely, as DANCKWERTS, J., if left to himself, would have decided it.

In my judgment, the clue to the matter is this. I think that, for s. 51 (2) to apply, beneficial interests in real estate (whatever they may be) must possess certain characteristics. They must have existed and belonged to the lunatic on Jan. 1, 1926; and they must also exist and belong to the lunatic at the time of the lunatic's death. If that is right, then Re Donkin (1) is excluded from further consideration for the first characteristic in that case was absent. But I think also that the beneficial interests must, thirdly, be such that at the date of the coming into operation of the Act, or immediately before the coming into operation of the Act, they would have devolved as real property and gone to the heir. I will state in a moment my reasons for that view, but, subject to those limiting characteristics, I think the phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate" is one of wide import and does (because it is not in terms, or by necessary implication, excluded from so doing), according to the ordinary usage of language, cover an interest such as this lunatic had, namely, an interest in the proceeds of sale of real estate held on trust for sale. If that is right, the necessary conclusion follows.

I will give my reasons for saying that these beneficial interests, whatever they are, must have the characteristics I have ventured to ascribe to them. I have already read the sub-section. The language provides that the beneficial interest concerned must be one "to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age at the commencement of this Act, and unable, by reason of his incapacity, to make a will," etc. The beneficial interest, therefore, must, I think, be one in reference to which, at the date of the commencement of the Act, the lunatic was "unable to make a will." In other words, it must have existed and belonged to the lunatic at that date. I reach that conclusion because the section goes on "... who thereafter dies intestate in respect of such interest without having recovered his testamentary capacity," and there is a further reference to any will "in respect thereof," which the lunatic had made before his or her insanity, which, ex concessis, must have begun before Dec. 31, 1925. There can, secondly, be no doubt that the beneficial interest must continue until the date of the lunatic's death because in terms the section says "to which" the lunatic "was entitled at his death." Finally, in the last part of this section, come the words

"... and any such beneficial interest ... shall ... devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

That seems to me to indicate, in the plainest terms, that this beneficial interest is one in respect of which the law of descent applicable would, apart from the repeal section, have been the old law as to real estate. Therefore, I feel compelled, as a matter of construction of this section, to say that the beneficial interest referred to must have those three characteristics that I have stated. So long as the interest has them, I see no reason for limiting the natural and, as I think, wide usage of the phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate." My view, above referred to, is reinforced, I think, for a reason indicated during the argument by SOMERVELL, L.J., viz., the use before the word "entitled" of the past "was" rather than "is."

I come to the phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate." There has been considerable argument what that phrase properly describes, but it cannot be doubted, I think, that, at least in some contexts, a share in the proceeds of sale of realty would be covered by the phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate." For other purposes, no doubt, it is equally true that interests in the proceeds of real estate are personalty. Thus, CLAUSON, J., in Re Price (2), described them as an interest in personalty. But, as counsel for the heir-at-law pointed out, his mind was not directed in the least to the particular question with which we are concerned. What he was concerned to point out was, to use his own language ([1928] Ch. 589), that the trust for sale had converted, "so far as the beneficiaries are concerned," their interest from a landed or real interest into a personalty interest. Indeed, so far as authority is concerned, if authority be necessary, it seems to me that DANCKWERTS, J., rightly derived some support from, among others, the language of RUSSELL, L.J., in Re Kempthorne (3).

Another case cited to us was Re Warren (4), which followed Re Kempthorne (3). MAUGHAM, J., in that case was concerned with the question whether a particular gift was adeemed, a question which, no doubt, would depend primarily on the language of the will in suit. But, in the course of his judgment, the learned judge said ([1932] 1 Ch. 46):

"In considering that question it is important to note that the legislature has not deprived the testatrix of all interest in the land. The 'statutory trusts' (the meaning of which expression is set out in s. 35 of the Law of Property Act, 1925) are shortly to sell and hold the net proceeds on such trusts as may be requisite for giving effect to the rights of the persons interested in the land."

Then the learned judge observed, after referring to s. 26 (3) of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (ibid. 47):

"But in substance the beneficial interests of the undivided owners in regard to enjoyment so long as the land remains unsold have not been altered, and it is true to say that the ordinary layman possessed of an undivided share in land would be quite unaware of any alteration in his rights as the result of the Act."

The learned judge then referred to Re Kempthorne (3), and I would like to quote one short passage from the judgment of RUSSELL, L.J., in that case ([1930] 1 Ch. 292):

"And, therefore, it was contended that his property continued to be freehold property, and had not been changed into personal estate. I am unable to accept that view. There is no doubt that he is interested in the land; but his interest has ceased to be freehold property, and has become personal estate. To borrow an old phrase, frequently used in another connection, his interest, though an interest which savours of realty, is none the less personal estate."

That was a case of undivided shares. I have cited those observations to support the view that as a matter of ordinary English, the formula "any beneficial interest in real estate" can quite properly, and without abusing language or using it loosely or imprecisely, cover a share in the proceeds of sale of real property. It is true that in the passages I have quoted the word "land" is used rather than "real estate," but I cannot think myself that that vitally affects the matter.

Counsel for the niece of the intestate was asked what were the beneficial interests in that estate which, and which alone, s. 51 (2) was designed to cover. It would be most unjust to him to suppose that the reply he gave was exhaustive, but he did give examples which no doubt were present in his mind after giving much thought to the problem. He said "Land in fee simple: interests in remainder: estates pur autre vie: and absolute equitable interests." Then he was asked "If the words 'any beneficial interest in' were omitted from the formula which of those interests would no longer be covered?", to which he, subject to one qualification, answered "None." He expressed a doubt whether absolute equitable interests would be covered in either event, but if they were covered in the one case, I did not understand counsel to say they would not be covered in the other. However that may be, I think it became apparent in the course of the argument that those words "any beneficial interest in" must either be given the sort of significance which I have given them, or should be treated as put in ex abundanti cautela to exclude the application of this sub-section, in effect, to real estate held by the lunatic as trustee. I find the suggestion that holdings as trustees could ever have been in contemplation at all in this section and in this Part of the Act extremely difficult to accept. The whole of this Part of the Act, as I have said, deals, and deals only, with the distribution of the beneficial interests of a deceased person. I cannot think that anybody could have contemplated or thought that special words were required to procure that this sub-section should not be applicable to cases—and it could relate only to them—where lunatics were sole trustees.

Therefore, in its context (though I appreciate the force of the view which may be taken on the other side), I, for my part, feel compelled to the view that "any beneficial interest in real estate" is a phrase which is naturally—and is, in fact—used in this context to cover such an interest as that with which we are here concerned. The word "beneficial" is, no doubt, a limitation of the word "interest." None the less, in my judgment, the addition of the whole phrase "beneficial interest in" to "real estate" expands and enlarges the subject-matter to which the sub-section would otherwise have been related and makes its language apply to a species of property which, being a beneficial interest in realty in 1925, still continued thereafter to retain that quality. I think the result is natural, for after all this section is, on the face of it, a saving section. It seems to me naturally to be designed to preserve the rights of those who would be dispossessed, so to speak, by the coming into operation of the Acts in circumstances in which such dispossession could not have been prevented by the testator owing to his or her lunacy. I think it natural in such circumstances that such well recognised real property interests under the old law as undivided shares in real property should not be treated differently from other real estate interests.

My conclusion, for the reasons I have already stated, does not involve the view that interests coming into existence for the first time quoad the lunatic after the Acts have come into force, and converted as a result of the legislation into personalty, would be diverted from the ordinary rules of distribution provided by the Act. Moreover (and this is the point with which I end this judgment) my conclusion does not involve that if, apart altogether from the Act, real property had, before the Act came into force, been subjected to a trust for sale, the interest of the lunatic in the proceeds of such sale would descend as realty under the old law. I say that for this short and simple reason, because that beneficial interest in real estate would not have been a beneficial interest in real estate which, at the material date, namely, the coming into operation of the Act, would have devolved as the real estate of the lunatic under the old law.

My conclusion is the result of the three characteristics which I find attributable to the beneficial interest covered by the section. I agree with counsel for the niece that it means putting some gloss on, or explanatory language into, the section. So that I may not be thought to be evading that consequence, I will state what seems to me one way, at any rate, of reading the section, adding the words which I think must necessarily be added. I would read it thus: "The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act do not apply to any beneficial interest to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age was entitled as real estate (but not including chattels real), at the commencement of this Act," etc. I think that reading is necessarily involved in the language. If that reading is justified, I think all the results follow. For the reasons I have stated, I would allow the appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. The first question that I think has to be considered is whether or not s. 51 (2) is confined to cases where a beneficial interest existed in the lunatic at the commencement of the Act. I come to the conclusion that that is a necessary condition of the application of the sub-section. I think the actual words used in the sub-section are capable of either construction, but I think, whichever of the two constructions is put on them, it might be said that the language is not so completely clear or as apt as, perhaps, it might have been. I come to that conclusion for these reasons. I think the opening words plainly point to this construction. The fact that the person entitled must be a lunatic of full age at the commencement of the Act, naturally, though not, perhaps, necessarily, indicates that it is to that date that you look to see whether he has any beneficial interest in real estate in respect of which he was not able to make a will. Then the later words, "was entitled at his death," naturally have to be inserted, because there must be two conditions if the prima facie view I have expressed about the commencement of the Act is right. Obviously, the section must not operate, or purport to operate, unless the interest still subsists at his death. I, therefore, come to that conclusion for the reasons which I have shortly expressed, and for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls.

Then we come to the question whether this undivided share in realty, the nature of which was changed by this body of legislation including the Law of Property Act, 1925, is within these words. On that I associate myself, with respect, if I may, with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to the construction of these words in this context, but, speaking for myself, once I have come to the conclusion that the beneficial interest in real estate must exist at the commencement of the Act, I think I would have arrived at the same result by a somewhat shorter route, because, on this view, it seems to me natural to construe the words in the light of their meaning immediately before the commencement of the Act. Nobody disputes that until the Law of Property Act, 1925, operated on interests such as those we are considering they were beneficial interests in real estate. I think that that construction is reinforced by the logic and purport of this sub-section. I can see no reason why the sub-section should make a saving in respect of interests in real estate which are left as such as the result of the Law of Property Act, but not make a saving in respect of interests in real estate, the nature of which was changed, for certain purposes at any rate, by that Act. If, therefore, one construes these words in that way, that illogicality does not arise. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I regret that I find myself unable to agree with my Lords as to the right conclusion in this case. The Law of Property Act, 1925, by s. 39 and pt. IV of sched. I, subjected to a statutory trust for sale land held at the commencement of the Act in undivided shares. Statutory trusts were defined by s. 35 of the Act. Very briefly, they were a trust for sale with power to postpone the sale "and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale . . . and of the net rents and profits until sale" on the trusts requisite for giving effect to the rights of the persons interested in the land. It is not open to doubt that the statutory trust for sale thus imposed was just as effective as an express trust for sale created by a disposition for the purpose of effecting an immediate conversion of the land in equity from realty to personalty. It follows that every former owner of an undivided share in land which, as the law stood before 1926, was real estate, received in lieu of that interest in realty, an interest in personalty consisting of a share in the proceeds to arise from the execution of the statutory trust for sale, and a share also in the rents and profits until sale. That substituted interest, I apprehend, was clearly personalty for all purposes, including devolution on intestacy, and incidentally also including the construction of gifts by will in the sense that a general testamentary gift of real estate in the absence of some special context would no longer include such undivided share.

It was open to the legislature, if minded so to do, to insert in the Law of Property Act, 1925, a saving to the effect that the conversion effected by the statutory trusts should not alter the character or quality of any interest in an undivided share to which a lunatic or defective might have been entitled before the commencement of the Act. No such saving was inserted, and the undivided share of a lunatic or defective suffered the same fate as the share of any person who was fully compos mentis. Had the legislation rested there, the result as regards devolution, would have been quite plain. By force of the conversion, a former undivided share, or rather a share in the proceeds of sale corresponding to the former undivided share whether of a lunatic or defective or of a person of sound mind, instead of passing to the heir, would have passed to the persons entitled to his personal estate under the statutes of distribution in force before the Law of Property Act, 1925, but, in fact, in addition to the Law of Property Act and the other Acts passed at the same time, there was passed the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which altered the devolution of property on an intestacy.

Broadly speaking, the effect of that Act (the part of which chiefly material for the purposes of this case is pt. IV) was to abolish all the rules of descent specially applicable to realty and to assimilate the devolution of realty to that of personalty. The devolution of personalty, or, rather, of property generally, irrespective of whether it was realty or personalty, reproduced in a somewhat modified form the main provisions governing intestate succession to personalty as they stood before the Act. I say in a somewhat modified form because there were various modifications of more or less importance, but the change as regards personalty was not nearly so radical as the change involved in abolishing the old rules of descent to the heir. As I have said, there is no saving clause in the Law of Property Act, 1925, in relation to undivided shares held by lunatics or defectives, but it was thought necessary in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to insert a saving clause as regards the application of the new rules of succession to the real estate of such persons. Apparently, the framers of the Act considered that the alterations, so far as they affected personalty, were of a kind to which no one would be likely to raise any strong objection. Therefore, the personalty of a lunatic was left to descend after the Act in the same way as the personalty of a person of sound mind, but with respect to real estate a saving was thought to be necessary, and it was provided for, in the terms to which my Lord has already referred, by s. 51 (2): beneficial interest (not being an interest ceasing on his death) shall, without prejudice to any will of the deceased, devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

“The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act do not apply to any beneficial interest in real estate (not including chattels real) to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age at the commencement of this Act, and unable, by reason of his incapacity, to make a will, who thereafter dies intestate in respect of such interest without having recovered his testamentary capacity, was entitled at his death, and any such

The question in the case is whether, by virtue of that saving provision, the intestate's share in the proceeds of sale, and net rents and profits until sale of the property in an undivided share to which she was entitled immediately before the commencement of the legislation of 1925, devolved as real estate. As to that, I would first observe that, as appears from what I have already said, the conversion of this undivided share into personalty was effected not by pt. IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, at all, but by the Law of Property Act, 1925. A section which purports to be a saving from the application of "the foregoing provisions" of pt. IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, is, prima facie, not an appropriate vehicle for the saving of an undivided share of an intestate from the results of the conversion effected by a wholly different Act. One would expect the saving in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925 s. 51 (2), to be dealing simply with the innovations in the way of rules as to devolution of property on intestacy effected by that Act and nothing else. In my judgment, that is precisely what this sub-section does refer to.

The first question which arises is what is meant by "any beneficial interest in real estate." Does that expression include a share in the proceeds of sale to arise under the statutory trusts for sale? With respect to my Lord, I should say the answer to that question quite clearly must be in the negative. If an interest in the proceeds of sale to arise under the statutory trusts for sale is a beneficial interest in real estate within the meaning of the section, by parity of reasoning an interest in the proceeds of sale to arise under an express trust for sale would be an interest in real estate. If that were so, one would, on a natural reading of the section, prima facie, get the peculiar result that where a lunatic or a defective was entitled to proceeds to arise under an express trust for sale, those proceeds on the death of that person intestate would pass in accordance with the old law applicable to the devolution of freehold land—an extraordinary result indeed!

Counsel for the heir-at-law appreciated the difficulty about construing "any beneficial interest in real estate" in that way, and he disclaimed the view that a share in the proceeds to arise under an express trust for sale would be affected by the section in the way I have mentioned. He sought to extricate himself from the difficulty by saying that this sub-section only applied to beneficial interests in real estate to which a lunatic or defective was entitled immediately before the commencement of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and which, as the law stood immediately before such commencement, were real estate. I understand that to be in substance the view which has commended itself to my Lords. For my part, and with diffidence, I find it impossible to extract that construction from the language used. It seems to me that the sub-section quite clearly, so far as language can make anything clear, is directed to one point of time and one point of time only, and that is the death of the lunatic or the defective. The lunatic or the defective dies after the commencement of the Act without ever having recovered testamentary capacity and one has to consider how his property is to devolve. One finds that his estate includes a share in proceeds to arise under a statutory trust for sale of freeholds. In my judgment, such an interest on the death of the lunatic or defective after the commencement of the Act must necessarily be personal estate and cannot be anything else. I think that result necessarily follows unless one can re-cast the language in the way my Lord proposes so as to determine the quality of the property immediately before the commencement of the Act instead of at the death of the lunatic or the defective. That is simply a matter of the construction of the language used in the sub-section, which is admittedly very involved, as the draftsman has thought it necessary to treat himself to at least one relative enclosed within another, and has managed to postpone, to about the eighth line of the section, the vital words "was entitled at his death." But when one reads it through to the end, speaking for myself, A I think it is really quite clear that the date of the death is the only date which can be looked at.

There is very little more that I wish to say. My Lord found it possible, as I understood his reasons, to hold that the word "beneficial" has some enlarging effect on the word "real estate." I find it impossible to agree with that. It seems to me that the word "beneficial" is only inserted to exclude interests B which might be held by the lunatic or defective as a trustee. I think exactly the same meaning would have been achieved if the section had run "any interest in real estate" and then had said "to which a lunatic" and so on "was entitled at his death beneficially and not as a trustee." My Lord has suggested that this is not enough to account for the use of the word "beneficial." He pointed out that the cases in which trust interests could come into question would be C very rare, and in any case no one could suppose that the section was intended to apply to them. That may be so, but I think in that kind of matter the draftsman of the Act did display a superabundance of caution, for a little later on in the section he found it necessary to exclude interests ceasing on the death of the lunatic or defective. For my part, I find it impossible to see how an interest ceasing on the death of the lunatic or defective could devolve D either in accordance with the old law or in accordance with the new law. Further, as to the meaning of the vexed phrase "any beneficial interest in real estate," for my part, reading the definition contained in s. 55 (1) (xix) of the Act in conjunction with the definition of real estate which so devolves contained in s. 3 (1), I would be disposed to conclude that by definition, i.e., by the definition extracted from the joint application of s. 55 (1) (xix) and s. 3 (1), money to arise under a trust for sale, or in other words an interest under a trust for sale, is excluded from the expression "any beneficial interest in real F estate" in s. 51 (2). I do not attach any great importance to that, however, for it seems to me that ROXBURGH, J., was perfectly right in Re Donkin (1) when he said, in effect, that from the context it is apparent that the beneficial interests in real estate referred to are those beneficial interests which would have devolved in accordance with the old law of an intestate succession to real estate, if that law had not been abrogated by the new legislation.

"'Real estate' save as provided in pt. IV of this Act means real estate, including chattels real, which by virtue of pt. I of this Act devolves on E the personal representative of a deceased person"

G I think my Lords in substance are in agreement with that, and the real point of difficulty is simply at what moment of time should the quality of the beneficial interest be determined. For the reasons I have endeavoured to express, I find myself unable to accept any other moment of time for that purpose than the date of the death of the deceased. If I could agree with my Lords that the moment before the commencement of the Act was the appropriate time, I H would agree with them that the consequences which they indicate would follow from that, but, having regard to the contrary view I take on that point, for my part, I would dismiss the appeal.

ROSS v. ROSS.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), February 15, 24, 1950.]

Divorce—Maintenance—Wife entitled to maintenance under order made by justices—Application to Divorce Court for maintenance while justices' order still in force—Election by wife—Waiver of right to order by Divorce Court—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (2). A

On May 4, 1949, the wife obtained a decree nisi of divorce from the husband. At the conclusion of the hearing of her petition counsel stated on her behalf that she would not ask for maintenance as she proposed to rely on a maintenance order, dated Aug. 30, 1945, which she had obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction on behalf of herself and her child, on the ground of the husband's desertion and wilful failure to maintain. The decree was made absolute on June 17, 1949, and on Aug. 15, 1949, the wife filed an application for maintenance under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (2), without having applied to the justices to discharge their order of Aug. 30, 1945. On Oct. 26, 1949, she took out a summons for arrears due under the order of the justices, and on Oct. 27 she applied to the justices to discharge their order, but her application was adjourned sine die pending the hearing of her application to the Divorce Court. It was contended by the husband that the application under the Act of 1925 could not be entertained as the wife had made an irrevocable election to rely on the order of the justices. B C

HELD: (i) on the facts of the case, there was no evidence of an irrevocable election by the wife in favour of the order of the justices, but D

Semble: the doctrine of election could not apply where the wife had only one remedy open to her (viz., an order for maintenance against the husband), but a choice of courts in which she might pursue that remedy.

(ii) assuming that, by the statement of her counsel at the conclusion of the hearing of her divorce petition, and by her subsequent conduct, she had purported to make an irrevocable election not to apply for maintenance under the Act of 1925, the wife could not renounce or waive her right to maintenance under the Act of 1925 and the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 44 (1), by any unilateral statement or conduct on her part, as such a purported election would offend against the principles laid down in Hyman v. Hyman ([1929] A.C. 601) and would not be binding on her. E F

(iii) the court would not make an order for maintenance while the order of the justices was still in force, and the wife would have to decide whether she would rely on the order of the justices, or whether she would apply to them to discharge their order and would then apply to the Divorce Court for an order under the Act of 1925.

APPLICATION FOR MAINTENANCE adjourned into court.

The wife, who had obtained a decree nisi of divorce on May 4, 1949, filed an application for maintenance, under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (2), on Aug. 15, 1949, while an order for maintenance, dated Aug. 30, 1945, which she had obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction at Southport, was still in force. On Oct. 27, 1949, she applied to the justices to discharge their order, but the application was dismissed sine die pending the hearing of the application before the High Court. On Dec. 5, 1949, the application under the Act of 1925 came before the district registrar of the Southport District Registry who referred the matter to the judge for his decision, under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 53. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cour. adv. vult.

Feb. 24. WILLMER, J., read the following judgment. This is a wife's application for maintenance which has been referred to me by the district registrar of the Southport District Registry because of an unusual point of law raised by the husband in opposition to the application. The case originally came before me at Manchester Spring Assizes last year, and on May 4, 1949, I pronounced a decree nisi in favour of the wife. This was made absolute on June 17. The petition included no prayer for maintenance, and it is common ground that at the conclusion of the hearing before me counsel for the wife stated in open court that there would be no question of maintenance as the wife proposed to rely on an order, dated Aug. 30, 1945, which she had obtained from the court of summary jurisdiction at Southport on the ground of desertion and wilful failure to maintain, whereby the husband was ordered to pay £2 per week maintenance for the wife and 10s. per week for the one child of the marriage. The period of two months from final decree within which an application should be made under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 44 (1), expired on Aug. 17, 1949. Two days before that, i.e., on Aug. 15, the wife, without having taken any steps towards the discharge of the order of the court of summary jurisdiction, filed the present application for maintenance under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (2). On Oct. 26, the wife took out a summons for arrears due under the order of the court of summary jurisdiction, and I am informed that some, at least, of the arrears alleged to be due were subsequently paid by the husband. On the following day, Oct. 27, the wife for the first time applied for the discharge of the order of the court of summary jurisdiction, but her application was adjourned sine die, pending the hearing of the present application. Consequently, at the date of the hearing before the learned district registrar, the order of the court of summary jurisdiction was still in force, and it is still in force to-day.

In these circumstances it is contended on behalf of the husband that the wife has elected to take her remedy elsewhere and can no longer be allowed to put forward a claim for maintenance in this court. It is well established that a wife cannot obtain an order for maintenance in this court while at the same time retaining in force an order previously obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction: see Kilford v. Kilford (1). In that case a wife had previously obtained an order from a court of summary jurisdiction, with which for the time being she was quite satisfied, but to safeguard her future position she sought, while the order of the justices was still in force, to obtain in addition a nominal order for maintenance in this court. BARNARD, J., however, refused to entertain the application so long as the order of the justices was in force, and left the wife to choose either to rely on the order of the justices or to have that order discharged before proceeding with her application in this court. In the present case the wife is quite content that I should take a similar course, and I am invited to make an order for maintenance in her favour on the understanding that the application to discharge the order of the justices will be proceeded with forthwith. For the husband, however, it is objected that in this case the time for such a choice has now passed, and it is said that the wife has already made an irrevocable election to rely on the order of the justices. It is contended that, having regard to the statement made by her counsel at the trial, coupled with her subsequent conduct in retaining the order of the justices in force after the filing of the present application—and, indeed, after the last date on which the application could have been made without leave—the wife has made an election, within the principle stated by the House of Lords in Scarf v. Jardine (2), and, having made that election, is precluded for all time, and in all circumstances, from obtaining an order for maintenance in this court.

The doctrine of election, as I understand it, applies in a case where a plaintiff has alternative remedies, and it is held that, where he has once elected to pursue one, he has waived his right to the other and is for ever precluded from asserting it. This is nowhere made clearer than by the words of CAVE, J., in Re Davison (3), where he said (13 Q.B.D. 54):

“ This doctrine applies only where the person having the cause of action is put to elect between two inconsistent remedies, as in the case of the right to sue either the agent or the principal when disclosed: Curtis v. Williamson (4); or the old and new partners in a firm where the old partners are liable only by estoppel, as in Scarf v. Jardine (2); or in the case of the right to sue for a tort or to waive the tort and sue for the proceeds in the hands of the wrongdoer. In these cases the plaintiff may elect which remedy he will have, but when he has elected one remedy he has thereby waived his right to the other.”

In the present case, as it seems to me, the wife was never in the position of having alternative or inconsistent remedies. She never had more than one remedy open to her, viz., an order for maintenance against the husband, but she had a choice of courts in which she might pursue that remedy. The position, as I see it, is somewhat analogous to the case where proceedings in respect of substantially the same cause of action are pending at the same time in two different courts. Of this class of case, McHenry v. Lewis (5) is a well-known example. In such cases it has never, so far as I know, been suggested that a plaintiff, by instituting proceedings in one court, has irrevocably elected to pursue his remedy only in that court, so as to be precluded for all time from proceeding elsewhere. On the contrary, it is clear that, on a motion to stay proceedings on the ground of lis alibi pendens, the court has a discretion to stay or not to stay the proceedings, and may at that stage put the plaintiff to his election in regard to the court in which he will proceed. I very much doubt, therefore, whether the doctrine of election, as enumerated in the cases referred to, could ever be applied to a case such as the present, where the wife's only choice so far has been in regard to the court in which she will pursue the remedy which she undoubtedly has. In any case I am not satisfied, on the facts of the present case, that the wife has ever, so far, done anything which could be dignified by the name of an election in the sense of a final and irrevocable choice. The words used by her counsel at the trial of the suit appear to me to amount to no more than a statement of present intention—an explanation to the court in regard to the reason for the absence of any prayer for maintenance in the petition. If the wife were to be held irrevocably bound by any such statement by counsel, it would seem to be logical to say that she would equally be bound by a similar intimation in the course of solicitors' correspondence at any stage of the proceedings. Carrying the argument one stage further, why should she not be said to have made an irrevocable election by including no claim for maintenance in her petition? Plainly, such a contention would be absurd, yet, logically, I do not see why a statement by counsel at the trial, in the circumstances in which this statement was made, should be treated as having any more binding effect. The fact is that by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 44 (1), a wife is not required to assert her claim for maintenance until decree absolute and two months thereafter. Moreover, even after that time she may still assert such a claim by leave of the court. Up to the time when this application was, in fact, filed, viz., Aug. 15, 1949, I cannot see that the wife had done any unequivocal act, within the principles laid down in Scarf v. Jardine (2), such as to show an irrevocable election to rely only on the order of the justices and to waive her rights in the High Court. Reliance is placed on the fact that after that time, and notwithstanding the filing of the present application, she continued to retain in force the order of the justices. It seems to me, however, that the most that can be said against her in that respect is that her conduct after Aug. 15 was equivocal. Nothing that happened after that date could be regarded as evidence of an irrevocable election in favour of the order of the justices.

Assuming, however, that I am wrong in all that I have said so far, it appears to me that there is another fatal objection to the husband's contention. Even if the wife, by the statement of her counsel and by her subsequent conduct, did purport to make an irrevocable election not to apply for maintenance in the High Court, such a purported election would, in my judgment, offend against the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Hyman v. Hyman (6), and would not be binding on her. In that case it was held that the terms of a separation agreement entered into before the institution of divorce proceedings could not be relied on to oust the jurisdiction of the court to award the wife maintenance, but the members of the House made it clear that, in their view, any agreement entered into between the parties at any stage, whereby it was sought to limit or control the jurisdiction of the court to award maintenance to a wife, would be void and unenforceable. The reason for this is that the statutory right to maintenance is accorded to a wife as much in the public interest as for her own benefit, and it is, therefore, a right which it is not competent for her to renounce or barter away by agreement. The same principle was recently followed by the Court of Appeal in Gaisberg v. Storr (7), where it was held that a husband's undertaking, given during divorce proceedings, to make weekly payments, in consideration of the wife undertaking not to apply for alimony pending suit or for permanent maintenance, did not in any way preclude the wife from claiming alimony pending suit or permanent maintenance. Applying the same principle to the present case, if it is not competent for a wife by agreement to contract out of her statutory right to claim maintenance in this court, I do not see how it is possible for her, by any unilateral statement or conduct on her part, to renounce or waive such right, at any rate up to the time of decree absolute and two months thereafter. It was further argued by counsel on behalf of the wife, following the principles applied in Ward v. Baugh (8) and Fytche v. Fytche (9) that, even assuming the wife herself to be barred by an irrevocable election on her part to rely only on the order of the justices, such an election on her part could not in any circumstances bind the child of the marriage, so as to bar a claim for maintenance in this court on behalf of the child. In view of the conclusion which I have already stated, it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion on this further point, but I merely refer to the argument presented to me so as to keep the point open in the event of an appeal.

This being my conclusion on the question of law argued before me, it remains for me to consider what order I ought to make in the circumstances. I was invited by counsel on both sides to regard the whole matter, including all questions of quantum, as being referred to me, and, in the event of my deciding (as I have decided) that the claim is not barred, to proceed forthwith to the making of a maintenance order. It should be stated that the question of quantum has already been considered by the learned district registrar, who has reached a tentative conclusion in regard to what would be an appropriate sum by way of maintenance for the wife and child respectively, assuming that the claim is admissible. After consideration I have come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the invitation of counsel, it would be wrong for me to make an order for maintenance at the present stage. To do so now, while the order of the justices is still in force, would be contrary to the ruling in Kilford v. Kilford (1), by which I hold myself bound, and with which, in any case, I agree. It is stated in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 473—correctly, in my judgment—that the court will not hear the application and make an order subject to the discharge of the justices' order. The wife can have only one order in force at one time. If I make an order now, as I am invited to do, the wife will have two orders in force at the same time, and she will be in a position to enforce whichever appears to her the more favourable, and to apply for the discharge of the other. In my judgment, she is not entitled to be put in any such privileged position. I propose to follow BARNARD, J., in Kilford v. Kilford (1), and to say that the wife must now make up her mind whether she will rely on the order of the justices, or whether she prefers to have that order discharged so as to make way for an order of this court. I propose, therefore, to adjourn this application for twenty-eight days. If at the expiration of that time the order of the justices remains undischarged, this application will stand dismissed. But if within that time the wife shall have obtained the discharge of the justices' order, she will be at liberty to renew this application before the district registrar, to whom I refer the matter to make such order as he may think fit. Since this result amounts to a substantial success for the wife, I think that she should have her costs of the proceedings both before the district registrar and before me. Such costs as may be included in any renewal of the application before the district registrar, I reserve to him. But, without wishing in any way to fetter his discretion in the matter of costs, I think it is proper to point out that, if the wife feels that the order of the justices is inadequate in present conditions the justices now have jurisdiction under the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, s. 1, to award substantially larger amounts than the amounts payable under the Married Women (Maintenance) Acts, 1895 and 1920, so that she is in no way bound to have recourse to this court in order to obtain a more favourable order.

v. THE TRUSTEE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Jenkins, L.J.J.), February 27, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Appeal—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Appeal out of time—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal to grant leave—Need to show special circumstances—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15—Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (S.R. & O., 1914, No. 1824), r. 130, r. 134.

The trustees of a settlement appealed to the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division against a decision of a court judge that the settlement (which was made within two years of the bankruptcy of the settlor) was not for valuable consideration and could therefore be impeached by the settlor's trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1). On Jan. 23, 1950, the Divisional Court dismissed the appeal, but gave the settlement trustees leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. During a casual conversation after the hearing, the solicitors for the settlement trustees raised the question of the time allowed for the appeal, and counsel in error suggested that the period was six weeks. On Feb. 22, 1950, the solicitors attempted to lodge a notice of appeal, but the clerk refused to permit the lodgment on the ground that having regard to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 130, no appeal to the Court of Appeal from any order of the court could be brought after the expiration of twenty-one days. The settlement trustees now applied for leave to appeal out of time.

HELD: despite the elimination in 1909 from Ord. 58, r. 15, of the words "special leave of the Court of Appeal," it was still necessary, in cases subject to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, having regard to r. 130 thereof, to show special circumstances before leave to appeal out of time could be granted; and, although a mere mistake by a legal adviser did not constitute "special circumstances," on the facts of this case the circumstances as a whole were adequate to justify the granting of the leave sought.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an application for an extension of the time wherein an appeal to this court can be lodged against an order of the Divisional Court made on an appeal from His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., at Brighton and Lewes County Court on Nov. 10, 1949. The appeal was heard by the Divisional Court on Jan. 23, 1950, and was then dismissed, but the order was not drawn up until Jan. 31. It is not in doubt that the time for the purpose of an appeal ran from the former date, Jan. 23. It is also not in doubt that, subject to any powers we may have (which I will mention in a moment) the period for entering an appeal was twenty-one days from that date. The trustees of the settlement attempted to enter the notice of appeal on Feb. 22, but that was some ten days or so out of time, and this application is so to extend the time as to enable that notice of appeal to be made effective.

The matter of appeal is governed by the rules in bankruptcy which have been in operation since 1915. They provide, by r. 134:

"Subject to the foregoing rules, appeals to the Court of Appeal shall be regulated by Ord. 58 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883," and any amending rules. As I shall have occasion to observe presently, in 1915 Ord. 58 had been amended in a material respect, and the effect of that amendment was to give to this court much greater latitude in matters of this kind and a much wider discretion than it had earlier possessed. Rule 130 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, provides:

"Subject to the powers of the Court of Appeal to extend the time under special circumstances, no appeal to the Court of Appeal from any order of the court shall be brought after the expiration of twenty-one days."

Counsel for the applicants has argued that the effect of the two rules read together and of the change in the Rules of the Supreme Court is that the power of the Court of Appeal to extend the time for appeal is not now limited to a case in which special circumstances have been shown. I am unable to accept that argument. It seems to me that those two rules, read together, plainly mean that the time for appeal is limited as stated subject to the powers to extend time which the Court of Appeal have under the ordinary rules, which powers shall only be exercised "under special circumstances."

D

I deal next with the history so far as it affects Ord. 58 of the Rules of the Supreme Court. Before 1909 Ord. 58, r. 15, provided that the powers of the Court of Appeal to extend time should be limited according to this formula, namely, that the time for appeal should be as fixed in the rules subject to extension "by special leave of the Court of Appeal." In 1909 (by R.S.C. May, 1909), the words I have just read, "special leave of the Court of Appeal," were eliminated so that there was no longer need to prove anything special, and the matter became simply one for the free and unfettered discretion of the court in view of the circumstances in each case as it came before it. But before that change had been made, it had been decided in Re Coles & Ravenshear (1) that a mistake on the part of the legal advisers of the would-be appellant should not be counted as "special circumstances" such as would justify leave being given by the Court of Appeal under the old rule, i.e., it was held by this court that, in order to obtain the "special leave of the Court of Appeal," special circumstances must be shown and a mistake by a party's legal advisers did not constitute such circumstances. Counsel for the applicants has drawn attention to the fact that in the more recent case of Gatti v. Shoosmith (2) this court pointed out that the effect of the alteration of the rule which removed the necessity of proving special circumstances was that in a case to which the ordinary rule applied it was no longer to be treated as conclusive against the applicant that the reason for the delay had been merely due to mistake; that that, in itself, would not be fatal to the application, but the court was entitled to consider every case on its merits; and, if it thought that, notwithstanding the mistake, it was right and proper to give leave, there was power to do so. In my judgment, however, that change which the alteration of Ord. 58 effected as regards ordinary appeals is inapplicable to bankruptcy appeals, for the reason which I have already stated—that the powers to grant extension of time are, in the case of bankruptcy appeals, limited by the phrase "under special circumstances." If, therefore, the only matter which is relied on by the applicants is a mistake on the part of the legal advisers, this court would be bound to hold, as I conceive, following

H

Ravenshear's case (1), that such a mistake does not constitute a special circumstance.

A What are the facts here? It is said in an affidavit by the solicitors to the applicants that the reason why they sought to enter the appeal on Feb. 22 instead of within the period of twenty-one days was a casual conversation with the learned counsel who appeared in the court below as a result of which they were misled into thinking that they had got six weeks from the time when the order was made and they forbore to read r. 130 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915. That, of itself, as I have indicated, would appear to me to be insufficient to deprive the successful party of the right to say: "No, I have won my case and the order made should not now be disturbed merely because the other side have made a mistake." Indeed, it was a casual conversation which was the cause of the trouble in Re Coles & Ravenshear (1). But that is not quite all in the present case. In the first place, the applicants here are the trustees of a settlement. As I follow it, from my recollection of reading the report in the ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS of the proceedings before the Divisional Court (Re Macadam (3)), the cost of certain premises was provided in part by the trustees out of trust moneys and in part by the bankrupt, and the question was whether that transaction could be successfully impeached in the bankruptcy. There may be persons other than the bankrupt interested under the settlement. The point which was considered by the Divisional Court was obviously one of some importance in principle, and the learned judges went so far, when asked to grant leave to appeal, as to say that they thought it a case proper to go to the Court of Appeal. The property remains vested in the trustees, so that it may be fairly said with greater emphasis than could be said in other cases that the property remains where it was, and nobody is the worse off for this mistake. I also bear in mind, as I think it is legitimate to do, that in Gatti v. Shoosmith (2) this court indicated that the court regarded fetters on its discretion with some disfavour. That can, I think, be fairly taken into account, though, of course, it would be quite improper on the view which I take for this court to do other than loyally follow Re Coles & Ravenshear (1) or to suggest that it was not correct. But, when all the circumstances are added together—the fact of there being here trustees concerned and persons interested under a settlement, the fact that the property remains safely in the trust, the fact that special leave to appeal was given by the Divisional Court (which was, at any rate, some intimation to the trustee in bankruptcy that the question of an appeal was going to be considered), the fact that counsel who has been good enough to attend and assist us on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy is obviously not disposed to press very strongly for the rejection of the application—I think that there is just sufficient—but, in my judgment, only just—to say that there are special circumstances which would justify the court in this case in granting the application sought. It will be, of course, on the terms that the applicants pay the costs of the trustee which have been occasioned by this application. It is unnecessary to say whether those costs ought or ought not in any circumstances to be charged against the trust estate. That is a matter beyond our jurisdiction, but for the reasons I have indicated, and without in any way desiring to cast doubt on the validity of the view expressed in WILLIAMS ON BANKRUPTCY, 16th ed., p. 617, that a mere mistake by counsel or solicitor or both would not qualify as special circumstances, nevertheless, as I have said, in this case I think it would be right to give leave to appeal.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE L. C. THOMAS, made at Cardiff County Court, on Nov. 11, 1949, whereby he allowed the plaintiff’s claim for commission. The facts appear in the judgment.

The plaintiff, an estate agent, alleged that he had, in accordance with the defendant’s instructions, found a purchaser for the defendant’s property. The defendant failed to complete, and, on the plaintiff claiming commission, resisted the claim on the ground that there was no note or memorandum, within the meaning of s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, sufficient to bind the purchaser, and, alternatively, that there was no concluded contract between the defendant and the purchaser, because the date for possession had not been agreed. F

David Pennant for the defendant.

Meurig Evans for the plaintiff. G

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This action was brought by a Mr. William Howard Fowler, trading as William Fowler & Son, estate agents, in Cardiff, for commission alleged to have been earned in respect of a “ sale ” by him on the defendant’s behalf of certain premises 355, Lansdowne Road, Cardiff, owned by the defendant, at the end of 1948. H

The first question is: What were the terms of the contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, and on that the learned county court judge has expressed no view. That, however, may be understandable because, having considered the evidence, I do not think that there can be any doubt about what the terms were. In his evidence-in-chief the plaintiff said that he received instructions to sell, and then he adds: "Had to find purchaser willing and able to pay." In cross-examination he said: "I was asked by defendant to find 'a buyer'," and those words are placed by the judge in inverted commas. He goes on: "Neither of us mentioned a person able and willing to purchase." The defendant stated: "Instructed him [the plaintiff] to find purchaser." So the learned judge may well have said to himself: "There is no doubt that the terms of the agency were that the plaintiff was to find a purchaser." At any rate,

A I think it is clear that that is what the evidence shows the bargain to have been.

The next question is: On that footing, what did the plaintiff have to do to earn his commission? In my judgment, the answer to that question is that he had to find, i.e., produce for his principal, a purchaser who was bound in law to buy. That statement I base on the language of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN and LORD ROMER in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1). The facts in the Luxor case (1) were quite different from those in the present case, and the observations to which I am about to allude and on which I rely were, no doubt, strictly obiter. The whole question, however, of the relationship which properly exists between a house owner and an agent employed by him for the purpose of selling was considered most carefully by their Lordships in that case, and I think it would be the duty of this court on any view of it to follow the opinions which I am about to read. I only add that they have been followed in the sense which I attach to them by HILBERY, J., in two recent cases, one Jones v. Lowe (2) and the other E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (3), to which may be added a decision of SLADE, J., in Murdoch Lownie, Ltd. v. Newman (4).

C The first passage in the Luxor case (1) to which I would refer is in LORD D RUSSELL's speech ([1941] 1 All E.R. 44) where he says this:

"The position will no doubt be different if the matter has proceeded to the stage of a binding contract having been made between the principal and the agent's client. In that case, it can be said with truth that a 'purchaser' has been introduced by the agent. In other words, the event has happened upon the occurrence of which a right to the promised commission has become vested in the agent."

E That conclusion followed a discussion of Trollope (George) & Sons v. Martyn Bros. (5), which LORD RUSSELL criticised, and in that context I think there can be no doubt that LORD RUSSELL is expressing the view that where one has a bargain by which the agent has to introduce a purchaser, the agent, to earn his commission, must produce the result of a binding contract (I am quoting LORD F RUSSELL's language) having been made between vendor and purchaser. LORD ROMER, after discussing the Trollope case (5) says this ([1941] 1 All E.R. 64):

"The question, then, to be determined upon the hypothesis which I mentioned just now is this. Where an owner of property employs an agent to find a purchaser, which must mean at least a person who enters into a binding contract to purchase, is it an implied term . . . ?"

G I take those two passages as guiding me to the conclusion I have indicated, namely, that in the present case, where the bargain was that the plaintiff should find a purchaser, he must, to earn his commission, at least produce a person bound in law to buy. Whether it is also necessary that his principal, the vendor, should be bound in law it is unnecessary for the present case to decide. The plaintiff says, and, as I hold, says with truth: "I have found someone. I have found a Mr. T. A. Harris, and he is a person bound at law to buy."

H [HIS LORDSHIP held on construction that the terms of the correspondence, constituted a sufficient memorandum of the contract between the defendant and the purchaser and that the date of possession was not of the essence of the contract, which was, therefore, binding and enforceable against the purchaser, and, accordingly, that the plaintiff was entitled to commission. He continued:]

For these reasons I conclude that we should not disturb the decision of the judge below and I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J., and JENKINS, L.J., concurred.

Estate Duty—Continuing annuity—Bequest of annuity for joint lives and life of survivor—Property passing on death of first of beneficiaries to die—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (b).

The Finance Act, 1894, s. 1 provides: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, there shall . . . be levied and paid, on the principal value . . . of all property . . . which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'estate duty' . . ." By s. 2: "(1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say: . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest . . ."

A testator, who died on Feb. 11, 1917, bequeathed to the trustees of his will certain property to pay out of the income therefrom an annuity to commence from his death and to continue payable during the joint lives of his brother A. and his brother's son B. and the survivor of them, and to be paid to A. during his lifetime and after his death to B. On May 18, 1947, A. died leaving B. him surviving, and the Inland Revenue claimed that estate duty thereupon became payable either (a) under s. 1 of the Act of 1894 in respect of the share producing the said annuity of the property charged therewith, being a share thereof bearing the same ratio to the whole as the said annuity bore to the whole income of the same property, or (b) under s. 2 (1) (b) in respect of the property charged with the payment of the said annuity to the extent by which a benefit accrued or arose by the cesser of the interest of the said deceased therein, such benefit to be valued in the manner prescribed by s. 7 (7) of the Act.

HELD: (i) sections 1 and 2 were mutually exclusive; on the death of A. the property passing was the benefit of the annuity, which was taxable under s. 1; and there could not also be deemed to pass under s. 2 (1) (b) a "slice" of the property calculated according to s. 7 (7) (b).

Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1899] A.C. 198), considered, and dictum of LORD MACNAGHTEN therein (ibid., 212), applied.

Re Cassel ([1927] 2 Ch. 275), approved and followed.

Decision of WYNN-PARRY, J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 701), affirmed.

(ii) the property taxable under s. 1 was not (as in the case, for instance, of the death of one of a number of life tenants interested in the same property) a proportionate part of the capital, but the annuity itself, and duty should be charged in respect of its actuarial value.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Oct. 19, 1949, reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 701, made on an originating summons by which it was sought to determine the basis on which estate duty became payable on the death of Viscount Fitzalan.

- D By his will, the testator, Henry, fifteenth Duke of Norfolk, provided a fund on trust out of the income therefrom to "pay any annuity or annuities which may be bequeathed by any codicil hereto." By a first codicil to his will the testator bequeathed to his trustees an annuity of £3,000 to commence from the day of his death and to continue payable during the joint lives of his brother, E Viscount Fitzalan, and his said brother's son, Henry Edmund Talbot, and during the life of the survivor of them, and he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the said annuity on trust to pay it to Viscount Fitzalan during his life on protective trusts. In the same codicil the testator further declared that after the death of Viscount Fitzalan, on certain (in the events, irrelevant) conditions, the trustees should pay the annuity to Viscount Fitzalan's said son F during his life on similar protective trusts. By a second codicil the amount of the annuity was reduced to £2,000. On Feb. 11, 1917, the testator died. On May 18, 1947, Viscount Fitzalan died, the protective trust not having operated to determine the payment to him of the annuity of £2,000. Viscount Fitzalan was survived by his son. The summons raised the question whether on the death G of Viscount Fitzalan estate duty became payable (i) under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and only on the value (calculated under s. 7 (5) of the said Act) of a continuing annuity of £2,000 for the life of the son, or (ii) under s. 2 (1) (b) of the said Act on the capital value (ascertained according to s. 7 (7)) of the proportion of the testator's estate required to produce an annuity of £2,000. By leave of the Court of Appeal and with the consent of the plaintiff, the Public H Trustee, the Crown before the Court of Appeal advanced contention (a) stated in the headnote, in addition to contention (b) which alone had been argued before WYNN-PARRY, J.

Mar. 6. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. (read by SOMERVELL, L.J.): In this appeal the Inland Revenue Commissioners have taken two distinct points, the first having been added by our leave and by consent of the plaintiff respondent to the notice of appeal, it not having been taken before WYNN-PARRY, J. These two contentions are clearly stated by the terms of the notice of appeal as amended and are as follows:

“That in the events which have happened estate duty became payable upon the death of the Right Honourable Edmund Bernard Viscount Fitzalan of Derwent either (a) under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in respect of the share producing the said annuity of the property charged therewith being a share thereof bearing the same ratio to the whole as the said annuity bears to the whole income of the same property, or (b) under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), in respect of the property charged with the payment of the said annuity to the extent by which a benefit accrued or arose by the cesser of the interest of the said deceased therein such benefit to be valued in the manner prescribed by s. 7 (7) of the said Act.”

If the Crown is entitled to succeed under either head of appeal, the result will be to effect a change in the practice hitherto adopted by the Estate Duty Office in levying estate duty in respect of a single annuity bequeathed to several persons in succession on the deaths of the annuitants (other than of the last). That circumstance is not in itself a valid reason for rejecting the Crown's contention, though (having regard to the numerous occasions on which revenue statutes are reviewed by Parliament) it inclines me to regard the contention with caution. The second ground of appeal involves the existence (at least) of an option in the Crown as regards the basis on which estate duty may be charged in respect of one and the same subject of benefaction, and this also appears to me to require that the argument be cautiously received. It was only the second ground which was considered—and rejected—by WYNN-PARRY, J., and, since we are all agreed that the view of the learned judge was correct, I propose to deal with it first.

The relevant facts are stated in the report of the decision of WYNN-PARRY, J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 701), and need not be repeated. According to this head of the Crown's argument, there arose on the death of the testator's brother, Viscount Fitzalan, who had enjoyed the first life interest in the annuity of £2,000 per annum bequeathed by the will and codicils, two distinct subject-matters of taxation, namely (i) the annuity itself, i.e., the right to receive the sum of £2,000 per annum for the remainder of the life of Viscount Fitzalan's son; and (ii) the benefit which accrued to the Norfolk estates by the cesser of Viscount Fitzalan's right to enjoy the annuity. It is clear that the first subject falls to be taxed exclusively by reference to s. 1 of the Act of 1894, but that the second can only be taxed (if at all) by virtue of s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act. WYNN-PARRY, J., was of opinion that the simultaneous existence of a right to tax under s. 1 and s. 2 was inconsistent with the well-known statement of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and could not, therefore, be sustained. I agree with him. It is true that the actual language used by LORD MACNAGHTEN, and, particularly, his phrase ([1899] A.C. 212) “... s. 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased,” was used in reference to a case in which only one possible subject-matter of taxation was under consideration and that it is of the essence of the Crown's argument in the present case that there are two distinct proprietary interests. Counsel for the Crown observed further that the celebrated pronouncement of LORD MACNAGHTEN, which has constituted one of the most significant decisions on the interpretation of the Finance Act, 1894, did not, in fact, represent the determination of an issue argued in the Cowley case (1). Nevertheless, I think with WYNN-PARRY, J., that LORD MACNAGHTEN's opinion ought not to be regarded as subject to such refinement, and that the law (at any rate in the courts of first instance and in this court) must be taken to be that as regards any such single benefaction as that with which we are concerned the application of s. 2 of the Act is necessarily excluded by the application to the annuity itself of s. 1.

In conceding that the Crown had only an option under this part of his argument, counsel for the Crown stated that he was compelled so to do by the terms of s. 7 (10) of the Act which provides :

“ Property passing on any death shall not be aggregated more than once, nor shall estate duty in respect thereof be more than once levied on the same death.”

I am inclined to think that counsel is thereby shown to be on the horns of a dilemma, for, if he is right in saying that there are here, in truth, two distinct properties, two distinct subject-matters of taxation, then, prima facie, I should have thought s. 7 (10) would be inapplicable. On the other hand, if there is but one property, one subject-matter of taxation (as the invocation of s. 7 (10) seems to import), the argument necessarily fails in limine.

WYNN-PARRY, J., felt himself further bound by the decision of RUSSELL, J., in the second case of Re Cassel (2). Again I think the learned judge was right, but since there has been in this court considerable argument on the true effect of that decision and of the views taken of it in subsequent cases, including, particularly, Christie v. Lord Advocate (3), and since the consideration of this matter is pertinent also to the first head of the Crown's argument before us, I will give my reasons for construing the decision of RUSSELL, J., in the way which WYNN-PARRY, J., adopted. The subject-matter in Re Cassel (2) which gave rise to the claim for duty was a direction in the testator's will that during a period of years ending in 1995 the trustees should provide the annual sums required for payment of rent, rates and certain other outgoings in respect of premises known as Brook House, which was itself bequeathed in trust for the benefit of several persons in succession. The first of these persons had died. RUSSELL, J., expressed his own view that, apart from authority, he would have supposed in the case of a gift to A. for life followed by an absolute gift of the same subject-matter to B. that no property “ passed ” within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and that tax would have been levied as on the cesser of an interest by virtue of s. 2 (1) (b), but he regarded himself bound by the Cowley case (1) to hold that there was in truth a passing within s. 1. He further stated that, had he been at liberty to follow his own inclinations in the case before him, he would, in accordance with s. 7 (7) (b) of the Act, and by taking the average amount expended annually by the trustees in respect of rent and other outgoings at £5,000, have fixed the “ slice ” deemed to have passed at £78,250. Since, however, ex hypothesi, this method of assessment was not open to him and there was a direct “ passing ” of property, namely, the right to receive or enjoy the benefit of the variable annual sums, he was faced with the difficulty of determining, pursuant to s. 7 (5) of the Act, the principal value “ in the open market ” of something which, from its nature, could have no market and was in other respects obviously most difficult of estimation.

The above is, in my judgment, a brief but essentially accurate statement of RUSSELL, J.'s decision so far as relevant to the present case, and it involves necessarily the determination that, for estate duty purposes, an annual sum bequeathed to or for the benefit of several persons in succession is the property which passes on the deaths of such persons (save the last) and that the duty is exigible in respect of its capital value. Thus the learned judge said ([1927] 2 Ch. 280):

“ What then is the property which passes on Mrs. Cassel's death ? In my opinion the true answer is the benefit of the annual sum payable under the special clause . . . What passes is the right to enjoy the benefit of that annual sum. That is the property which passed on the death of Mrs. Cassel."

In my judgment, accordingly, WYNN-PARRY, J., rightly held that the present case, at least so far as he was concerned, was governed by Re Cassel (2). In this court we were invited to take a different view and to hold either (i) that Re Cassel (2) was a decision depending solely on its own peculiar facts and inapplicable in principle to a case of an ordinary continuing annuity, or (ii) that it was wrongly decided.

To the first ground of criticism, colour is undoubtedly lent by certain observations, first of MAUGHAM, J., in Re Northcliffe (4), and secondly of LORD RUSSELL himself as a member of the House of Lords in Christie v. Lord Advocate (3). Both the two last mentioned cases were instances of dispositions of aliquot shares of the general income of an estate to be enjoyed in succession, as distinct from an annuity or yearly sum which, even though variable (as in Re Cassel (2)), is in no way dependent on, or related to, the general income of the estate, and they constitute authority for the proposition that on the death of the first taker of the aliquot share of income there is a "passing" within s. 1 of the Act of a like share of the corpus, but they are, in my judgment and for reasons which I will later give, no authority for the view that on the death of the first taker of a continuing annuity there is a passing of any part of the corpus of the property out of which the annuity is raised or on which it may be charged. In distinguishing from his own case of Re Northcliffe (4) that of Re Cassel (2), MAUGHAM, J., used of the latter these words ([1929] 1 Ch. 333):

"It was therefore almost impossible to say that the principal value of the property out of which that sum had to be paid passed on the death of the first tenant for life. Accordingly, quite naturally as I think, he [RUSSELL, J.] came to the conclusion that the case was of a very special character, and there being no section of the Act of 1894 which really exactly applied, it had to be met by holding that what passed was the benefit of the annual sum which was payable under the special clause."

It is true that the relevant provision in Re Cassel (2) was of a "very special," that is, unusual, character, but with the greatest respect to MAUGHAM, J., in other respects he appears to me to have misapprehended RUSSELL, J.'s decision and the basis on which it rested. As I have already stated, RUSSELL, J.'s own opinion would have favoured, in the case before him as in the case of successive interests in an aliquot share of general income, a notional passing under s. 2 of the Act. Had he been free so to decide, he would have found no difficulty in arriving at the appropriate capital sum. He, in fact, did the calculation and arrived at the figure of £78,250, but he held himself (rightly) bound to treat both types of case as falling under s. 1 of the Act. There was thus no question but that s. 1 did in fact and "exactly" apply to the annual sums in question, and the property to which it applied was "the benefit of the annual sum payable under the special clause."

But RUSSELL, J., appears himself (as LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN) to have felt some misgiving in Christie's case (3), for, in the course of his opinion in that case, he said of his earlier judgment ([1936] 1 All E.R. 447):

"That was indeed a very special case, in which, it having been decided that the Cowley case (1) compelled me to treat it as falling within s. 1 of the Act, it became apparent that no capital sum could be earmarked as producing either actually or notionally an annual sum which necessarily varied in amount within elastic limits. I indicated, as best I could, the lines upon which a valuation might be fairly reached."

It must be confessed that the language I have quoted seems to indicate that LORD RUSSELL may then have thought that only the "very special" circumstances of the Cassel case (2) prevented its determination on lines similar to those applicable to cases of aliquot shares of income, i.e., by regarding the property which passed as the appropriate capital amount which "produced" the annual sums. LORD RUSSELL, however, was only concerned to show that Re Cassel (2) was no authority for a method of taxing an aliquot share of general income. The ordinary case of a continuing annuity was not present to his mind. Nor is it suggested in the present case that the method of assessment appropriate to a continuing annual sum, whether fixed or variable, determines the method of assessment for an aliquot share of income. The two things are, for estate duty purposes, essentially different, but, in my judgment, the principle of Re Cassel (2) is the principle appropriate to a continuing annuity such as that in the present case, which is in essential characteristics the same as the annual sum in Re Cassel (2). The real difficulty in Re Cassel (2) (and the only difficulty) lay, not in deciding by reference to which section, s. 1 or s. 2, duty was exigible, but, having regard to the peculiar and "special" nature of the annual sums provided, in discovering the "principal value" of those sums by applying the method of estimation enjoined by the relevant s. 7 (5) of the Act. Thus, finally, in Crossman's case (5), LORD RUSSELL himself again observed ([1936] 1 All E.R. 788):

"I have recently explained in Christie v. Lord Advocate (3) how very special that case [Re Cassel (2)] was in its facts; and that all that I did was to indicate, as best I could, the lines upon which a valuation might fairly be reached of a benefit which (being purely personal) could not be offered for sale at all."

I should add that counsel for the Crown further criticised RUSSELL, J.'s decision in Re Cassel (2) on the ground that, on the hypothesis that s. 2 applied, his taking for the purposes of his calculation the average figure of £5,000 was in excess of the directions to be found in s. 7 (7) (b). I cannot take that criticism seriously. The provisions of that paragraph have only been rendered workable by giving a most liberal interpretation to its enigmatic language. I cannot think such an objection would be found in the commissioner's mouths when, on the death of the last individual to enjoy the benefit of the special clause, s. 2 (1) (b) and s. 7 (7) (b) of the Act would in any case have to be applied.

I have dealt at length with this aspect of the matter because of its prominence in the course of the argument and because of confusion which has arisen out of what, with all respect, I venture to think was the misapprehension on the part of MAUGHAM, J., of RUSSELL, J.'s, decision. For reasons which I have given, I think Re Cassel (2) is (as WYNN-PARRY, J., thought it was) an authority in principle governing the case of successive interests in a continuing annuity, and I am inclined also to think, after Christie's case (3) and Crossman's case (5) in the House of Lords, that it is an authority binding this court also. If so, that is the answer to the second argument of counsel for the Crown in regard to Re Cassel (2) noted above, i.e., that it was wrongly decided. I now arrive at the first ground of the Crown's appeal, namely, that in the case of a continuing annuity, as in the case of aliquot shares of general income, the property passing within s. 1 of the Act is some share or portion of the corpus of the estate.

Accepting without reservation that in the case of aliquot shares of the general income of an estate there is, having regard to the language of s. 1 of the Act, and, particularly, the use of the words "settled or not settled," a "passing" of a corresponding part or share of the corpus of the estate, it does not, in my judgment, follow either as a principle of construction of the statute (established by authority) or in logic that there is a similar passing of corpus in the case of a continuing annuity. Indeed, in my opinion, the principle underlying the former class of case is wholly inapplicable and cannot be sensibly related to the latter. In the case of one who has enjoyed for his life the income of (say) one-fourth of the income of an estate, it seems to me in accordance with common sense and a natural use of language to say that he enjoyed for his life, that he was life tenant of, a fourth part of the (corpus of the) estate, and, accordingly, that on his death a fourth part of the estate passed to the next successor. But no such language can, in my judgment, appropriately be used in the case of an annuitant. He is in no way concerned with changes in the yield of the estate. His right to his annuity will continue whatever income the estate may produce or (unless he has a right to look to income only) though the estate produce no income at all. The share which (according to the suggested analogy) is to be attributed to the annuity will vary from half year to half year. If the general income is exactly equal to the annuity, the corpus passing on his death will be the entirety, and the result will be presumably the same when there is no income at all. The suggested analogy, in my view, involves a confusion of right with remedy, and disregards the essential characteristics of an annuity: see, for example, Bignold v. Giles (6), and see also the language once more of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in De Trafford v. A.-G. (7) ([1935] A.C. 290):

"The present baronet's right to an annual sum of £8,000 gave him no right to the receipt of any particular items of the annual income, or to the income of any particular portion of the estates."

The basis of the contention of counsel for the Crown lay in the fact that (in the present case) the annuitant has a charge on, and, therefore, some kind of interest in, the corpus and every part of it, and can call on the trustees, in the course of their administrative duties, to give effect to such rights. But since the artificial process called the "slice" enjoined by s. 7 (7) (b) has no application, the logical result of counsel's emphasis on these rights of the annuitant seems to me to involve the result that, whatever the arithmetical relation at any point of time between the corpus of the estate and the first taker of a continuing annuity, the whole corpus passes on his death. It is true that in one sense he who is entitled to an aliquot share of general income is also "interested" in the whole estate and can call on the trustees of the whole for due administration of the whole estate, but that right and that interest are irrelevant to the calculation of what property passes on his death. The share of the whole which passes is determined by the necessary and direct relationship between a given proportion of the whole income (whatever it may be) and the like proportion of the corpus out of which the income arises—a relationship which is wholly absent in the case of an annuity. It is true that the distinction may seem a fine one between the two cases, and (more so) between the case of successive takers of a continuing annuity, on the one hand, and the case of takers of successive, but distinct, annuities of the same amount, on the other. But the distinction rests on the essential characteristics of an annuity and (in the case of successive takers of distinct annuities) on the circumstance that there is no passing of any property within s. 1, but an artificial passing within s. 2, which brings into play the statutory method of calculation provided by s. 7 (7) (b). Nor, as it seems to me, would counsel's contention, if accepted, entirely avoid apparent anomalies. If trustees, pursuant to a testator's directions, buy an annuity for a fixed period or for the period ending with the death of the longest liver of a number of persons, counsel concedes that on the death of the first recipient duty could only be levied under s. 1 on the then value of the annuity as such. The distinction rests, says he, on the existence of the charge and the administrative remedies which, in such a case as the present, the annuitant has. With this matter I have already dealt. I am not entirely clear what would, on counsel's argument, be the position where a single and continuing annuity is given to persons in succession, but such annuity is given no charge on any part of the estate. I conceive that the annuity would, in such a case, rank as a legacy, and any annuitant would have the right to have the estate so administered that due provision was made for the annuity before any distribution of residue. In my view, the existence of such an administrative remedy cannot involve the "passing" of some specified portion of the estate.

Counsel further conceded that in the case of a continuing annuity for a specified period of years, the death of the first recipient did not give rise to any benefit to the general estate comparable with that derived, on the happening of the like event, in the case of a continuing annuity for the joint lives of A. and B. and the life of the survivor. But the distinction, if otherwise sound, is irrelevant to this head of the Crown's appeal.

A In opening his case, counsel for the Crown observed that the existing practice of the Estate Duty Office might, and often did, work hardly on the second annuitant, that is, if he only survived the first by a short time. In other cases other methods of taxation have no less been said to work hardships. These are not matters with which we are concerned. In any case, the alleged hardship of the present case is one for which a testator can (and frequently does) make
B a provision. In truth, the object of the Crown in the present case is (if rightly entitled thereto) to obtain a larger amount of duty. At any rate, if the practice hitherto adopted works unfairly between taxpayers and inadequately for the Crown, Parliament has never thought fit to take any of the frequent opportunities offered to it to remedy those ills. In my judgment, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

C SOMERVELL, L.J. : I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which I have just delivered for the Master of the Rolls and that about to be delivered by JENKINS, L.J. I have nothing I wish to add on the point argued before WYNN-PARRY, J. On the point set out in paragraph (a) of the notice of appeal and argued before us I think that there is more force in the argument than do my brethren on the following grounds. The authorities, in particular
D Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and Christie v. Lord Advocate (3), make it clear that where life tenant succeeds to life tenant or life renter to life renter what passes within the meaning of s. 1 is the property producing the life interest. This is so whether the life interest is in the whole or an aliquot part. This indicates the principle on which the Act is based, namely, that property passes to a man in the sense of the words as they appear in the section when he is able to enjoy what that property produces, although he cannot
E expend the capital. So far as the application of the section is concerned, the same amount of property passes when life tenant succeeds to life tenant as when absolute owner succeeds to absolute owner. MAUGHAM, J., emphasises this very clearly in Re Northcliffe (4). What actually passes when life tenant succeeds to life tenant is the life interest. That life interest could be readily valued in F the open market, and if the successor is an old man the value would be very much less than the fund in which he gets a life interest. What actually passes, therefore, is not the test. If it were, it is clear that what actually passed in this case was what was left of the one continuing annuity. I was at one time inclined to think that the principle I have set out was applicable in the sense contended for by counsel for the Crown as between successive annuitants. I have, however,
G come to the conclusion, first, that so to hold would be inconsistent with the decision in Re Cassel (2), and that that case, for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, is probably now binding on this court. I have also, with some hesitation, come to the conclusion that the argument fails apart from authority. The artificial conception of the "slice" which has been found in the words of s. 7 (7) (b), must, if it is to apply here, be based on implication. There is, of H course, no difficulty, when one is dealing with an aliquot share of income, in arriving at the value of the share of the fund producing the income. In the possible case, however, of a single continuing annuity which is being paid in part out of capital, insuperable difficulties seem to me to arise in applying the method for which counsel contends. One cannot imply a principle which would be in some cases unworkable. I therefore think that in this case what passed within s. 1 was the annuity to be valued on the basis set out by JENKINS, L.J., at the conclusion of the judgment which he is about to read.

JENKINS, L.J. : By the joint effect of his will and certain codicils thereto, Henry Duke of Norfolk, who died on Feb. 11, 1917, (i) devised and appointed to his wife as sole executor and trustee thereof certain freehold hereditaments for a term of one thousand years on trust (inter alia) to pay out of the rents and profits thereof any annuity or annuities bequeathed by him, and (ii) bequeathed to her as such sole executor and trustee an annuity of £2,000 to commence from his death and to continue to be payable during the joint lives of his brother Edmund Bernard Viscount Fitzalan of Derwent (hereinafter called the late viscount) and the late viscount's son Henry Edmund Talbot (hereinafter called the present viscount) and the life of the survivor of them, and to be paid to the late viscount during his life and after his death to the present viscount, subject in both cases to certain protective trusts which are not material for the present purpose. The late viscount died on May 18, 1947, and the present proceedings concern the liability to estate duty on his death in respect of this annuity.

It is not in dispute that, on the true construction of the relevant provisions of the will and codicils, the interest in question is, in truth, one continuing annuity (charged on the estates comprised in the one thousand years term) for the longer of the lives of the two annuitants, and cannot be regarded as comprising two successive annuities, the first ceasing, and the second commencing, on the death of the late viscount. It has been the established practice of the Estate Duty Office, in cases in which one continuing annuity for two or more lives is given to two or more persons in succession and charged on property, to claim estate duty on the death of any annuitant other than the last on the footing that the annuity passes on his death within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and attracts duty on its principal value calculated actuarially for the residue of the period for which it is payable (i.e., the lives or life of the remaining annuitants or annuitant), and to claim duty as on a cesser within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b) of an interest in the shape of the annuity, attracting duty under s. 7 (7) (b) on the proportion of the capital of the property charged corresponding to the proportion of its income theretofore absorbed by the annuity, only on the death of the last annuitant. This practice, whether it gives full effect to the legitimate claims of the Revenue or not, obviously produces less duty than would be realised if a charge as on a cesser of the annuity under s. 2 (1) (b) were made on the death of each annuitant, inasmuch as the "slice" of capital required to produce the annuity, which is chargeable with duty on this basis, must needs be greater, and where the age of the surviving annuitants or annuitant is advanced, very much greater, than the actuarial value of the annuity to which, under the existing practice, the claim on the basis of s. 1 is confined.

Accordingly, the Estate Duty Office, with a view to testing the validity of the practice I have described, and, if possible, establishing a more lucrative interpretation of the law, claimed duty in the present case on the death of the late viscount as on a cesser under s. 2 (1) (b) of an interest in the property charged, in the shape of his life interest in the annuity, bringing about a notional passing of the property charged with the annuity to the extent of the benefit accruing or arising by such cesser, and attracting duty at the appropriate rate on the "slice" of capital declared by s. 7 (7) (b) to constitute the value of such benefit for this purpose. The Public Trustee, who is now sole trustee of the will and codicils of the late duke, resisted this claim, contending that duty only became payable under s. 1 on the value of a continuing annuity of £2,000 for the life of the present viscount, and applied to the court by originating summons for a decision of the question at issue. The case was heard by WYNN-PARRY, J., who, in a considered judgment delivered on Oct. 19, 1947, rejected the claim under s. 2 (1) (b), and made an order declaring that on the death of the late viscount estate duty became payable on the basis contended for by the Public Trustee.

A The Inland Revenue Commissioners now appeal from that order, and, in arguing their appeal, they have, with the leave of the court and the consent of the Public Trustee as respondent, added to the claim under s. 2 (1) (b) a claim not advanced before WYNN-PARRY, J., to the effect that, even if recourse cannot be had to s. 2 (1) (b), nevertheless the admitted passing of the annuity under s. 1 attracted duty not merely on the actuarial value of the annuity for the life of the present viscount, but on a capital "slice" of the property charged with the annuity, ascertained as under s. 7 (7) (b), the property which "passed" by virtue of the "passing" of the annuity being nothing more nor less than this capital "slice."

B I will deal first with the claim as argued before WYNN-PARRY, J. He (in effect) held himself bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), as applied by RUSSELL, J., in Re Cassel (2), to hold (i) that there was an actual passing of the annuity on the death of the late viscount under s. 1; (ii) that s. 1 and s. 2 are mutually exclusive, and that the application of s. 1, accordingly, precluded recourse to s. 2 (1) (b); and (iii) that, accordingly, duty was only exigible under s. 1 as on a passing of the annuity, and could not be claimed under s. 2 (1) (b) as on the cesser of an interest. In my judgment, the learned judge was clearly right in the conclusion to which he came, and the principles by which he was guided in arriving at it are no less binding on this court than they were on him. It is clearly not open to this court to depart from the construction placed on s. 1 and s. 2 over fifty years ago by the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and followed by their Lordships in the comparatively recent case of De Trafford v. A.-G. (7).
D I need only refer to one passage from the well-known speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN in the former case where he says ([1899] A.C. 212):

E "I am, therefore, compelled to differ from the Court of Appeal at the very outset. I think the present case falls within s. 1. I think it belongs to a class of cases which the authors of the Act had directly in view when they framed that section. Now, if the case falls within s. 1 it cannot also come within s. 2. The two sections are mutually exclusive. Section 1 might properly, I think, be headed, 'With regard to property passing on death, be it enacted as follows.' Section 2 might with equal propriety be headed, 'And with regard to property not passing on death, be it enacted as follows.' I cannot, therefore, agree with RIGBY, L.J., when he says that s. 2 is a provision 'explanatory' of s. 1. In my opinion the two sections are quite distinct, and s. 2 throws no light on s. 1. But, then, no doubt s. 2 speaks of 'property in which the deceased . . . had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased.' And that, it may be said, was just the position of the second Earl with regard to the Mornington settled estates. So it was. But s. 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased. That is already dealt with in the earlier section. For property in the lifetime of the deceased subject to a charge or interest which ceased on the death must of course pass free from that charge or interest. And, so passing, it must of course be valued accordingly. That is s. 1. You do not want s. 2 for that. You cannot resort to s. 2. For that would be giving the duty twice over. The Crown cannot have it both ways. Double duty is forbidden by the Act."

H Applying these principles to the case of a continuing annuity in the form of an annual sum of varying amount given by a testator to defray the outgoings and upkeep of a leasehold house settled by his will on successive life tenants, RUSSELL, J., in Re Cassel (2), as I think rightly, and, indeed, inevitably, held that on the death of the first life tenant there was an actual passing under s. 1 of property consisting of the right to enjoy the benefit of the annual sum in question, and that s. 2 (1) (b) had no application.

It is not disputed on the part of the Crown that in the present case there was an actual passing of the annuity under s. 1, and that on the principles stated in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) this has the effect of excluding the application of s. 2 (1) (b) so far as the annuity itself is concerned. It is, however, argued that it is, nevertheless, open to the Crown to claim in the alternative that, so far as the property charged with the annuity is concerned, the late viscount's life interest in the annuity was an interest in that property which ceased on his death within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), and, accordingly, brought about a notional passing of the property on his death to the extent to which a benefit accrued or arose by the cesser of such interest and thus attracted duty on a "slice" of the capital of the property ascertained as provided in s. 7 (7) (b). A

In my judgment, this alternative contention is wholly inadmissible. As pointed out by WYNN-PARRY, J., it was, in effect, considered and rejected by RUSSELL, J., in Re Cassel (2); and it appears to me to have been rightly and necessarily so rejected for the simple reason that it involves doing the very thing which according to Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) is not to be done, that is to say, treating an actual passing of property under s. 1 as if it was a cesser of an interest in property under s. 2 (1) (b), which in the words of LORD MACNAGHTEN (ibid., 213) does not refer "to the cesser of an interest in property which passes, but to the cesser of an interest in property which does not pass." B C
Once the actual passing of the annuity under s. 1 is established, the cesser of the late viscount's life interest in the annuity must be regarded merely as the event which brought about such passing, and not as the cesser of an interest within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b). Moreover, it seems to me that, even if the cesser of the late viscount's life interest in the annuity could properly be regarded as a cesser of an interest in the property charged with the annuity within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), it would not be a cesser by reason of which any benefit accrued or arose within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), read in conjunction with the formula for the valuation of such a benefit provided by s. 7 (7) (b). D
Section 2 (1) (b), in my judgment, contemplates a cesser of some interest in property or the income thereof which has the effect of discharging the property from the interest so ceasing for the benefit of the persons entitled to it subject to such interest. In other words, the benefit contemplated by the section is a benefit which accrues or arises to the property by reason of the cesser of the interest. This accords with the views expressed by LUSH, J., in A.-G. v. Watson (8) ([1917] 2 K.B. 431), and is, I think, borne out by the method of valuation prescribed by s. 7 (7) (b), the value of the "slice" ascertained in accordance with that provision being an appropriate index of the benefit accruing or arising to property, or to persons entitled to property, when an interest such as an annuity for one life to which it was formerly subject ceases by the death of the annuitant, but, so far as I can see, wholly inappropriate to a case in which property is charged with a continuing annuity, which does not cease on the death of the person for the time being entitled, but remains on foot for the benefit of the next taker. In such a case, no benefit whatever has accrued or arisen to the property, which remains subject to precisely the same annual payment as before. It was contended for the Crown that a benefit did accrue or arise in the present case in the shape of the passing of the annuity to the present viscount. But that, in my view, is not a benefit which can be taken into account for the purposes of the Crown's alternative claim under s. 2 (1) (b). E F
It is a benefit produced by the actual passing of the annuity under s. 1, and admittedly that is the only section which can be called in aid so far as the annuity itself is concerned. The alternative claim under s. 2 (1) (b) necessarily involves separating the late viscount's life interest in the annuity from the present viscount's life interest in it, treating the former as a distinct and separate interest in the property charged ceasing on the death of the late viscount within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), and finally demonstrating that by reason of the cesser G H of such interest, as distinct from the actual passing of the annuity under s. 1, a benefit accrued or arose. Even if the first two steps in this process were legitimate, as, in my judgment, they clearly are not, the third would, as it seems to me, present an insurmountable obstacle. The issue is, perhaps, obscured by the fact that the passing of the annuity under s. 1 was here brought about by the cesser of the late viscount's life interest in it. If an annuity of like duration had been given to the late viscount absolutely, so that the right to receive it during the residue of the present viscount's life had passed on his death as part of his free estate, there could have been no question of any claim for duty otherwise than under s. 1. The fact that the annuity was settled on the late and present viscounts successively for life lends colour to the claim under s. 2 (1) (b), but, in truth, it is just as much, and just as exclusively, a s. 1 case as it would have been in the hypothetical circumstances I have mentioned.

It was argued, though somewhat faintly, on the part of the Crown that the reduction in the actuarial value of the annuity by the dropping of one of the two lives on which it depended (as to which reduction there was in fact no evidence) constituted a benefit within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b) which fell to be valued according to the wholly irrelevant formula provided by s. 7 (7) (b). I find myself quite unable to accept this contention. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the claim under s. 2 (1) (b) fails, first, because it is inadmissible according to the principles laid down in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and, secondly, because the continuing character of the annuity in any case seems to me to make s. 2 (1) (b) and s. 7 (7) (b) wholly inappropriate according to what appears to me to be the true construction of those provisions.

I now turn to the new contention raised on the part of the Crown in this court to the effect that, even if duty can only be claimed under s. 1 as on an actual passing of the annuity on the death of the late viscount, the property which passed was not simply the right to receive the annuity during the residue of the life of the present viscount, but the proportion of the corpus of the property charged corresponding to the proportion of the income thereof required to produce the annuity. The argument in support of this contention proceeds in this way. It is pointed out (and rightly) that where the income of property is divided into shares which are settled on persons in succession, the death of any person entitled to a life interest in any one of such shares occasions a passing under s. 1 of the corresponding share of capital: see Re Northcliffe (4); Christie v. Lord Advocate (3). It is next alleged that the interest of an annuitant in respect of an annuity charged on property is equivalent to a life interest in the share of capital required to produce the annuity ascertained by reference to the proportion borne by the amount of the annuity to the whole income of the property charged. The conclusion is then adduced that, on the authorities to which I have just referred, it follows that the property which passes under s. 1 when a continuing annuity charged on property passes on a death within the meaning of that section is not simply the annuity for the residue of its prescribed duration (which is clearly all that passes in fact), but the proportion ascertained as above of the corpus of the property charged with the annuity.

This contention seems to me contrary to all principle. An annuity charged on property is not, nor is it in any way equivalent to, an interest in a proportion of the capital of the property charged sufficient to produce its yearly amount. It is nothing more nor less than a right to receive the stipulated yearly sum out of the income of the whole of the property charged (and in many cases out of the capital in the event of a deficiency of income). It confers no interest in any particular part of the property charged, but simply a security extending over the whole. The annuitant is entitled to receive no less and no more than the stipulated sum. He neither gains by a rise nor loses by a fall in the amount of income produced by the property, except in so far as there may be a deficiency of income in a case in which recourse to capital is excluded. On the other hand, a life interest in a share of the income of property is equivalent to, and, indeed, constitutes, a life interest in the share of the capital corresponding to the share of income. The life tenant enjoys the share of income whatever it may amount to, and his interest, viewed as a life interest in capital, consists of a constant proportion of the whole property, whether the income is great or small and whether the capital value of the property rises or falls. The property which changes hands on his death (or, in other words, passes under s. 1) thus clearly consists of the designated share of capital which then passes from his beneficial enjoyment to that of another. An annuity cannot be so related to any fixed proportion of capital: see De Trafford v. A.-G. (7) ([1935] A.C. 290). The proportion of the total income required to produce the annuity, and with it the corresponding share of capital, varies from year to year according to the total income produced by the property charged. The Crown's contention thus involves substituting for the annuity a "slice" of capital ascertained by means of a calculation on the lines prescribed by s. 7 (7) (b) for ascertaining the benefit accruing or arising by the cesser of an interest, with a result depending on the rate of income produced by the whole fund over whatever period might be selected for the purposes of the calculation. The "slice" so ascertained would bear no relation whatever to the legal rights of the annuitant, and its ascertainment would amount to the construction for estate duty purposes of a wholly fictitious and notional proprietary interest for which there is no warrant whatever in the relevant legislation.

It was suggested that authority for this method of charging duty on the passing of a continuing annuity under s. 1 was to be found in the comments on Re Cassel (2) made by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Northcliffe (4), and by LORD RUSSELL himself in Christie v. Lord Advocate (3). In my judgment, these comments properly understood provide no such authority. The peculiar difficulty in the Cassel case (2) to which reference is made consisted not in deciding what property passed—RUSSELL, J., made it abundantly plain that what passed, and what had to be valued, was simply the right to receive the benefit of the annual payment—but in valuing the property which passed, i.e., the right to receive the benefit of the annual payment, owing to its fluctuating amount and other peculiar characteristics. This is, I think, made clear by the further observations of LORD RUSSELL on the Cassel case (2) in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Crossman (5) ([1936] 1 All E.R. 788). Annuities charged on property which cease on death and fall within s. 2 (1) (b) being charged to duty on the "slice" basis prescribed by s. 7 (7) (b), the Act might consistently have prescribed a similar basis of charge with respect to continuing annuities which pass on death under s. 1, but no such provision has, in fact, been made, and it is for the legislature and not this court to supply it should that be considered desirable. In the absence of any such special provision the property which attracts duty on a passing under s. 1 is simply the property which passes, and the property which passed in the present case was the annuity and nothing else. The annuity must, accordingly, be valued for duty purposes simply as consisting of the right to receive £2,000 per annum from the death of the late viscount for the residue of the life of the present viscount. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

CACKETT (otherwise TRICE) v. CACKETT.

[PROBATE DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson J.), February 21, 1950.]

Nullity—Wilful refusal to consummate marriage—Coitus interruptus—Cruelty.

In 1935 the parties went through a ceremony of marriage. Against the wishes of the wife and in spite of frequent protests by her, the husband practised coitus interruptus. A doctor who examined the wife warned the husband that the practice was having a serious effect on the wife's health, but he persisted in the practice, maintaining that he could not allow his wife to have a family because her parents were first cousins. The wife petitioned for a decree of nullity on the ground of her husband's wilful refusal to consummate the marriage, and, in the alternative, for a divorce on the ground of cruelty.

HELD: (i) the marriage had been consummated, and, therefore, the wife was not entitled to a decree of nullity.

White (otherwise Berry) v. White ([1948] 2 All E.R. 151), followed.

Grimes (otherwise Edwards) v. Grimes ([1948] 2 All E.R. 147), not followed.

(ii) the husband's conduct, which was persisted in, notwithstanding the wife's repeated protests and which to his knowledge was having an increasingly adverse effect on her health, constituted cruelty, and the wife was entitled to a decree of dissolution on that ground.

PETITION by the wife for a decree of nullity on the ground that the husband, throughout the marriage and against the wishes of the wife, had practised coitus interruptus, and had thereby wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, and, in the alternative, for a decree of dissolution on the ground of cruelty. The suit was undefended. The facts appear in the judgment.

Tolstoy for the wife.

HODSON, J.: This is a suit brought by a wife for nullity on the ground that the husband has wilfully refused to consummate the marriage. In the alternative she seeks a divorce on the ground that the husband has been guilty of cruelty. The suit is undefended.

Against the wishes of the wife the husband, throughout the married life, which existed from 1935 until 1947, followed the practice described as coitus interruptus. A Dr. Evans, who had known the wife before the marriage when she was in exceptionally good health, stated that after the marriage the wife's health had been such as to render it necessary for her to consult him. He found that she was in a condition which he found it difficult to explain and in 1943 he spoke to the husband. He said:

"I told him (in effect) that his wife had said to me that throughout their married life he would insist on practising coitus interruptus. I warned him that if he continued this incomplete intercourse his actions would result in a complete breakdown of her health. The [husband] did not even attempt to deny that he practised coitus interruptus, but said that he did so because he could not allow his wife to have any family as her parents were first cousins. I did my best to bring home to the [husband] the effect his attitude was having upon the [wife's] health, but I failed to convince him that his point of view was a selfish one and harmful to the [wife]. During our conversation I asked the [husband] if he would be willing to have normal intercourse with the use of contraceptives. His reply was to the effect that he did not trust them to be fully effective and said he would not alter his methods."

He then describes how he saw the wife in January, 1948, shortly before the separation, and he says:

"The [wife] was clearly under a nervous strain. I had a long talk with her and advised her for the sake of her health to leave her husband, at any rate for the time being. Some time later the [husband] had a conversation with me during which he informed me that he had asked the [wife] to return to him and that she had refused to do so unless he promised to have normal intercourse and he had refused to make such a promise."

That is borne out by the evidence of the wife.

On those facts one has to consider how far the possibility of conception is relevant. That matter was considered in White (otherwise Berry) v. White (1), in which WILLMER, J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 153), said:

"I should state that in this case there is evidence from Dr. McLean that, when coitus interruptus is practised, the possibility of conception none the less remains, and for this reason. According to him, many men do in fact have a small emission of semen before the main emission that follows on the completion of the act. There is always the possibility, therefore, that from this minor preliminary emission conception may result. Dr. McLean said that, speaking as a medical adviser, he would not recommend the practice of coitus interruptus as a means of birth control. That may or may not be of some materiality."

I mention that aspect of the case because I think that on the evidence I could not find other than that penetration was effected, and that there was the possibility of conception.

The question which I have to decide arose in two cases which were tried within a few days of one another, the first being Grimes (otherwise Edwards) v. Grimes (2), before FINNEMORE, J., and the other being the case to which I have just referred. FINNEMORE, J., came to the conclusion that conduct of this kind can amount to wilful refusal to consummate the marriage, and WILLMER, J., came to the opposite conclusion. That puts me in a position of some embarrassment. FINNEMORE, J., however, decided in favour of the wife petitioner in an undefended case without hearing any argument on the other side, whereas the decision of WILLMER, J., was arrived at after argument on both sides. WILLMER, J., came to the conclusion that, although the point was left open in Baxter v Baxter (3), the right conclusion, following on the reasoning of their Lordships' House, was that in circumstances of this kind it was impossible to hold that there was no consummation of the marriage, and I prefer to follow that decision.

Counsel for the wife has made a point which, so far as one can see, was not made in either White v. White (1) or Grimes v. Grimes (2). He says that the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Baxter v. Baxter (3) was not to overrule the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cowen v. Cowen (4) on this particular point, and, therefore, that the latter case was an authority in his favour. In support of this contention he relies on a passage from the opinion of LORD JOWITT, L.C., in the Baxter case (3) where he said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 888):

"... I wish to make an observation upon one practice referred to in this summary of facts, viz., that of withdrawal before emission, or coitus interruptus. This practice, as distinct from artificial methods of contraception, does not arise in the case before the House and I prefer to express no opinion about it. I desire also to reserve the question what bearing the employment of force or fraud may have on the issue of consummation."

The question is how is the decision in Cowen v. Cowen (4), to which LORD JOWITT refers, affected? In that case DU PARCQ, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, who had earlier referred to the use of contraceptives, the subject of the appeal in the Baxter case (3), said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 199):

"... in order that intercourse should be complete, it is well established that there must be what DR. LUSHINGTON referred to as vera copula. He said in D—e v. A—g (5) (1 Rob. Eccl. 298) 'Sexual intercourse in the proper meaning of the term is ordinary and complete intercourse; it does not mean partial and imperfect intercourse . . .' We are of opinion that sexual intercourse cannot be said to be complete when a husband deliberately discontinues the act of intercourse before it has reached its natural termination, or when he artificially prevents that natural termination, which is the passage of the male seed into the body of the woman. To hold otherwise would be to affirm that a marriage is consummated by an act so performed that one of the principal ends, if not the principal end, of marriage is intentionally frustrated."

In Baxter v. Baxter (3), the whole basis on which this conclusion was reached, in my opinion, removed because the LORD CHANCELLOR examined D—e v. A—g (5) in some detail and I think he made it quite clear that what DR. LUSHINGTON was speaking about in the quoted passage was malformation, because that was the subject-matter of the case which he had to decide, and at that time, under the law which he was administering, either malformation or frigidity or something else involving incapacity to consummate the marriage was a ground for a decree of nullity at the instance of one or other of the spouses, whereas in 1947, when the Baxter case (3) was decided, an additional ground for a decree of nullity had been introduced by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 7 (1) (a), which gave a spouse a right to a decree of nullity on the basis that, quite apart from capacity, the opposite spouse had refused to consummate the marriage.

The question under consideration in Baxter's (3), and also Cowen's case (4), was whether, on the facts of those particular cases, the spouses in question could be said to have wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, and I think the LORD CHANCELLOR's speech in the former case makes it plain that the House considered that the Court of Appeal in Cowen v. Cowen (4) had completely misapprehended the effect and the meaning of DR. LUSHINGTON's words. It is pointed out ([1947] 2 All E.R. 891):

"... that the key to DR. LUSHINGTON's judgment is that he thought the true distinction lay in the answer to the question whether the malformation was incurable, not as related to conception, but 'as to mere coitus'."

The whole foundation of the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal in Cowen's case (4) having been destroyed, in my judgment, the conclusion also is destroyed, and the matter is in the fullest sense of the word left open, and is not any longer covered by the decision in Cowen's case (4), although the House of Lords have not dealt with the particular point. In my judgment, therefore, it is my duty to decide this question in the light of such authority as there is, including the judgment in the Baxter case (3), in so far as it throws light on this problem. I, therefore, come back to the decision with which I previously stated I found myself in agreement, viz., the reasoning of WILLMER, J., in White (otherwise Berry) v. White (1) and to his analysis of the decision of DR. LUSHINGTON in D—e v. A—g (5).

I have been invited by counsel for the wife to come to the opposite conclusion because he says that it is the duty of the court to find wilful refusal where consummation—quoting from the speech of the Lord Chancellor in the Baxter case (5) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 892)—“as that word is understood in common parlance and in the light of social conditions known to exist,” has not taken place, and he says that where one finds conditions such as these, it is not possible to hold that normal sexual intercourse has taken place, and if it has not taken place owing to the refusal of the husband, he says he is entitled to succeed. I think the court would be driven into an impossible position if it tried further to define of what normal sexual intercourse between normally formed people consisted, because the court would be bound to inquire exactly at what stage emission took place, or what degree of satisfaction was reached by the woman, in a case where the woman was alleging that the man had failed to complete the act. I have already indicated the difficulties in the present case of examining or trying to draw the line between a complete act and an incomplete act. Here seed was emitted from the man in close proximity to the woman so that conception might have been effected, and I must decline to embark on an inquiry of a kind which I think it would be almost impossible to complete. It is argued by counsel that that is no reason why the court should not embark on that inquiry because it has to embark on difficult inquiries in every case where capacity is in question. That is true, but in cases where capacity is in question the court expects to get assistance from expert witnesses who can give evidence as to physical facts which will guide the court on a subject where there is often no possibility of corroboration being available. It seems to me that it is impossible to determine exactly where normal intercourse begins and ends. There could be no legal standard laid down which would define a matter of that kind.

I have been referred to SHELFORD ON MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, the date of that work being 1841. The learned author says, p. 202:

“Impotence then consists in incapacity for copulation, or in the impossibility of accomplishing the act of procreation. The manifest causes of impotence in both sexes are divided into physical and moral. The causes of impotence in man arises from two sources, from malformation of the genitals or from want of action in them; but in females impotence can only depend on malformation, either natural or acquired.”

It is said that it appears to have been thought that an essential part of the act of intercourse was the emission of seed into the body of a woman, and in that connection I was further reminded that at common law, before the stat. Geo. 4, c. 31, the emission of seed was an essential part of the evidence in criminal cases where carnal knowledge was involved. Without knowing of any reported cases where the emission of seed in criminal cases is concerned, it is impossible to determine how far the evidence of what happened to the seed would be considered relevant, but so far as cases of impotence are concerned I have the advantage of the authority of DR. LUSHINGTON in D—e v. A—g (5) from which I think it is clear that the possibility of conception, as opposed to the possibility of penetration, was not considered material. He said (1 Rob. Eccl. 296):

“Mere incapability, however, of conception is not a sufficient ground whereon to found a decree of nullity, and alone so clearly insufficient, that it would be a waste of time to discuss an admitted point. The only question is, whether the lady is or is not capable of sexual intercourse, or, if at present incapable, whether that incapacity can be removed."

Some attempt was made on behalf of the wife to support the argument by reference to the judgment of LORD PENZANCE, J.O., in G. v. G. (6), where he said (L.R. 2 P. & D. 291):

"It is conceded that if the organs of the woman were so formed structurally as to render intercourse impossible, the marriage would be void. It is apparent enough that without sexual intercourse the ends of marriage, the procreation of children, and the pleasures and enjoyments of matrimony cannot be attained."

I do not think that that passage goes so far as to support the view which I am asked to take, that sexual intercourse cannot be said to have taken place unless, not only has the woman been penetrated, but also emission has taken place within her body. The pleasures and enjoyments of matrimony therein referred to are obviously quite independent of the act of sexual intercourse referred to in the earlier part of the sentence, and the reference to the procreation of children as one of the ends of matrimony does not appear to me to carry the case any further, particularly in such a case as this, where the possibility of pregnancy is by no means absent. For these reasons I think that the claim for nullity fails.

The claim for divorce succeeds on the ground of cruelty, because I find that the conduct of the husband to this woman can properly be described by the English word "cruel" in its ordinary meaning, having regard to her repeated protests at this particular form of maltreatment which affected her health and caused reasonable apprehension of further injury to health if she had continued to live with him. Indeed, after they had parted, she gave him a further opportunity of restoring the position by leading a normal married life and behaving towards her sexually in what might reasonably be described as a normal manner, and I think that from that point of view the case is covered by the last part of the speech of the Lord Chancellor in the Baxter case (3) when he said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 892):

"I take the view that in this legislation Parliament used the word 'consummate' as that word is understood in common parlance and in the light of social conditions known to exist, and that the proper occasion for considering the subjects raised by this appeal is when the sexual life of the spouses, and the responsibility of either or both for a childless home, form the background to some other claim for relief."

He obviously had in mind then, relief based either on desertion or on cruelty.

The evidence of the wife has been corroborated by the evidence of the doctor, and I find her case proved. I reject the prayer for nullity, but there will be a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty with costs.

PEARSON v. LAMBETH BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 15, 16, 17, March 1, 1950.]

Negligence—Licensee—Licensor's "actual knowledge" of danger—Knowledge of potential danger—Public convenience—Injury caused by children tampering with grille—Liability of local authority.

The plaintiff entered a public convenience provided by a borough council by passing through an outer gate at street level and down a flight of stairs to a roofed enclosure. On leaving he mounted the stairs, and as he reached the topmost steps his head came into contact with part of an overhead grille or grid which had been drawn forward while the plaintiff was in the convenience by the action of children swinging thereon, and he thereby suffered injury. The council, through their servant, the attendant, knew that children were in the habit of swinging on the grille, and it would have been possible to prevent anyone drawing the grille forward by padlocking it, but that was not done. In an action by the plaintiff against the council for damages for personal injuries,

HELD: (i) a licensor was not liable to a licensee for injury caused by dangers of which the licensor did not actually know, but of which he ought to have known, for, if it were otherwise, there would be no difference between the liability of an invitor and that of a licensor.

Dicta of LORD ATKINSON and LORD WRENBURY in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society ([1923] A.C. 86, 96) and LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd. v. Dumbreck ([1929] A.C. 365), considered.

(ii) to have "actual knowledge" of the danger a licensor need not know of the actual presence on the premises at the time of the accident of the physical object which causes the injury, but it is sufficient if he knows that there is present a physical object capable of being put into a dangerous condition by the action of third persons who are quite likely to act in such a way having regard to their past behaviour or inherent qualities.

Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council ([1937] 3 All E.R. 602), applied.

(iii) on the facts the defendants knew of the danger from which the plaintiff sustained his injury, notwithstanding that they could not foresee the precise manner in which the dangerous condition might cause personal injury to users of the convenience, because by their servants they knew that children were in the habit of tampering with the grille. Accordingly they were liable to the plaintiff as a licensee, and a fortiori if he were an invitee.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE SHAW, given at Lambeth County Court on Nov. 11, 1949, whereby he found that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for injuries received by him while making use of a public convenience maintained by the defendants. The facts appear in the judgment of the court read by ASQUITH, L.J.

Stephen Terrell for the plaintiff.

Dennis Thompson and Hannay for the defendants.

Mar. 1. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is the plaintiff's appeal against a decision of the county court judge for Lambeth refusing to award him damages for personal injuries caused, as he alleges, by the defendants' breach of duty as owners and occupiers of a public convenience. The case raises two issues: (i) Were the defendants in relation to the plaintiff when he visited the convenience in question, inviters, and liable as such for hidden dangers not only of which they knew but of which they ought to have known? or (ii) if they were not inviters, but merely licensors, may they not nevertheless be liable to the plaintiff on the facts of this case? The judge has held—(a) that the relationship between the parties was that of licensor and licensee; (b) that a licensor is only liable for "traps" or hidden dangers of which he actually knows; (c) that the defendants had no actual knowledge of the danger which caused the plaintiff's injuries, and hence the plaintiff cannot recover.

On Oct. 2, 1948, at 10.50 a.m., the plaintiff entered this convenience by passing through an outer gate at street level, and down a flight of stairs to the usual roofed enclosure containing urinals and w.c's. He used the urinal. He then mounted the stairs again, but, as he reached the topmost steps, his head came into violent collision with part of an overhead grille or grid which had been drawn forward by some person unknown while he was below. Normally in the day time this grille, which runs easily on rollers, is drawn back and when it is in that position no one could come into collision with it. At night time, at the hour when the convenience is closed, it is drawn forward, and, when drawn fully forward, it prevents anyone from entering the convenience. In this case the grille had been drawn, not fully, but partially, forward. It would have been perfectly possible to have prevented anyone from drawing the grille forward (except the authorised attendant at the proper time) by padlocking it and giving him alone a key. This was, in fact, done at several other conveniences, but not at this one. The negligence alleged in the statement of claim is this omission which is alleged to have invested the grille with the quality of a "trap." It is conceded that the plaintiff was guilty of no contributory negligence.

The county court judge has found as a fact that the grille was thus pulled forward by mischievous children who had been in the habit of tampering with it and had been seen swinging on it that very morning shortly before the accident. There was, in our view, ample evidence to support this finding, given in the main by witnesses for the defence. Thus Wright, the lavatory attendant, said:

"I had found children swinging on the convenience gate on that morning [before the accident] and on previous mornings. I had not seen the children pull the grid. I had not known them pull the grid over. I had seen them swinging on the grid . . . It does not require any force to pull a grid . . . No doubt, the grid had been pulled over by children . . . If a child had swung on it it could have come forward to a certain extent . . . I had just previously driven away some children: they were swinging on the grid. This was about half an hour before the accident."

One Green, a painter, who was painting the outside of the ladies' convenience on the day and about the time of the accident, said:

"Just previous to this accident I had chased away boys from the top of the [men's] convenience. I did not see those boys interfering with the grid . . . I had seen children swinging on this grid. That did not pull the grid forward."

One O'Connell, superintendent of works of the Lambeth Borough Council, after saying that grids did not move forward of their own accord, went on:

"I never heard of a grid being pulled forward by children swinging on it . . . We have had complaints about children playing round these conveniences and swinging on grids and railings . . . for three or four years before this accident. It was worrying to me . . . If it had been pointed out to me that the children might have moved the grille by swinging on it, steps would have been taken to stop the grid from being so moved . . . I don't think children could have brought forward this grille by swinging on it."

The judge clearly rejects this last bit of evidence, but it is impossible to say that the evidence of these three-witnesses, all called for the defence, was not sufficient to support his finding that

"to the knowledge of (the defendants') servants, children were in the habit of swinging on this grille—a grille which moved easily and could be (and, as I find, was) pulled forward in that way."

Accepting, then, the finding that children had pulled the grille forward between the plaintiff's descent of the stairs and his re-ascent, we will proceed (inverting the order in which we stated the two issues) to consider first whether the defendants are liable to the plaintiff on the basis that the latter was a licensee. It is generally accepted that a licensor is only liable to a licensee for injury caused by hidden dangers of which the licensor "actually knows." What precisely is meant by "actually knowing of a danger" is by no means as easy a question as it sounds. The meaning of the word "know" and of the word "danger" are both in this connection surprisingly elusive. We are satisfied, at all events (notwithstanding certain expressions of opinion by very eminent judges which would appear to be obiter dicta), that a licensor is not liable for dangers of which he does not actually know, but of which he ought to know in the sense in which the words "ought to know" are used in Indermaur v. Dames (1). If it were otherwise, there would be no difference between the liability of an invitor and of a licensor. The dicta indicating a contrary view are contained in the speeches of two law lords—LORD ATKINSON and LORD WRENBURY in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (2) and in the speech of LORD HAILSHAM in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd. v. Dumbreck (3). In the first of those cases both LORD ATKINSON and LORD WRENBURY appear to be saying that a licensor is liable in respect of a trap of which he "ought to know," but, since it was held by the majority of the House that there was no trap (a trap is a hidden danger and this was a patent danger), it was immaterial to the decision whether the defendant company was an invitor or licensor. In neither event could it be liable. These passages must, therefore, be considered obiter dicta. In a recent decision of the Irish Supreme Court, Boylan v. Dublin Corpn. (4), BLACK, J., put the matter compactly in the following words ([1949] I.R. 77):

“The plaintiff’s status—whether that of licensee or that of an invitee—was not in issue, and I am at a loss to understand how a pronouncement on a matter that is not in issue can be part of the ratio decidendi, or anything but an obiter dictum.”

The same observation, in our view, applies to a passage to the same effect in the opinion of LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd. v. Dumbreck (3) where he said ([1929] A.C. 365):

“In the case of persons who are not there by invitation, but who are there by leave and licence, express or implied, the duty is much less stringent [that is to say, less stringent than the duty towards an invitee] the occupier has no duty to ensure that the premises are safe, but he is bound not to create a trap or to allow a concealed danger to exist upon the said premises, which is not apparent to the visitor, but which is known—or ought to be known—to the occupier.”

In that case again the observation was unnecessary to the decision, since the plaintiff was neither an invitee nor a licensee, but a trespasser, and failed for that reason. The Court of Appeal in Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5) and the majority of text-book writers have treated these words as used per incuriam, but on any view they are used obiter.

An ingenious argument was, however, put forward by counsel for the plaintiff which, if sound, would incidentally justify the language of LORD ATKINSON, LORD WRENBURY, and LORD HAILSHAM. It was suggested that the formula “danger of which he ought to know” was used in different senses in relation to inviters and licensors respectively and that its use in relation to licensors could be defended when this distinction was grasped. Inviters may be liable though wholly ignorant of the facts constituting the danger provided they ought to have known those facts. A licensor will not be liable unless he knows the facts which objectively constitute the danger, but (so the argument runs) if any reasonable person would know that those facts did constitute a danger, he cannot be heard to say he did not know they did. On this view and in this sense of the words, a licensor who knows the facts which actually constitute the danger ought in addition to know that those facts do constitute a danger, in cases, at least, where it is obvious that they do so. In putting forward this contention counsel for the plaintiff prayed in aid Baker v. Bethnal Green Corporation (6) (the air raid shelter case). In that case the point is raised, described as attractive, but left open in the following passage from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1945] 1 All E.R. 140):

“Counsel for the respondent put forward what I must confess at first sight appears to me to be a very attractive explanation of that difficulty. What he said was that, if a licensor knows of the existence of what in fact is a trap or a hidden danger, that is sufficient, because he cannot be heard to say that although he knew the physical facts which constituted the danger from a purely objective point of view, the fact that it was a danger did not occur to his mind. In other words, that when the phrase “or ought to have known” was used, it was directed to that view of the position, and refers, not to the physical objective facts, but to the circumstance that those facts constitute a danger. That appears to me to be a very attractive view, but much though I should like to do so, I do not find it necessary to consider whether it is correct or not.”

Having regard to the view we take of this limb of the plaintiff’s argument, we too can afford to leave this point undecided. For we think that in the sense properly attributable to the words, the defendants “actually knew of the danger” and that the plaintiff does not need to rely on the word “ought.” Before seeking to define this sense, it may be well to glance at the authorities. A great many were cited to us, but on this branch of the case we need only refer to the two which are most nearly in point. The first is Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7). In that case a local authority provided a recreation park with a paddling pool for children and sand. A notice was exhibited prohibiting users from taking bottles, tins, and the like into the pool, owing to the risk of cut feet. The pool was raked every morning to clear it of any broken glass, etc., which might be there, but the rake used was quite ineffective for this purpose, as it only stroked the surface of the submerged sand. The plaintiff, a small boy, while paddling in the pool had his foot cut by broken glass embedded in the sand. The plaintiff, who was held to be a licensee, was held entitled to recover. The local authority did not know glass was buried in the sand, but they knew of the possibility of its being there, ergo they were held to have that "actual knowledge of the danger" which fixes a licensor with liability. GREER, L.J., said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 459):

"It does not seem to me to matter that the council officials did not know that the actual piece of glass was there: the question is, did not the council know that there was a danger to children that it ought to provide against?"

Actual knowledge of a potential danger would, therefore, seem to suffice.

The other case is Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5). There again the local authority were occupiers of a recreation ground, which in this case contained a chute down which children could slide. The infant plaintiff was injured by a chain placed across the lower end of the chute by another boy in mischief. The chain was normally so placed on Sundays when the chute was out of use. On weekdays, when the chute was in use, the chains were padlocked to a pole by the attendant, partly, as he said, because, if loose, the children might tamper with them, e.g., by doing what they had seen him do on Sundays, namely, place the chain across the chute. In this case the chains were insecurely attached to the pole. It was held (i) that the plaintiff was a licensee, and (ii) that the danger of the chains, if loose, being used by mischievous boys in the manner in which they were in the event used constituted a danger actually known to the attendant (and, therefore, to the local authority), not merely a danger of which he and it ought to have known. GREER, L.J., said (157 L.T. 416; [1937] 3 All E.R. 605):

"... the danger created by a mischievous boy using this chain was a danger known to the ground attendant, the servant of the defendants; it was not merely a danger of which he ought to have known, but a danger of which he did in fact know."

SLESSER, L.J., said (157 L.T. 417 ibid., 608):

"The evidence, therefore, showed: first, knowledge on the part of the defendants, by their agent, that these chains were likely to be put to the dangerous use to which this chain was put, by boys in mischief; secondly, that this chain was not properly secured by the ground attendant; and, thirdly, that this particular chain was put round the chute by a boy in mischief."

The learned lord justice is clearly holding that to know this much is to have "actual knowledge of the danger." Both lords justices held there was a breach of the defendants' duty as licensors towards the infant licensee. SCOTT, L.J., agreed.

These two authorities are binding on this court. They seem to decide (i) that to have "actual knowledge of the danger" the defendant or his servants need not know of the actual presence on the premises at the time of the accident of the physical object which in the result causes the injury. It is enough if such an object has been there in the past and a similar object may be there again if no sufficient precautions have been taken to prevent its presence: Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7); (ii) (and more relevant to the present case) that it is sufficient if the defendant knows—(a) that there is present a physical object capable of being put in a dangerous condition; (b) by the action of third persons;

(c) who are quite likely to act in such a way as to put it in a dangerous condition, having regard to their past behaviour or inherent qualities: Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5). We feel it impossible to distinguish the present case materially from Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5). The three conditions (a), (b) and (c) are satisfied in the present case. In both cases a simple precaution was omitted which would have thwarted or rendered innocuous the possible action of the third persons. The only difference which can be suggested is that the accident in Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5) took the precise form which the defendants could have anticipated. The attendant had fastened the chain across the chute on Sundays in the presence of the children. He had put the idea into their heads, and the danger "of which the defendants" (by him their servant) "knew" was that of the children doing likewise, whereas in the present case no one on behalf of the defendants had seen the children pull the grille forward so as to threaten the safety of anyone emerging from the convenience.

We do not think this difference is crucial. What the defendants by their servant knew in this case (taking such evidence of the servants of the defendants as the county court judge accepted, and ignoring that part of it which he rejected) was—(i) that the children had persistently (for three or four years there had been complaints of this) tampered with the grille, in particular, by swinging on it, and that this had "worried" the witness, O'Connell, a lot; (ii) that the lavatory attendant had seen them swinging on the convenience gate that morning within half an hour of the accident and had seen them swinging on the grid, also that morning; (iii) that it does not require any force to pull a grid; (iv) that the swinging of the children could have moved the grid forward a bit. Given this knowledge on the part of the defendants' servants it would seem that on the principle on which Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5) proceeded the defendants "actually knew of the danger." The only distinction between the cases is that in Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7) and in Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5) the dangerous condition materialised in a casualty in the precise way contemplated by the defendants, e.g., in the first case the defendants had issued a warning notice specifying the sort of casualty likely to occur, namely, "cut feet" to a paddler, and cut feet to a paddler resulted. In the other case it had materialised also in the way contemplated, namely, in injuries to one child due to a chain being stretched across the chute by another. In the present case, while the dangerous condition (namely, an easily sliding grille habitually tampered with by children, movable by them and capable in certain positions of inflicting serious injury) was liable to injure someone—a child or someone else—in some way, yet the defendants could not and did not foresee the precise manner in which this dangerous condition would translate itself into an actual casualty. In our view, this distinction is not a material difference. In all three cases the defendant "actually knew of the danger," and the plaintiff is entitled to succeed even though a mere licensee.

This conclusion, if well founded, would absolve us from considering the other issue, namely, whether the plaintiff was, indeed, a mere licensee or an invitee. If we are wrong, and the plaintiff was an invitee, he would in this character a fortiori be entitled to recover, but as the issue has been argued before us at some length, we think we should set out briefly the grounds of our conclusion that the plaintiff was a licensee only. The general principles on which persons coming on the premises of an occupier with his consent are classified as invitees and licensees respectively are easy to formulate but not always easy to apply. They are somewhat over-simplified in the formula in SALMOND ON TORT (9th ed., p. 514) justly commended by MACKINNON, L.J., in Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7) ([1937] 3 All E.R. 464):

"The invitor says 'I ask you to enter upon my business.' The licensor says: 'I permit you to enter on your own business.'"

Succinct and vivid as is this formula, it might suggest that the visitor is an invitee only if the business on which he comes is exclusively that of the occupier. This is, of course, not what is meant. It is more exact to say that an invitee is a person who comes on the occupier's premises with his consent on business in which the occupier and he have a common interest, e.g., a shopper has an interest to buy and a shopkeeper an interest to sell. It is sometimes said that the interest must be pecuniary, or, at least, "material." This certainly does not mean that a visitor who is not required to pay and does not pay is necessarily excluded from the class of invitees, e.g., many shops encourage customers to enter and inspect their wares without any obligation to buy. No doubt, this practice pays in a purely pecuniary sense in the long run and is tolerated for that reason: cf. Stowell v. Railway Executive (8). It is not clear that a "common interest" for this purpose may not exist where no pecuniary gain whatever, immediate or remote, is aimed at. In Weigall v. Westminster Hospital (9) the mother of a patient (it is true a paying patient) at the hospital, in the course of visiting him, slipped on a mat placed on a polished floor and suffered injuries. She was held to be entitled to recover qua invitee. It is not clear that the result might not have been the same if her son had not been a paying patient. In a Canadian case—Nickell v. City of Windsor (10)—the same status was attributed to a person who, having entered a public library (presumably without paying), was injured in leaving it by slipping on an ice-covered step.

The observations obiter of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Baker v. Bethnal Green Corpn. (6) carry the matter a step further. He said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 139):

"The first question that arises is whether or not the relationship of the appellants to the respondent's husband was that of invitor and invitee. It seems to me that there are serious arguments in favour of the view that that was the true relationship. The appellants were fulfilling a public duty. Upon the due performance of that duty their reputation as servants of the public depended. In order to fulfil that duty they furnished themselves with premises thought to be suitable, and they threw them open to such members of the public as might desire to use them. In those circumstances it seems to me that there are serious grounds for saying that the case bears no resemblance to the case where, for social reasons or reasons of that kind, one person allows, or I will use the word 'invites' (but I use it here in a non-technical sense) somebody to come upon his premises; and it may well be that such a case as the present is to be distinguished from Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7), which was a case of a public park provided by a local authority. GREER, L.J., appears to have taken the view that even in that case the relationship was that of invitor and invitee, although he did not so hold as a matter of judgment. The other two members of the court, SLESSER and MACKINNON, L.JJ., took the view that the relationship was that of licensor and licensee. Here I do not find it necessary to express any concluded opinion upon the question, and I will assume that the true legal relationship was that of licensor and licensee."

It is true that these are obiter dicta, but they relate to a case in which no pecuniary interest—immediate or long-term—on the part of the occupier existed. If the matter were free from other authority and if the observations just cited were part of the ratio decidendi of the case, we should find ourselves impelled to the conclusion that the defendants, who were, from motives of civic duty and in pursuance of their public functions, providing an essential sanitary service, were invitores. In both cases the public authority had the power, but was under no legal compulsion, to provide the facilities in question. Our difficulty in arriving at such a conclusion arises from cases such as Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (7), Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (5) and Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor (11), in all of which it was held that persons entering a public park or recreation ground were mere licensees. If, however, we are wrong in this view, the result we have arrived at on the basis of the inferior duty owed to a licensee is confirmed and reinforced. For these reasons we think the appeal should be allowed.

Re WIGHTWICK'S WILL TRUSTS. OFFICIAL TRUSTEES B OF CHARITABLE FUNDS v. FIELDING-OULD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 24, March 2, 1950.]

Will—Perpetuity—Gift rendering capital inalienable—Gift of income to non-charitable association "until vivisection shall be made a punishable offence"—Gift over to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—Validity of gifts and gift over—Contingency.

By her will a testatrix bequeathed £2,000 to trustees on trust to invest the same and pay the dividends arising to "the treasurer for the time being of a society or association called ... the 'International Association for the Total Suppression of Vivisection' ... such dividends to be at the disposal of the committee for the time being for the purposes of the said association until the time shall arrive that the practice of vivisection be made penal by law within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and shall also be made a punishable offence upon the continent of Europe and elsewhere And it is my will and I hereby direct that from and after the time when the objects of the said ... association ... shall have become accomplished by the absolute and total abolition by law of the practice of vivisection not only in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland but also on the continent of Europe and elsewhere then the trustees for the time being of this my will shall pay the dividends ... as they shall accrue unto the treasurer for the time being of the society called ... 'the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals' ... to be at the disposal of the committee for the time being of the said society." The testatrix gave the residue of her estate to A.T. absolutely. The trustees paid the income first to the International Association for the Total Suppression of Vivisection, and later to the successors in title of that association, the National Anti-Vivisection Society. In National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1947] 2 All E.R. 217), the House of Lords held that the said society was not established for charitable purposes only.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will the gift to the society was made on trust to apply the income towards the furtherance of its objects for a period which, because the court could never be satisfied that the condition on which the payment was to determine had been satisfied, was indefinite, and, therefore, the gift involved rendering the capital inalienable, and was void as a perpetuity or as tending to a perpetuity.

Re Chardon ([1928] Ch. 464), distinguished.

(ii) it was not possible to postulate a dies certus when the primary gift would determine, and, therefore, the gift over to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was contingent and failed.

Dictum of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Chamberlayne v. Brockett (1872) (8 Ch. App. 211), applied.

Mar. 2. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. This originating summons is necessitated by the decision of the House of Lords in National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). The relevant passage in the will of the testatrix reads as follows: E

"I give and bequeath the sum of £2,000 to be paid out of such part of my personal estate as can be lawfully applied for that purpose unto the Most Noble John Villiers Smart Townshend Marquis Townshend William Adlam of the Manor House Chew Magna in the county of Somerset Esquire and Arthur Frederick Astley of the Eton and Harrow Club London Esquire in trust to invest the same in such securities as they may deem proper and to pay the dividends arising out of such capital sum half yearly unto the treasurer for the time being of a society or association called or known by the name of the 'International Association for the Total Suppression of Vivisection' established in 1876 the offices of which association are now or were at the above date at No. 25 Cockspur Street London such dividends to be at the disposal of the committee for the time being for the purposes of the said association until the time shall arrive that the practice of vivisection be made penal by law within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and shall also be made a punishable offence upon the continent of Europe and elsewhere And it is my will and I hereby direct that from and after the time when the objects of the said International Association for the Total Suppression of Vivisection shall have become accomplished by the absolute and total abolition by law of the practice of vivisection not only in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland but also on the continent of Europe and elsewhere then the trustees for the time being of this my will shall pay the dividends arising out of the capital sum before mentioned as they shall accrue unto the treasurer for the time F G H being of the society called or known by the name of 'the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals' established in 1824 to be at the disposal of the committee for the time being of the said society."

After other provisions not material to be referred to the testatrix gave the residue of her estate to one Anne Thacker absolutely. The plaintiffs, in whom are vested the investments representing the legacy in question, have paid the income arising therefrom first to the International Association for the Total Suppression of Vivisection and later to the defendants, the National Anti-Vivisection Society, an unincorporated body who are their successors. In view of the above decision of the House of Lords, it has become necessary to consider the validity both of the primary gift and the gift over. The Treasury Solicitor is joined as a defendant as all efforts to trace those entitled to the residuary estate have failed.

As regards the primary gift, the fact that it is a gift of income for an indefinite period is not of itself an objection, and, prima facie, it would be good if it does not infringe the rule against inalienability: Re Chardon (2). In that case there was a gift of £200 by a testator to his trustees to invest it and pay the income to a cemetery company during such period as they should continue to maintain and keep two specified graves in good order and condition with flowers and plants thereon as the same should have thitherto been kept by him, and he declared that, if the graves should not be kept in such order and condition, his trustees should pay and apply the income as provided in the will. ROMER, J., held that the gift was valid as it did not infringe either the rule against perpetuities or the rule against inalienability. Neither in that case nor in the present case is the rule against perpetuities involved, because in neither does any question arise as to the gift in question vesting within the period allowed by the rule. In Re Chardon (2) ROMER, J., held that the interest of the cemetery company was not inalienable on the ground that they could at any time dispose of it if they could find a purchaser. His grounds appear most clearly in a passage towards the end of his judgment where he says ([1928] Ch. 470):

"The cemetery company and the persons interested in the legacy, subject to the interest of the cemetery company, could combine tomorrow and dispose of the whole legacy. The trust does not, therefore, offend the rule against inalienability. The interest of the cemetery company is a vested interest; the interests of the residuary legatee, it being agreed on all hands that, subject to the interest of the cemetery company, the legacy falls into residue, are also vested."

This case has been the subject of criticism in TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th ed., appendix, p. 701. The criticism is based on the presence in the will of certain clauses which are omitted from the report. I do not propose to pause to consider the views expressed. It is sufficient for my purpose that the learned judge accepted the view, which he pointed out was common ground, that, subject to the interest of the cemetery company, the legacy to it fell into residue. ROMER, J., was able to hold the gift to the cemetery company valid, first, because he found no context in the terms of the gift which would operate to fetter the right of the cemetery company to dispose of the income, and, secondly, because, on the view which he accepted, those interested in residue, into which the legacy would fall on the determination of the interest of the cemetery company, could join with the cemetery company in disposing of the whole legacy.

The first question, therefore, is to decide whether the National Anti-Vivisection Society could dispose of the income which is the subject of the primary gift. This is, to my mind, a question which depends on the language of the gift. The income is to be paid half yearly to the treasurer for the time being of the society. In contrast, the direction in Re Chardon (2) was to pay the income to the cemetery company simpliciter, a direction which would include its assigns. The will in this case further provides that the income is to be at the disposal of the committee for the time being for the purposes of the association. That, to my mind, means that the committee must apply the income received each half year for a particular purpose, that is, the purposes of the association, with the result that, in my judgment, the association takes the income on a trust, namely, to apply it towards the furtherance of its objects. Now, a trust of income for an indefinite period for a purpose not being charitable is void as a perpetuity or as tending to a perpetuity because it involves rendering the capital inalienable. Turning to the language of the will, by which a limit is sought to be set on the period of payment to the association, it appears to me that it can be no overstatement to say that it tends to a perpetuity, because it is hardly possible to imagine that the court could ever be satisfied on evidence that the condition on which the payment is to determine had been satisfied. On this short ground the present case is, in my view, distinguishable from Re Chardon (2) and the primary gift is void.

It remains to consider the validity of the gift over. The validity of this gift appears to me to turn on whether or not it is contingent. It is quite true that there is no magic in the words which may be used to introduce a gift over, but the fact that they can be reduced to "subject to" is not, in my view, the true test. The test appears to me to be whether or not the gift over is bound to take effect. If one can find a dies certus for the determination of the primary gift then, generally speaking, the gift over will not be construed as being contingent. The death of a person is a dies certus, for it must be predicated of every person that some day he must die. It is on this basis that such cases as Maddison v. Chapman (3) and Re Shuckburgh's Settlement (4) were decided. Cases where, on the failure of the primary gift, the property given falls into residue stand on a different footing. In such cases it does not matter that the prior interest may be of possibly unlimited duration: Re Randell (5), Re Blunt's Trusts (6). If, however, the gift over is not to residue and it is not possible to postulate a dies certus, then, in my judgment, the gift over is contingent, and the circumstance that the object of the gift over is charity makes no difference. In Chamberlayne v. Brockett (7), LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said (8 Ch. App. 211):

"On the other hand, if the gift in trust for charity is itself conditional upon a future and uncertain event, it is subject, in our judgment, to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If the condition is never fulfilled, the estate never arises; if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities, the gift fails ab initio."

I will not repeat what I have already said regarding the language of the condition on which this gift over is to take effect. In my judgment, the gift over is contingent and fails. It follows, therefore, that the investments in question now held by the plaintiffs fall into the residuary estate.

In paying the income, as they have done, to the association and then to the National Anti-Vivisection Society up till now, the plaintiffs have acted throughout bona fide and in accordance with the generally held view that the primary gift was a good charitable trust: see Re Foveaux (8). It will, therefore, be proper to declare under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61, that they acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused for any breach of trust which they may have committed and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter, and that they should be wholly relieved from personal liability.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the fund.

LEAF v. INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Jenkins, L.JJ.),
February 28, March 1, 1950.]

Misrepresentation—Innocent misrepresentation—Sale of goods—Misrepresentation as to quality of article sold—Rescission of contract—Acceptance by buyer of delivery—Claim to rescind contract after five years.

A In March, 1944, the buyer bought from the sellers an oil painting of Salisbury Cathedral which was represented to him as a painting by Constable, a representation which was held to be one of the terms of the contract. In 1949 he found that the picture was not a Constable. On a claim by the buyer for the rescission of the contract on the ground that there had been an innocent misrepresentation,

B HELD: assuming that in a proper case a contract for the sale of goods passing by delivery could, after its completion by the delivery of the goods, be rescinded on the ground of innocent misrepresentation as to the quality of the chattel sold, the present claim was not competent because the buyer had lost the right to reject on that ground when he accepted delivery of the picture, or, at least, when a reasonable time had elapsed after his acceptance, and five years was more than a reasonable time.

G APPEAL by the buyer from an order of His Honour JUDGE DRUCQUER, sitting at the Westminster County Court, dated December 14, 1949, dismissing an action for the rescission of a contract for the sale of a picture on the ground of innocent misrepresentation.

The buyer had accepted the picture as a genuine Constable on the representation of the sellers, and it was only after five years that he became aware that it was not genuine. He then claimed rescission of the contract on the ground of innocent misrepresentation. The facts appear in the judgment of DENNING, L.J.

H David Weitzman for the buyer.
John Perrett and K. G. Jupp for the sellers.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: In March, 1944, the buyer bought from the sellers an oil painting of Salisbury Cathedral. On the back of the picture there was a label indicating that it had been exhibited as a Constable, and during the negotiations for the purchase the sellers represented that it was a painting by Constable. That representation, the judge has found, was incorporated as one of the terms of the contract. The receipt for the price, £85, was given in these terms: "Mar. 6, 1944. One original oil painting Salisbury Cathedral by J. Constable, £85." Nearly five years later the buyer was minded to sell the picture. He took it to Christie's to be put into an auction, and he was then advised that it was not a Constable. So he took it back to the sellers and told them he wanted to return it and get his money back. They did take the picture back temporarily for investigation, and they still adhered to the view that it was a Constable. Eventually the buyer brought a claim in the county court claiming rescission of the contract. In his particulars of claim he pleaded that the picture had been represented to be a Constable, and that he had paid £85 in reliance on that representation. The sellers resisted the claim. After hearing expert evidence the judge found as a fact, and this must be accepted, that the painting was not by Constable and was worth little.

The question is whether the buyer is entitled to rescind the contract on that account. I emphasise that this is a claim to rescind only. There is no claim in this action for damages for breach of condition or breach of warranty. The claim is simply one for rescission. At a very late stage before the county court judge counsel for the buyer did ask for leave to amend by claiming damages for breach of warranty, but it was not allowed. So no claim for damages is before us. The only question is whether the buyer is entitled to rescind. The way in which the case is put by counsel for the buyer is this. He says this was an innocent misrepresentation and that in equity he is entitled to claim rescission even of an executed contract of sale on that account. He points out that the judge has found that it is quite possible to restore the parties to the same position that they were in originally, by the buyer simply handing back the picture to the sellers in return for the repayment of the purchase price.

In my opinion, this case is to be decided according to the well known principles applicable to the sale of goods. This was a contract for the sale of goods. There was a mistake about the quality of the subject-matter, because both parties believed the picture to be a Constable, and that mistake was in one sense essential or fundamental. Such a mistake, however, does not avoid the contract. There was no mistake about the subject-matter of the sale. It was a specific picture of "Salisbury Cathedral." The parties were agreed in the same terms on the same subject-matter, and that is sufficient to make a contract: see Solle v. Butcher (1). There was a term in the contract as to the quality of the subject-matter, namely, as to the person by whom the picture was painted—that it was by Constable. That term of the contract was either a condition or a warranty. If it was a condition, the buyer could reject the picture for breach of the condition at any time before he accepted it or was to be deemed to have accepted it, whereas, if it was only a warranty, he could not reject it but was confined to a claim for damages.

I think it right to assume in the buyer's favour that this term was a condition, and that, if he had come in proper time, he could have rejected the picture, but the right to reject for breach of condition has always been limited by the rule that once the buyer has accepted, or is deemed to have accepted, the goods in performance of the contract, he cannot thereafter reject, but is relegated to his claim for damages: see s. 11 (1) (c) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 and Wallis, Son and Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (2). The circumstances in which a buyer is deemed to have accepted goods in performance of the contract are set out in s. 35 of the Act which provides that the buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods, among other things,

"... when after the lapse of a reasonable time, he retains the goods without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them."

In this case this buyer took the picture into his house, and five years passed before he intimated any rejection. That, I need hardly say, is much more than a reasonable time. It is far too late for him at the end of five years to reject this picture for breach of any condition. His remedy after that length of time is for damages only, a claim which he has not brought before the court.

Is it to be said that the buyer is in any better position by relying on the representation, not as a condition, but as an innocent misrepresentation? I agree that on a contract for the sale of goods an innocent material misrepresentation may in a proper case be a ground for rescission even after the contract has been executed. The observations of JOYCE, J., in Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co. (3) are, in my opinion, too widely stated. Many judges have treated it as plain that an executed contract of sale may, in a proper case, be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation: see, for instance, WARRINGTON, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., in Harrison v. Knowles (4) ([1918] 1 K.B. 609, 610); LORD ATKIN in Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (5) ([1932] A.C. 224); SCRUTTON, L.J., and MAUGHAM, L.J., in L'Estrange v. F. Graucob, Ltd. (6) ([1934] 2 K.B. 400, 405). Apart from that, there is now the decision of the majority of this court in Solle v. Butcher (1) which overrules the first ground of decision in Angel v. Jay (7). It is unnecessary, however, to pronounce finally on these matters because, although rescission may in some cases be a proper remedy, nevertheless it is to be remembered that an innocent misrepresentation is much less potent than a breach of condition. A condition is a term of the contract of a most material character, and, if a claim to reject for breach of condition is barred, it seems to me a fortiori that a claim to rescission on the ground of innocent misrepresentation is also barred. So, assuming that a contract for the sale of goods may be rescinded in a proper case for innocent misrepresentation, nevertheless, once the buyer has accepted, or is deemed to have accepted, the goods, the claim is barred. In this case the buyer must clearly be deemed to have accepted the picture. He had ample opportunity to examine it in the first few days after he bought it. Then was the time to see if the condition or representation was fulfilled, yet he has kept it all this time and five years have elapsed without any notice of rejection. In my judgment, he cannot now claim to rescind, and the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. So far as dealings in land are concerned there is a considerable body of authority to the effect that rescission on the ground of innocent misrepresentation will not be allowed after conveyance. For instance, there are the observations (1 H.L. Cas. 632) of LORD CAMPBELL to that effect in Wilde v. Gibson (8), and the doctrine has also been applied to leases in Angel v. Jay (7). In some of the cases, on the strength of the authorities dealing with sales of land, the proposition has been stated in general terms to the effect that no executed contract can be rescinded after completion on the ground of innocent misrepresentation. As appears from the recent decision of the majority of this court in Solle v. Butcher (1) it seems probable that the proposition thus generally stated is unduly wide. In particular, it cannot be assumed that it necessarily holds good with respect to a sale of chattels passing by delivery. For the purposes of this case, however, I find it unnecessary to decide how far it is possible to obtain, on the ground of innocent misrepresentation, rescission of a contract for the sale of chattels passing by delivery after the contract has been completed by delivery of those chattels, and I propose to confine myself to considering whether, assuming such a claim to be open, this is a case in which it should properly be allowed. In my judgment, that question must clearly be answered in the negative on the facts. It is true that the buyer bought the picture on the faith of the representation, innocently made, that it was a painting by Constable. It is true that this was a representation of great importance which went to the root of the contract and induced him to buy. Clearly if, before he had taken delivery of the picture, he had obtained other advice and come to the conclusion that the picture was not a Constable, it would have been open to him to rescind. It may be that if, having taken delivery of the picture on the faith of the representation, he, within a reasonable time, took other advice and satisfied himself that it was not a Constable, he might have been able to make good his claim to rescission notwithstanding the delivery. That point I propose to leave open. In fact, he took delivery of the picture, kept it for some five years, and took no steps to obtain any further evidence as to its authorship, and, finally, when he was minded to sell the picture at the end of a matter of five years, the untruth of the representation was brought to light.

In those circumstances it seems to me to be out of the question that a court of equity should grant relief by way of rescission. It is true that the county court judge held that there had been no laches, and, of course, it may be said that the buyer had no occasion to obtain any further evidence as to the authorship of the picture until he wanted to sell, but, in my judgment, contracts such as this cannot be kept open and subject to the possibility of rescission indefinitely. Assuming that acceptance of delivery was not fatal to his claim, at all events, I think it behoves the buyer either to verify, or, as the case may be, disprove, the representation within a reasonable time or else to stand or fall by the representation. If he is allowed to wait five, ten, or twenty years and then re-open the bargain, there can be no finality. I do not think that equity will intervene in such a case, more especially in the present case as it cannot be said that, apart from rescission, the buyer would have been without remedy. The judge was clearly of opinion, and it seems to me that he was right, that the representation that the picture was a Constable amounted to a warranty. If it amounted to a warranty and that was broken, as on the findings of the judge it was, the buyer had a right at law to damages for breach of warranty. That remedy he did not choose to exercise. That being so, it seems to me that he has no justification now for coming to equity five years after the event and claiming rescission. Accordingly, it seems to me that this is not a case in which the equitable remedy of rescission, assuming it to be available in the absence of fraud in respect of a completed sale of chattels, should be allowed to the buyer. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I also agree that this appeal should be dismissed, for the reasons which have already been given. On the facts of this case it seems to me that the buyer ought not now to be allowed to rescind this contract. In the circumstances it is unnecessary, as my brethren have already observed, to express any conclusion on the more general matter whether the so-called doctrine which finds expression in the headnote to Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co. (3) ought now to be treated as of full effect and validity. The doubt on that matter is the greater since the observations of the majority of this court in Solle v. Butcher (1), but out of respect to the argument of counsel for the buyer and because the matter is one of interest to lawyers (see, for example, the article in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW of January, 1939, p. 90), I venture to add some observations which may be relevant when the general application of this doctrine has to be further considered.

The buyer's case rested fundamentally on this statement which he made: "I contracted to buy a Constable. I have not had, and never had, a Constable." Though that is, as a matter of language, perfectly intelligible, it, nevertheless, needs a little expansion if it is to be accurate. What he contracted to buy and what he bought was a specific chattel, namely, an oil painting of Salisbury Cathedral, but he bought it on the faith of a representation, innocently made, that that painting had been painted by Constable. It turns out that it was not so painted. Nevertheless, it remains true to say that the buyer still has the article he contracted to buy. The difference in value is, no doubt, considerable, but it is, as DENNING, L.J., has observed, a difference in quality rather than in the substance of the thing itself.

That leads me to suggest this matter for consideration. The attribution of works of art to particular artists is often a matter of great controversy and increasing difficulty as time goes on. If the buyer is right in saying that he is entitled, perhaps years after the purchase, to raise the question whether in truth a particular painting was rightly attributed to a particular artist, it may result in most costly and difficult litigation in which there will be found divergent views of artists and critics of great eminence, and the prevailing view at one date may be quite different from that which prevails at a later date. There is, moreover, a further point. The judge has found here that restitutio in integrum is possible, meaning thereby, as I understand it, that the picture itself retains the condition which it possessed at the time of the sale in 1944 and can, therefore, be returned to the sellers, and the sellers can return to the buyer the £85 which he paid. It can be well understood that, if the view for which counsel for the buyer contended is of general application, many cases will arise in which other controversies of equal difficulty and complexity may have to be determined—namely, whether in the interval there has been a change through wear and tear or otherwise in the article which has been sold. A set of chairs attributed to Chippendale after being used for six years might well be said to have suffered damage which appreciably diminishes their value. Again, the fashion in these things, and consequently their value, varies from time to time.

It seems to me, therefore, that, if the view of counsel for the buyer is to be accepted, there may arise matters for determination of great difficulty and complexity leading to uncertainty and considerable litigation. And as between one case and another the rule of equity may work somewhat capriciously. Those results, it seems to me, are undesirable. If a man elects to buy a work of art or any other chattel on the faith of some representation, innocently made, and delivery of the article is accepted, then it seems to me that there is much to be said for the view that on acceptance there is an end of that particular transaction, and that, if it were otherwise, business dealings in these things would become hazardous, difficult, and uncertain. A representation of this kind may either be a warranty or not, or equivalent to a warranty or not. If not, then the matters to which I have already referred seem to me to gain in importance. I need not elaborate the point by example, but, if the representation does amount to a warranty, then, as JENKINS, L.J., has pointed out, there is available to the buyer a remedy at law for the breach which is reasonably certain and capable of giving perfectly adequate compensation to the injured party. If such a remedy at law is available, there is less ground for invoking a rule of equity to supplement the law. Finally, I add this. True it is that since the observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (5), and those of this court in Solle v. Butcher (1) much greater doubt may be entertained about the validity of the decision of JOYCE, J., in Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co. (3) in 1905—forty-five years ago. The article in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW read to us by counsel for the buyer was written eleven years ago. There has been opportunity for Parliament to alter the law if it was thought to be inadequate. I am not saying that that is a ground on which we should conclude that the so-called doctrine of Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co. (3) is well stated or is in all respects correct, but the fact that it has stood for such a length of time, even though qualified, is, I think, another consideration deserving of some weight when this matter has further to be debated and to be adjudicated on. I have added those remarks out of respect to the argument and because of the importance of the case, but I base my conclusion on those grounds which have already been stated by my brethren and which it would be mere repetition on my part to state again.

NOTE.

LEVIN v. ROTH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.J.J.), February 23, 24, 27, 1950.]

Equity—Unconscionable bargain with expectant heir—Bills of exchange given by reversioner for small consideration—Sale of reversion—Subsequent renewal of bills from time to time—Loss of right to application of equitable doctrine.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated July 20, 1948.

In 1937, when the parties met, the plaintiff was fifty-seven years old, and the defendant thirty-seven. Both were dental surgeons. The defendant was at that time entitled to a reversionary interest in one half of the residuary estate of his step-grandfather, expectant on the death of his step-grandmother. The value of the said residuary estate was about £30,000, and the defendant had borrowed £4,900 on the security of his interest from a reversionary interest society. On Feb. 1, 1937, under an agreement terminable at one month's notice, the plaintiff agreed to employ the defendant as his assistant at a salary of six guineas per week rising after a certain time to nine guineas. In July, 1937, the defendant gave notice determining the agreement, but the parties remained on friendly terms. On Aug. 24, 1937, the defendant signed two bills of exchange, one for £1,000 and one for £500, in favour of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff signed an agreement to the effect that he, having received the said two bills, promised not to present them for payment or deal with them in any other way until after the death of the defendant's step-grandmother. On Aug. 25, 1937, the parties entered into a service agreement which provided that the plaintiff should employ the defendant as his assistant at a salary of £8 per week from Aug. 27, 1937, until Aug. 1, 1938. The defendant left the plaintiff's employment at the end of July, 1938, and from time to time thereafter he renewed the bills, the last renewal being dated Aug. 1, 1946. On Aug. 2, 1938, the defendant assigned his reversion to the said reversionary interest society absolutely. In August, 1946, the defendant's step-grandmother died, and on June 25, 1947, the bills became due. The plaintiff claimed payment under the bills, with interest. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., felt unable to hold that the bills had been given for no consideration, however small the consideration might have been, and he found that, having regard to the evidence, the promise to pay the £1,500 was referable to the agreement of service entered into on Aug. 25, 1937. The learned judge held, however, that in view of the relationship between the parties at the time when the defendant was an expectant heir, the plaintiff had not discharged the onus which rested on him to show that the bills had not been obtained by an unconscionable use of power, but were fair, just and reasonable. The plaintiff appealed.

COHEN, L.J., said that he did not feel justified in differing from the learned judge on the question of consideration, but he was unable to accept the learned judge's view on the question of the application of the equitable doctrine relating to unconscionable bargains with expectant heirs. He thought, on the whole, that he would have come to a different conclusion as to the application of the doctrine at the date (Aug. 24, 1937) when the bills were first given, but whether he came to that conclusion or not there was another ground on which the appeal should succeed. His Lordship continued: The bills, on the finding of the learned judge, were not bills given for no consideration. They have been renewed again and again since the defendant ceased, on Aug. 2, 1938, to be in the position of a reversioner. He had sold his reversion. The result is that again and again he has given new bills in exchange for the old bills, and he is no longer in a position to rely on the principles applicable to expectant heirs. Moreover, there was no evidence of any unconscionable conduct on the part of the plaintiff at the time of the renewals. In those circumstances, it seems to me that, applying what was said by LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in Chesterfield v. Janssen (1), we are bound to hold that even if—which I doubt—the defendant was originally entitled to relief, his subsequent conduct in renewing the bills have deprived him of a remedy. I must confess that I have arrived at this conclusion with some reluctance, but I think it is the only possible conclusion on the evidence.

ASQUITH and SINGLETON, L.JJ., agreed.

THE BERWICKSHIRE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), January 30, 31, February 1, 15, 1950.]

Shipping—Collision—Damages—Interest—Collision during war between British ship and ship belonging to enemy alien—Damages awarded to alien at end of hostilities—Time from which interest accrues.

On June 23, 1940, following the surrender of France to Germany, the plaintiffs, the owners of a French fishing vessel, became enemy aliens. On Nov. 2, 1940, this vessel collided with an English vessel, the property of the defendants, and sank with the whole of her cargo and the effects of her crew. On Oct. 13, 1944, a provisional government in France was recognised by Great Britain. On July 24, 1947, in an action by the plaintiffs to determine liability for the loss, the defendants were found to be wholly to blame. In a subsequent claim for damages, the registrar allowed interest on the sum which he awarded, not from the date of the collision, but only from Oct. 13, 1944, i.e., the date of the recognition of the provisional French government, on the ground that between those dates, owing to the war, the defendants were prohibited by law from making any payment to the plaintiffs.

Held: the plaintiffs were entitled to interest from the date of the collision to the date when the matter would have come before the registrar for assessment of damages but for an adjournment at the request of the plaintiffs.

MOTION to vary the registrar's report.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the Anne de Bretagne, a French fishing vessel, had claimed from the defendants damages in respect of a collision between the French vessel and the S.S. Berwickshire, an English vessel, the property of the defendants. At the time of the collision in 1940 the plaintiffs were enemy aliens, and, accordingly, no proceedings were taken until after the recognition by Great Britain of the French provisional government on Oct. 13, 1944. The defendants having been held alone to blame for the collision, the registrar awarded a sum by way of damages with interest to date only from the date of the recognition of the French government. The question for determination was whether or not interest should also be allowed for the period from the date of the collision to Oct. 13, 1944.

Carpmael, K.C., and Vere Hunt for the plaintiffs.

Naisby, K.C., and Boyes for the defendants.

Feb. 15. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment. This is a motion to vary the registrar's report of July 28, 1949, whereby he assessed the damages in respect of the total loss of the plaintiffs' vessel, the Anne de Bretagne, for which, by a judgment of this court on July 24, 1947, the defendants' vessel, the Berwickshire, was held to be alone to blame. It raises an interesting and important question about which there is no direct authority.

The material facts are as follows. After the surrender of France on June 23, 1940, the owners of the Anne de Bretagne, a French sailing vessel engaged in fishing off the Newfoundland Banks, became enemy aliens. On Nov. 2, when returning to her home port after a fishing expedition laden with a full cargo of green cod, she collided in the North Atlantic with the s.s. Berwickshire, an English vessel, and sank with the whole of her cargo and the loss of the effects of her crew and of one passenger. Happily, no lives were lost. It was impossible at that time for her owners to take proceedings. Equally, it was impossible for the owners of the Berwickshire to admit liability and pay compensation for the loss of the Anne de Bretagne, since any such payment would not merely have been forbidden by the common law of England, but would have been in direct contravention of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. Thus matters remained in abeyance until the conclusion of hostilities, or, at least, until the provisional government of General de Gaulle was recognised on Oct. 13, 1944.

The writ in the action was issued on Sept. 20, 1945. In November, 1945, bail was demanded and given in the sum of £29,000. At the hearing of the action on July 24, 1947, the Berwickshire was held alone to blame, but for one reason or another the claim for damages was not filed until Feb. 23, 1949. The claim was for £109,003 8s. 2d. together with interest and costs. Of this figure £77,126 7s. 2d. represents the cost of replacing the vessel and £2,925 her non-consumable stores and equipment. The registrar awarded £7,500 in respect of those two items together. His award is no longer challenged in this respect, nor is there now any challenge in respect of the disallowance of the considerable claim for loss of profit, amounting in round figures to £11,900, nor in respect of his award of £699 10s. for the crew's effects, nor the £75 awarded in respect of agency. As regards the loss of cargo, in respect of which the registrar awarded £4,000 on a claim of £15,396 12s., the defendants, at an early stage of the hearing before me, offered to increase the sum awarded by £5,600. This was accepted by the plaintiffs, and, accordingly, I order that the registrar's award in this respect be varied by substituting the sum of £9,600 for the sum of £4,000. The only actual controversy, therefore, was in respect of the claim for interest. The learned registrar has awarded interest, not from the date of the collision, but only from Oct. 13, 1944, the date of the recognition of General de Gaulle's government, and he awards it only until June 23, 1949. This is because the reference was postponed from that date at the plaintiffs' request. As to the correctness of his decision to limit the interest to this latter date there can be no question, nor is there any dispute that interest is rightly awarded from July 28, 1949, the date of his award, until payment.

Thus it will be seen that the real dispute is whether or no interest should be allowed for the period from the date of the casualty to Oct. 13, 1944. The learned registrar, in a carefully considered judgment, while acknowledging that it has always been recognised in Admiralty cases that interest is paid on damages and that since the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, this principle is applied to all courts, including the Admiralty Court, held that it did not follow that where the one party is prohibited by law from having any commercial dealings with the other party the first party should necessarily pay interest for the period during which he had been prohibited from paying. He then dealt with the suggestion that payment could have been made to the Custodian of Enemy Property. As to this, the learned registrar was clearly right in rejecting the contention, and it was not pressed before me. Finally, after referring to the circumstances in which the plaintiffs became enemies of Britain and so remained until the liberation of France, he states his conclusions in these words:

“ During that period all commercial intercourse between British nationals and enemy aliens was prohibited, whether by common law or by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. The effect of this prohibition was, in my opinion, not merely to suspend, but to cancel the payment of interest as between British nationals and enemy aliens, and to deprive me of discretion in the matter. Accordingly, I made no award of interest from the date of the collision until the date of liberation. If it had been a matter of discretion I should have reached the same result and should have allowed no interest to run between the collision and the liberation. The liberation of France

I date from the recognition by Britain of the de Gaulle government on Oct. 13, 1944."

It will be seen, therefore, that the learned registrar has determined this question on the ground that he is obliged to reject a claim for interest for this period as a matter of law rather than as a matter of the exercise of the discretion entrusted to him by s. 3 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. Unless I am driven to the same conclusion of law as that held by the learned registrar, I also have a discretion, under s. 3 (1) of that Act, whether to award any interest at all, and, if so, at what rate, on what part of the damages, and whether for the whole or any part of the period between the collision and the judgment. It is quite clear from the approval of the decision in the Court of Appeal in Cooper v. Cooper (1), by LORD ATKIN ([1937] 2 All E.R. 649) in the House of Lords in Evans v. Bartlam (2), that my discretion would not be fettered by any previous exercise of the learned registrar's discretion. A

As I have already indicated, there can be no doubt that the principle of including in the damages for a collision at the discretion of the judge interest on the amount recovered, at a rate, for a period, and whether in respect of the whole or part of the amount recovered, all of which matters are also respectively at the discretion of the judge, was firmly embodied in the Admiralty jurisdiction at a time when the right to award interest by way of damages at common law depended, speaking generally, on the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, ss. 28 and 29, or on the express terms of a contract, or those imported into mercantile contracts by the custom of merchants, as, for example, on bills of exchange or promissory notes: see the notes to the common indebitatus count for interest, in BULLEN & LEAKE, 3rd ed., pp. 51-52. B C D

As to the Admiralty practice, it is unnecessary to multiply authorities. I need only refer to the dictum of DR. LUSHINGTON in The Hebe (3) (5 Notes of Cases, 182), and in The Gazelle (4) (2 Wm. Rob. 281), The Kong Magnus (5) ([1891] P. 236), per SIR CHARLES BUTT, P.; and The Joannis Vatis (No. 2) (6) ([1922] P. 223), per SIR HENRY DUKE, P. There is also a very clear statement of the principle by SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE in The Northumbria (7). Distinguishing the authorities cited in support of the proposition that the right to award damages depended solely on the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, ss. 28 and 29, and that the Admiralty practice was erroneous as being at variance with the common law both before and since the passing of the statute, SIR ROBERT said (L.R. 3 A. & E. 10): E

"But it appears to me quite a sufficient answer to these authorities to say, that the Admiralty, in the exercise of an equitable jurisdiction, has proceeded upon another and a different principle from that on which the common law authorities appear to be founded. The principle adopted by the Admiralty Court has been that of the civil law, that interest was always due to the obligee when payment was not made, ex mora of the obligor; and that, whether the obligation arose ex contractu or ex delicto." F G

Dealing with the period from which the interest is to be reckoned, he points out (ibid. 11, 12) that the court should be guided by the principle of restitutio in integrum, and deals with the argument that the statutes limiting liability had adversely affected the established principles of the court, as follows (ibid. 12): H

"The question is, how are these principles affected by the statutes which limit the liability of the wrongdoer. In these statutes the legislature introduced a new principle, the object of which was to give some protection to the owner against the wrongdoing of his servant, the master of the vessel. They preserved the principle of restitutio in integrum in cases where, with his actual fault and privity, the damage had been inflicted on the sufferer; but with this exception, they limited his liability to a certain definite sum.

A In the latter case, therefore, this limited amount took the place of the restitutio in integrum; but the principle still remains, that the liability to this amount attaches from the time of the collision; and there seems no reason why interest should not accrue on the delay to pay that limited amount, as well as in the case where the amount is unlimited. Indeed, the equity of the thing is the other way, for to refuse this interest would be to diminish still further the natural right of the sufferer to full compensation for the injury which he has sustained. It is to be observed that the sufferer does not, where interest is awarded, obtain interest on the amount of his damage, but on the limited amount, or on his share of the limited amount, to which the statute has restricted the liability of the wrongdoer. B In the case of a vessel without cargo being sunk, it is clear that the interest would date from the time when the liability attached, that is, from the moment of the collision. Nor, when the case is examined, does it appear that a different rule ought to apply when the vessel carries cargo. Under the rule of restitutio in integrum the cargo-carrying vessel did not obtain interest from the date of the collision, because she received it in the shape of freight at the port of delivery; but where the amount of the liability is limited, and the sufferer does not receive full compensation, the reason C which fixes the date of the probable arrival at the port of delivery as the date from which interest shall run does not apply."

D Counsel for the defendants admitted that there was no authority binding me to hold in an Admiralty case that interest could not be recovered in respect of a period during which the payment either of the principal debt or of the interest was prohibited by law. He invited me, therefore, to decide this question on the basis that the award of interest as part of the damages for this collision was a matter for my discretion and not one of law. Counsel, however, rightly emphasised that it must be a judicial exercise of discretion, and urged on me the propriety of guiding and informing my discretion by considering the E decisions of common law judges in cases which were not widely dissimilar. In particular, he laid stress on two decisions under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, one of which arose out of the 1914-18 war, Biedermann v. Allhausen & Co. (8), decided by DARLING, J. and N. V. Ledeboter and Van der Held's Textiel-Handel v. Hibbert (9), decided by MORRIS, J.

F I note in passing, for whatever the distinction may be worth, that in the present case I am dealing with the enhancement of the damages arising ex delicto on the established Admiralty practice, whereas all the cases by which I am invited to guide the exercise of my discretion are cases of damages for non-payment of a debt arising ex contractu, and, moreover, that the bills of exchange cases depend on the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which, by the very terms of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1) (c), are expressly excluded from the operation of that Act. G Nevertheless, having special regard to the fact that the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, was intended to be a self-contained code declaratory of the common law, I might, in the absence of any other guidance, have felt myself impelled to follow the principle so clearly expressed by MORRIS, J., in N. V. Ledeboter, &c. v. Hibbert (9), and to confirm the learned registrar in acting on it. MORRIS, J., says ([1947] H K.B. 967):

"In the present case, although the defendant did not perform his contractual obligation to meet the bill at maturity, he could not lawfully have done so. Apart from the position at common law, there was express statutory provision which prohibited him from paying the plaintiffs. In these circumstances, in my opinion, he is not liable in damages for having failed to pay. He was obliged not to pay. There seems to me to be something incongruous in asking the court to award damages against a man for failing to do what the law forbade him to do. This, in my view, disposes of the claim which is made."

This is in accord with the decision of DARLING, J., in Biedermann v. Allhausen & Co. (9). He said that (37 T.L.R. 663):

"With regard to interest it seemed that there could be no interest by way of damages until the day had arrived when payment became legal."

The same principle was expressed in the Court of King's Bench in Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lord) (10). The action was by the payee against the maker of a promissory note, dated Dec. 27, 1787, at Paris, payable six months after date. The action was tried before ABBOTT, C.J., at the Guildhall sittings in January, 1822. ABBOTT, C.J., in reply to a question by the jury whether they were bound to give the plaintiff interest as well as principal, charged them that interest being the damage for the detention of the debt, the question was peculiarly for the jury's consideration, and the jury found a verdict for the principal sum only. On a motion for a rule to show cause why the amount of the verdict should not be increased by adding the interest due on the note from the day it became due until judgment, the Chief Justice is reported as saying (1 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 19):

"But there is another objection to the plaintiff's recovering interest on the debt, for during the greatest part of that time he was an alien enemy, and could not have recovered even the principal in this country, and at all events during that portion of the time the interest could not have run, and it would even have been illegal to pay the bill whilst the plaintiff was an alien enemy."

I am bound to confess that I do not really understand, if the fact that the plaintiff was an alien enemy during the greater part of the time was a vital objection to his recovering any interest for that period, why the Chief Justice left the question of interest at large to the jury. However that may be, the court decided that the question of interest was peculiarly within the province of the jury. In that sense the passage in the Chief Justice's judgment is obiter dictum, but it plainly shows that, had he been sitting as a judge alone, he would have decided the question at common law in the same way as it was decided under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, in the two cases to which I have already referred.

Reference was also made to Wolff v. Oxholm (11). This was an action for the recovery of a debt contracted in England by a Danish subject resident in Denmark with a house of trade established here and in a time of peace between the two countries. The case raised, and was decided on, considerations of international law arising out of a Danish ordinance passed during a period of hostilities between this country and Denmark quashing certain proceedings instituted in peace-time for the recovery of the debt and the interest thereon. It was held that this ordinance, not being conformable to the usage of nations, did not bar the right of the plaintiffs to recover the debt and interest in the English court. It is true to say that neither in the argument nor in the judgment was any special reference made to the question of interest as distinct from the principal debt. It was sought to distinguish this case, not only on this ground, but also on the ground that the default had occurred before the war, and, therefore, interest had already begun to run. I do not understand, however, even if that be so, on what principle, if the dictum of ABBOTT, C.J., in Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lord) (10), was right, that affects the right to recover in respect of the period during which the two countries were at war.

My attention was drawn to two American cases, Hoare v. Allen (12) and Brown v. Hiatts (13). Both were claims for interest on a mortgage accrued due in the first case during the War of Independence, and in the second during the Civil War. Delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court in Brown v. Hiatts (13), FIELD, J., said (15 Wallace 185):

“As the enforcement of contracts between enemies made before the war is suspended during the war, the running of interest thereon during such suspension ceases. Interest is the compensation allowed by law, or fixed by the parties, for the use or forbearance of money, or as damages for its detention, and it would be manifestly unjust to exact such compensation, or damages, when the payment of the principal debt was interdicted.”

It is clear, however, that the court drew no distinction between cases in which the claim for interest was based on the terms of the contract and those in which interest is allowed by law. Indeed, after a reference to Hoare v. Allen (12) and to Foxcraft v. Nagle (14), in which the former case had been followed in 1791, the learned judge continued (ibid.):

“The counsel for the complainant attempts to draw a distinction between those contracts in which interest is stipulated and those to which the law allows interest, and contends that the revival of the debt in the first case, after the termination of the war, carries the interest as part of the debt; while in the latter case interest is allowed only as damages for the detention of the money. We are, however, of opinion that the stipulation for interest does not change the principle, which suspends its running during war. In the first case cited, from Pennsylvania, interest was stipulated in the contract. ‘A prohibition,’ says WASHINGTON, J., in Conn v. Penn (15), ‘of all intercourse with an enemy during the war, and the legal consequence resulting therefrom, as it respects debtors on either side, furnish a sound, if not in all respects a just reason, for the abatement of interest until the return of peace. As a general rule it may be safely laid down that wherever the law prohibits the payment of the principal, interest during the existence of the prohibition is not demandable.’”

This would, indeed, have been a formidable weight of authority had it stood alone, but I do not think that it does. In Hugh Stevenson & Sons v. Akt. fur Cartonnagen Industrie (16) an English company and a German company had carried on a partnership business in England until the outbreak of war between Great Britain and the German Empire operated as a dissolution of the partnership. Thereafter the English company continued to carry on the business and to use the partnership’s plant for that purpose. It was held by the House of Lords that the German company were entitled to a share of the profits made after the dissolution by the carrying on of the business by the English company with the aid of the German company’s share of the capital. The trial judge, ATKIN, J., had taken the view that they were not entitled to any share of the profits of the partnership since the date of the outbreak of war, and that view was supported by LAWRENCE, J., in a dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal. Their Lordships, however, were unanimously of opinion that the case fell to be decided on the equitable principles governing the winding-up of a partnership, which, as LORD HALDANE said ([1918] A.C. 247):

“... depends on the principles which courts of equity apply to persons who are in possession of property under circumstances in which they are treated as standing in a fiduciary relationship. It is more than and different from the procedure which applies when the rights of parties arise merely out of the rules of the common law which apply to contracts.”

To decide otherwise than that the German partners were entitled to their fair share of the profits during the war would be to declare that the English partners were entitled to confiscate the property of the German partners for their own benefit, whereas in English law an enemy’s right to his property in this country is not extinguished, but his claim to receive it during the war is merely postponed.

As to the two American cases, LORD DUNEDIN (ibid. 248) expressly reserved his opinion whether those authorities would or would not be held as in accordance with the law of this country. LORD HALDANE made no comment on them. LORD FINLAY, however, said (ibid. 245):

"These decisions seem to me not to be in conformity with English law. The rule of international law on this point, in the view of the courts of this country, does not appear to have formed the subject of any express decision in England. The judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, however, in Wolff v. Oxholm (11), appears to me to imply that, in the view of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, interest on such a debt would not cease to run during the continuance of the war, but the point does not appear to have been argued. It is difficult to see on what principle the interest is to be forfeited if private property is to be respected."

LORD ATKINSON says (ibid. 255):

"Two American cases and one English (Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lord) (10)), were cited going to establish that where the relation between the parties is that of debtor and creditor interest does not accrue to an alien enemy while he is an alien enemy. It is not very easy to ascertain what precisely was the principle upon which those decisions were based. As far as one can gather, however, it appears to me to be this: that interest is in the nature of damages payable by the debtor by reason of his withholding his debt, his default in not paying his debt, and since during war he cannot lawfully pay his debt to an alien enemy without committing a crime, he is not in any default in omitting to pay it, and should not therefore be mulcted in damages for not doing what he cannot do lawfully. This doctrine has been extended to a case where the debt was due under a covenant by a mortgagor to pay interest on the mortgage money, presumably on the ground that, though the covenant was in form absolute and independent of the payment of the mortgage debt, it was impliedly conditional on default being made in payment of that debt. I do not think these decisions are consistent with the principle of the decision in Wolff v. Oxholm (11), in which, as I read the report, interest which accrued due during the war with Denmark was recovered, and besides I think they have not any application to the present case."

LORD PARMOOR says (ibid. 259):

"In the course of the argument two American cases were called to the attention of your Lordships—Hoare v. Allen (12) and Brown v. Hiatts (13). These cases have not, in my opinion, any direct bearing in this appeal, and I should require further research and investigation before accepting them as an authority that interest is not payable though there is a stipulation for its payment. In such a case it is difficult to see any difference in principle between the payment of interest and the payment of a capital sum. The case of Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lord) (10), illustrates this point. This was an action on a promissory note which did not contain a stipulation for payment of interest. In the absence of such a stipulation the judge directed the jury that interest was damage for the detention of the debt, and that the question whether it should be allowed was peculiarly for their consideration. The jury found a verdict only for the principal sum named in the note. The court held that the jury had been rightly directed and that the question of interest was entirely for them."

Referring to the passage in the judgment of ABBOTT, C.J., which I have quoted, LORD PARMOOR continues (ibid.):

"My Lords, in my opinion, this dictum would not apply either to a case in which there is a stipulation for interest, or where there is a fiduciary relationship between the parties on the dissolution of a partnership."

In his judgment in N. V. Ledeboter v. Hibbert (9), MORRIS, J. ([1947] K.B. 969), cites these passages from the speeches of LORD FINLAY, LORD ATKINSON and LORD PARMOOR in full, but says that he does not read them as involving a rejection of the view expressed by ABBOTT, C.J., in Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lord) (10). It may be putting it too high to speak of rejection, for, as I have already said, the appeal was decided on a broader principle, but, at least, it may be said that very slender support for the principle on which the decision of the learned registrar is based is afforded by such phrases as LORD FINLAY's: "It is difficult to see on what principle the interest is to be forfeited if private property is to be respected"; or LORD ATKINSON's: "It is not very easy to ascertain what precisely was the principle upon which those decisions were based," which is followed by an unfavourable comment on the supposed principle stated in terms indistinguishable from those employed in N. V. Ledeboter v. Hibbert (9), or LORD PARMOOR's: "In such a case it is difficult to see any difference in principle between the payment of interest and the payment of a capital sum."

I am not concerned to express any opinion whether Biedermann v. Allhausen (8), and N. V. Ledeboter v. Hibbert (9), were rightly decided on the express provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. I think, however, that I derive much surer guidance on the question how I should exercise my discretion from these dicta. However the case may stand regarding payment of interest by way of damages for a breach of contract, in my opinion, the true principle underlying the award of interest in Admiralty is that in every £'s worth of damage in respect of which interest is ultimately awarded, the interest has accrued potentially from the moment when the damage was suffered until the liability has been adjudged and the amount finally ascertained.

The learned registrar speaks of the interest being, not merely suspended, but cancelled, by the outbreak of war, but the suggestion that there is some distinction in this respect between the sum awarded as damages and the interest thereon seems to me to be in conflict with the law as stated by LORD FINLAY in his speech in Hugh Stevenson & Sons v. Akt. fur Cartonnagen Industrie (16), when he says ([1918] A.C. 244):

"It is not the law of this country that the property of enemy subjects is confiscated. Until the restoration of peace the enemy can, of course, make no claim to have it delivered up to him, but when peace is restored he is considered as entitled to his property with any fruits which it may have borne in the meantime."

After all, it is the injured plaintiffs who have been kept out of the damages justly due to them, and the wrongdoers, or their insurers, have had the use of the money meanwhile. In holding, as I do, that interest should run from the date of the casualty to June 23, 1949, I think that I am following a line of reasoning which LORD FINLAY, LORD ATKINSON and LORD PARMOOR would have applied to a case like the present.

No question has been raised regarding the fixing of the rate of interest at four per cent., which seems to me to be reasonable. Accordingly, I vary the registrar's report further by including interest at this rate from the date of the casualty, and I give judgment accordingly.

MIDDLETON v. BALDOCK

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Jenkins, L.J.J.),
March 1, 2, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Dwelling-house let to husband—Subsequent desertion by husband—Wife remaining in occupation—Separate actions against husband and wife—No statutory ground pleaded by landlord—Husband's consent to possession.

Rent Restriction—Practice—Separate actions for possession against husband and wife—Consolidating actions—Joinder of parties in one action.

A landlord claimed possession of a dwelling-house, to which the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1949, applied, from the tenant merely on the ground that the contractual tenancy had come to an end and not on any ground specified by the Acts. A second action for possession of the same premises was brought against the tenant's wife on the ground that she was a trespasser. The tenant, who had deserted his wife and left her in the house, which was the matrimonial home, with some of his furniture, admitted the landlord's claim for possession and offered to give possession forthwith. At the hearing of the first action the wife's application to be joined as a defendant was refused. An order for possession against the husband was made, and when the second action against the wife was heard an order was also made against her. The Court of Appeal allowed the wife's application to be joined as a party in the action against the tenant, and gave her leave to appeal.

HELD: (i) where a husband had deserted his wife and the wife remained in the matrimonial home she was lawfully there and the husband remained in occupation by her; possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied could only be ordered on one of the grounds specified in the Acts, and a tenant could not by agreement waive the statutory protection afforded by the Acts; and, therefore, the orders for possession were wrongly made.

Brown v. Draper ([1944] 1 All E.R. 246) and Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander ([1949] 2 All E.R. 822), applied.

(ii) where it was brought to the attention of a court that there were separate actions for possession against a husband and his wife, prima facie either those actions ought to be consolidated or the two parties should be made parties in one action, so that the whole matter could be tried at the same time.

APPEAL by the wife of the tenant from two orders made by His Honour JUDGE FIELD, K.C., at the Bedford County Court, and dated Nov. 23, 1949, giving the landlord possession of a dwelling-house,

The landlord commenced two separate actions in respect of the same dwelling-house, to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, one against the tenant and the other against his wife. The tenant, who had deserted his wife and left her in the house, signed a document admitting the landlord's right to immediate possession. An application by the wife to be joined as a defendant in her husband's action was refused. A possession order was made against the husband and in the second action against the wife. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and S. N. Bernstein for the wife.

H. W. Sabin for the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: There were two actions in the Bedford County Court in one of which the plaintiff (the landlord) was a Mrs. Middleton and the defendant (the tenant) was a Mr. Baldock who had been the contractual tenant of the premises, 39, Wellington Street, Bedford. In the second action his wife, Mrs. Baldock, was the defendant. In both proceedings the landlord claimed possession. In neither proceeding did she allege any grounds for possession such as are set out in the Rent Restrictions Acts. She simply alleged that she was the owner, that the contractual tenancy had come to an end, and that the wife was a trespasser. The action against the husband came on first and the solicitors for the wife, who were attending the court for the purpose of dealing with the second action, then discovered for the first time that there was this separate proceeding against the husband for possession. The solicitors, accordingly, applied to the judge for their client, Mrs. Baldock, to be joined as a defendant in the first action so that the question of the possession of these premises should be litigated and determined in the presence of all three, the landlord, the tenant, and his wife. The judge did not assent to that suggestion, nor did he direct a consolidation of the two proceedings, but he tried first the husband's action and then the wife's action. The husband had deserted his wife. For some time prior to the proceedings the husband and the wife had lived together at 39, Wellington Street, Bedford, and it was their matrimonial home. The wife obtained an order for the payment by the husband of maintenance to her, and after his desertion she continued to live in the house where an appreciable quantity of her husband's furniture remained. The husband, having deserted his wife, was not concerned to protect her right to remain on the premises. On the contrary, he was anxious to relieve himself of any further obligations to the landlord in reference to the premises and to do whatever he was asked to do so that his wife should be evicted from them. He, therefore, proceeded, in the first action, to sign a document which I assume was laid before him by the landlord or her advisers and is in the following terms:

"I admit the plaintiff's title and her right to immediate possession and offer to give possession forthwith. I admit the claim for £5 7s. 3d."

When the first case (what I call the "husband's case") came on, the landlord proved this document. The judge thereupon came to the conclusion that the husband should be treated as admitting the right of the landlord to possession, and he made an order for possession.

The wife's action then came on. The wife proved the matters of fact I have stated and claimed that she was rightly in possession as the wife of the tenant and that no order ought to be made against her. The judge came to the conclusion—and having regard to what had happened in the husband's action I am inclined to think rightly—that, an order having been made against the husband, there could be no question of any right to remain in possession on the part of the wife, and he, therefore, made an order also against the wife. In my judgment, the order against the husband was made without jurisdiction and was erroneous, but it had been made and the husband was in no mood to appeal against it. Unless the order could be got rid of, the wife's appeal in her own action was, for the reasons I have indicated, not likely to succeed. In those circumstances she was compelled to ask this court, in the exercise of the jurisdiction which we admittedly have, to add her as a party to her husband's action and give her leave to appeal. That we did. She, therefore, brings the appeal in that action and at the same time appeals in her own action, for, if she succeeds in the appeal in her husband's action, the foundation for the order made in her own action would go and she would be entitled to challenge that order also. The necessity for all that multiplicity of proceedings is, I think, most regrettable. A

It seems to me, as a matter of practice and common sense, plain that where it is brought to the attention of a court that there are claims for possession against a husband and a wife, prima facie those claims ought either to be consolidated or the two parties should be made parties in one action, so that the whole matter B can be tried at the same time. Had that been done in this case there would have been a great saving of unnecessary trouble and expense.

The question now is: Was the order made against the husband rightly made? I have indicated my view that it was not, and I will now proceed to state my reasons. In the first place, it is clearly established that a landlord seeking possession in the courts against a tenant must, if he is to obtain an order, establish C that there is under the Rent Restrictions Acts jurisdiction to make the order for one or other of the grounds stated in the Acts. Those grounds are numerous and they may depend on the proof of matters of fact—for example, that the tenant is in breach of some covenant. If the tenant, when sued for possession on some such ground as I have indicated, chooses to admit the truth of the allegation on which the landlord's claim is based, I think it is also established (and was D so stated by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Barton v. Fincham (1)) that the judge can accept the admission as sufficient to found his jurisdiction and is not bound himself to investigate the matters of fact alleged. He has jurisdiction to make an order. If it afterwards turns out that the admission by the tenant was procured by the landlord by some impropriety, other remedies would become available for the deceived tenant. That did happen in Thorne v. Smith (2) where E
BUCKNILL, L.J., observed that, if matters of fact on proof found the jurisdiction, the admission of the tenant of those matters of fact will give the court the requisite jurisdiction to make an order. If, again, the tenant goes out of possession and delivers up the premises to the landlord, equally there is nothing to prevent the landlord taking advantage of that fact and going into possession. By quitting the premises the tenant takes himself out of the protection of the F Acts, and, therefore, no proceedings are necessary against him. If some unauthorised person enters the premises after the tenant has effectively given up possession himself and remains there without any authority on the part of the tenant or of the landlord, it may be necessary for the landlord to bring an action for trespass against that third party. None of these illustrations, however, applies to the present case. As I have said, the actual individual in possession G was the tenant's wife and beyond any shadow of doubt, vis-a-vis the tenant, she was rightly there.

Counsel for the landlord has addressed to us an argument that since recent legislation it is no longer true to say that there is any agency in a wife, that is, any right which a wife enjoys on behalf of her husband when she is in possession of her husband's house, but I do not accept that argument. It seems to me that H
Mrs. Baldoek, as the wife of Mr. Baldoek, who had deserted her, beyond doubt was entitled to be in possession and to enjoy any right the tenant had under contract, statute, or otherwise, to live on the premises. If matters had been otherwise and the wife had wronged the husband, or if, though not the guilty party, an appropriate court, on the husband's application, had ordered the wife to go out, the wife's right to say she was lawfully there would, of course, have come to an end, but that has not happened in this case. On the facts of this

A case, it seems to me, the conclusion inevitably follows that, as the wife was rightly in possession on her husband's behalf, the statement made by the husband that he admitted the landlord's right to immediate possession and offered to give possession was futile and irrelevant. His offer to give possession was one he was unable to perform and he wholly failed to perform it. The only way he could perform that promise would be by getting a court with competent jurisdiction in matrimonial matters to order his wife out or, possibly, if he adopted the more mediaeval method suggested by counsel for the landlord, by taking his wife by the scruff of her neck and throwing her out. In the absence of one of those methods, he was unable to give possession and he has failed so to do.

It follows, therefore, that the second type of case to which I have referred is inapplicable here. This is not a case in which possession has been given.

B It is, therefore, necessary for the landlord to get an order and she can only get it if she can found herself by appropriate allegation and appropriate proof on one or other of the grounds in the Rent Acts. That she has not done. Counsel for the landlord has suggested that the mere assertion by the landlord that she claims possession, if admitted by the tenant, is sufficient to found jurisdiction under the Acts, but, in the absence of actual possession which removes the premises altogether from the Acts, I reject that argument. It, therefore, follows C that the document which was the foundation of the judge's order in the husband's action was wholly ineffective for any of the purposes for which it was used ; that the judge, with the knowledge which he had that the wife was, in fact, in possession as the wife of the tenant, could not properly make the order he did ; and that that order must be set aside. Once that order is out of the way it follows D that there is no basis on which there could be made the order which was made in the wife's case. It follows also that both orders must be set aside.

E I have dealt with this matter on what I consider to be the general principle to be derived from looking at the cases cited and, in particular, Barton v. Fincham (1). This kind of question, though the circumstances were not by any means identical, has twice been before this court recently and I will, in conclusion, say just a word about those two cases. The first is Brown v. Draper (3). F There a husband, who was the tenant, having had disputes with his wife, departed from the premises, leaving his wife and child in occupation. He stopped paying the rent, but he did not revoke any authority that he had given, or must be taken to have given, to his wife to remain on the premises. The landlord brought proceedings against the wife alone, not joining the husband or bringing any proceedings against him. The county court judge made an order for possession against the wife, but this court set it aside. I think counsel for the landlord is entitled to say that the ground on which this court primarily founded itself was the absence as a party to the proceedings of the tenant, that is, the husband. It was pointed out that in his absence no effective order could be made against the tenant's wife. Therefore, the precise point with which we are here G concerned did not arise, but I am inclined to think that the reasoning of this court goes further than counsel for the landlord is disposed to concede. I would, however, like to read one or two passages from the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1944] 1 All E.R. 247):

H " . . . the county court judge appears so to have held, that, in view of the statements made by Joseph Draper [the husband] in the witness-box, his right to claim the protection of the Acts has gone. We do not take this view. There are, we think, only two ways by which a tenant whose contractual tenancy has come to an end can lose the protection of the Acts. One is, as we have stated, by giving up possession. The other is by an order against the tenant for recovery of possession. We do not see on what ground it can be said that a tenant who remains in possession can, by a mere statement of his intentions and wishes in the witness-box, in an action to which he is not a party, confer on the court a jurisdiction of which the statute deprives it.

Unless and until Joseph Draper gives up possession the respondent can only obtain possession as against him by obtaining an order; and the power of the court to make such an order is limited by statute."

After saying that a tenant remaining in possession cannot lawfully contract out of the Act, LORD GREENE said (ibid., 247):

"No contract, and a fortiori, no mere statement of his wishes or intentions, can deprive him of the statutory protection."

Although it contains the important phrase "in an action to which he is not a party," I do not think that the passage I have read bears anything like so limited a meaning as counsel for the landlord suggests. I think that LORD GREENE, M.R., was saying, though in very much better language, what I have tried to say, namely, that a tenant does not put an end to his statutory right by merely asserting that he does not desire to remain on the premises and that he proposes, or is willing, to go out while his wife is still, in fact, there. LORD GREENE, M.R., continued (ibid., 248):

"Were the landlord now to take proceedings against Joseph Draper to recover possession, Joseph Draper could, in our opinion, say that he had changed his mind and that he now wished to avail himself of the protection of the Acts."

That, I think, again tends to support the view I have stated. If a husband merely states that he is willing to give up possession at some time, he can change his mind at any moment—at any rate, up to the making of an order. In this case the order was made, and I am willing to assume that any change of mind after the making of an order would be ineffective if the order was operative. I find it unnecessary to read the whole of LORD GREENE's judgment, but I must refer to what is said at the end because it is this passage which undoubtedly lends colour to the view put forward by counsel for the landlord that LORD GREENE, M.R., was not deciding, to put it at its lowest, what would have been the result had the facts been as they are in this case, namely, both parties being before the court and the husband then saying that he was willing to give up possession. LORD GREENE, M.R., said (ibid., 249):

"... it follows that the court has no jurisdiction to make an order against the wife unless the husband is a party and an order is made against him as well. If the views above expressed are correct, they cover the present case; and the proceedings are defective for want of parties. The action, therefore, ought to have been dismissed. It may well be that, in the circumstances of this case, the [wife] will not secure any lasting benefit from this decision; since, if the landlord brings a fresh action, making Joseph Draper a party, it may be that Joseph Draper will submit to an order. On the other hand, he may change his intention . . ."

That, I concede, seems to suggest that if in such a case as the present, assuming the husband and the wife to be before the court in the same proceedings, the husband submits to an order—or even if they are not the same proceedings, but the husband submits to an order—then an order might be made which would be effective and would entitle the landlord also to possession against the wife. That part of the judgment was, I think, obiter. The set of circumstances which we have now to consider was not in the minds of the court, and the passage I have quoted is not, therefore, in my judgment, authority which compels us to take the view for which counsel for the landlord contended. Before leaving that case I add that it seems to me that there is no distinction between the tenant stating in the witness box that he is willing to give up possession and his writing it on a piece of paper and allowing the landlord to prove it.

The second and later case, Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (4), came before this court last year. In that case the plaintiffs had examined with some care the decision of this court in Brown v. Draper (3) and had attempted to marshal their forces in accordance with the observations of LORD GREENE, M.R., in the earlier case. They were, however, defeated by a change of mind on the tenant's part. I do not say they would not otherwise have been defeated, but they were plainly defeated for the reason which I have given. In that case there was a tenant living with his wife and they quarrelled. The tenant left the matrimonial home and proceeded to purport to surrender it by a written agreement. His wife remained on with the furniture. The husband then, at the behest of the landlords, signed a further document purporting to revoke the wife's authority to remain on. The landlords had thus got two separate documents. In one the tenant said that he was willing to give up possession and did not resist the claim—indeed, he stated, without any foundation of fact, that he handed back the key. In the other, he said: "Please take this as formal notice of the revocation of any authority or leave which I may have at any time granted or given to you"—that was to his wife—"to occupy the said flat." Armed with both those documents the landlords thought that their position was a strong one, but by that time the husband and the wife had come together again and when the action came on they were both in possession together and the husband said: "I am very sorry, but I have now entirely changed my mind and I want to remain." This court said that he was entitled to remain. Again, because of the peculiar facts there, which are quite different from those in the present case, it cannot be said that that case is a direct authority governing the present, but, in my judgment, it goes a stage further along the road trodden earlier by Brown v. Draper (3) and lends very strong support to the view I have attempted to formulate. BUCKNILL, L.J., after referring to the passage from Brown v. Draper (3), which I have already read, said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 824):

"That passage is very appropriate to the present case because, in the first place, the tenant did nothing towards removing the furniture in the flat, and so long as it was there he retained possession to that extent. It was not open to the landlords to let the flat unfurnished while the furniture was there and the tenant could not remove his wife otherwise than by breaking the law and forcibly carrying her out. It is not necessary for this court to decide whether he could lawfully revoke his permission for her to live there, but in the absence of circumstances showing that she was in the wrong and had forced him to leave her I should have very great doubt whether any revocation of permission to an innocent wife to live in the matrimonial home in which the husband had lived with her and from which he had deserted her would have any valid legal effect."

SOMERVELL, L.J., said this (ibid., 825):

"The wife and the furniture remained in the house. It is unnecessary to decide what would be the position if a husband had cleared the house of furniture, and his wife had insisted on remaining in the unfurnished house, and he had then given to the landlords a revocation of the licence to his wife. That case can be dealt with when it arises and it might turn on the question whether the landlords accepted that position as a proper surrender. The fact that the furniture was left in the house, however, seems to me in itself sufficient to prevent this tenant being able to establish that possession was surrendered."

Finally, DENNING, L.J., observed (ibid., 825):

"The reason [why the husband cannot give possession] is because the wife has a very special position in the matrimonial home. She is not the sub-tenant or licensee of the husband. It is his duty to provide a roof over her head. He is not entitled to tell her to go without seeing that she has a proper place to go to. He is not entitled to turn her out without an order of the court: see Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (5). Even if she stays there against his will, she is lawfully there, and, so long as she is lawfully there, the house remains within the Rent Acts and the landlord can only obtain possession if the conditions laid down by the Acts are satisfied."

Counsel for the landlord said that these last observations go further than is warranted by the law. It may be that some argument to that effect could be effectively addressed to the court and will be hereafter, but it is unnecessary to say any more on that topic in the present case, for here not only was there still some of the husband's furniture on the premises, but there is no attempt to show that there has been any revocation, or even attempted revocation (except perhaps by inference), of the wife's right to remain in the matrimonial home. If that is so, it seems to me that the principle of Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (4) covers the present case, and I would like to say that, as at present advised, I wholly associate myself with what DENNING, L.J., said in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (4), though it may be that that is going further than is strictly necessary for the decision of this case. Counsel for the landlord says that it is not right that county court judges, when dealing with possession cases, should have to be involved in a trial of matrimonial disputes, and there is, of course, force in that, but in practice I doubt whether difficulties of the formidable nature suggested would, in fact, be experienced. If both husband and wife are before the court, in the great majority of cases I should not expect any real difficulty to arise. Whether difficulties may arise in some cases hereafter, they certainly do not, in my judgment, arise in this case, for here it is plain on the evidence that the husband deserted his wife and that his wife is rightly still in possession. There has been no effective revocation of any licence that she had, and the husband's furniture partly remains there also.

For all those reasons, I am clear that the order made in the husband's action was wrongly made and must be set aside, and it follows that the order made in the wife's action must also go. In the result, I think that the appeals in both actions should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: The protection of the Rent Acts is a personal privilege of the tenant which ceases when the tenant goes out of occupation. A sub-tenant to whom a part of the premises have been lawfully sub-let is protected by a special provision of the Act, but, apart from that provision, the privilege ceases when the tenant goes out of occupation. The tenant in this case, however, never went out of occupation. He left his wife there and he had no right to turn her out. Even if she stayed there against his will, he could not turn her out. Counsel for the landlord says, rightly, that husband and wife are no longer one in law. That is true, but there is still a special relationship between them which is recognised and regulated by the law, and one of the features of that relationship is that the husband cannot sue his wife for a tort. He cannot sue her, for instance, in ejectment or in trespass. He cannot as of right turn her out of the matrimonial home, even if he is the owner or the legal tenant of it. All he can do is to make an application to a court under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and ask the court in its discretion to order his wife out: see Bramwell v. Bramwell (6) and Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (5). In a case of the present kind, where the husband has deserted his wife and she has nowhere else to go, no court would order her out. She is, therefore, lawfully there, and, so long as she remains lawfully there, the husband remains in occupation by her. If he desires to cease to be in occupation—and to cease to be responsible for her occupation—he must go to the court and persuade the court, if he can, to order her out. Until that time arrives, she is lawfully there, and she can claim in his right, even against his will, to be there. The landlord can only get possession if the rent is unpaid or some other condition of the statute is satisfied entitling him to possession. I agree with all that my Lord has said, and that the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree. The wife's claim depends entirely on her being able to claim in right of her husband the protection accorded to him as a statutory tenant. The question, therefore, comes simply to this: Has the husband's interest as statutory tenant been determined or not? If, instead of the action against the husband in which he submitted to an order for possession, there had been nothing more than an agreement out of court either in the form of a notice to quit accepted by him or in the form of a purported surrender given by him, it would, I think, be plain, on the principles stated in Brown v. Draper (3) and in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (4), that the husband's interest as a statutory tenant had not been effectively determined in that he had never actually given up possession of the premises, but had remained in possession of them through his wife. This case, however, does differ from those two cases in that here there has been an order of the court against the husband for possession of the premises. Was that an order which the county court judge ought to have made or had jurisdiction to make under the Rent Acts? In my judgment, it is reasonably plain that the judge ought not to have made that order and had no jurisdiction to make it. This matter was also discussed in Barton v. Fincham (1), and Thorne v. Smith (2). I think the principles deducible from those cases are that under the Acts the court only has jurisdiction to order possession on one or other of the specified statutory grounds. The court, however, is not always obliged to hear a case out, because, if the tenant appears and admits that the plaintiff is entitled to possession on one of the statutory grounds, the court may act on that admission and make the appropriate order. Again—and this, I think, is an extension of what I have just said—if there is a representation made by the plaintiff landlord to the defendant tenant to the effect, for instance, that the landlord wants the premises for his own occupation—which is one of the ingredients of a ground on which possession may be ordered—and the tenant accepts that representation and on that footing submits to an order, the order can validly be made, subject to the possibility that in the event of the representation turning out to have been false the efficacy of the order may be destroyed. In my judgment, the court cannot go further than that and exercise a general jurisdiction to make a consent order without inquiry or investigation simply because the tenant appears in court and says: "I consent to an order," or goes into the witness box and says he does not contest the plaintiff's right. I think that necessarily follows from the principle that possession can only be ordered on one or other of the statutory grounds and that the tenant cannot waive the statutory protection by agreement.

There is only one authority to which I want to refer, because I think it bears on that point, and that is a passage from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Barton v. Fincham (1) where he said ([1921] 2 K.B. 298):

"We were asked to order a new trial, apparently that an attempt might be made to bring the case under s. 5 (1) (c) [of the Act of 1920, that being the sub-section under which an order for possession can be given where a tenant has given notice to quit] but the landlord had not put the case forward in his particulars or apparently in his argument, and there are no findings of fact relevant to the case. The point being fought was the effect of the agreement. It was urged that the effect of our decision [that the tenant could withdraw from the agreement] would be to prevent agreements in court. If the tenant is willing to go out, I do not see why any order is wanted; let him go; but as at present advised I do not see any reason why the judge on being satisfied that a tenant is then ready to go out (not that he was once willing but has changed his mind) should not make an order for possession."

I refer to that passage because it looks at first sight as though SCRUTTON, L.J., was saying that in any case in which the tenant appears and expresses his willingness to go out forthwith the county court judge can properly make an order by consent without any investigation whatever. In my judgment, SCRUTTON, L.J., did not mean that, but when he said "on being satisfied that a tenant is then ready to go out," it seems to me that he clearly must have meant "on being satisfied that the tenant is then ready to go out and is able to give possession." I think his observations must be limited at least to that extent. So limited, they do not conflict with the conclusion arrived at by my brothers in this case, with which I agree, for, if the judge had made any investigation as to the position, as he was invited to do by the wife's solicitors before the case against the husband came on, I think he would inevitably have come to the conclusion that the husband's admission of the landlord's right and his expression of willingness to go out of possession was wholly idle inasmuch as the house was occupied by his wife whom, so far as could be seen, he had no means of ejecting. For these reasons I agree that the order for possession made against the husband should be set aside and the wife's appeal should be allowed.

GRIFFIN v. LONDON TRANSPORT EXECUTIVE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), March 3, 1950.]

Factory—Premises used for substantial repair of vehicles—"Running repairs" and "minor adjustments"—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1).

By the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1), the expression "factory" includes, inter alia, "the following premises in which persons are employed in manual labour, that is to say:— . . . (vi) any premises in which the construction, reconstruction or repair of locomotives, vehicles or other plant for use for transport purposes is carried on as ancillary to a transport undertaking . . . not being any premises used for the purpose of housing locomotives or vehicles where only cleaning, washing, running repairs or minor adjustments are carried out."

A tramcar depot belonging to a transport undertaking included a repair shop in which were effected, besides small repairs and adjustments, substantial repairs necessitated by collisions. New parts, made elsewhere, were fitted into tramcars to replace damaged parts, and vehicles were sometimes retained undergoing repair for a considerable time.

HELD: repairs which were necessitated by a collision could not be called "running repairs," which meant repairs becoming necessary in the ordinary running of the vehicle, nor were the repairs at the depot restricted to minor adjustments, such as the tightening of nuts, the replacement of small parts and fuses, and, therefore, the depot was a factory within the meaning of s. 151 (1) (vi).

[FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 151 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 1113.]

ACTION for damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff and alleged by him to be due to a breach by the defendants of their duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (3).

The plaintiff suffered injuries through falling into a pit at a repair shop in a tramcar depot where he was employed by the defendants. He claimed that the defendants were liable for their failure to fence the pit in accordance with the requirements of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (3). The defendants contended that the repair shop was used for "running repairs" and "minor adjustments," and that, therefore, the premises were not a factory within the definition in s. 151 (1) (vi) of the Act.

Jukes for the plaintiff.

A Beresford, K.C., and F. G. Paterson for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an action brought by an employee of the defendants, the London Transport Executive, to recover damages because he broke his leg by falling through an opening in the floor at a depot at New Cross. It is an ordinary depot or garage for tramcars, which are taken in when out of service. Certain repairs are also done to tramcars there, and there is a repair shop separated from the part in which the plaintiff works by a brick wall with a door in it. This repair shop is under the supervision and management of a larger depot at Charlton, and if parts are damaged and have to be replaced, the Charlton depot makes the replacements and sends them down to New Cross, where they are fitted in the repair shop. Quite substantial repairs may be done to tramcars in the depot itself, for instance, after collisions.

C I have to decide, first, whether this depot was a factory within the definition in the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151. There is no direct evidence with regard to the repair shop, but I think the depot will have to be considered to be a factory within the meaning of the Act. Section 151 provides:

D " (1) . . . the expression 'factory' . . . also includes the following premises in which persons are employed in manual labour, that is to say:— . . . (vi) any premises in which the construction, reconstruction or repair of locomotives, vehicles or other plant for use for transport purposes is carried on as ancillary to a transport undertaking or other industrial or commercial undertaking, not being any premises used for the purpose of housing locomotives or vehicles where only cleaning, washing, running repairs or minor adjustments are carried out . . . "

E In this depot, repairs are from time to time carried out when tramcars are brought in as a result of collision, and it seems impossible for me to say that only running repairs or minor adjustments are carried out there. Repairs which are the result of collision cannot, by any fair construction, be called running repairs. A private chauffeur commonly advertises that he is capable of doing running repairs, but that does not mean that he holds himself out as being capable of effecting repairs which are the result of a collision. A fair definition of running repairs would be repairs of defects which arise in a vehicle in the course of its ordinary running. Minor adjustments are the adjustments which have to be carried out from time to time, when nuts work loose, electrical equipment requires small corrections, small parts, or fuses and so forth. I think those are the sort of running repairs and minor adjustments envisaged in the Factories Act. But I cannot say that, in a place where vehicles may be kept a considerable time for repair after collisions, only running repairs and minor adjustments are carried out. Therefore, I find that this depot does come within the definition in s. 151 of the Factories Act.

H [His LORDSHIP then found that the repair pits were "openings in the floor" which had not been properly fenced by the defendants in breach of the requirements of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (3), and attributed the plaintiff's accident as to two-fifths to such breach of statutory duty, and as to three-fifths to his own negligence. He assessed the damages including special damage at £455, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £182 with costs.] Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Administration—Grant to sole administrator—Possible life interest—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 160 (1), s. 162 (1) (as amended by the Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (c. 26), s. 9.)

In 1898 the deceased married one F.D. and the following year a child was born. In 1905, by agreement, the deceased separated from his wife, who, with the child, went to live in Canada, and from 1906 onwards, in spite of numerous inquiries, nothing further was heard of her or of the child. In 1947 the deceased died intestate leaving him surviving three brothers, including the applicant, and two sisters. The value of the deceased's estate amounted to some £1,200. The sisters and two of the brothers having renounced their right to a grant of letters of administration of the estate, the applicant applied for a grant to him alone. The question for determination was whether the court had power under the provisos to s. 162 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928, to make such a grant.

HELD: the proviso to s. 162 (1), as amended, related to the class of persons who were suitable for appointment, and not the number, and, therefore, two administrators should be appointed in accordance with s. 160 (1).

FOR THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (CONSOLIDATION) ACT, 1925, s. 160 (1) and s. 162 (1), as amended by the ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE ACT, 1928, s. 9, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 776, 777.]

MOTION for grant of administration.

For the applicant it was argued that (i) there was prima facie evidence on which the court could find, within s. 160 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, that no life interest was subsisting, since all efforts to trace the deceased's wife had failed, and (ii) by the proviso to s. 162 (1) of the Act of 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928, the court had a discretionary power to grant administration to one person only. It was, however, stated on behalf of the applicant that, should it be decided that two administrators were necessary, the applicant's wife was willing to act.

William G. H. Cook for the applicant.

WILLMER, J.: I have no doubt that this is a proper case for a grant. The question is whether, in the circumstances of this case, a grant can be made to a single administrator in respect of an estate which exceeds £1,000*, having regard to the provisions of s. 160 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Section 160 (1) provides that:

"... administration shall, if ... a life interest arises under the will or intestacy, be granted ... to not less than two individuals."

* As to the appointment of a single administrator where the net estate does not exceed £1,000, see the direction of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, p. 3670).

A The grounds on which it has been argued that a grant might properly be made to a single administrator are: (i) That the evidence is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the deceased's wife is dead. I find that there was not sufficient evidence to enable me to reach such a conclusion, and, therefore, there may be a life interest subsisting. (ii) That, even if the wife is alive, the court had jurisdiction to make such a grant by virtue of the proviso to s. 162 (1) of the Act of 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928. Section 162 (1), as amended, provides:

B "In granting administration the High Court shall have regard to the rights of all persons interested in the estate of the deceased person or the proceeds of sale thereof . . . Provided that—(a) where the deceased died wholly intestate as to his estate, administration shall be granted to some one or more persons interested in the residuary estate of the deceased, if they make an application for the purpose . . . and (b) if, by reason of the insolvency of the estate of the deceased or of any other special circumstances, it appears to the court to be necessary or expedient to appoint as administrator some person other than the person who, but for this provision, would by law have been entitled to the grant of administration, the court may in its discretion, notwithstanding anything in this Act, appoint as administrator such person as it thinks expedient, and any administration granted under this provision may be limited in any way the court thinks fit."

D In Re White (1), which was decided in 1927, the Court of Appeal held that the court had no power to make a grant to a single administrator. It is argued that the effect of the amendment to s. 162 (1) is that that decision is no longer binding, and that the position as stated in Re Herbert (2) is restored. I have been referred to a note in HALSBURY'S STATUTES, 2nd ed., vol. 9, p. 778, in which this opinion is expressed†. In my view, however, the position has not been altered as a result of the amendment. I am not satisfied as a matter of construction that the proviso which was substituted by the Act of 1928 was intended to enable the court to dispense with a second administrator in a case such as the present. The new proviso deals with the class of persons who are suitable for appointment as administrators and not with the number of such persons. Had the legislature intended to dispense with the requirements of s. 160 (1) it would have been easy to make that intention clear in the amending statute. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that two administrators must be appointed, and, as the applicant's wife is willing to act and is a suitable person to do so, an order will be made appointing her on condition that she files her consent.

Order accordingly.

CUNLIFFE v. GOODMAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), February 22, 23, March 7, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Covenant to repair—Breach—Landlord's intention to pull down premises—Onus on tenant to prove definite decision or intention—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

On the termination of a tenancy the landlord was considering demolishing the premises and erecting on the site blocks of flats or maisonettes, but she had not then definitely decided whether to do so or not as the carrying out of such a scheme was conditional on her obtaining the permission of the local authority and building licences, and, even if the necessary permission and licences were obtained, the scheme might not prove financially attractive by reason of restrictive conditions on letting and selling imposed as a condition of the grant of building licences, or by reason of the cost of the scheme which had not then been fully worked out. In an action by the landlord against the tenant for breach of a covenant to leave the premises in repair, the tenant contended that he was under no liability, by reason of the provisions of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, that no damages shall be recovered for a breach of covenant to repair at the termination of a lease if it is shown that the premises would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement.

HELD: to prove that the premises "would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down" within the meaning of s. 18 (1) a tenant must show that, at the date of the termination of the lease or tenancy agreement, the landlord had definitely decided or had a definite intention (whether or not that decision or intention was revocable, or was, in fact, subsequently altered) to pull down the premises. To show a conditional decision or intention to pull down was not sufficient. On the facts of the present case the intention of the landlord to pull down was conditional only, and, accordingly, the tenant could not avail himself of s. 18 (1).

APPEAL by the landlord from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., given on Nov. 16, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 946, whereby he had dismissed the landlord's claim for damages for breach of covenant to leave the premises in repair and to reinstate them as a dwelling-house on the ground that the landlord was not entitled to damages, since it appeared that the premises would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, within the meaning of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 7. The following judgments were read.

COHEN, L.J.: In this action the landlord seeks to recover damages for alleged breaches of repairing covenants contained in a tenancy agreement dated June 10, 1943, by which the landlord let to the tenant, a manufacturing chemist, premises known as No. 1 Abdale Road, Shepherd's Bush, London, for the duration of the war at a yearly rent of £150, subject to the proviso that either party might terminate the agreement on giving three months' notice in writing after the cessation of hostilities. The material tenant's covenants were in the following terms:

"4. To keep the said premises in good and sufficient repair during the said term And in particular will reinstate the premises at the end of the term hereby granted as a private dwelling-house and replace all the fixtures removed during the tenancy except the bath and wash basin which were handed over to the landlord at the commencement of the tenancy. . . .10. During the tenancy to keep and on the expiration or sooner determination of the tenancy quietly to deliver up to the landlord the premises in a good and tenantable state of repair and condition together with all fixtures (except any tenant's fixtures)."

The tenancy was duly determined on Nov. 30, 1945, and on May 8, 1946, this action was begun. At the trial before LORD GODDARD, C.J., breaches of covenant were admitted and it was agreed that, if damages were payable in the events which happened, they were properly assessed at the sum of £565. The tenant, however, contended that he was relieved from liability under the provisions of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The first part of the sub-section provides for damages for diminution of the value of the reversion and then goes on:

" . . . in particular no damage shall be recovered for a breach of any such covenant or agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement."

LORD GODDARD, C.J., upheld the tenant's contention, being of opinion that the present case was indistinguishable from the decision of this court in Salisbury v. Gilmore (1). That case, he considered, decided that if, at the time when a tenant leaves the premises and the lease comes to an end, the intention of the landlord is to pull down the premises, the landlord cannot, by changing his mind afterwards, recover damages for the breach. He found that intention proved to exist in the present case at the material date, Nov. 30, 1945, and, accordingly, he dismissed the action. From that decision the landlord appeals.

The evidence on which LORD GODDARD, C.J., found the intention to pull down proved was documentary. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the correspondence and continued:] The views of LORD GODDARD, C.J., on this correspondence are summed up in the following paragraph from the transcript of his judgment:

"The letters clearly show that not only had the landlord before notice to quit intended to build, but after the termination of the tenancy she still retained that intention and actively pursued her negotiations for that purpose, and through her architect and solicitor was taking all necessary steps in that intention."

Taking this view of the correspondence, it followed that, in applying the decision of Salisbury v. Gilmore (1), LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that the tenant had brought himself within s. 18 (1) of the Act and was entitled to judgment. Counsel for the landlord contends (i) that LORD GODDARD, C.J., has misconstrued the decision in Salisbury v. Gilmore (1); and (ii) that he was wrong in finding on the correspondence a definite intention on the part of the landlord persisting at Nov. 30, 1945, to rebuild the premises. To deal with the first argument I must refer to the report of Salisbury v. Gilmore (1). The facts are sufficiently set out in the first paragraph of the headnote ([1942] 2 K.B. 38):

"In 1926 the first plaintiff demised to the first defendant, G., premises for a term of fourteen years from Sept. 29, 1925, by a lease which contained a tenant's covenant to leave the premises in repair at the expiration of the term. The second defendant, M., was the assignee of the term. In 1937 M. asked for a renewal of the lease but was informed that the plaintiffs (who had become the landlords in 1936) intended to pull down the premises at the expiration of the lease. On Sept. 29, 1939, M. vacated the premises and left them out of repair, being still under the impression that the premises were being pulled down. It was not till he received a letter dated Dec. 5, 1939, from the plaintiffs' agents claiming damages for breach of covenant that he became aware that the scheme for forthwith pulling down and rebuilding the premises had been abandoned."

It is to be observed that in that case the plaintiffs had given to the defendants definite notice of their intention to pull down the premises and had not withdrawn that notice at the material date. Moreover, although, no doubt, local authorities had certain powers under the London Building Acts and the Town Planning Acts, the war time restrictions were not in force by the material date. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment, stated that the point of time in relation to which the fate of the building was to be considered was the termination of the lease. He also recognised that the onus of proving the intended fate of the building was on the tenant and that he had to discharge that onus at a date necessarily subsequent to the termination of the lease. He summed up his conclusions as to how the tenant was to discharge the onus which rested on him in these words ([1942] 1 All E.R. 461):

"I am of opinion that, if the tenant can show at the trial that at the moment when the covenant fell to be performed the building was one which was going to be pulled down at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy, he is entitled to the relief which the sub-section gives. The question then arises, what is the test by which the fate of the building as at the relevant date—namely, the date at which the covenant ought to be performed—is to be ascertained? I have already pointed out that a building may be destined for demolition either because the landlord has so determined or because some extraneous authority has decided to exercise its powers in that behalf. I have also pointed out that the crucial date is the date of the termination of the lease. Once that date has passed, the tenant is no longer in a position to fulfil his covenant, and, if it is shown that before that date arrives the landlord has decided to pull down the building and that this intention is still existing at that date, the requirements of the sub-section are, in my opinion, satisfied."

He then held on the facts of the case that the tenant had discharged the onus which rested on him, and, therefore, he found it unnecessary to consider either (a) whether the plaintiffs by their conduct had debarred themselves from asserting that before the material date they had abandoned their intention to pull down, or (b) whether any damage to the reversion had been proved. MACKINNON, L.J., decided both these points in favour of the defendants and did not express any opinion as to the test to be applied in deciding whether the tenant had discharged the onus which rested on him. GODDARD, L.J., as I read his judgment, agreed with LORD GREENE, M.R., in thinking that intention was the test, an opinion he repeated in the present case.

In the result, I respectfully agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., that the ratio decidendi of the decision in Salisbury v. Gilmore (1) is to be found in the passages from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., which I have read. Counsel for the landlord, however, says that in that passage, LORD GREENE, M.R., was distinguishing between "intention" and "decision" and was laying down that it is not enough to prove an intention, but that the tenant must show a decision. I do not so read his judgment. I do not think that LORD GREENE, M.R., was distinguishing between "intention" and "decision." On referring to the SHORTER OXFORD DICTIONARY, I find under "decision" "(2) The making up of one's mind," and under "intention" "(5) That which is intended: purpose." I think that what LORD GREENE, M.R., was laying down was that what the tenant has to prove is the making up of the landlord's mind to carry out the purpose of pulling down the premises. Such a decision or intention would be revocable, but "revocable" must be distinguished from "conditional."

Counsel for the landlord next argued that the fact that the war-time building restrictions are now in force was sufficient to distinguish this case from Salisbury v. Gilmore (1). He pointed out that both LORD GREENE, M.R., and GODDARD, L.J., emphasised the fact that such restrictions were not in force at the date material in that case (Sept. 29, 1939), GODDARD, L.J., saying at ([1942] 1 All E.R. 464):

"He [the plaintiff] never applied his mind to the question before Oct. 5, and until that date his intention was unchanged, nor was there any enactment or regulation then in force which could have prevented the carrying out of the scheme."

I do not, however, read the judgment as holding that, had the regulations been in force, the decision would necessarily have been different. I think they were merely reserving the question. In the present case our attention has not been directed to any regulation absolutely prohibiting buildings of the character proposed on behalf of the landlord. The regulations only make building without licence illegal and enable the authority to impose conditions if they grant a licence. The existence of such regulations is, no doubt, a factor to be borne in mind in deciding what was the intention of the landlord at the material date, but it is not conclusive on the point.

The third point of counsel for the landlord—and it is the point which has caused me most difficulty—was that the evidence in this case, which was purely documentary, did not justify the conclusion of LORD GODDARD, C.J., that on Nov. 30, 1945, the landlord had a definite intention to pull down the premises. Counsel submitted that the proper inference was that the landlord's intention to re-build was conditional on licences being obtained and satisfactory arrangements being made for the provision of finance, and that on Nov. 30, 1945, she had not reached a final decision on the point. He contended that in any event the onus was on the tenant to prove a definite intention and that onus had not been discharged. Counsel for the tenant argued that the conclusion of LORD GODDARD, C.J., was justified by the correspondence. During the course of the discussion my mind has fluctuated between these two arguments, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the landlord is entitled to succeed. It is clear that the intention which must be proved against the landlord is a definite intention. This intention may be revocable, but it must not be provisional. Reading the correspondence as a whole, I have come to the conclusion that the landlord never reached more than a provisional decision. She would obviously not re-build unless the proposed scheme would provide an adequate return on the capital she would have to sink in it. It was plain that she could not reach a judgment on this point until she knew (a) what conditions the authorities would impose as to rent, etc., (b) what the proposed buildings would cost, and (c) what interest she would have to pay in order to finance the scheme. The financial aspect was plainly present to her mind throughout, and, reading the correspondence as a whole, I find it impossible to conclude that the tenant has discharged the onus which rests on him of proving that before Nov. 30, the landlord had decided to pull down the building and that that intention was still existing at that date. For these reasons I would allow the appeal. Before parting with the case, I should add that before LORD GODDARD, C.J., the landlord raised the subsidiary point that, in any event, s. 18 (1) had no relation to the covenant to reinstate the premises as a private dwelling-house. LORD GODDARD, C.J., came to the conclusion that he ought to construe this reinstatement as part of the word "repair." Before us counsel for the landlord decided not to press this argument.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree and will only add a few sentences out of respect for LORD GODDARD, C.J., from whose judgment we feel constrained to differ. The question to be answered is whether the tenant (on whom the onus lies) has proved that on Nov. 30, 1945, the landlord "intended" to pull down the premises on this site. This question is, in my view, one of fact. If the landlord did no more than entertain the idea of this demolition, if she got no further than to contemplate it as a (perhaps attractive) possibility, then one would have to say (and it matters not which way it is put) either that there was no evidence of a positive "intention" or that the word "intention" was incapable, as a matter of construction, of applying to anything so tentative and so indefinite. An "intention," to my mind, connotes a state of affairs which the party "intending"—I will call him X.—does more than merely contemplate. It connotes a state of affairs which, on the contrary, he decides, so far as in him lies, to bring about, and which, in point of possibility, he has a reasonable prospect of being able to bring about by his own act of volition. X. cannot, with any due regard to the English language, be said to "intend" a result which is wholly beyond the control of his will. He cannot "intend" that it shall be a fine day to-morrow. At most he can hope or desire or pray that it will. Nor, short of this, can X. be said to "intend" a particular result if its occurrence, though it may be not wholly uninfluenced by X's will, is dependent on so many other influences, accidents, and cross currents of circumstance that not merely is it likely not to be achieved at all, but, if it is achieved, X's volition will have been no more than a minor agency collaborating with, or not thwarted by, the factors which predominately determine its occurrence.

If there is a sufficiently formidable succession of fences to be surmounted before the result X. aims at can be achieved, it may well be unmeaning to say that X. "intended" that result. Here there were a number of such fences. The approval of the London County Council as the town planning authority for London had to be obtained, and it was refused in respect of the first re-building plan. A building licence had to be obtained from the Hammersmith Borough Council. The first plan never reached the stage at which such a licence could usefully be applied for. As to either plan a licence, if forthcoming, might have been granted on terms, and these terms might have deprived the project of all commercial attraction—deprived it of the character of a "business proposition." Such licences are often granted conditionally on a maximum selling price for the structure as re-built, or, if it be not sold but let, conditionally on a maximum rent, and in respect of the second scheme a maximum rent of an unattractive level was, in fact, proposed by the local authority. This leads me to the second point bearing on the existence in this case of "intention" as opposed to mere contemplation. Not merely is the term "intention" unsatisfied if the person professing it has too many hurdles to overcome or too little control of events; it is equally inappropriate if at the material date that person is in effect not deciding to proceed but feeling his way and reserving his decision until he shall be in possession of financial data sufficient to enable him to determine whether the project will be commercially worth while. A purpose so qualified and suspended does not, in my view, amount to an "intention" or "decision" within the principle. It is mere contemplation until the materials necessary to a decision on the commercial merits are available

A and have resulted in such a decision. In the present case it seems to me that, assuming the landlord was both before and after Nov. 30, 1945, disposed to demolish and re-build if she could do so on remunerative terms, she never got, in respect of the first scheme, to a stage at which she could decide on its commercial merits, nor, in respect of the second, to the stage of actually deciding that the scheme was commercially eligible unless, indeed, she must be taken, not merely to have repudiated her architect's authority, but to have decided that it was commercially ineligible. In the case of neither scheme did she form a settled intention to proceed. Neither project moved out of the zone of contemplation out of the sphere of the tentative, the provisional and the exploratory—into the valley of decision. For these reasons and those given by my Lord I think the appeal should be allowed.

B SINGLETON, L.J.: The judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., was based primarily on the decision of this court in Salisbury v. Gilmore (1). There is a considerable difference on the facts between that case and the present case. In Salisbury v. Gilmore (1) the facts were beyond dispute. The landlords had determined to pull down the premises at the termination of the tenancy and they had intimated to the tenant their intention. They had put forward a scheme which had been approved by the London County Council and the city corporation, and the necessary permission had been obtained before the termination of the tenancy. It is true to say that the headnote in that case (in the Law Reports ([1942] 2 K.B. 38)) and certain parts of the judgments lead one to the view that an intention on the part of the landlords to pull down the premises at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy is sufficient to absolve the tenant from his contractual obligation, but examination of the judgment of D LORD GREENE, M.R., seems to me to show that the headnote is a little too wide. I draw attention to two passages in his judgment. He said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 461):

E “... If the tenant can show at the trial that at the moment when the covenant fell to be performed the building was one which was going to be pulled down at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy he is entitled to the relief which the sub-section gives,”

and later he said (ibid.):

“... if it is shown that before that date arrives the landlord has decided to pull down the building and that this intention is still existing at that date, the requirements of the sub-section are, in my opinion, satisfied.”

F In other words, if the landlord has arrived at a decision to pull down and if that decision stands at the date at which the tenancy ends, it matters not that the landlord subsequently changes his mind. It follows from this that there must be a decision on the part of the landlord. In one sense an intention to pull down may be the same thing, but it is not so unless it is a clearly formed intention, or a firm intention, in the sense that the landlord has made up his mind. Contemplation by the landlord is clearly not enough. If the landlord is considering what he should do and has a scheme put forward which is accepted by the authorities from whom permits have to be obtained, that is evidence that he has formed an intention to pull down and probably evidence that he has come to a decision. In the present case the scheme put forward was turned down by the London County Council who refused to sanction it on Oct. 8, 1945, that is, before the termination of the tenancy on Nov. 30, 1945. Another scheme was put forward by the architect on Dec. 28, 1945 (after the termination of the tenancy) and was approved by the London County Council on Mar. 22, 1946. The approval of the London County Council is subject to conditions which might or might not be agreeable to the landlord, and the approval of the Hammersmith Borough Council and the obtaining of a building licence were necessary before anything could be done. In the meantime there had been correspondence between the landlord's agent and the tenant's agent on the question of dilapidations and a firm of builders acting for the landlord had been in communication with the Hammersmith Borough Council seeking a licence to do the necessary repairs.

In these circumstances I do not see that the tenant showed at the trial that at the moment when the covenant fell to be performed the building was one which was going to be pulled down at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy. In other words, he did not show a decision on the part of the landlord, nor a firm intention. On the facts the landlord was contemplating pulling down and re-building and probably she would have done so if she could have obtained approval of a scheme which was attractive commercially. On the other hand, the Hammersmith Borough Council might have inserted as a term of their approval to a scheme conditions as to selling price or as to rents which would have made it not worth the landlord's while to pursue the matter further. The landlord was not called as a witness, but, still, the onus was on the tenant, and, in my view, he did not discharge it. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Will—"To pay the income of the residuary trust fund up to the sum of £1,000 per annum to L. for her life"—Whether deficiency of income may be supplied out of surplus of subsequent years.

By his will a testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees on the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and, in the events which happened, to hold his residuary trust fund (as therein defined) on trust "to pay the income of the residuary trust fund up to the sum of £1,000 per annum to [his daughter] for her life so long as she shall remain single . . . and as to the remainder of the income of the residuary trust fund upon trust to pay the same during the life of my said daughter" to the testator's brother and sisters or their children. The testator further provided that, if the income should amount to more than £1,500, "such excess in income" was to be divided equally between his daughter, brother and sisters.

HELD: on the true construction of the will, the daughter was not entitled to make up to £1,000, out of the income surplus to £1,000 in any subsequent year, the income of any year which did not amount to £1,000, but she was only entitled to the income produced in any one year up to a maximum of £1,000.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Robert Frederick Carey, deceased, and in the events which had happened, the testator's daughter, Lilian Jepson Carey, was, from the date of the death of the testator's widow, Agnes Carey, during her life entitled to the whole income of the testator's residuary estate up to an aggregate limit of £1,000 per annum, or was only entitled in each year to the income of the said residuary estate for that year up to a limit of £1,000.

By his will dated Feb. 15, 1911, the testator gave, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of to his trustees on the usual trusts for sale, conversion and investment, to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and legacies, and to stand possessed of the residue (called his residuary trust fund) on trust to pay the income thereof to his wife, Agnes Carey, (in the events which happened) during her life. He directed that on the death of his wife the residuary trust fund be held on trust "to pay the income of the residuary trust fund up to the sum of £1,000 per annum to the said Lilian Jepson Carey for her life so long as she shall remain single . . . and as to the remainder of the income of the residuary trust fund upon trust to pay the same during the life of my said daughter" to the testator's brother and sisters or the child or children of any of them who should have predeceased him or who should have died in the lifetime of Agnes Carey or Lilian Jepson Carey, "provided that if my estate should realise an income of over £1,500 then I direct my trustees to stand possessed of such excess in income in trust for my daughter and my said brother and sisters in equal shares." In the event of his daughter's dying without leaving a child or children, the testator directed that his trustees should stand possessed of his residuary trust fund "both capital and income" on trust for his brother and sisters or the child or children of any of them then dead. The testator died on Dec. 29, 1912, and his will was proved on Feb. 4, 1913, by the executors named therein. In 1934, the testator's widow, Agnes Carey, died. At the date of the summons the testator's brother and all his sisters were dead, and Lilian Jepson Carey was a spinster of advanced age.

Wilfrid Hunt for the persons interested in the residuary trust fund subject to the interest of the daughter.

DANCKWERTS, J. (having stated the facts): After the death of the testator's widow, the gross income of the residuary estate was less than £1,000 in the years 1935, 1936, 1937, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1943, but exceeded £1,000 in the years 1938, 1942, and in all the years since 1943. It was not contended on behalf of the daughter that she could, in any year in which the income was less than £1,000, have recourse to the surplus income of earlier years, but it was argued that she had the right to resort to the income surplus to £1,000 in subsequent years to make up a deficiency in any year. Such a construction involves construing the provision as creating a continuing charge on the income of the residuary estate during the life of the daughter. In my judgment, the provision for the daughter cannot be so construed. The will points to annual accounts, and each year must be treated separately, so that, if there is an excess of income over £1,000 in any year, that excess must be distributed to the persons entitled, while, if the income in any year is less than £1,000, the daughter takes what is available.

The principle applied in the case of annuities gives me some assistance. In Re Collier's Deed Trusts (1) pursuant to a deed of family arrangement the residuary estate of the testator was to be held on trust to pay three life annuities in the form of weekly sums, of which one was payable to the widow during her widowhood. The deed also contained a trust during the widowhood of the widow to pay or apply the whole or any part of the balance of the income on certain trusts. ROMER, L.J., said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 295):

"... it is plain that the weekly sums are not charged upon corpus. FARWELL, J., so held, and the appellant does not challenge that decision. But the judge also held that the weekly sums were not a continuing charge upon income. In so holding, he based his decision upon the direction in the deed as to the surplus income arising during the widowhood of the appellant, following the reasoning of SIR W. PAGE WOOD, V.-C., in Stelfox v. Sugden (2). In my opinion, he was right in so doing. I think that the direction in question shows unmistakably that the parties to the deed intended that the weekly sums in any year should be paid out of the income of that year, and out of that alone. Suppose, for instance, that, during the first few years of the appellant's widowhood, there was a surplus of income, after paying the three weekly sums, and that the trustees, in the exercise of their discretion, had applied the whole of such surplus for the widow's benefit. Suppose, further, that, during the remainder of her widowhood, the income is insufficient to pay the weekly sums. It can hardly have been within the contemplation of the parties that the widow, or her legal personal representatives, should, in such circumstances, be paid the arrears of her weekly sum out of the income accruing after her re-marriage or death. In my opinion, the express trust contained in the deed for distribution of the surplus income is a reasonably plain indication that the weekly sums were not intended to be a continuing charge upon the income of the trust fund."

In the present case it was not contended that the charge extended beyond the death of the daughter. On the true construction of this will, the distribution of surplus income is to be made each year, and any intention that the benefit to the daughter should be cumulative is thereby negatived. The daughter is only entitled in each year to the income of the residuary estate up to a limit of £1,000.

BOISSEVAIN v. WEIL.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott and Lord Radcliffe), January 16, 17, March 21, 1950.]

Currency Control—Loan in foreign currency—Promise to repay in sterling—Parties resident in foreign country in military occupation of enemy—Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 950), reg. 2 (1).

While, owing to war conditions in 1944, the parties were involuntarily resident in Monaco, which was in the military occupation of the enemy, the appellant, a Dutch subject, lent to the respondent, a British subject, a sum of money in French currency. The respondent drew cheques in blank for the full amount on an English bank, wrote a letter addressed to the bank informing it of the circumstances, and instructing it, on presentation or as soon as the law permitted, to honour the cheque in sterling. She also signed a document acknowledging the debt, certifying that she had posted the letter to the bank, and undertaking, in case the appellant failed to obtain payment on presentation of the cheque, to repay the sum borrowed in cash not later than one month after the declaration of an armistice, with additional provisions in the event of her death before payment was made. In an action by the appellant for the recovery of the amount lent,

HELD: the transaction was prohibited by the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 2 (1), which, having regard to the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 3 (1), had extra-territorial force and applied to all British subjects wherever they might be, other than in one of the excepted territories, who bought or borrowed foreign currency, and, therefore, the appellant was not entitled to repayment of the money lent.

Semble: even if the appellant could have put forward a claim for repayment on the ground of money had and received, a claim which, in the circumstances was not open to him, he would not have been entitled to succeed for the courts could not impute a promise to repay money, the borrowing of which was forbidden by law.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, ASQUITH and DENNING, L.JJ.), dated Dec. 13, 1948, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 146, reversing an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., made on Apr. 23, 1948, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 893, whereby he gave judgment for the appellant in an action for money lent.

The appellant, a Dutch subject, claimed from the respondent repayment of £6,000, money lent in the form of francs while the parties were resident in Monaco at a time when the principality was in the military occupation of the enemy. The respondent, in addition to giving a written acknowledgment of the debt, drew cheques, which she gave to the appellant, for the amount borrowed. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., held that the contract was governed by the law of Monaco; was neither contrary to the English common law, the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 1, or the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, regs. 2 (1), 3A (1) and 3C (1); and, therefore, was enforceable. The Court of Appeal held that the proper law of the contract was English law, and that the contract was illegal by virtue of the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1929, reg. 2 (1), and could not be enforced either by an action for money lent or by an action on the cheques or for money had and received.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 21. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion which my noble and learned friend, LORD RADCLIFFE, is about to deliver and I agree so fully in his reasoning and conclusions that I do not propose to add anything on the main question in the appeal, viz.: What was the effect of the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 2 (1), on the transaction under review. It is only on another aspect of the case that I wish to make some observations.

The appellant's claim against the respondent, as stated in his statement of claim, was simple and unequivocal. It was for the sum of £6,000 lent by him to the respondent with interest from June 9, 1945, at the rate of five per cent. per annum. Particulars of the sum of £6,000 were given, by which it was alleged that three several sums of £2,000 were lent—on June 10, June 15 and July 8, 1944. By amendment it was alleged that on each of these dates the appellant lent to the respondent 320,000 francs which she agreed to repay to him in sterling at the agreed rate of 160 francs to the pound, and it was further alleged that she agreed to pay interest on the said loans at five per cent. per annum with payment as from one month after the termination of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. This, the only issue raised on the pleadings, is that with which alone the court was properly concerned, but it appears that, both before the learned trial judge and before the Court of Appeal, the appellant was, despite the objection of counsel for the respondent, allowed to raise a very different alternative issue, viz., that, if the appellant could not recover under his claims as pleaded, then he could recover against the respondent on the footing that he had made to her a payment for which the consideration wholly failed, and, therefore, he was entitled to recover the money paid to her as money had and received, and for this purpose the so-called principle of "unjust enrichment" was invoked. To me, my Lords, it appears that such a procedure cannot be justified. Had an amendment been duly made and the issue properly raised it would have been a very different matter. Then the respondent would have been in a position in her turn to amend her defence and plead to the new issue, and it is at least possible that her advisers would have found material on which they could rely to displace such new case as the appellant might make. I do not think I am going too far if I say that substantial injustice is likely to be done if such a departure is made from the ordinary course of practice and pleading. I should, therefore, had I been fully aware at the outset of all the circumstances, have at an early stage moved your Lordships that counsel for the appellant should not be allowed to raise this issue on appeal. It happened, however, that it was only at the conclusion of the appellant's argument that I, in common with the rest of your Lordships, fully appreciated how serious had been the departure from any issue pleaded, how different the relief claimed—320,000 francs to be converted into £ sterling at the proper rate of exchange, which assuredly would not be 160 to the £—from that appearing on the face of the writ, and how scanty, through no fault of the respondent, were the materials on which a judgment on this issue must be formed, but my belated appreciation of the situation had this advantage at least, that I had heard all that was to be said on the application of the doctrine of "unjust enrichment" to the present case and saw no ground for thinking that the Court of Appeal had come to a wrong conclusion on it. I had, therefore, the less reluctance in suggesting to your Lordships that counsel for the respondent should not be called on to meet a case which should never have been allowed to be raised. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD RADCLIFFE. I find myself in complete agreement with all that he has said and I will not detain your Lordships by adding anything of my own. I agree also with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack on the impropriety of including the question of "unjust enrichment" without specific notice in the pleadings.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack that the issue of "unjust enrichment" was not open to the appellant in these proceedings, and I have formed no opinion on this issue. On all other issues, I agree entirely with the opinion which is about to be declared by my noble and learned friend LORD RADCLIFFE. The result is that the respondent, Mrs. Weil, cannot be compelled in these proceedings to repay to the appellant the sums which he lent to her in response to her entreaties in order to save her son, a Jew, from a German concentration camp. The appeal must be dismissed.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, I am of opinion that this appeal must fail on the grounds that reg. 2 (1) of the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, forbade the respondent to borrow French francs from the appellant as she did, and that the courts of this country cannot uphold the appellant's claim to recover on foot of a promise to make repayment in respect of the sum so borrowed. I need not detail my reasons for these views. I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD RADCLIFFE, and I agree so completely with his reasoning and conclusions on these matters that there is nothing I can usefully add regarding them. I express no view, one way or the other, whether the appellant would be entitled to relief had he sued on some different basis, such as "unjust enrichment" or deceit. The pleadings do not raise any issue of the kind and amendment at this late stage is out of the question, if only because it is possible that further evidence, relevant thereto, might have been adduced by the respondent had such issue been raised before the trial.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, on June 10, 1944, the appellant placed in the respondent's hands Bank of France notes for 320,000 francs. The respondent had applied to him for a loan, since she was, apparently, in need of money wherewith to try to purchase for her son exemption from being deported to Germany. It was common ground throughout that whatever money was made available by the appellant should be repaid in sterling. The site of this transaction was the principality of Monaco, in which French francs are legal currency. Of the two parties, the respondent had taken up residence on the south coast of France some twenty years ago, though retaining at all times British citizenship, and at the outbreak of war in 1939 was ordinarily resident in Monte Carlo. The appellant, who is a Dutch subject with a domicile in Holland, had been living in France on business before the war, and in 1941 had succeeded in escaping from that country to what may have been the somewhat greater security of the principality of Monaco.

The agreement which the parties came to was accompanied by, if it did not consist of, certain documents which the respondent signed and handed to the appellant. There is no need to refer to their contents in any detail. Evidently she had told him that she had an account at the Baker Street branch of the National Provincial Bank in London. Accordingly, there was a cheque for £2,000 sterling, signed by her and drawn on that branch of that bank. The space for the payee's name was left blank. There was a letter signed by her and addressed to the manager of that branch, stating that she had issued the cheque, requesting him to honour it "on presentation or as soon as the law permits it", and recognising the debt of £2,000 sterling as an obligation binding her estate in the event of her dying before presentation, and another letter, similarly signed and addressed to her solicitor in London, asking him to give his full attention to seeing that the cheque was paid as soon as the law allowed it. Lastly, there was a letter in French over the signature of the respondent certifying that she had addressed her letter to the bank manager and given her cheque of the same date, and undertaking that, if payment could not be obtained on presentation of the letter and cheque, she would pay the sum due directly and in cash not later than one month after the declaration of an armistice between Great Britain and Germany or earlier if her account at the National Provincial Bank had been released prior to the armistice. She added an undertaking that the £2,000 should bear interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum after becoming due. The appellant's name nowhere appeared in these documents. In fact, a blank space was left wherever a payee or obligee's name was due to appear. No doubt, this precaution was taken for reasons of security, but, equally, it must be beyond doubt on the evidence available that on June 10, 1944, Mrs. Weil, a British subject resident in Monaco, borrowed 320,000 French francs in Monaco from Mr. Boissevain, a Dutch subject also resident there at that date, on an undertaking to repay the money in sterling in London at the rate of 160 francs to the £ as soon as, but not before, the law of this country would allow such a payment to be made. This transaction was repeated in all its essential features on two further occasions. On June 15, 1944, and again on July 8, 1944, the appellant paid over to the respondent a further sum of 320,000 French francs and on each occasion secured a further set of documents to the purport that I have set out. Thus, the respondent assumed a liability to pay in London the sum of £6,000 in all, no part of which she has hitherto made available, nor, it appears, did she have at the date of her promise or at any time since any account at the branch of the National Provincial Bank on which her cheques were drawn. The action out of which the present appeal comes represents the appellant's endeavour to obtain from the courts of this country a judgment against the respondent for this sum of £6,000. My Lords, I think that this endeavour must fail, because I am satisfied that the respondent broke the law of this country and committed an offence when she borrowed these sums in francs from the appellant. If that is so, he can get no relief in respect of that transaction from an English court, and it would afford no material assistance to him if I were to express my sympathy with him in the predicament in which he is placed, or my distaste for the attitude which the respondent appears to have taken up against her benefactor. Before I come to the legal issues involved, it is necessary to say something of the course of the proceedings in the courts below.

The endorsement on the appellant's writ stated explicitly that he was claiming from the respondent the sum of £6,000 which he had lent to her in francs and which she had promised to repay in sterling. By further particulars he made it plain that he was asserting the existence of an oral contract to this effect which had been confirmed in writing by the several documents that I have noticed above. To this claim the respondent delivered a defence which raised a number of separate grounds of defence, among them a plea that by virtue of reg. 2 (1) of the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, the loans to her and the alleged agreements relating to them were contrary to the regulations, and were, accordingly, invalid and illegal. On these pleadings the action came to trial. The appellant was called as a witness and gave evidence on his own behalf. The respondent was not called to give evidence, but two affidavits sworn by her as to the facts of her place of residence were admitted by agreement. The learned trial judge, after considering and rejecting various of the respondent's grounds of defence for reasons which are not now material, since those grounds were abandoned by her counsel when the case came to the Court of Appeal, proceeded to consider the bearing of the Defence (Finance) Regulations on the case. The regulations to which he referred were regs. 2 (1), 3A (1) and 3c (1). As to the first two, he expressed the view that, on the facts found by him, the loan transactions were not within their terms. I have not been able to extract from his judgment with any certainty what were the considerations that led him to this view, but I think that he was influenced partly by what he regarded as the practical difficulty of the Treasury in war time authorising any transaction between two persons resident in Monaco, and partly by his finding that the transactions were, in truth, transactions of loan and not in any sense exchange transactions or transactions in currency, direct or indirect. Since I have come to the conclusion that reg. 2 (1) is decisive of this case, I need not refer to the learned judge's interpretation of reg. 3c (1) which, also, he held not to apply. So holding, he entered judgment for the appellant for £6,000 with costs.

It will be convenient at this point to set out in full the contents of reg. 2 as it stood in June, 1944. It ran as follows:

"(1) Except with permission granted by or on behalf of the Treasury, no person other than an authorised dealer shall buy or borrow any foreign currency or any gold from, or lend or sell any foreign currency or any gold to, any person not being an authorised dealer. (2) In this regulation the expression 'authorised dealer' means, in relation to any transaction in respect of gold, a person authorised by or on behalf of the Treasury to deal in gold, or in relation to any transaction in respect of foreign currency, a person authorised by or on behalf of the Treasury to deal in foreign currency."

This regulation the Court of Appeal have unanimously held to apply to the transactions which are here in question, and to produce the result that the appellant cannot recover the sterling debt arising from the loan agreement.

A Accordingly, by the order of the Court of Appeal dated Dec. 13, 1948, it was ordered that the judgment of the trial judge should be wholly set aside and that judgment should be entered for the respondent. It is from that order that appeal is now taken to your Lordships' House.

B My Lords, it would seem to follow that, if the appellant is to succeed, he must displace the conclusion that reg. 2 (1) applies to his case. That is a simple issue, even if its solution gives rise to some difficulty. The Court of Appeal did not find it necessary to consider any of the respondent's other grounds of defence, of which the only one that was maintained before them appears to have been based on reg. 3c, and, of course, had your Lordships not been in agreement with the Court of Appeal that reg. 2 (1) does apply here, it would have been necessary to consider the bearing of this reg. 3c. The appellant's
C counsel did, indeed, devote a large portion of his argument to the submission that reg. 2 (1), when rightly understood, did not extend so far as to bear on this transaction. I will explain in a moment why I do not agree with that submission, but, before I do so, I must notice an alternative argument that was addressed to us on behalf of the appellant.

D The alternative argument took this shape. Let it be assumed, it was said, that reg. 2 (1) did forbid the respondent to obtain this loan and that, accordingly, the loan agreement itself cannot be enforced in an English court. Nevertheless, the fact remains that she obtained 960,000 francs, and the appellant in the result got nothing at all out of the transaction except the loss of the money that he had advanced. Surely, it was urged, in circumstances such as these a right of action must arise in the appellant on the ground of the unjust enrichment of the respondent. I do not propose to give any detailed attention to the meaning of the phrase "unjust enrichment" as a principle of liability, since I think that such a claim, however phrased, must fail in this case, but I take it to be a less technical, if more dignified, description of the count for money had and received to a plaintiff's use which has long been an established cause of action under our system of law. It is, I think, plain that no such claim
E was open to the appellant on the pleadings in the action. His whole case was confined to an enforcement of the terms of the loan agreement. Moreover, if his rights were to be no higher than a right to get his money back, I do not see how he could have looked for a judgment in sterling of £6,000, since the contractual rate of 160 francs to the £ was much more favourable to him than the rate ruling at the date in 1948 when the action was tried. There is no doubt,
G however, that in both the courts below the appellant did, in fact, conduct an argument to the effect that he was entitled to judgment by virtue of the principle of unjust enrichment without being called on either to abandon the argument or properly to define the issue by amendment of his pleading. The trial judge refers to such a claim in his judgment, but he did not decide it, since he was in favour of the appellant on his main grounds. The Court of Appeal considered
H it as an alternative contention and rejected it on its merits. Your Lordships were informed that this plea was not entertained by the Court of Appeal without a protest by counsel on behalf of the respondent to the effect that it was not open on the pleadings, a protest which in the result must be treated as having been overruled. I am not clear whether an objection as definite was taken before the trial judge, but at least no suggestion was made to us that the respondent's counsel had at any stage consented to this issue being decided on the pleadings as they stood, and that perhaps is the only thing that matters.

The course that has been taken of allowing this plea to be entertained without the issue having been properly raised at the trial might have placed your Lordships in a serious difficulty. For it would, I think, have been impossible to allow the appeal to succeed on this ground with any confidence that the respondent had been given the opportunity to which she was entitled of placing before the court all the facts that might be relevant to the determination of the issue. I am not unaware that the trial judge made findings to the effect that the respondent had deliberately misled the appellant as to the existence of her alleged banking account in London, and that he had no knowledge as to the use to which she had put the moneys that she obtained from him. There is no reason whatsoever to suppose that these findings represented other than the true facts of the case, but the fact remains that, without the issue of unjust enrichment fairly joined between the parties, no one can be certain that the respondent might not have given some evidence or the appellant made some answer in cross-examination that would have had a material bearing on the point. In particular, it would have been relevant to know how much, if anything, either of the parties knew of the Finance Regulations which had been made by this country, and whether either of them knew more than the other. My Lords, I think that this difficulty disappears in the case before you when it is recalled that a further examination of the facts, while it might conceivably have produced material that would have aided the respondent, could not well have improved the position of the appellant. His counsel were content to base his claim on the facts as found by the trial judge, which included his holding that the parties must not be treated as in pari delicto, assuming, of course, that some offence against our Defence Regulations was committed by the respondent. If, even on the basis of those facts, the appellant's claim fails, it becomes unnecessary to consider what course of action would have been appropriate had a more favourable view of its merits commended itself to your Lordships.

For my part, I agree with all that was said by TUCKER, L.J., in the Court of Appeal on this point. If reg. 2 did extend to this transaction, it forbade the very fact of borrowing, not merely the contractual promise to repay. The act itself being forbidden, I do not think that it can be a source of civil rights in the courts of this country. It is very well to say that the respondent ought not in conscience to retain this money and that that consideration is enough to found an action for money had and received, but there are two answers to this. Firstly, when the transaction by which the money has reached the respondent is actually an offence by our laws, the matter passes beyond the field in which the requirements of the individual conscience are the determining consideration. Secondly, an action in this country cannot by its very nature lead to a return of what was borrowed. Our courts are not being asked, and could not be asked, to make a personal order on the respondent to return to the appellant the francs that he handed to her. What is sought is a judgment in sterling. After all, we must not forget the realities of the matter. It is an accident of circumstance that at the time of the trial the franc rate may have been less favourable to the appellant than 160 to the £. Suppose it had stood at the contractual rate. Then, if this claim based on unjust enrichment were a valid one, the court would be enforcing on the respondent just the exchange and just the liability, without her promise, which the Defence Regulation has said that she is not to undertake by her promise. A court that extended a remedy in such circumstances would merit rather to be blamed for stultifying the law than to be applauded for extending it. I would borrow the words which LORD SUMNER used ([1914] A.C. 452) in Sinclair v. Brougham (1):

"The law cannot de jure impute promises to repay, whether for money had and received or otherwise, which, if made de facto, it would inexorably avoid."

His principle is surely right whether the action for money had and received does or does not depend on an imputed promise to pay.

A I think then that the Court of Appeal were right in saying that, if reg. 2 applied to the case, the appellant's action must fail. Now, that this operation was a borrowing of foreign currency within the meaning of the regulations, seems to me inescapable. "Foreign currency" is defined by reg. 10 as meaning
B any currency other than sterling, unless the context otherwise requires, and here there is nothing in the context that permits, let alone requires, another meaning. Any person subject to the regulation, who receives notes of a currency other than sterling on an undertaking to repay what he receives, borrows foreign currency. What else can one say of it? One may speculate
C whether the makers of this regulation may have had in mind some more limited and specialised meaning for the words when they spoke here of borrowing and lending currency, but, in truth, there is no material on which to feed the speculation and your Lordships are bound to treat these words as meaning no less than what they so plainly say. The range of what they prohibit, so understood, is, indeed, exceedingly wide, and it is this very width that lends plausibility to the suggestion that there must be implied some qualification
D either of the class of persons affected or of the kind of transaction that is brought under control. Two instances have been used in argument to illustrate what is said to be the unacceptable absurdity of reading the regulation according to its literal meaning. There is the case of the escaping prisoner of war who borrows some money in the country through which he passes, promising to make it good if he can make good his escape, and there is the case of the British subject resident in a foreign country who raises some every-day loan from a friend or, perhaps, his banker there against his promise to repay in the same
E currency. Can it be thought that such harmless transactions were intended to be made criminal offences by this regulation? For my part, I think that the escaping prisoner of war can be left out of consideration. His would have been a wholly exceptional case and would have been so treated. It would be quite unreasonable to base any particular construction of this general regulation on its circumstances. The British subject resident abroad presents more difficulty and does legitimately raise the query whether it can be right to interpret the regulation as governing his merely local transactions, but I think that it must be so interpreted. Section 3 (1) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, makes it imperative that defence regulations should be construed
F as applying to all British subjects, with certain immaterial exceptions, unless a contrary intention appears from the regulation itself. It is impossible to extract any such contrary intention from this regulation. The references which it contains to the Treasury's dispensing power and to the permitted operations of dealers authorised by the Treasury appear to me to be neither here nor there. Certainly they are quite insufficient to justify a construction more
G limited than the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, presumptively enjoins. And here I would add that when a regulation contains a general dispensing power such as the power that is given to the Treasury by reg. 2, it is very difficult to press to a result any argument for a limited interpretation which is based on the absurdity of its literal construction.

H The particular qualification for which the appellant's counsel contended amounted to asking your Lordships to introduce an implied exception for British subjects who found themselves for the time being in enemy territory or territory which the enemy has overrun or occupied. I am ready to assume that Monaco could be so characterised at the material date, but I mean no disrespect to all that was urged on behalf of the appellant in support of this exception if I say that I can see no indication that would warrant your Lordships in putting such a construction on this regulation. If we did, we should be making a new regulation, not interpreting an existing one, nor.

stated as a general exception in favour of British subjects behind the enemy line, does it commend itself to me as very probable feature of war time legislation. Finally, the circumstance that the repayment in London was not to take place until the law permitted appears to me irrelevant since it is the actual obtaining of the loan that the law forbids.

There is only one further matter that I wish to notice before I conclude. Fully as I agree with the Court of Appeal's view that reg. 2 (1) prohibited this borrowing and therefore renders the appellant's claim for repayment unmaintainable, I do not find it possible to base my view either on the circumstance that this transaction was an exchange of francs for sterling, or on the fact, if it be a fact, that the proper law of this contract was the law of England. Indeed, it seems to me an unmaintainable proposition that if a British subject who is within the ban carries out such a transaction in foreign currency as the regulation describes, he commits or does not commit an offence according to whether the proper law of the transaction is English or foreign. These defence regulations were concerned with prohibiting certain acts under the sanction of severe penalties, and their interpretation cannot be assisted by considering in what circumstances the rules of private international law would uphold or reject contracts arising from those acts. I think that both the sterling element and the proper law factor are really irrelevant. I think so because I can find no warrant in the regulation itself for the assumption that it was specially designed for the support or the defence of sterling. Other regulations are, no doubt, directed specifically to this and, appropriately, base their provisions on distinctions between persons resident inside and persons resident outside the United Kingdom or the sterling area, as the case may be, and payments made to such persons. Regulation 2 says nothing of this. One can deduce from what it says no more than that it intended, just so far as it could, to restrict all dealings in foreign currency and gold to a group of dealers authorised by the Treasury. There were obvious advantages in this, but there is no warrant for supposing that the British government was interested only in dealings in which sterling was involved. There was the currency of our allies to be considered and, for that matter, there was the currency of our enemies, against whom the government had organised a Ministry of Economic Warfare. If it be said that, unless there is some implied limitation of the regulation to sterling transactions, it struck blindly, and perhaps needlessly, at all sorts of people and operations, I can see the force of the criticism, but I do not think that it alters the meaning of the words or should lead your Lordships to forget that in August, 1940, when the regulation first assumed its present amplitude, the tide of war itself was beating blindly on many innocent people.

JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

Judgment—Judicial decision as authority—Ratio decidendi or obiter dictum—Decision based on more than one ground.

- A Negligence—Licensee—Liability of landlord—Defective paving of forecourt of shop—Forecourt in occupation of landlord—Shop let to tenant—Injury to customer—Invitee or licensee.

Nuisance—Defective paving of forecourt adjoining highway—Need to cross forecourt to reach shop—Injury to customer leaving highway to visit shop—Liability of occupier of forecourt.

- B The landlords of a housing estate had laid out a forecourt between the pavement of the highway and the entrance to some shops which they had let. Anyone going to one of the shops from the highway had to cross the forecourt which remained in the occupation of the landlords. While on her way to make a purchase at one of the shops, the appellant stepped from the pavement of the highway on to the forecourt and caught her foot in the cover of a stop-cock which projected about an inch and a quarter above the surrounding surface of the forecourt at a distance of about two feet from the highway. The landlords were not aware of this danger. In an action by the appellant against the landlords claiming damages for negligence, or, alternatively, nuisance, the county court judge found, on the plea of negligence, that the appellant was an invitee on the forecourt. He gave judgment for her on both grounds, but his order was reversed on both points by the Court of Appeal. On an appeal by the appellant to the House of Lords, it was contended by the landlords, on the plea of negligence, that Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society ([1923] A.C. 74) was an authority for holding that, on the facts of the present case, the appellant was a licensee while on the forecourt, and not an invitee, but the appellant contended (a) that the observations of the House of Lords in Fairman's case (supra) that the appellant in that case was a licensee and not an invitee on the premises where she suffered damage were obiter dicta, and, accordingly, not binding on the House, and (b) that, in any event, the circumstances of the two cases were not similar.

- F HELD: (i) the question of the status of the appellant, Mrs. Fairman, was an issue clearly raised in Fairman's case (supra), and the deliberate conclusion of the House that she was a licensee on the premises where she suffered damage was a ratio decidendi of the case, and, accordingly, it was an authority binding on the House. Where a judge had given more than one reason for his decision, there was no justification for regarding one of those reasons as obiter dictum.

- G Observations of GREER, L.J., in London Jewellers, Ltd. v. Attenborough ([1934] 2 K.B. 222), and of PICKFORD, L.J., in Cheater v. Cater ([1918] 1 K.B. 252), approved.

- H (ii) the facts of the present case were not distinguishable in principle from those in Fairman's case (supra), except, if at all, to the disadvantage of the appellant in this case, as the forecourt, though not dedicated to the public, was, apparently, open to the public at large, whether or not they were intending to enter a shop or even to look into its windows; it could not be said that a member of the public had any common interest with the landlords in the forecourt, and the appellant had no higher right than any other member of the public; she was a licensee; and the landlords were not liable to her in damages for negligence.

Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society ([1923] A.C. 74), followed.

(iii) to sustain her claim that the landlords were liable to her because the condition of the stop-cock and the surrounding paving-stones constituted a nuisance adjoining the highway whereby she had suffered injury, it was necessary for the appellant to prove that she, as a member of the public using the highway, had suffered special damage through the existence of the nuisance, but, on the facts, she was not using the highway when she met with the accident, as she had deliberately left it to go to the shop, A and, therefore, her claim in nuisance failed.

Bromley v. Mercer ([1922] 2 K.B. 126), and Howard v. Walker ([1947] 2 All E.R. 197), referred to.

Owens v. Scott & Sons (Bakers), Ltd. ([1939] 3 All E.R. 663), not approved.

Per curiam: It will help to keep sight of the differences between cases of nuisance and cases of negligence if two propositions are maintained—(i) B that negligence is not necessarily an element in nuisance, and (ii) that, where the nuisance in respect of which a private person sues is a “public nuisance,” he has no personal right of action unless he can prove special damage beyond that suffered by other members of the public.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1949] 1 All E.R. 790), affirmed.

A APPEAL by the plaintiff, Mrs. Jacobs, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, ASQUITH and SINGLETON, L.JJ.), dated Mar. 24, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 790, allowing an appeal by the defendants, the London County Council, from an order of His Honour JUDGE HUNTER, K.C., made at Ilford County Court on Oct. 6, 1948, whereby he awarded damages to the plaintiff in respect of injuries suffered by her through the defective condition of the forecourt of a block of buildings on a housing estate belonging to the defendants. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Beresford, K.C., and Monier-Williams for the appellant.

H. E. Francis for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

C Mar. 21. The following opinion was read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, on June 9, 1947, the appellant, Mrs. Jacobs, who lives at No. 255, Bennett's Castle Lane, Dagenham, in the county of Essex, left her house to visit a shop, No. 240, Bennett's Castle Lane, which is let by the respondents, the London County Council, to Smith Gard & Co., Ltd., pharmaceutical chemists. Bennett's Castle Lane is a highway vested in Ilford Borough Council and is within a large area laid out by the respondents as a housing estate known as the Becontree Estate. On that part of the estate which abuts on Bennett's Castle Lane the respondents built a number of shops (including No. 240) with flats above them. The frontages of these shops were set back from the pavement a distance of about ten feet six inches and the intervening space, which constituted a series of forecourts, was levelled and paved with paving-stones similar to those of the pavement of the highway. These forecourts were not fenced, but the paving-stones were so laid that there was a continuous line indicating which was forecourt and which was pavement. To the casual passer-by, however, the pavement of the highway and the forecourts were indistinguishable. Though there was at one time a dispute whether the forecourts were let with the adjoining shops, it is now clear that, at least so far as No. 240 is concerned, the forecourt was not included in the demise to Smith Gard & Co., Ltd., but was at all material times in both the ownership and the occupation of the respondents. In the forecourt in front of No. 240 at a distance of about two feet from the line marking the boundary between the pavement and the forecourt, there was a stop-cock which controlled the water supply to the flats above the shop. The paving-stones surrounding this stop-cock had sunk so that it projected to the extent of an inch and a quarter above them. The appellant, having on June 9, 1947, walked along the pavement until she was nearly opposite the shop, turned to her left and walked towards it. Perforce she crossed the forecourt and in doing so she caught her toe against the projecting stop-cock. She fell and sustained a somewhat serious injury in the fracture of her right patella.

H In consequence she commenced an action against the respondents in the Ilford County Court claiming damages. Her action was, in the first place, framed in negligence. She alleged that the respondents, as occupiers of the forecourt, had committed a breach of their duty to her as an invitee thereon. Alternatively, she laid her claim in nuisance, alleging that the condition of the stop-cock and surrounding paving-stones constituted a nuisance adjoining the highway whereby she had suffered injury. In the course of the proceedings the appellant's husband was joined as plaintiff, but nothing turns on this, or on the fact that, as I have already indicated, it was at one time in issue whether the respondents or Smith Gard & Co., Ltd., were occupiers of the forecourt. The learned county court judge found that the appellant had not herself been guilty of any negligence in not observing the condition of the paving-stones and stop-cock and that she was using reasonable care for her own safety. He further held that she was an invitee on the forecourt. Unfortunately, in an otherwise very clear judgment the learned judge did not state on what facts or for what reason he came to this conclusion. In regard to the respondents, he found that they did not take reasonable care to guard against such danger, or even to acquire knowledge of such danger arising, and that they ought to have known of it and failed to do so owing to their lack of reasonable care in the matter of inspection. On the alternative plea of nuisance also the learned judge found in favour of the appellant. In his opinion, the appellant, being lawfully on the land of the respondents and being injured by reason of a nuisance on their land, was entitled to succeed on this ground also. He thereupon awarded her general and special damages. The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, ASQUITH and SINGLETON, L.JJ.), who unanimously reversed the judgment of the learned county court judge on both points.

On the first ground of claim, that of negligence, the question turns wholly on the category into which the appellant is to be placed. If she was an invitee on the forecourt of No. 240, then her claim is conceded by the respondents to be valid. If she was only a licensee, then she concedes that it is not. Invitee or licensee? That, then, is the question. For the respondents it is contended that the question is concluded in favour of licensee by the decision of this House in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (1). For the appellant it is contended that the relevant observations of the noble and learned Lords who heard that case were obiter dicta and that it is not an authority binding on this House to the effect that a person in the position of the appellant, Mrs. Fairman, is in the category of licensee and not invitee, and, further, that in any event the circumstances of Mrs. Jacobs were different from those of Mrs. Fairman and Mrs. Jacobs, at any rate, was an invitee. My Lords, the appellant was, I think, encouraged to adopt the first branch of her contention by the observations of SCOTT, L.J., in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (2). That learned lord justice (differing on this point from GODDARD, L.J.) expressed the opinion ([1941] 3 All E.R. 166) that the observations of the learned lords in Fairman's case (1) on this question were all obiter dicta and he felt at liberty to state a different view of the law. So far as I have been able to discover, the opinion of SCOTT, L.J., has not received any support either in judicial decision or text-book of authority, and for a quarter of a century Fairman's case (1) has been regarded as a definitive statement of the law. However, in the present case the learned lords justices who heard the appeal thought that the matter admitted of sufficient doubt to justify the admission of an appeal to this House. Hence it falls to your Lordships to determine what Fairman's case (1) decided and for what proposition of law it is an authority, binding alike on this House and on every court of law in this country.

My Lords, I can entertain no doubt that Fairman's case (1) decided that Mrs. Fairman was a licensee on the premises where she suffered damage and that that decision was the ratio decidendi, or a ratio decidendi (it matters not which), of the case. It is not, I think, always easy to determine how far, when several issues are raised in a case and a determination of any one of them is decisive in favour of one or other of the parties, the observations on other issues are to be regarded as obiter. That is the inevitable result of our system. For while it is the primary duty of a court of justice to dispense justice to litigants, it is its traditional role to do so by means of an exposition of the relevant law. Clearly, such a system must be somewhat flexible, with the result that in some cases judges may be criticised for diverging into expositions which could by no means be regarded as relevant to the dispute between the parties, and, in other cases, other critics may regret that an opportunity has been missed for making an oracular pronouncement on some legal problem which has long vexed the profession. However this may be, there is, in my opinion, no justification for regarding as obiter dictum a reason given by a judge for his decision, because he has given another reason also. If it were a proper test to ask whether the decision would have been the same apart from the proposition alleged to be obiter, then a case which ex facie decided two things would decide nothing. A good illustration will be found in London Jewellers, Ltd. v. Attenborough (3). In that case the determination of one of the issues depended on how far the Court of Appeal was bound by its previous decision in Folkes v. King (4), in which the court had given two grounds for its decision, the second of which [as stated by GREER, L.J. ([1934] 2 K.B. 222), in Attenborough's case (3)] was that:

"... where a man obtains possession with authority to sell, or to become the owner himself, and then sells, he cannot be treated as having obtained the goods by larceny by a trick."

In Attenborough's case (3) it was contended that, since there was another reason given for the decision in Folkes' case (4), the second reason was obiter, but GREER, L.J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 222) in reference to the argument of counsel:

"I cannot help feeling that if we were unhampered by authority there is much to be said for this proposition which commended itself to SWIFT, J., and which commended itself to me in Folkes v. King (4), but that view is not open to us in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Folkes v. King (4). In that case two reasons were given by all the members of the Court of Appeal for their decision and we are not entitled to pick out the first reason as the ratio decidendi and neglect the second, or to pick out the second reason as the ratio decidendi and neglect the first; we must take both as forming the ground of the judgment."

So, also, in Cheater v. Cater (5) PICKFORD, L.J., after citing a passage from the judgment of MELLISH, L.J., in Erschine v. Adeane (6), said ([1918] 1 K.B. 252):

"That is a distinct statement of the law and not a dictum. It is the second ground given by the lord justice for his judgment. If a judge states two grounds for his judgment and bases his decision upon both, neither of those grounds is a dictum."

The principle, which can be thus simply stated, is not always easy of application, particularly where the judgments of an appellate court consisting of more than one judge have to be considered. An illuminating discussion of the difficulties that may then arise will be found in an article, "Ratio Decidendi and Obiter Dictum in Appellate Courts," by PROFESSOR PATON and G. SAWER in THE LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, vol. 63, p. 461. It does not, however, appear to me that Fairman's case (1) should cause any difficulty. In that case the defendants owned a block of flats which they let to various tenants, the defendants keeping possession and control of the common staircase giving access to the flats. The stairs were made of cement reinforced by iron bars embedded in the cement and running along the whole length of the tread. Owing to the wearing away of the cement, in some cases irregular depressions were scooped out behind the iron bars. The plaintiff, who lodged with her sister in a flat on the fourth floor, of which the sister's husband was tenant, while descending the stairs, caught her heel in a depression so formed, and fell and was injured. The trial judge found that the defendants were not guilty of negligence; that the state of the staircase was not dangerous at the time of the accident; and that the depression which caused the plaintiff to fall was not in the nature of a concealed danger or trap, but was obvious and could have been seen by the plaintiff if she had looked. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. When the case came on appeal to this House, it was clear that it was important for the appellant to establish as high a degree of responsibility in the respondents as possible, and it was clear too that, if she was an invitee, that degree was higher than if she was a licensee. Accordingly, her counsel, after referring to Miller v. Hancock (7) and stating the difference to which I have referred, urged that the appellant was "indirectly the invitee of the respondents." And so also counsel for the respondents opened his argument by saying: "Qua the respondents the appellant was not an invitee." Thus, while, no doubt, much argument ranged round other questions—what was the true inference to be drawn from the evidence, what was the measure of liability if the plaintiff was in fact an invitee, what was really decided in the much debated case of Miller v. Hancock (7), and so on—yet it was an issue clearly raised: What was the status of the appellant, invitee or licensee? And that issue was thus decided. LORD BUCKMASTER, finding himself unable to agree with the trial judge, held that the state of the staircase was a dangerous trap so that the appellant was entitled to succeed, whatever her status. It is possible that he would have decided in favour of invitee. That appears to be the purport of his final observation ([1923] A.C. 84). LORD ATKINSON decided (ibid., 85) that she was, quoad the landlord, when using the stairs, "at most merely his licensee." LORD SUMNER, after stating the relevant facts, said (ibid., 92): "I think that the plaintiff was the defendants' licensee not their invitee," and went on to explain why. LORD WRENBURY, at an early stage of his opinion, said (ibid., 95):

"It is well to define at the outset what, in my judgment, is the relation between the plaintiff and the landlord in respect of which she can sue."

He proceeded to define it thus (ibid.):

"She was, I think, the invitee of the tenant, and, in consequence, the licensee of the landlord."

Finally, LORD CARSON agreed in the conclusion reached by LORD BUCKMASTER. I do not find in his speech any reference to the immediate question. Thus, three of the five noble and learned Lords who heard the appeal decided that Mrs. Fairman was a licensee, not an invitee. To treat their deliberate conclusions as obiter would not be consonant with the principle which is, in my view, essential to our system of case law and precedent.

This House, then, is bound by Fairman's case (1). The question remains whether the facts of the case now under appeal distinguish it in principle. I have already set out the facts on which in Fairman's case (1) the plaintiff was held to be a licensee. It would, in my opinion, be an unjustifiable refinement of the law for this House, which declared Mrs. Fairman to be a licensee, to declare Mrs. Jacobs to be other than a licensee. I can find no essential distinction between the two sets of facts. If there is one, it is, I think, to the disadvantage of Mrs. Jacobs, inasmuch as the forecourt on which she walked and fell was apparently, though not dedicated as a highway, open to the public at large, whether or not they were intending to enter the shop or even to gaze into its windows. I do not think that she had a higher right than any other member of the public, of whom it would be impossible to predicate that he had any common interest with the respondents in the forecourt. My Lords, I have deliberately used the expression "common interest," because in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (8) (a case heard in this House just three months after judgment had been delivered in Fairman's case (1), LORD SUMNER said ([1923] A.C. 272):

"The leading distinction between an invitee and a licensee is that, in the case of the former, invitor and invitee have a common interest, while, in the latter, licensor and licensee have none."

It is possible that this House may on some future occasion have to examine further what for the purpose of this distinction constitutes a common interest, but it is clear that LORD SUMNER did not think that there was a common interest between Mrs. Fairman and the landlords of the block of flats in which she was the lodger of their tenant. A fortiori, as I think, there is no common interest here.

A Finally, my Lords, on this branch of the case I would say that I do not intend either to cast any doubt on, or to affirm, the authority of cases which have long been cited as examples of such a common interest, e.g., the so-called dock cases and railway cases where the defendants were carrying on the business of a dock or railway undertaking and the plaintiffs, being lawfully on their premises, suffered injury thereon. It is not necessary to do so, and such a task should only be assumed where the facts of the case demand it, and then only after a more
B exhaustive examination of the authorities than the present appeal requires.

Since writing this part of my opinion, my attention has been called to a case recently tried in Eire. I refer to Boylan v. Dublin Corpn. (9) in which the Irish Supreme Court distinguished Fairman's case (1). On that I make no comment, but I observe that BLACK, J., in a reasoned judgment ([1949] I.R. 77), supported the view expressed by SCOTT, L.J., in Haseldine's case (2) that the opinions
C given by the House in Fairman's case (1) on the question of licensee or invitee were obiter. The learned judge's observations led me to re-consider what I had written, but I am unable to come to a different conclusion. As I have already said, I recognise that the dividing line is difficult to draw, but it would, I think, be to deny the importance, I would say the paramount importance, of certainty in the law to give less than coercive effect to the unequivocal statement of the D law made after argument by three members of this House in Fairman's case (1). Nor, perhaps I may add, are your Lordships entitled to disregard such a statement because you would have the law otherwise. To determine what the law is, not what it ought to be, is our present task.

It remains to examine the appellant's alternative claim, viz., that the respondents were liable to her because the condition of the paving-stones round
E the stop-cock constituted a nuisance adjoining the highway. As I have said, the learned county court judge on this ground also decided in her favour. He held that she was lawfully on the land of the respondents (as she undoubtedly was) and that the principles laid down in Wringe v. Cohen (10) were applicable. It was clear, however, that the learned judge was in error in thinking that that case was relevant, for it decided no more than that, where premises on a highway
F become dangerous and constitute a nuisance so that they collapse and injure a passer-by or an adjoining owner, the occupier or owner of the premises, if he has undertaken the duty to repair, is answerable, whether he knew or ought to have known of the danger or not. I cite the headnote ([1940] 1 K.B. 229) which, I think, accurately states the decision, though I would observe that the dispute was between adjoining owners, the premises of one having been damaged
G by the defective condition and collapse of the other, and reference to highway and passer-by were, alike, strictly unnecessary. But in any case learned counsel for the appellant did not, either in the Court of Appeal or in this House, rely on the authority of Wringe v. Cohen (10), but claimed that as a user of the highway she had suffered injury by reason of a nuisance adjoining the highway caused by the respondents. That, at least, is how I understand the claim to H have been formulated in this House. My Lords, the answer given by the Court of Appeal to the claim so formulated is that the appellant was not at the time of her accident a user of the highway. She was, as they held and, I think, rightly held, a licensee on the land of the respondents, who failed in no duty that they owed to her in that capacity. It is the validity of this answer that must be examined. But at the risk of provoking the criticism, to which at an earlier stage of this opinion I referred, I would make some preliminary observations.

In a recent article, "The Boundaries of Nuisance," in THE LAW QUARTERLY

REVIEW, vol. 65, p. 480, to which I would express my indebtedness, PROFESSOR NEWARK observes that in the American RESTATEMENT OF TORTS (ch. 40), the word "nuisance" has been eschewed as being "attended with so much confusion and uncertainty of meaning." That drastic step is not open to your Lordships. To-day, as at any time during the past five hundred years, a plaintiff may found his claim in nuisance and call it nuisance. The confusion, however, is a real one and, in relation to the boundaries of nuisance and negligence, has led PROFESSOR WINFIELD to say, in his TEXTBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORT, 4th edn., p. 472:

"Until quite recently there was a hybrid action of nuisance and negligence. Sometimes it looked as if negligence were the substance of the action and nuisance were an untechnical term; sometimes the exact reverse would be the truth, and then, again, 'negligent' has figured as a persistent term in the plaintiff's declaration only to be persistently ignored by the court in deciding on grounds of nuisance."

Yet, as LORD SUMNER (then HAMILTON, L.J.) said ([1913] 1 K.B. 413) in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (11),

"... the differences between cases of nuisance and cases of negligence must never be lost sight of."

It will, as I think, help to keep sight of those differences, if two propositions are maintained, first, that negligence is not necessarily an element in nuisance, and, second, that, where the nuisance, in respect of which a private person sues, is a "public nuisance," he has no personal right of action, unless he can prove special damage beyond that suffered by other members of the public. It may also be useful to remember how far from its former scope and meaning nuisance has strayed, largely, I suppose, by reason of the impact of the law of public nuisance on the original conception of that tort. For of this there is no doubt, that, originally, nuisance meant nothing else than an unlawful interference with a man in respect of the use and enjoyment of his land, whereby he suffered damage, by an act done by another on his own, not on the plaintiff's, land, and for this purpose "land" at a very early date included, not only a corporeal, but also an incorporeal hereditament, such as a private right of way.

In the present case the appellant's case rests, not on the unlawful interference with her enjoyment of any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, but on the proof of a public nuisance in respect of which she, as a member of the public, suffered special damage. This may be somewhat elaborated. As stated in PRATT AND MACKENZIE'S LAW OF HIGHWAYS, 18th ed., p. 107:

"Nuisance may be defined, with reference to highways, as any wrongful act or omission upon or near a highway, whereby the public are prevented from freely, safely, and conveniently passing along the highway."

The question, then, may be stated with particularity. Has the appellant proved the existence of a public nuisance as so defined in reference to the highway, Bennett's Castle Lane? And further, has she proved that she, as a member of the public using that highway, suffered special damage? On the first question I feel great difficulty. The learned county court judge has not, I think, addressed his mind to it. For, while saying that "the stop-cock and surrounding stones constituted a nuisance," he adds that "the cases as to nuisances on land adjoining a highway are not in point." Yet the appellant's claim in nuisance must fail in limine unless the nuisance of which she complained was in respect of some act or omission on the highway or the land adjoining it. I gravely doubt whether there is any finding which would justify your Lordships in holding that a public nuisance was proved, and I should myself hesitate long before I came to the conclusion that the owner of land adjoining the highway was guilty of a public nuisance because he allowed a stop-cock on that land to protrude by so little from the surrounding stone. I do not ignore that the learned judge found the appellant guilty of no negligence, but it does not follow, because she was not guilty of negligence, that her accident was caused by any act or omission of the respondents which amounted to a public nuisance. It is not, however, on this point only that the appellant's claim cannot be sustained. I turn to the second question and quote again the learned judge. He said:

A       “ The appellant did not stray on the forecourt by accident. She went there deliberately. But she was there lawfully, not as a trespasser.”

He had, indeed, already held that she was an invitee on the land of the respondents. At any rate, whether as licensee or invitee, she was there lawfully and had claimed that the respondents, as occupiers of the land, owed her in that capacity a certain duty of care.

B       I would not say, my Lords, that an alternative claim in negligence and nuisance can never be permissible: see, e.g., Crane v. South Suburban Gas Co. (12). But it is, I think, essential to keep in mind where the accident takes place and why the plaintiff is in that place. For the confusion, to which I have referred and of which, among a hundred examples in the reports, I would mention such cases as Proctor v. Harris (13), Flower v. Adam (14) and Coupland v. Hardingham (15), must be increased if a plaintiff can allege that, being on the defendant's land, he was as invitee owed a duty of care, and can then, it being found as a fact that he was truly on the defendant's land, but only as licensee, allege that he was still a user of the highway. The duty which every citizen owes not to commit a public nuisance at peril of an indictment or of an action by a member of the public who has suffered special damage is one thing, and the duty of care which an occupier of land owes to his invitees or licensees on it is another. I decline to introduce a third category, a duty which the occupier of land owes to one who was lately on the highway just because he was lately on it. It is then, as I see it, a question of fact whether the appellant suffered injury while using the highway, and it is clear that she did not. The learned judge has, in fact, so found. If so, her claim must fail, for it is then irrelevant whether or not the respondents have been guilty of some act or omission “ whereby the public are prevented from freely, safely, and conveniently passing along the highway.” She was not, in fact, passing along the highway at all. Nothing that I say is intended to cast any doubt on the proposition that a man may be regarded as the user of a highway though he has diverged from it accidentally, as in Barnes v. Ward (16), or has made a false step, or become giddy, and thus left it: see Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire Ry. and River Dun Co. (17), per MARTIN, B. (28 L.J.Ex. 141). But the House was referred to no case, and my researches have led me to none, where a plaintiff has deliberately left the highway to go elsewhere and, having left it and having suffered injury on the adjoining land, has then been held entitled to recover on a claim of public nuisance in respect of which he suffered special damage. Far as the law of nuisance has travelled beyond its original limits, this further extension appears to me to be justified neither by reason nor by authority.

My Lords, it does not escape me that in the result a distinction which may appear to be capricious will exist between two cases, the one of a person who, like the appellant, suffers an injury on land adjoining the highway, the other of a person who suffers similar injury on the highway itself. The distinction has, in fact, been commented on in Howard v. Walker (18). But, my Lords, such distinctions must exist in the law so long, at least, as a distinction exists between public and private property, and it is ultimately on that distinction, perhaps, that the different fates of my hypothetical victims depend. I have said that no authority has been cited contrary to the view which I have submitted to the House. On the other hand, there are cases which, I think, clearly support that view. For I can see no essential difference in the fact, if, indeed, it is the fact (for there was no evidence of it), that the appellant did not know where the highway ended and the forecourt began. Her rights in this respect are the same whether the stop-cock was two feet from the highway or two feet from the shop front. I shall follow TUCKER, L.J., in looking back no further than Bromley v. Mercer (19). In that case a child, while on a visit to the defendants' premises, which abutted on the highway, was injured by a heavy stone which fell from the wall on her. It was contended, and the learned commissioner, who heard the case at nisi prius, so held, that the defendants were liable to her in nuisance. But in the Court of Appeal her claim was rejected. LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., pointed out ([1922] 2 K.B. 129) the fallacy of saying that

"... where there is a nuisance to the highway everyone who comes in proximity to it has a right of action which he can carry about with him on to private premises."

SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 131):

"... the only person who can successfully sue for damages is one who is injured in using the highway. There is no authority for the extension of the law which the learned commissioner has made, and in my opinion it is erroneous."

The learned lord justice further pointed out that in Harrold v. Watney (20) the plaintiff, who was held entitled to recover damage, was actually using the highway. To the same effect as Bromley v. Mercer (19) was Howard v. Walker (18), a recent decision to which I have already referred. There the plaintiff, after leaving a shop, suffered injury on its forecourt on her way to the highway. There, too, LORD GODDARD, C.J., rejected a claim laid in nuisance on the ground that it was not as a user of the highway that she suffered injury but while she was on the forecourt as a visitor or invitee of the tenant. Consistently with what I have already said, I regard these as clearly right decisions. On this second branch of the case I must add that Owens v. Scott & Sons (Bakers), Ltd. (21) on which the appellant relied, cannot be regarded as in harmony with the cases that I have cited. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I concur in the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I also concur.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, I agree.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. v.
BANK OF ENGLAND.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Cohen, L.JJ.), January 30, 31, February 1, 2, 3, 17, March 6, 1950.]

Conflict of Laws—Impleading foreign sovereign States—Gold bars belonging to French company seized by Germans and carried off to Germany—Discovery by allied forces—In possession and under control of governments of United States, United Kingdom and France—Deposit with Bank of England for purpose of applying agreement by allied governments on restitution of monetary gold—Action by French company against bank claiming delivery of bars or damages for conversion.

In May, 1938, a French company purchased sixty-four identifiable gold bars and lodged them in a private vault at Limoges of which it retained the key. In 1944, the bars were seized by the Germans and taken to Germany, where they were found by the United States forces in 1945, after the invasion of Germany by the allied armies. In September, 1946, a Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold was set up by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and France to implement the terms of Part III of the Paris Agreement on Reparation, dated Jan. 14, 1946, whereby all the monetary gold found in Germany by the allied forces was to be pooled for distribution as restitution among the countries participating in the pool in proportion to their respective losses of gold through looting or by wrongful removal to Germany. In March, 1948, the Bank of England was requested by the Treasury to open a gold set-aside account in the name of the Treasury on account of "the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France," the account to be operated by the representatives of those three governments on the Tripartite Gold Commission "for the deposit and eventual distribution of a portion of the gold looted by Germany from the occupied States of Europe and recovered by the allied occupation forces." Under the terms of the contract the bank was to make charges in connection with the account. In July, 1948, under the orders of the Tripartite Commission, the sixty-four gold bars were conveyed to England and deposited in the gold set-aside account which had been opened by the bank pursuant to the request of the Treasury. After 1940, it was the normal practice of the bank, when gold bars were deposited by a customer, to ascertain the gold content of the bars deposited and to credit the customer with the quantity of ounces of fine gold discovered on assay, but not thereafter to treat the specific bars deposited as segregated in any way to the particular contract of deposit. When the sixty-four gold bars were deposited with the bank, it was known that the French company had, or might have, an interest in them, and on July 16, 1948, the Tripartite Commission wrote a letter to the bank saying that they had received a request from the French government that the bars should be set aside and that "the commission would be grateful, providing such action does not present insuperable technical or administrative difficulties, if you could see your way to having these bars set aside intact on arrival, if they can be identified, pending receipt of a further communication from the commission on the subject." On July 19 the bank replied, agreeing to the commission's proposal. On Oct. 25, 1948, the bank wrote to the commission informing them of the fine gold content of the bars, "which amount has accordingly been set aside to-day for account of H.M. Treasury o/a the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France," and adding, "in view of the circumstances outlined in your letter . . . these bars have been temporarily segregated pending the receipt of instructions as to their disposal." In an action by the company against the bank claiming (inter alia) delivery of the bars, and, alternatively, damages for their conversion, the bank applied for an order setting aside the writ and staying all further proceedings on the grounds (a) that the sixty-four gold bars were in the possession or under the control of the governments of the United States of America, France, and the United Kingdom, and (b) that the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, viz., the governments of the United States of America and France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the court. JENKINS, J., made an order in favour of the bank, and the company appealed. During the course of the hearing of the appeal, it was found that, although the bank had intended that the bars should be kept apart from the pool and be held as individual bars for the three governments, it had failed to take one of the various steps necessary to create an exception to its general rule and had inadvertently sold thirteen of the bars.

HELD: as (a) it was not the custom of the bank to segregate bars to the particular contract of deposit, and (b) although it had intended to do so in this case, it had failed to take one of the steps necessary to create an exception to its general rule, the sixty-four gold bars were not at any relevant date in the possession or under the control of the three governments, and, therefore, the company's action against the bank should be allowed to proceed.

As the matter was one of public importance, and as the facts on which the Court of Appeal based their conclusions were not before the judge, the court thought it right to express their views on the main points which had been debated before them and with which the judge had dealt.

HELD: (i) (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., dissenting) assuming that, under the contract between the bank and the Tripartite Commission on behalf of the three governments, the gold bars were returnable in specie by the bank to the three governments on demand, the bars had not ceased to be under the control of the three governments when deposited with the bank; "control," within the meaning of LORD ATKIN's proposition in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721), covered the right to tell the possessor what was to be done with the property; and the immunity of a foreign sovereign State from process in the municipal courts was not lost by a temporary bailment for safe custody of property of which that State had had de facto possession.

(ii) if the company had failed to show that they were entitled to pursue a claim for the return of the bars, they would also be disentitled to proceed with a claim for damages for detinue or conversion of the bars.

(iii) the cases dealing with the administration of trust property in this country, which appeared to establish a limitation on the immunity enjoyed by a foreign sovereign State which was included among the persons interested under the trusts, had no application to the facts of this case.

Per curiam: There is something to be said for the view that, where a foreign government seeks to stay proceedings, the court should be satisfied by evidence that the law of that country grants immunity on the basis that is being sought here.

Per SOMERVELL, L.J.: The suggestion that the principle of immunity is limited to cases where a foreign sovereign is impleaded or relief in rem is sought is inconsistent with authority and with the language used in the Cristina case (supra) and in Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd. ([1938] 3 All E.R. 384).

Decision of JENKINS, J. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 946), reversed on the facts which were not before the judge.

E INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiffs, a French company, from an order of JENKINS, J., dated Apr. 6, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 946, granting an application by the defendants, the Bank of England, for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings in an action by the plaintiffs, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of some gold bars which had been seized and removed to Germany by the Germans during their occupation of France. In 1948, with the object of carrying out the provisions of an agreement by the allied governments dated Jan. 14, 1946, the bars were deposited by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France in a "gold set-aside account" which had been opened on their behalf at the Bank of England at the request of the Treasury. In the action against the bank the plaintiffs claimed (a) delivery of the gold bars, or, alternatively, damages for their conversion; (b) an injunction restraining the bank from dealing with or parting with possession of the bars; and (c) damages for their detention. On its application to set aside the writ and stay all further proceedings, the bank contended (a) that the bars were in the possession or under the control of the governments of the United States of America, France, and the United Kingdom; and (b) the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, viz., the governments of the United States of America and France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the court. The case proceeded on the basis that the bars were returnable in specie to the three governments on demand, and JENKINS, J., held that the bars were in the possession or under the control of the three governments and that the action was an attempt to sue indirectly the governments concerned, two of which were foreign sovereign States who could not be directly sued, and, accordingly, he granted the bank's application. The plaintiffs appealed, and at the conclusion of the argument before the Court of Appeal the court were informed that further investigations had shown that the bank had inadvertently sold thirteen of the sixty-four bars which were the subject-matter of the action. Evidence was given that it was the practice of the bank, since 1940, not to segregate bars deposited with it to the particular contract of deposit, but to credit the customer with the quantity of ounces of fine gold discovered on assay. It had, however, intended to depart from its regular practice in the case of these particular bars, as the result of a request made by the representatives of the three governments when depositing them. The facts appear in the judgments of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and COHEN, L.J.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and R. O. Wilberforce for the plaintiffs.

Cross, K.C., and J. R. C. Lee for the defendants, the Bank of England.

H. L. Parker and Denys Buckley for the Crown.

Mar. 6. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The facts of this case have been fully stated by JENKINS, J., in the court below, and are summarised in the judgment of my brother COHEN which I have had the advantage of seeing. I do not, therefore, find it necessary to relate them anew in this judgment. One small lacuna has been filled since the hearing by JENKINS, J. The learned judge observed ([1949] 1 All E.R. 951) that there was only available to him the order of the French government establishing the Tripartite Commission for Restitution of Monetary Gold. In this court we have also seen the order of the British government recorded in the LONDON GAZETTE dated Sept. 27, 1946. The matter is, however, unimportant since the due establishment of the Tripartite Commission by acts of the three governments concerned has not been, and is not, contested. Moreover (at any rate as the argument has developed in this court), save for the fact that the deposit of the gold bars in question with the Bank of England was effected by the commission and that the claim for immunity on the part of the French government and the government of the United States of America has, in fact, arisen out of their co-operation with the British government in the Tripartite Commission, the objects and jurisdiction of the commission have no relevance to the appeal.

One other substantial matter of fact has, however, been expanded by fresh evidence put before this court by consent. In his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 954), the learned judge set out the letters passing between the secretary-general of the Tripartite Commission and Mr. Hilton Clarke on behalf of the Bank of England on July 16 and 19, 1948, in reference to the terms on which the bank agreed to hold the bars in suit. Counsel for the plaintiffs read an extract from a further letter from the Bank of England to the commission dated Oct. 25, 1948 (i.e., one week after the issue of the writ in this action), the material part of which is as follows:

"In this connection I have to inform you that the fine gold content of the bars in question has been established as 25,679.605 fine ounces, which amount has accordingly been set aside to-day for account of H.M. Treasury o/a the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France. I would mention that in view of the circumstances outlined in your letter under reference these bars have been temporarily segregated pending the receipt of instructions as to their disposal."

He also drew attention to the pencil note of the bank's official on the letter of July 16, 1948: "My reaction is that we can help if the French take the gold away immediately." On this material counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the three governments could not now claim to be either in "possession" or "control" of the sixty-four bars in any intelligible sense of the language of LORD ATKIN in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (1), since, after the ascertainment of the fine gold content of the bars at 25,679.605 fine ounces, that quantity of fine ounces of gold was placed to the credit of the relevant account and the governments could not claim any rights in respect of the specific bars or any bars. An affidavit was then put in on the bank's behalf, sworn by one of its officers, Mr. L. J. Menzies. From this affidavit it was made apparent that the normal practice (since 1940) of the Bank of England, when gold bars are deposited by a customer, is to ascertain the gold content of the bars deposited, to credit the customer with the quantity of ounces of fine gold discovered on assay, but not thereafter to treat the specific bars deposited as segregated in any way to the particular contract of deposit. Mr. Menzies further stated that in the present case, although the fine ounce content of the bars had been ascertained on Oct. 25, 1948, and the requisite number of ounces of fine gold thereupon credited to the gold set-aside account of the three governments, the bars nevertheless continued to remain segregated, and still so remained. He stated that this departure from regular practice was adopted "in view of the commission's request referred to in the bank's letter of July 19, 1948," i.e., to enable effect to be given to a request, if made (having regard to the plaintiffs' claim), for delivery of the bars to the Bank of France.

After all the arguments had been concluded, it then and for the first time appeared (according to the statement made to us by counsel for the bank) that, in fact, notwithstanding the "segregation" to which Mr. Menzies had deposed, certain of the bars had been sold by the bank to outside purchasers. An opportunity having been given by the court for further investigation of the true state of facts, a further affidavit was sworn by Mr. Menzies on Feb. 16. The narrative disclosed by this further affidavit was startling. It now appears that, to give effect to the special arrangement made by the bank with the commission, instructions were given to the appropriate officer of the bank for three steps to be taken, viz., (i) the making of a separate stack or pile of the sixty-four bars, (ii) the placing on such stack of a warning notice that the bars were not to be dealt with save after reference to "higher authority," and (iii) the attachment of a similar warning notice to the cards "which constitute the Bullion Office records of the sixty-four bars"; that the third of such steps was never, in fact, taken; and that so long ago as "on various dates between Dec. 30, 1948, and Jan. 26, 1949," thirteen of the sixty-four bars were sold and delivered by the bank to outside purchasers. Even before the filing of the second affidavit of Mr. Menzies, I should have felt doubt whether it would have been right for the court, on such an application as is now before us, to proceed on the basis which had been assumed before JENKINS, J., i.e., on the basis that at all material times and as part of the contract of bailment between the commission and the bank, the sixty-four bars in suit were held by the bank, segregated from all other customers' gold and specifically allocated to that contract. For this is, after all, an application to stay proceedings in limine, and on such an application it is not common nor proper to assume favourably to the applicant matters of fact which may be in any doubt. Moreover (and this is a matter to which I shall later return), counsel for the plaintiffs has maintained with no little force that a plaintiff in an action in personam of this character should prima facie not be concerned with or embarrassed by the alleged rights of a purely contractual nature between the defendant and a third party inter se. I should, therefore, in any event have been inclined to think, even before Mr. Menzies' second affidavit, that the true legal relationship between the bank and the commission, on the assessment of which the bank's claim to immunity might well depend, ought to be more closely investigated before any safe answer to the question before us could be given.

However that may be, the further evidence by Mr. Menzies has, to my mind, destroyed at a single blow the whole premise on which the judgment below proceeded, and on which the bank's claim for a stay has necessarily rested. I am not to be taken as casting blame on any individual, still less as impugning in the smallest degree the good faith of any officer of the bank or any of its advisers. But the fact that, at a time when there was pending an application by the bank to stay proceedings based essentially on the proposition that the possession or control of the bars remained with the bank's customer, thirteen of the sixty-four bars could be disposed of by an officer of the bank, and that such sale was so clearly within the ordinary scope of his duties that it should for nearly twelve months pass wholly unnoticed by those concerned on the bank's behalf to litigate before the court the claim to immunity, emphasises in the clearest possible way, in my judgment, the caution with which applications of this kind for a stay of proceedings ought to be received by the court. And the matters to which I have referred further show—conclusively, to my mind—that it is quite impossible for the bank on the present application to establish either limb of the argument which is fundamental to its application, viz., that the bars were either in the possession or under the control of the three governments. So far as concerns the thirteen bars which have been sold by the bank, it is manifestly impossible, in my view, for the bank any longer to invoke the rule of immunity in answer to the plaintiffs' claim for damages for their conversion. And I am glad to be able to record that, if and so far as it may be necessary or relevant for the plaintiffs to rely for any purpose on the sale by the bank, no point will be taken by the bank on the ground that such sale occurred after the date of the writ. But further, the circumstances relating to the sale of the thirteen bars make it, to my mind, no less impossible for the bank on the present application to assert that any of the sixty-four bars were at any relevant date in the possession or under the control of the three governments. For the purposes of the present application it must, in my judgment, be taken as established that (a) in the absence of special terms in the contract of bailment, gold bars deposited by a customer with the Bank of England were never, after ascertainment of their fine gold content, segregated or treated by either party to the contract as segregated from other gold deposited by the bank's customers or otherwise allocated to the particular contract, (b) of the several essential steps proposed to be taken in the present case so as to create an exception to the general rule, one was never, in fact, taken, and, consequently, (c) at no relevant date were any of the gold bars in suit, within any sensible use of the words, in the possession or under the control of the three governments. In the result, the whole basis of the learned judge's decision having been destroyed, the appeal must, in my judgment, succeed. The plaintiffs' action must be allowed to proceed. The bank will, of course, be entitled to set up such defences as it desires. In the circumstances, it is strictly unnecessary to consider further any of the difficult questions that have been argued. Since, however, the matter is one of obvious public importance on which the learned judge expressed certain conclusions, and out of respect to the careful arguments addressed to us, I think it right to express my own view on the substantial points that have been debated.

For this purpose I assume that the sixty-four gold bars have remained specifically allocated to the contract between the bank and the Tripartite Commission and segregated from other customers' gold accordingly. On this assumption, can the bars fairly be said to be in the "possession or control" of the three governments, within the meaning of that phrase as used by LORD ATKIN in his speech ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721) in the Cristina case (1)? Since both parties to the appeal have accepted, without qualification, the validity of LORD ATKIN's propositions, and have further been content (as I understand them) to treat those propositions as exhaustive, as SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., stated them to be ([1938] 3 All E.R. 388) in Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd. (2), it is necessary, as a premise to what follows, to cite the relevant passage from LORD ATKIN's speech. It is as follows ([1938] 1 All E.R. 720):

“The foundation for the application to set aside the writ and arrest of the ship is to be found in two propositions of international law engrafted on to our domestic law which seem to me to be well-established and to be beyond dispute. The first is that the courts of a country will not implead a foreign sovereign. That is, they will not by their process make him against his will a party to legal proceedings, whether the proceedings involve process against his person or seek to recover from him specific property or damages. The second is that they will not by their process, whether the sovereign is a party to the proceedings or not, seize or detain property which is his, or of which he is in possession or control. There has been some difference in the practice of nations as to possible limitations of this second principle, as to whether it extends to property used only for the commercial purposes of the sovereign or to personal private property. In this country, it is, in my opinion, well-settled that it applies to both.”

Counsel for the bank has conceded that for the purpose of the appeal—and I repeat that the present application on the bank's behalf is one for the stay of the proceedings in limine—the three governments must be treated as having no title of any kind to the sixty-four bars. In the course of the argument examples were taken, for the purpose of testing its validity, of articles such as a picture or (the example given by MELLISH, L.J., in Ancona v. Rogers (3)) a gentleman's silver or gold plate which, having been “looted” by the Germans, was re-captured and then deposited by the conquering forces (themselves claiming no title thereto) with a bank or other depositary on terms comparable to those I am assuming in the present case. Such examples, I am aware, may raise the further question of the extent to which the rule of immunity applies to chattels in the possession of a sovereign Power but not used by it for public purposes. Notwithstanding that question, the examples are useful. Under modern conditions it may be natural to suppose that gold bars must be rightly held by governments rather than by individuals. The examples, therefore, bring into bolder relief the implications and consequences of the bank's claim if, notwithstanding the absence of any title, it is held to be well founded. Though the question is one of difficulty and complexity, and though we have been greatly assisted by the arguments and researches of the learned counsel, no parallel case has been found, no case in which the claim of immunity has been raised by a party in a position comparable to that of the Bank of England in this appeal. So to say is to cast no reflection on the propriety of the bank's contentions. The bank has, admittedly, in raising the plea of immunity, acted on the direction of the three governments, and the Solicitor-General has appeared in this court and in the court below on behalf of His Majesty's Government, or on behalf of all three governments, as amicus curiae. But it is the case of the plaintiffs that the three governments are neither necessary nor proper parties to this action. The circumstance, to my mind, illustrates the point that there is a real distinction, as regards this matter of immunity, between actions in rem and actions in personam. At any rate, there is here presented for the first time the spectacle of a claim by an owner of property which is not only resisted, but is said to be incapable of litigation in our courts, by an English defendant who, being in actual custody of the goods claimed, sets up, not the title of his bailor, but some other rights, said to be “possessory,” although the defendant is in no sense the mere servant or agent (in the common meaning of the word) of that third party.

In his speech in the Cristina case (1), LORD MAUGHAM expressed his own caution in regard to the so-called doctrine of immunity. Thus he said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 737):

“... but it seems to me that the claim by the Spanish government for immunity from any form of process in this country may extend to cases where possession of ships or other chattels had been seized in this country without any shadow of right, and also to cases where maritime liens were sought to be enforced by actions in rem against vessels belonging to a foreign government and employed in the ordinary operations of commerce. For my part, I think that such a claim ought to be scrutinised with the greatest care. In these days, and in the present state of the world, diplomatic representations made to a good many States afford a very uncertain remedy to the unfortunate persons who may have been injured by the foreign government."

Again, later in his speech, he said (ibid., 738):

"... but there is no authority for the view that, if he wrongfully obtained possession of valuable jewellery in this country, and it was in the hands of a third person, he could claim to stay proceedings by the rightful owner against that person to recover possession of the jewellery merely by stating that he claimed it. To come within DICEY'S rule [DICEY ON CONFLICT OF LAWS, c. 4, r. 52], he would, in my opinion, be bound to prove his title."

I venture respectfully to share LORD MAUGHAM'S misgivings, and all the more since the admission of counsel for the bank that his plea in the present case involved the result (which, in my judgment, LORD MAUGHAM and also LORD WRIGHT would have repudiated) that, if a foreign sovereign "wrongfully obtained possession of valuable jewellery in this country, and it was in the hands of a third person, he could claim to stay proceedings by the rightful owner," not, it is true, by stating merely that he claimed it, but by the allegation (which could be sufficiently made on his behalf by the third person) that, as an ordinary bailor, he retained "possession or control" of the jewellery within the meaning of LORD ATKIN'S formula. As LORD MAUGHAM himself observed, by reference to the well-known judgment of BRETT, L.J. (5 P.D. 207) in The Parlement Belge (4), the doctrine of immunity rests on the regal dignity of the sovereign, "his absolute independence of every superior authority." It was also observed (passim) in the opinions of the House in the Cristina case (1) that, though the doctrine of immunity must be regarded as part of our municipal law, it has become such on the footing that it has been reciprocally applied by other civilised nations. Thus it is legitimate to approach the solution of the present case by asking: (i) whether the regal dignity of foreign sovereigns is challenged by the plaintiffs' writ, and (ii) whether there is any evidence that a similar immunity to that asserted by the bank would be extended by the courts of France and the United States of America to the British government. I am inclined to think that a negative answer to both questions should be given.

However that may be, it is clear that in this court the question has to be determined as a matter of authority by reference to LORD ATKIN'S propositions. The vital question then is: According to the proper acceptance of the language used by LORD ATKIN, can these bars—and the same question can be asked of the picture or the plate in the hypothetical cases I have been given—be fairly regarded as being in either (a) the possession or (b) under the control of the three sovereign States? JENKINS, J., answered both questions in the affirmative. It is with great hesitation that I express a view differing from that entertained by JENKINS, J., and my difficulties have been enhanced by the realisation that both my brethren in this court would, on the assumed facts, have reached the same conclusion as the learned judge below, but I have been unable to persuade myself that on any significance of the word "possession" known to our law—and, indeed, any significance which I have been able to express or define—the three governments had or have, in the admitted absence of any title whatever, "possession" of the sixty-four bars claimed by the plaintiffs. And though I think, on the assumed facts, that the case for attributing "control" to the three governments is less difficult, I am inclined to a similar conclusion on this alternative also.

Before giving my reasons for the conclusion to which I have felt compelled, I would like to deal (if, as I hope, I can) with one point which was pressed on us, and which has commended itself to my brethren. It is said that, immediately prior to the deposit of the bars in question, they were indubitably in the "possession," i.e., the actual or de facto possession, of the three governments or one of them, for they were in the hands either of the American military forces or of the Tripartite Commission, and these persons were the mere servants or agents of the United States government or of the three governments. So far, I agree. Any claim, therefore, by the plaintiffs to the bars against the United States army authorities or the commission must have been liable to be stayed as impleading directly or indirectly the sovereigns concerned. Again, I agree. It is then said that, assuming immunity at that stage, to suppose the immunity to be lost as a result of doing the very thing which (having regard to the character of the property in question) it would be the normal and natural thing to do, viz., deposit it with a bank, is, on the face of it, contrary to common sense and is to introduce unnatural and unnecessary refinements into our law. In my judgment, this reasoning either involves a confusion of title or proprietorship with possession, or loses sight of the basis on which rests the doctrine itself. If, immediately before the deposit, the United States army or the commission held the bars "in right of conquest," then I agree that that right should not reasonably be treated as lost by the mere act of deposit, but the argument, in my view, forgets that the phrase "right of conquest" involves some significance of title or ownership. On this application it is conceded that the three governments assert no title at all. They are in the position of mere finders of another's property.

Secondly, the non-availability of process against the United States army forces or the commission (as the case may be) would surely rest on the circumstance that by such process the sovereigns would themselves be directly or indirectly impleaded. Nor am I persuaded on other grounds that the result would be to draw fine distinctions. In the case of any doctrine which has definable limits, the case must sooner or later be found which is near the boundary line. It will be none the worse for that, so long as the question on which side of the line it falls can be answered by reference to logic or principle. If I, a foreign sovereign, find the valuable (and identifiable) property of an English citizen, I may, so long as it remains physically in the hands of myself or one of my servants, successfully challenge the owner's right to sue, on the ground that my regal dignity is offended. But if I choose to part with the possession of the property to some third party who is neither my servant nor (in the sense of the term) my agent, it does not seem to be unreasonable to say that I have thereby lost my immunity. It is conceded in the present case that the bank is not the "servant" of the three governments, or of any of them. At the time of the deposit of the bars, and assuming, as for present purposes I do, that the bars are still specifically allocated to the original contract of deposit, the position of the bank is admittedly that of a bailee. It is unnecessary now to consider any special rights which the bank might have by way of lien in respect of its unpaid charges or otherwise, for counsel for the plaintiffs has not, in this court, based argument on them. Nor, though he has kept the point open, has he addressed any argument in this court on the point that the bars are expressed to be held for His Majesty's Treasury, albeit on account of the three sovereign States. The bailment with the bank was a bailment for reward, and must for present purposes be regarded as a revocable bailment. Physically, beyond doubt, the bars are, as a consequence, in the possession (and also under the control) of the bank. It is, however, said—and this is the turning point in the case—that the bars, nevertheless, remain either in the possession or under the control of the bailors in some sense, and (more particularly) in the sense used by LORD ATKIN.

As regards "possession," the learned judge in the court below based himself on the decision of this court in Ancona v. Rogers (3), and counsel for the plaintiffs was, in my judgment, right in saying that this part of the judge's judgment was its "linch-pin." We have been referred to many passages in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW, HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, and other text-books, and there is no doubt that in certain conditions a bailor will be regarded as having "possession" of the goods bailed by him, i.e., for the purposes of maintaining an action for trespass. But, in my opinion, the conditions are that the bailor either owns the goods, or has some right or title thereto which he can (and must) allege against the third party. This follows, in my judgment, from the history of the bailor's right to sue in trespass, which is discussed in HOLDSWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, vol. III, p. 348, and vol. VII, pp. 422, 430, and I think that it is also inherent in the notes in BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS, 3rd ed., p. 414. "Possession" in such a case means a right to possession which, as is stated in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION, p. 145, is "one of the constituent elements of the complete right of property . . ." In Ancona v. Rogers (3) there was no doubt that the bailor was the proprietor of the furniture in suit, and the language of MELLISH, L.J., cited by JENKINS, J. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 959) must, in my judgment, be read in the light of that fact. The vital passage in the judgment now appealed against is as follows (ibid., 960):

"Setting aside, as without relevance here, cases of palpably unlawful possession, as of stolen goods deposited by the thief with a receiver, I fail to see how the question whether goods remain in point of law in the possession of a bailor after he has delivered them to a bailee for safe custody can be made to depend on whether the title under which the bailor was in possession of them at the time of such delivery is, or is not, claimed by some third party to be invalid."

It is at this point in his judgment that, with all respect, I part company with the judge. In my judgment, there is neither logic nor authority for the view that a bailor who can, and does, assert no title of any kind to the goods bailed (e.g., a thief or mere finder) may bring an action for trespass against a third party who either has acquired physical possession of the goods, or threatens so to do, or who claims the goods as his own.

In the result, therefore, it seems to me that the three governments cannot claim to have either physical possession of the bars (for that is plainly in the bank), or legal possession of them in any definable sense. Then what sort of possession is it that they are said to have? It is claimed that LORD ATKIN did not use the word "possession" in any strict sense, or by reference to the significance given to the word by English law. In what sense, then, did he use it? I think, for my part, that he meant "de facto possession." In the Cristina case (1) the Spanish republican government were held by all their Lordships to have de facto possession of the ship, because the master and crew, who were, in fact, in actual control and charge of the ship (as a driver and his mate would be in actual control or charge of a steam or motor vehicle on land) asserted that they so "held" the ship as servants or agents on behalf of the Spanish government. In the case of a ship, such de facto possession via the master and crew is plainly intelligible—by no other means can there be de facto possession at all. But, in my judgment, there is no analogy between such a case and a contract of bailment of chattels with a bank. Each of its own kind is a well understood relationship. The doctrine of immunity is, after all, a legal doctrine, and must be capable of being understood and expressed by lawyers. The "possession" of the Cristina by the Spanish republican government was a result understood by and having a meaning to lawyers from the facts of that case. If I am right in my view that, vis-a-vis the plaintiffs, the three governments were not in any sense in legal possession of the sixty-four bars, and had no right in law to such possession, then I cannot see that, in any proper sense of the word, they can be said to have been "in possession" of them at all. Nor, in my judgment, is the bank's claim assisted by reference to The Arantzazu Mendi (5), for in that case not only did the master and crew assert that they were in possession of the ship on behalf of the Spanish nationalist government, but the owners of the ship assented to that view.

A It was argued by counsel for the bank that, as between the bank and the three governments, the bank was bound to admit the rights of the latter—not only, indeed, their right to call for possession of the bars, but also their title. But, assuming that this is so, the circumstance seems to me to be irrelevant in an action in personam by the plaintiffs against the bank. If the plaintiffs (claiming no title to them) had by some means acquired actual possession of the bars, and were sued in trespass by the bank, the terms and consequences B of the contract between the bank and the three governments would be wholly irrelevant to the plaintiffs' defence, and to any damages they might have to pay: see, e.g., The Winkfield (6). Equally, in my view, where the plaintiffs sue the bank for delivery of the bars, the terms and consequences of the bank's contract with the three governments are irrelevant. In the absence of some title, the plaintiffs would fail. Proving a title, the plaintiffs (if they can litigate) C ought to succeed, unless the bank can prove a better title in itself or can set up a better title in those who deposited the bars with the bank.

It is in this respect that, as I think, the difference to which I have already alluded between an action in rem and an action in personam is important. In the former case, if a plaintiff establishes a right or title to the chattels in suit, the right or title is good against (and pro tanto defeats) the claims of all other D persons interested, whether parties joining in the proceedings or not. In the present case (if it was an action in rem) the establishment of the plaintiffs' title would be good against the three governments and defeat any claim they might have to the chattels both against the plaintiffs and against the bank. The present proceedings are, however, proceedings in personam only. If the plaintiffs succeed against the bank, the three governments might still be entitled E to recover the bars from the plaintiffs, if they could show a higher title, and might also have claims against the bank, the validity of which it is unnecessary now to consider. It is true that the three governments may, as a consequence, be compelled to resort to the courts to assert their rights and recover any property or money to which they may be entitled. But it is no part of the law of immunity, as applied in this country, that the courts will restrain all proceedings merely F on the ground that the result might be to compel a sovereign claimant to sue for his rights: see per LORD MAUGHAM ([1938] 1 All E.R. 738) in the Cristina case (1). A third party in the position of the bank in the present case, being advised in regard to deposited chattels that the title of the claiming owner was a good one, and obtaining his authority to rely on such title, might properly and legitimately elect to deny all rights of the depositor, and such third party G could not, I conceive, be prevented from so doing by the circumstance that the depositor was a foreign sovereign who was thereby compelled to litigate his claim. Even in the case of actions in rem, no instance has been found in which, the ship being in the actual possession of a third party (e.g., a ship repairer), a claim by the owners has been stayed on the application of the third party and in the absence of the foreign sovereign, because the third party asserted H some right, proprietary, possessory, or other, in the sovereign. In The Amazone (7), the vessel was, in fact, in the physical custody of such a third party, Thornycrofts. The claim to immunity was set up by the defendant, the plaintiff's husband, who was a foreign diplomat, and claimed immunity as such. The ship was registered in his name, and it was asserted by him, and conceded by the plaintiff, that the possession of the vessel was, in law, his.

We were referred to Long v. The Tampico (8), an American case. That was a claim for salvage in respect of work done to the ship while in charge of a captain to whom it had been delivered by one Obregon for navigation to Vera Cruz, there to be handed over to the Mexican government for public use. It was held by the District Court (New York) that (on the assumption that Obregon was the Mexican government's agent in handing over the ship to the captain) the captain, not being the servant of the Mexican State but a bailee, and the ship being in his possession as such, no doctrine of immunity applied to stay the proceedings. It is true, as JENKINS, J., observed, that the case is of no binding authority in our courts. But it appears to be still treated as good law in America: see Compania Espanola de Navegacion Maritima, S.A. v. The Navemar (9). It seems, at least, to show that the claim to immunity made on behalf of the government of the United States in the present case cannot rest (as it should) on any reciprocity in the American courts. There is no evidence before the court of the view and practice of the French courts as regards the rule of immunity.

I have, therefore, been unable to satisfy myself that the bars in suit can be said to be in the "possession" of the three governments, as that word is used by LORD ATKIN in the Cristina case (1) or in any sense of that word that I am able to express or define. There remains the question: Were the bars in "the control" (within LORD ATKIN's formula) of the three governments? On this matter it is, I think, much more difficult to express a conclusion on an artificial and assumed basis of fact, for the answer to the question in any given case depends essentially on its exact and particular facts. But, assuming always that the bars remain segregated to the commission's contract and that by such contract the commission can at any time require the bank to deliver the same bars to such persons as it may direct, still, as a matter of principle and of ordinary English, I am disposed to think that the bars were not in the three governments' control. The learned judge below devoted the main part of his judgment to the matter of "possession" and he dealt briefly with "control." He was, however, of opinion that, since the three governments, or the Tripartite commission on their behalf, could at any time direct the bank to deliver the bars to them, it, therefore, followed that the bars were in their "control." But it seems to me that, until such a direction is given and has been complied with, the "control" of the bars was and is with the bank, for it rests entirely with the bank where the bars should from time to time be placed and who should be in charge of them on the bank's behalf. On such matters the commission have no knowledge and no concern. They are plainly not entitled to give to the bank any orders or in any way to dictate to the bank how the latter shall discharge its duties as bailee. To take a different view is, to my mind, to confuse "control" with "right to call for delivery"—which, on my understanding of the word, it certainly is not. I refer to the definition of "Delivery by way of bailment" in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION, p. 131:

"A delivery of a thing by a possessor (otherwise than in case of alienation) with intent to transfer separate undivided and exclusive control for the time being upon a condition or trust . . . is a bailment . . ."

In the Cristina case (1), LORD WRIGHT spoke ([1938] 1 All E.R. 732) of the rights on which the sovereign might rely to support the claim to immunity as comprehending rights "lesser" than proprietary or possessory. If his words could be said to mean and include merely contractual rights, as, e.g., the right between a bailor and bailee to call for the return of goods deposited, it seems to me that they went far beyond the requirements of the decision in the Cristina case (1) and find no support in the opinions of the other noble Lords. But, in my view, the words were used in reference to the facts of that particular case and to the somewhat special "rights" which flow from such an act of State as the "requisitioning" of ships. It appears, I think, from LORD WRIGHT's later language (ibid.) that what he had in mind was the consequence of such a requisitioning, which gives to the sovereign State the practical right to day-to-day direction of the movements and functions of the ship, whatever might be in law its (strictly) proprietary or possessory interests. I think that the same construction must be given to LORD ATKIN's formula, "possession or control" (ibid., 721). And I further venture to think that, whatever were the "rights" of the commission vis-a-vis the bank, they are in no way comparable.

A I have expressed my opinion on the assumption that the bars were and are segregated to the commission's contract because of the importance of the questions raised and because of the possibility of their arising again, in one form or another, under modern conditions. Sharing LORD MAUGHAM's misgivings, I think that the extent of the rule of immunity should be jealously watched. But, as I have stated at the beginning of this judgment, on the facts
B as they have emerged, I am satisfied that the bank has failed to make good a case for a stay of the plaintiffs' action. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed and the bank's motion for a stay ought to be refused. I further think it to follow that the plaintiffs, on their motion, are entitled to an injunction, until judgment in the action or further order, as regards the fifty-one bars remaining unsold. In conclusion: (i) Had the plaintiffs failed to show
C that they were entitled to pursue a claim for the return of any bars and, consequently, for an injunction in respect of them, then I agree with JENKINS, J., and SOMERVELL, L.J., and for their reasons, that they would also be disentitled to proceed with a claim for damages for detainee or conversion of the same bars. (ii) As regards the so-called "trust cases," I also entirely agree with the view taken in regard to them, as regards the present case, by the learned judge, D to which I only add that I feel some doubt whether Gladstone v. Musurus Bey (10) would to-day be decided in the same way as it was decided by PAGE Wood, V.-C., in 1862.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : The facts as admitted or proved before the learned judge are fully set out in his judgment, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them in detail. In view of the line taken by the foreign governments that they
E do not rely in these proceedings on any title proprietary or possessory, but only on their de facto possession and the terms of the deposit of the bars with the defendant bank, many of the documents, though matters of history, do not affect this decision. We are, for example, not concerned with the question whether these bars were, or were not, "monetary" or "non-monetary gold" within the Paris Agreement on Reparation, dated Jan. 14, 1946, nor with the F question whether the three governments [viz., the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and France] got rights proprietary or possessory by reason of the circumstances in which they obtained de facto possession. Counsel for the plaintiffs admits, as is clearly the fact, that the three governments had de facto possession of the bars prior to their deposit with the bank. The case before the learned judge proceeded on the basis that,
G as stated in the affidavit of Mr. Rootham, an assistant chief cashier of the Bank of England, the sixty-four bars of gold referred to in the writ had been deposited with the bank for safe custody and were returnable in specie by the bank to the three governments on demand. The question was whether on this basis the foreign governments were within the principles of English law with regard to State immunity and could, through the bank, successfully apply to have the H proceedings stayed. Although I think that the appeal must be allowed on the further evidence before us, I will state briefly my reasons for agreeing with the learned judge's conclusions on the facts before him. The applicable principles of law are set out in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (1). I need not read again the two propositions as stated by LORD ATKIN. The remainder of LORD ATKIN's speech and the other opinions make certain further points clear. It is plain that de facto possession is sufficient. LORD ATKIN said expressly ([1938] 1 All E.R. 722) that it was unnecessary to decide whether the ship was rightly in the possession of the government. Three of their Lordships were of opinion that the writ in rem directly impleaded the Spanish government: see per LORD ATKIN ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721), per LORD THANKERTON (ibid., 723), and per LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 730). All their Lordships also decided that the arrest infringed the second principle, the ship being, it was held, in the actual possession of the foreign government. LORD ATKIN clearly regarded control as something beyond actual possession. He said (ibid., 722):

"It is well established that the court will not arrest a ship which is under the control of a sovereign by reason of requisition: The Broadmayne (11), The Messicano (12), The Crimdon (13). The present case, however, is not one of control for public purposes, but of actual possession for public purposes."

LORD WRIGHT said (ibid., 732) that the rule

"applies to cases where what the government has is a lesser interest, which may be not merely not proprietary but also not even possessory. Thus, it has been applied to vessels requisitioned by a government, where, in consequence of the requisition, the vessel, whether or not it is in the possession of the foreign State, is subject to its direction, and employed under its orders."

I will consider first the claim for delivery up of the gold bars and the injunction. The first and main point is, as I see it, a very short one. Did these gold bars cease to be under the control of the three governments when deposited with the defendant bank? I am assuming, as I have said, that the bars were held by the defendant bank for the three governments so that through the agreed machinery of the Tripartite Commission the bank would on demand deliver the bars in accordance with any instructions it might so receive. I would have said that the three governments retained control. Some meaning must be given to the word "control." Some person other than the foreign government has ex hypothesi possession and that measure of control which goes with possession. Control would, therefore, as it seems to me, cover the right to tell the possessor what is to be done with the property. I can also see no logic in holding that the immunity is lost by a temporary bailment of property for, as here, safe custody, or possibly for some other temporary purpose. Suppose that the Cristina, having been in the de facto possession of the Spanish government, had been at the date of the arrest temporarily bailed to a ship repairer for minor repairs, it being clear that she was being repaired under the instructions of the Spanish government to enable them to use her for the public purposes for which they had taken possession. I think it would be wrong to say that in those circumstances the control required by the principle had been lost.

A good deal of the argument turned on whether "possession" was to be given its meaning in English law. This point does not, I think, arise, and I express no opinion on it. Perhaps, however, I ought to add this. The House of Lords were clearly not considering the problem which confronts us. If I am wrong in holding that "control," as used in the opinions in that case, covers the present case, I would still have been inclined to dismiss the appeal. I agree with the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that the principle of immunity ought not to be extended in the absence of evidence that the extension has been generally accepted by civilised nations as a rule of international conduct. If I regarded the dismissal of the appeal as an extension of the rule, I would agree entirely. One is, however, in my opinion, not necessarily extending a rule in this sense if its application to circumstances, which were clearly not present to the minds of those whose formulation of the rule one is considering, involves the addition of a gloss. If, contrary to the view I have formed, such a gloss is necessary, I should regard it, not as an extension of the rule, but as its logical application to circumstances not then before the House.

We were referred to Long v. The Tampico (8) as showing that under this rule of international law, as applied in the United States, the immunity is lost if the property in question is in the hands of a bailee. In order to understand Long v. The Tampico (8), it is necessary to consider an earlier decision, The Davis (14), which concerned a lien for salvage of property of the United States government. MILLER, J., delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, said (10 Wallace, 19):

A "... such a lien cannot be enforced where, in order to do this successfully, it is necessary to bring a suit against the United States, because the doctrine is well established that no suit can be sustained in which the United States is made an original defendant, to be brought into court by process, without some act of Congress expressly authorising it to be done."

B He also said (ibid.):

"... no suit in rem can be maintained against the property of the United States when it would be necessary to take such property out of the possession of the government by any writ or process of the court."

C At the time of the salvage service, the goods in question were being carried in a ship and were arrested on arrival before they had been handed over to an agent of the government. The court held that the possession of the master of the ship was not the possession of the United States. The court negatived the view that no suit in rem could be instituted against property of the United States under any circumstances. As the marshal served his writ and obtained possession without interfering with that of any officer or agent of the government, the lien was held D to be enforceable against the property. In the Tampico case (8), the rule in regard to State immunity was based on a principle which, so far as I know, has never been its basis here and, if applied to-day, having regard to the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, would abolish the rule altogether. It was stated by BROWN, J., in these words (16 Federal Reporter 495):

E "By international comity, and that tacit agreement which constitutes the law of nations, every government accords to every other friendly Power the same respect to its dignity and sovereignty, and the same consequent immunity from suit, both as respects the person of the sovereign as well as the national property devoted to the public service, which it enjoys itself within its own dominions."

F The case concerned claims for salvage services said to have been rendered on Aug. 8, 1880, to two vessels which had just been built and were admittedly designed for the Mexican government. Objection was taken on behalf of that government that the vessels were exempt from the jurisdiction of the court. The court was of opinion that on the evidence the vessels at the time of the salvage service neither formed part of the public service of Mexico nor were G as yet the property or in the possession of that government. This turned on the view that the possession of a Mr. Obregon, to whom the vessels had been delivered on Aug. 6 or 7, could not be treated as the possession of the Mexican government. The court, however, proceeded to consider the position if this was wrong, and the Mexican government had got possession on Aug. 6 or 7. Before the services were rendered on Aug. 8, the two vessels had been delivered by Obregon to H two captains respectively, as bailees, and they were to be delivered by the captains to the Mexican government at Vera Cruz. The court regarded the case, on this view of the law and the facts, as covered by The Davis (14), and held that the arrest, having been made without invading the possession of the Mexican government, must stand. In Compania Espanola de Navegacion Maritima, S.A. v. The Navemar (9), which, like The Davis (14), was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, Long v. The Tampico (8) is cited with approval.

Although the rule in regard to immunity as applied in any one State is based on a similar rule being applied in other States, it would be impossible to expect absolute uniformity. If the United States had been the only government objecting to the present proceedings, I can imagine a formidable argument being addressed to us on the lines that a State was not in a position to claim an immunity which it did not itself grant, and that Long v. The Tampico (8) showed that the present proceedings would be regarded as falling outside the rule. We are, however, concerned with the objection of the French government. If I am right in my application of the rule as formulated by the House of Lords in the Cristina case (1), I think that it would be wrong to modify that rule as against the French government, even if I were satisfied that under the rule as applied in the United States the present proceedings would not be stayed. Although the point was not taken in these proceedings, there is something to be said for the view that, where a foreign government seeks to stay proceedings, the court should be satisfied by evidence that the law of that country grants immunity on the basis that is being sought here.

Before going on to consider the effect of the further information supplied by the bank, I will state my opinion on an alternative submission made by counsel for the plaintiffs. He offered to abandon his claim for delivery up of the bars and for the injunction, claiming only damages for conversion. On the basis that the bars were being held as bars for the foreign governments and the conversion relied on was the refusal to deliver them up, this argument did not commend itself to me. To say in effect: "We will not order your agent or bailee to deliver up your property, but will make him pay damages for not doing that which we are disclaiming any right to make him do," would appear to me to be an impossible proposal.

I agree with the learned judge that the cases dealing with the administration of trust property in which a foreign government may be included among the persons interested have no application to the facts of the present case. I agree also with the learned judge that the suggestion that the principle of immunity is limited to cases where either a foreign sovereign is impleaded or relief in rem is sought is inconsistent with authority and with the language used in the Cristina case (1) and in Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd. (2). I thought at one time that the present procedure by which the objection was taken by the defendant, and not by an application made by the foreign government, was unsatisfactory. Provided, however, that there is, as here, clearly evidence from the foreign governments that the rights of immunity are claimed, and counsel for the defendant is instructed to argue the point, I think that there is no substance in the objection which I was inclined at one time to feel. It may be said that the above issues no longer arise, having regard to the conclusion to which I have come on the new evidence before us. I have, however, thought it right to express my opinion, because I am, at any rate, doubtful whether I should have come to the same conclusion as the learned judge on "possession."

I will now pass to the further developments that took place before us. Counsel for the plaintiffs put in some further correspondence as indicating that the bank did not hold specific bars as deposited for the governments, but credited them with so many fine ounces of gold, undertaking to deliver, not any specific bars, but so many ounces of gold. There was then filed an affidavit by Mr. L.J. Menzies, an acting deputy chief cashier of the bank. This affidavit set out the practice of the bank since 1940. From that date individual bars of gold had not been set aside and kept for individual customers. The various bars deposited in most cases, if not all, by other central banks, were kept separate from the bank's gold. Bars were examined on deposit, their gold content ascertained, and in certain cases, where necessary, they were made up to a standard. The customer was credited with the gold content, and thereafter the bars ceased to be held separately for that particular customer. There were further statements in the affidavit, and correspondence was put in to show that these sixty-four bars in question had been set aside, and were held specifically for the three governments. At this stage of the proceedings this seemed an answer to the point raised by counsel for the plaintiffs on the further correspondence. If the bars had passed into what I will call the customers' pool of gold, the case would, in my opinion, have fallen outside the principles as laid down in the Cristina case (1). I do not see how it could be said that the three governments had in that case any control of the sixty-four bars. They had, what would in ordinary circumstances be just as valuable, a right to the delivery of an equivalent amount of gold.

At the conclusion of the argument we were informed by counsel for the bank that further investigations had shown that one or more bars had, in fact, been inadvertently parted with, and the hearing was adjourned to enable the full facts to be placed before the court. A further affidavit was sworn by Mr. Menzies, and the following summarises the relevant facts. As I have stated, the ordinary practice of the bank was not to hold specific bars for individual customers. The bank, by letter dated Oct. 25, 1948, to the Tripartite Commission, stated that these bars had been temporarily segregated pending the receipt of instructions as to their disposal. There is no doubt that this had physically been done. There was a separate stack of these bars and a warning notice was placed on them. Particulars as to gold bars deposited are placed on cards, which constitute the records of the Bullion Office. I read Mr. Menzies' affidavit as meaning that, if segregation of particular bars to be held for a particular customer is to be effective, a warning note must be made on the cards which relate to the bars in question. This was not done, with the result that between Dec. 30, 1948, and Jan. 26, 1949, thirteen of these sixty-four bars were sold, have been utilised in manufacture, and no longer remain in their original state. The conclusion seems to me to be clear. The authorities of the bank responsible for the correspondence with the Tripartite Commission intended that these bars should be kept apart from the pool and held as individual bars for the three governments. Some steps were taken to this end, but, as the facts show, and as is admitted, one necessary step was not taken. The sixty-four bars for all relevant purposes at all material dates were in the pool. Thirteen of them were disposed of and the whole sixty-four might have been disposed of without instructions from or reference to the Tripartite Commission. In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to hold that the sixty-four bars were in the possession or under the control of the three governments. In any case of bailment where goods, say furniture, are being held for a particular customer, there is, of course, always the possibility of a mistake. A chair may inadvertently be delivered to the wrong person. That is a wholly different case. Here, admittedly under the ordinary practice of the bank, the bars passed in to the pool out of the possession and control of the bailor. The bank intended that they should be kept apart from the pool but failed to take the necessary steps to achieve this result. In my opinion, therefore, the whole basis of the argument for staying the proceedings goes in respect of all the sixty-four bars. If I am wrong about this, then it was, I think, conceded that the action must proceed in respect of the thirteen bars. An answer based on the fact that the bars were sold after the issue of the writ would not be an argument available, as I think, on the present issue, viz., whether these proceedings should be stayed. The defendant bank, as one would expect, did not require the issue of a fresh writ to get over the possible argument based on this point. I agree that this appeal should be allowed on the terms stated by the Master of the Rolls.

COHEN, L.J.: The relevant facts, as disclosed by the evidence originally before us, can be stated shortly as follows. Prior to the outbreak of war, the plaintiffs were admittedly the owners of sixty-four identifiable gold bars which were deposited in a private vault at Limoges, the key of which was retained by the plaintiffs. When the Germans were driven out of France in 1944, they seized these bars and took them to Germany, where in due course they were found by the American troops in 1945. On Jan. 14, 1946, an agreement was made in Paris between a number of the allied governments, which dealt with various matters in relation to German reparation. Part III of the agreement contained provisions in regard to "Restitution of Monetary Gold," paras. A, E and F being in the following terms:

"A. All the monetary gold found in Germany by the allied forces and that referred to in para. G below (including gold coins, except those of numismatic or historical value, which shall be restored directly if identifiable) shall be pooled for distribution as restitution among the countries participating in the pool in proportion to their respective losses of gold through looting or by wrongful removal to Germany. E. The various countries participating in the pool shall supply to the governments of the United States of America, France and the United Kingdom, as the occupying Powers concerned, detailed and verifiable data regarding the gold losses suffered through looting by, or removal to, Germany. F. The governments of the United States of America, France and the United Kingdom shall take appropriate steps within the zones of Germany occupied by them respectively to implement distribution in accordance with the foregoing provisions."

In September, 1946, a Tripartite Commission was set up by the governments of the United Kingdom, United States of America and France to implement Part III of the Paris agreement. A notice of its constitution was published in the LONDON GAZETTE of Sept. 27, 1946, its functions including those of assisting in the distribution of the available monetary gold and performing such administrative acts as might be necessary, including the opening and maintaining of banking accounts. In July, 1948, a quantity of gold, including the sixty-four gold bars in dispute in this action, were sent to the Bank of England to be placed to the credit of a gold set-aside account in the name of His Majesty's Treasury on account of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and France. This account had been opened pursuant to a letter from the Treasury, dated Mar. 9, 1948, and was described in that letter as an account to be operated by the representatives of the three governments on the Tripartite Commission:

"for the deposit and eventual distribution of a portion of the gold looted by Germany from the occupied States of Europe and recovered by the allied occupation forces."

The nature of a "gold set-aside account" is explained in paras. 2, 3 and 4 of an affidavit of Mr. Menzies of the defendant bank, which have already been read or summarised by the Master of the Rolls.

By the time the sixty-four gold bars were despatched to England, the fact that the plaintiffs had, or might have, an interest in them was known, and on July 16, 1948, the Tripartite Commission wrote a letter to the governor of the Bank of England which contained the following paragraphs in relation to the gold bars:

"2. The commission has received a request from the representative of France on the commission that certain gold bars which are included in the second consignment from Frankfurt, now on its way to the Bank of England, should be set aside pending receipt by the commission of a communication from the French government . . . 6. The commission would be grateful, providing such action does not present insuperable technical or administrative difficulties, if you could see your way to having these bars set aside intact on arrival, if they can be identified, pending receipt of a further communication from the commission on the subject."

To this letter the bank replied on July 19 and in the course of its reply said:

A “The proposal which you make is acceptable to the Bank of England provided that at the time we receive the authority of the commission to hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France we also receive instructions from them to ship the gold from London. As you are aware, it is now contrary to the Bank of England’s practice to set aside specific bars in the name of the customer, but if the French act as indicated above it will not be necessary for the bank to do more than hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France.”

The conditions thus specified do not appear to have been fulfilled. The bank duly ascertained the gold content of the bars, and on Oct. 25, 1948, wrote to the Tripartite Commission a letter (not before the learned judge in the court below), which contained the paragraph which the Master of the Rolls has already read.

B On Sept. 14, 1948, the plaintiffs’ solicitors wrote to the bank giving formal notice of their interest in the bars and asking for an assurance within fourteen days that the bank would not dispose of the gold without the consent of the plaintiffs, or without an order of a competent court. This assurance not being forthcoming, the plaintiffs on Oct. 18, 1948, issued the writ in this action, claiming:

C “1. Delivery to the plaintiffs of sixty-four bars of gold, and for damages for their detention. 2. Alternatively damages for conversion of the said bars of gold. 3. An injunction to restrain the defendants their servants and agents from selling, charging, dealing with or parting with possession of the said bars of gold or any of them otherwise than as directed by the plaintiffs.”

D On Oct. 22, 1948, the plaintiffs moved for an injunction restraining the bank from dealing with the gold bars until judgment or on further order. On Nov. 5, 1948, the bank applied for an order setting aside the writ and staying all further proceedings on the grounds:

E “1. That the sixty-four bars of gold in the writ mentioned are in the possession or under the control of the governments of the United States of America, the Republic of France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. 2. And that this action impleads two foreign sovereign States, namely, the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France who decline to submit to the jurisdiction of this honourable court.”

F These are in substance the two propositions stated by LORD ATKIN in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (1) in the passage of his speech which has already been read. Both motions came before JENKINS, J., in March, 1949, and on Apr. 6, 1949, he delivered a reserved judgment dismissing the plaintiffs’ motion and granting the bank’s application. The order, as drawn up, states that the application was granted on the ground that the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, namely, the United States of America and the Republic of France, though I am inclined to think that the learned judge’s reasoning is directed more to the second proposition stated by LORD ATKIN. From this decision the plaintiffs appeal.

G Since the original hearing of the appeal further material facts have been brought to the attention of the court. It is now known that the bank has sold or disposed of thirteen out of the sixty-four bars, conduct which could only be justified if the gold bars had been merged in the general pool of customers’ gold and the right of the governments was limited to the receipt of the appropriate amount of fine gold. The effect of the evidence has been stated by my brethren, and I need not repeat what they said. As far as the thirteen bars so sold are concerned, I incline to agree with counsel for the plaintiffs that he would be entitled to proceed with his action as it stands so far as the claim for conversion is concerned, since the cloak of immunity which might have been a bar to the prosecution of the action was destroyed when the thirteen bars ceased to be identifiable, but it is unnecessary to express a concluded opinion on this point, since counsel for the bank agreed that, if counsel for the plaintiffs founded his claim in conversion on the dealings by the bank with the thirteen bars in December, 1948, and January, 1949, the bank would not take the objection that the dealings were subsequent to the issue of the writ. As regards the remaining fifty-one bars, I agree with my brethren in their conclusion that the whole basis of the argument for staying the proceedings has gone, and with the reasons they give, based on the additional evidence, for reaching this conclusion. I do not desire to add anything further on this point.

In these circumstances, it is not strictly necessary to go into the issues that were decided in the court below, but, since the matter was fully argued, and the facts on which I have based my conclusion were not before the learned judge, I think it is right that I should state shortly my opinion on the main point with which he dealt. I must refer briefly to the Cristina case (1). The claim in that case related to a ship which the Spanish government claimed to be in their possession. It was held ([1938] A.C. 485):

"... that the courts of this country will not allow the arrest of a ship, including a trading ship, which is in the possession of, and which has been requisitioned for public purposes by, a foreign sovereign State, inasmuch as to do so would be an infraction of the rule well established in international law that a sovereign State cannot, directly or indirectly, be impleaded without its consent, and, therefore, that the writ and all subsequent proceedings must be set aside."

LORD ATKIN commenced his speech in that case by laying down two propositions of international law which, in his view, were engrafted into our domestic law, and were well established and beyond dispute. These propositions have already been read. They were, I think, accepted by all the other learned lords, with the reservation that LORD MAUGHAM was of opinion ([1938] 1 All E.R. 740) that the second principle should not be extended to property used only for the commercial purposes of the sovereign, and LORD THANKERTON and LORD MACMILLAN reserved this question for future consideration. It is also to be observed that both LORD ATKIN (ibid., 722) and LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 733) considered that de facto possession brought the principle into operation, notwithstanding that such possession was wrongfully obtained. LORD WRIGHT said (ibid.):

"This [the independent status in international law of a foreign sovereign] gives the sovereign, so far as concerns courts of law, an immunity even in respect of conduct in breach of the municipal law."

In calling attention to these passages, I am not, of course, suggesting that the possession of the governments in the present case was necessarily wrongful. That point was not argued before us, and it may well be that their possession, having been obtained in the way I have indicated, was not wrongful. Counsel for the plaintiffs accepted, as he was bound to do, the two propositions laid down by LORD ATKIN—indeed, he said they were exhaustive—but he contended that they did not touch the present case—the first because the action in the present case was in personam and not in rem, and the sovereign States were not necessary parties to the action—the second because, for the purposes of the present interlocutory appeal only, it was agreed that the sovereign States were to be treated as not being owners or claiming ownership of the gold bars and, as he said, they were neither in possession nor control of them.

Counsel for the bank did not press the point that the action impleaded the foreign States. Directly, they were certainly not impleaded; a judgment in the plaintiffs' favour would not bind them as would a judgment in rem. I think, therefore, that it is not strictly true to say that the writ in this action impleads the sovereign States, but this would not help counsel for the plaintiffs unless he could satisfy us that, if we allow the action to proceed, we could do so without, by our process, seizing or detaining property which is in the possession or under the control of the sovereign States. On this point, the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs was divided into two parts: (a) he said that no such interference could be involved since the bars were not in the possession or under the control of the sovereign States; (b) he said that, even if they were in such possession or under such control, the award of damages would not involve interference with such possession or control.

As regards (a), he advanced the following propositions: (i) possession means possession in law, (ii) possession in law is one and indivisible; (iii) under a contract of bailment the possession is in the bailee, and the bailor, therefore, cannot have any possessory rights; (iv) the fact that a bailor who is the true owner of goods may be able to sue in conversion is immaterial, because his right so to do depends on his ownership, and on this application the sovereign States do not claim to be owners of the gold bars; (v) the sovereign States cannot be in control of the gold bars since a chattel differs from a ship and there cannot be control of a chattel apart from possession or custody. With the first, second and fourth propositions I find myself in agreement, but I cannot accept the fifth proposition. I can see no reason in principle why LORD ATKIN's second proposition should not extend to personal chattels. I think it is clear from the observations of LORD WRIGHT ([1938] 1 All E.R. 733), that, while he recognised that ships had certain peculiar qualities, the propositions laid down by LORD ATKIN were of general application. LORD MAUGHAM seems to have been of the same opinion, for he said (ibid., p. 737) that the claim to immunity in that case might "extend to cases where possession of ships or other chattels had been seized in this country without any shadow of right . . ." Indeed, the whole tenor of his speech is directed to chattels generally, and not merely to ships. The defendant bank would, therefore, be entitled to succeed if it could satisfy us that the gold bars in question were in the possession or under the control of the sovereign States. For the reasons given by my brother SOMERVELL I think it is plain that the bars were under the control of the three governments within the meaning of LORD ATKIN's second proposition, and I agree with my brother in thinking that, but for the new evidence to which I have referred, to allow this action to proceed, on the evidence originally before us, we should by our process be interfering with that control. Having reached this conclusion, I find it unnecessary to consider the third proposition of counsel for the plaintiffs, namely, whether the bars were or were not in the possession of the governments after they had been deposited with the Bank of England.

A number of other authorities were cited to us, but, in view of the conclusion to which we have been forced by the additional evidence, I do not propose to review them. I only desire to express my concurrence with the conclusions reached by my brother SOMERVELL on the American cases. I also agree with him that, had we refused to allow the case to proceed in detinue, it would, for the reasons he gives, have been wrong to allow it to proceed in conversion. Accordingly, had it not been for the additional evidence as to the dealings by the bank with the bars, I should have been of opinion that the appeal failed, but for the reasons I have given, based on the additional evidence, I agree that it must be allowed. Before parting with the case, I desire to express my concurrence with the tentative opinion expressed by my brother SOMERVELL that immunity could not be claimed by a sovereign State which did not itself accord immunity in similar circumstances to other sovereign States.

CHANDRIS v. ISBRANDTSEN-MOLLER CO. INC.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), February 8, 9, 10, March 6, 1950.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Dangerous cargo—Exclusion of "acids, explosives, arms, ammunition, or other dangerous cargo"—Turpentine—Ejusdem generis rule—Acceptance of cargo by master—Breach of charterparty by charterer—Liability to damages—Delay in unloading—Amount of damages—Limitation by terms of demurrage clause—U.S.A. Carriage of Goods Act, 1936, s. 4 (6) (Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (c. 22), sched. art. IV, r. 6). A

By cl. 26 of a charterparty: "Cargo to consist of lawful general merchandise, excluding acids, explosives, arms, ammunition or other dangerous cargo." Another clause incorporated the United States of America Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1936, under s. 4 (6) of which (being in identical terms with the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, sched., art IV, r. 6), dangerous goods to the shipment whereof the master had not consented could be landed or destroyed without compensation, the shipper being liable for damages resulting from the shipment, and dangerous goods to the shipment whereof the master had consented, if they became a danger to ship or cargo, might be landed or destroyed, subject to the carrier's liability for general average, if any. By cl. 15 of the charterparty it was provided: "Should the cargo not be delivered to vessel at loading ports and/or discharged at port of destination within the specified time, for each and every day over and above the said lay-days, charterers are to pay, day by day, the sum of £100 British sterling per day demurrage." B

Under the charter the ship loaded at Jacksonville, U.S.A. a general cargo which included 1,546 tons of turpentine. The master consented to its shipment with knowledge of its nature and character, but he did not thereby waive any of the rights or remedies of the shipowner in respect of the shipment. On arrival at Liverpool, because of the dangerous nature of the turpentine, the ship was compelled to move out of the dock and to discharge in the river into craft with the result that the discharge took sixteen days longer than it would otherwise have done. The shipowner claimed damages for extra expenses and detention of the ship for the sixteen days. C

HELD: (i) on the principle that general words prima facie have their natural and larger meaning and are not to be restricted to things ejusdem generis with those previously enumerated, unless there is something to show an intention so to restrict them, "other dangerous cargo" was not restricted to cargo in the nature of "acids, explosives, arms, ammunition," but included turpentine, and, therefore, the charterers were in breach of the charterparty. D

Anderson v. Anderson ([1895] 1 Q.B. 753), applied.

(ii) although the terms of s. 4 (6) of the United States Act of 1936 relating to the shipment of dangerous goods without the consent of the master provided that the shipper should be liable for damages resulting from the shipment, while the terms of the sub-section relating to such shipment with the consent of the master contained no such provision, there was not to be implied into the latter part of the sub-section a provision that the shipper could not be liable for damages. E

(iii) the shipowner having affirmed the contract, the demurrage clause was not inapplicable, either on the ground that a dangerous cargo was outside the cargo covered by the charterparty, or on the ground that the breach by the charterers was of a fundamental obligation of the charterparty, and, therefore, the amount of the damages for which the charterers were liable was limited by the provisions of the demurrage clause. SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator.

The shipowner claimed damages and interest under a charterparty in respect of extra expenses incurred and of the detention of the ship for sixteen additional days by reason of the cargo being unloaded in a river instead of in dock. The cargo included 1,546 tons of turpentine which, it was alleged, was a breach of a term of the charterparty. The charterers contended that turpentine was not "other dangerous cargo" within the meaning of the charterparty; that by virtue of the incorporation in the charterparty of the United States of America Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1936, s. 4 (6), the charterparty did not prohibit the shipment of dangerous cargo to which the master had consented; that no damages, but only demurrage, were recoverable in respect of the detention of the ship; and that there was no power in the arbitrator to award interest on damages or demurrage. The arbitrator found against the charterers on all points and awarded the shipowner £7,529 15s. In the alternative, on the assumption that demurrage only was recoverable, he assessed the figure at £2,216 15s.

Mocatta and Michael Holman for the shipowner.

A. J. Hodgson and Boyes for the charterers.

Mar. 6. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The matter before me is an award stated in the form of a Special Case, and the facts found by the arbitrator, so far as they are material to the questions that I have to answer, are these. In March, 1941, the Evgenia Chandris under a voyage charter loaded at Jacksonville, U.S.A., a general cargo which included 1,546 tons of turpentine. Turpentine is a dangerous cargo. The master consented to its shipment with knowledge of its nature and character, but did not thereby waive any of the rights or remedies of the owner in respect of the shipment, nor had he any authority from the owner so to do. The vessel arrived at Liverpool, which was the port of discharge, on May 25, 1941, and began discharging on May 27 in dock. On May 29, because of the dangerous nature of the turpentine, she was ordered to move out of the dock and to discharge in the river into craft, with the result that the discharge took sixteen days longer than it would otherwise have done.

The first question which I have to consider is whether turpentine is a dangerous cargo within the meaning of cl. 26 of the charterparty. The second is whether, having regard to the fact that the charterparty incorporates the United States of America Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1936, the shipment of the turpentine with the knowledge and consent of the master was a breach of the charterparty. If these questions are answered affirmatively, as the arbitrator has answered them, the owner is entitled to the sum of £79 5s. 0d. as extra expenses incurred by reason of the discharge having to be made in the river, and is entitled to a further sum in respect of the sixteen additional days. Is the further sum to be demurrage at the rate fixed by cl. 15 of the charterparty or is it to be damages for detention? This is the third question. The arbitrator has decided that it is to be damages which he has assessed at £7,529 15s. 0d., a much larger figure than the corresponding figure for demurrage. The fourth question is whether the arbitrator has jurisdiction to award interest. He held that he had and has awarded the sum of £170. I can get rid of this last question at once. In Podar Trading Co., Ltd. v. Tagher (1) the Divisional Court answered the same question in the negative. Whether or not I am technically bound by a decision of the Divisional Court, I propose to follow this one as a recent and authoritative pronouncement on the law, and I have not, therefore, invited argument on it.

The first question depends on the construction of cl. 26 of the charterparty, which provides:

A "Cargo to consist of lawful general merchandise, excluding acids, explosives, arms, ammunition or other dangerous cargo."

The question is whether "other dangerous cargo" is to be construed ejusdem generis with what goes before. Counsel for the charterers, who says that it is, argues that the question turns on whether or not the rule is correctly stated in the following passage in SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES, 15th ed., p. 239:

B "It must be remembered that the question is whether a particular thing is within the genus that comprises the specified things. It is not a question (though the point is often so put in argument), whether the particular thing is like one or other of the specified things."

C This paragraph was quoted with approval by McCARDIE, J., in Magnhild v. McIntyre (2) ([1920] 3 K.B. 332). The alternative view, which the paragraph condemns, is the one for which counsel for the charterers contends and he can cite in support of it the dictum of GREER, J. (90 L.J.K.B. 40) in Akt. Frank v. Namaqua Copper Co., Ltd. (3). If the former view is right, counsel for the charterers cannot suggest a genus which would not include turpentine, and so he would fail. If the latter view is right, it is not suggested that turpentine is like any of the specified things, and so the charterers would succeed. Initially, counsel for the charterers presented his argument as if the choice lay between these two interpretations of the rule and there was no question but that the rule in one or other form applied. I think that this is the first question I have to determine, and, indeed, without examining the nature and scope of the rule, I should not be able to find a satisfactory answer on the point propounded.

E Anderson v. Anderson (4) was a decision of the Court of Appeal in relation to a post-nuptial settlement in which all three members of the court clearly laid it down that general words were prima facie to be considered as having their natural and larger meaning and not to be restricted to things ejusdem generis with those previously enumerated unless there was something in the deed to show an intention so to restrict them. In Tillmanns & Co. v. S.S. Knutsford, Ltd. (5),

F VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., without impeaching the authority of Anderson v. Anderson (4) sets out other authorities to the opposite effect designed to show that it is the restricted meaning that primarily attaches to the general words. It is, perhaps, important that this case concerns a charterparty. In Thorman v. Dowgate S.S. Co., Ltd. (6) HAMILTON, J., also dealing with a charterparty, thought it unnecessary to embark on this discussion. Anderson v. Anderson (4)

G is a decision which, unless distinguishable on the ground that I am dealing with a commercial document rather than a settlement, is binding on me. Apart from its authority, if I may respectfully say so, I entirely agree with it. A rule of construction cannot be more than a guide to enable the court to arrive at the true meaning of the parties. The ejusdem generis rule means that there is implied into the language which the parties have used words of restriction that are not there. It cannot be right to approach a document with the presumption that there should be such an implication. To apply the rule automatically in that way would be to make it the master and not the servant of the purpose for which it was designed, namely, to ascertain the meaning of the parties from the words they have used. Of course, the first approach will often show quite plainly that the words are used far more widely than the parties could have intended, as, for example, "all other perils" in the Lloyds policy which formed the subject of the well known decision in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co. (7). The so-called rule is, in short, really only a recognition of the fact that parties with their minds concerned with the particular objects about which they are contracting are apt to use words, phrases or clauses which, taken literally, are wider than they intend. Under the description of ejusdem generis the principle is applied to words only, but it is not different from the principle which restricts the meaning of clauses if literally they are inconsistent with the main object of the contract, as in Glynn v. Margetson & Co. (8). The same principle is put to work when it is sought to apply such clauses to events not contemplated by the contract, as in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick Kerr & Co. (9) and other similar cases in which frustrating events, though literally covered by the wide language of suspension clauses, have been held not to be within them. The latter principle has been recently applied in Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Works (10) in which ASQUITH, L.J., referred ([1950] 1 All E.R. 228) to the process as “ . . . a restriction imposed on the literal scope of the language actually used by the parties, by implication from what they must have contemplated.”

COHEN, L.J. (ibid., 223) applied the principle enunciated by McCARDIE, J. ([1918] 1 K.B. 335) in Naylor v. Krainische (11) that:

“ . . . words, even though general, must be limited to circumstances within the contemplation of the parties.”

I do not think that the presence of a genus, or of a series of items, alters the nature of the principle or gives it any special significance.

I cannot think that LORD MACNAGHTEN, in his rather cryptic observation ([1908] A.C. 409) in Knutsford v. Tillmanns (5), or HAMILTON, J., in Thorman v. Dowgate (6), were intending to say that the rule should be applied more stringently in the case of commercial documents than in the case of settlements. If that is what these two great lawyers had in mind, it would be impossible for me to differ from them, but I find that hard to credit. Legal draftsmen are all familiar with the existence of the rule, and familiar, too, with the proper signals to hoist if they do not want it to apply. Phrases such as “whether or not similar to the foregoing” and “without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing” are often employed in legal draftsmanship, and, if the draftsman has read the report of Larsen v. Sylvester & Co. (12), he will know that the addition of “whatsoever” generally serves the same purpose. Commercial draftsmen are not usually taught these rules. Moreover, the main argument of construction that justifies the application of the rule does not apply in commercial documents. It is that if the general words have an unrestricted meaning the enumerated items are surplusage. The presumption against surplusage is of little value in ascertaining the intention of the parties to commercial documents, as many great commercial judges have recognised. In Burrell v. Green (13) BAILHACHE, J., said ([1914] 1 K.B. 303) he was unimpressed by the argument of redundancy “because charterparties often contain many redundant words.” In Schloss Brothers v. Stevens (14) WALTON, J., said ([1906] 2 K.B. 673):

“It was said for the defendant that, if all risks were covered, why refer specially to risks of robbery with or without violence, negligence, etc.? On the other hand, it is very common to find in such contracts, although perfectly general words are made use of, including practically all risks, special reference to particular perils to which it is desired to draw special attention.”

In Beaumont-Thomas v. Blue Star Line, Ltd. (15) SCOTT, L.J., referred to the same habit, but less kindly ([1939] 3 All E.R. 133) as

" . . . the common and pernicious practice of cramming a contract with particular illustrations of some general stipulation, which in a legal sense are wholly unnecessary, and which, just because they are unnecessary, often afford a pretext for limiting general words in a way which was never intended."

A Draftsmen of charterparties—whether of the printed form or of the type-written clause, but, perhaps, especially of the latter—are probably not consciously familiar even with the idea of ejusdem generis. This charterparty refers, for example, to "a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or maize and/or other lawful merchandise." Nobody has ever, I think, suggested that the merchandise has to be similar to wheat or maize, although the first question which would occur to a lawyer would be to ask himself why the parties bothered to refer to wheat or maize, if they meant that the cargo might be anything B to chalk to cheese, including turpentine. I apply the principle laid down in Anderson v. Anderson (4), and so inquire whether there is anything in the text of this charterparty or in the circumstances in which it was made which would lead me to suppose that the parties intended "other dangerous cargo" C to have some limited meaning. I can find no such indication. It seems to me that the only reason why the owner is objecting to acids, explosives, arms, or ammunition is because they are dangerous, and, that being so, he may be presumed to have the same objection to all other dangerous cargo. On this ground, therefore, I think that the contention of counsel for the charterers fails.

This makes it unnecessary for me to deal with the other point, but since it was fully argued and is a point much in dispute, I may permit myself to express D shortly my view of it. If the ejusdem generis principle is a rule of automatic application, it becomes of the first importance to determine exactly what the rule is. If it is merely, as I think, an aid to ascertaining the intention of the parties, no point of controversy need arise. If there is something to show that the literal meaning of the words is too wide, then they will be given such other meaning as seems best to consort with the intention of the parties. In some E cases it may be that they will seem to indicate a genus; in others that they perform the simpler office of expanding the meaning of each enumerated item. If a genus cannot be found, doubtless that is one factor indicating that the parties did not intend to restrict the meaning of the words, but I do not take it to be universally true that, whenever a genus cannot be found, the words must have been intended to have their literal meaning, whatever other indica- F tions there may be to the contrary. I see no reason why, if it accords with the apparent intention of the parties, the words should not be treated, as suggested by LORD MACNAGHTEN (12 App. Cas. 501) in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Hamilton (7), as being:

G " . . . inserted in order to prevent disputes founded on nice distinctions . . . [and] to cover in terms whatever may be within the spirit of the cases previously enumerated . . . "

The next question is the effect of s. 4 (6) of the United States Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1936. This sub-section, which is in identical terms with the corresponding rule (art. IV, r. 6), made under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, is in two parts. The first part deals with dangerous goods to the H shipment whereof the master has not consented, and the second part deals with such goods to the shipment whereof he has consented. With regard to the first class, the rule provides that the goods may be landed or destroyed without compensation and that the shipper shall be liable for damages resulting from the shipment. With regard to the second class, the rule provides only that the goods, if they become a danger to ship or cargo, may be landed or destroyed, and this is subject to the carrier's liability for general average, if any. This second part says nothing at all about liability for damage. Counsel for the charterers argues that, since the first part expressly makes the shipper liable for damages and the second part is silent, there must be implied into the second part a provision in contrast to the first that the shipper is not liable for damages. If this reading of the rule is right, counsel next contends that the charterparty, construed as a whole, does not prohibit absolutely the shipment of all dangerous cargo, but only of dangerous cargo to the shipment whereof the master has not consented. I need not explore the merits of this further contention, for I can see no ground for making the implication in the rule which counsel requires. If it was clear that the Act was intended to provide a complete code in relation to the matters with which it deals, it might be argued that it could not have deliberately remained silent in respect of cargo of the second class, and, therefore, that some implication must be made, but the Act is not intended as a code. It is not meant altogether to supplant the contract of carriage, but only to control on certain topics the freedom of contract which the parties would otherwise have. I see no reason why it should not be silent on such topics as the consequences of shipping cargo with the consent of the master, leaving the matter to be regulated by the parties themselves. On the contrary, I see good reason why silence might be thought desirable, for the consequences might well depend on the terms in which the consent was given or the circumstances in which it was given.

Accordingly, I decide the first two questions against the charterers, and I agree with the arbitrator's conclusion that there has been a breach of the charterparty. I have next to determine whether the damages for the detention are at large or are governed by the demurrage clause, cl. 15. This clause provides:

"Should the cargo not be delivered to vessel at loading ports and/or discharged at port of destination within the specified time, for each and every day over and above the said lay-days, charterers are to pay, day by day, the sum of £100 British sterling per day demurrage."

The discharge took twenty-two and a half days over and above the lay-days. The owner has claimed and has been awarded demurrage in respect of six and a half of those days. The fact that the nature of the cargo was responsible for increasing the discharging time from an extra six and a half days to an extra twenty-two and a half days at first sight appears to be irrelevant, since the clause seems wide enough to apply to delay in discharging, however caused. In holding that the clause does not apply, the arbitrator expressed his view in para. 13 of the award in the following terms:

"I hold that demurrage clauses, like freight and exceptions clauses, are designed to apply only where cargo of the kind (if any) specified in the contract of affreightment is shipped; and that in cl. 15 of the charterparty in question the words 'the cargo' refer to contract cargo and not to cargo shipment of which is prohibited by the contract. If the charterparty had permitted or provided for carriage of dangerous cargo, the number of lay-days and the demurrage rate agreed upon might have been quite different. The basis of all the contractual provisions was that dangerous cargo should not be loaded."

Coming as it does from an arbitrator of great learning and experience, this view is entitled to deep respect.

It was at one time thought that, if the owner or charterer committed a breach of some fundamental or basic condition of the contract, such as is involved, for example, in a deviation from the contract voyage, the exceptions clauses in the contract were displaced and the contract could be enforced by the aggrieved party without granting to the other the benefit of any of the exceptions which might otherwise have protected him. The law on this matter was settled by the House of Lords in Hain Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd. (16), where it was held that it was governed by the ordinary law of contract.

The deviation is a fundamental breach going to the root of the contract, and the aggrieved party is entitled either to rescind or to affirm. If he affirms, he retains his right to damages for the breach, but the contract with all its terms and conditions remains alive for the benefit of the wrongdoer as well as of himself. In the case of the shipment of cargo outside the contract, the owner has in effect a similar right of election, as is instanced by Steven v. Bromley & Son (17). He can treat the shipment as a request to carry the cargo at a reasonable remuneration, and, if he accepts it, the freight clause in the contract will not apply to the non-contractual cargo. Here, again, no principle is involved peculiar to contracts of carriage and freight clauses, but only the ordinary law. In Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Works (10) the Court of Appeal held that the payment clause in a building contract was not applicable to work which was not contemplated by the contract, and that the contractor was entitled to recover for it on an implied contract to pay a reasonable remuneration.

In all these cases the old contract is not displaced unless there is either a rescission of it or evidence from which a new contract can be implied. Counsel for the shipowner does not contend that either event has taken place in this case, and neither is alleged in the pleadings in the arbitration which are attached to the award. The owners had previously taken freight in respect of the dangerous cargo at the charterparty rate, and they claimed in the arbitration, as I have said, under the demurrage clause in respect of six and a half days. What counsel for the shipowner contends is that the demurrage clause, while it remains generally effective, is not of its nature applicable to the consequences of the shipment of dangerous cargo. If I understood his argument rightly, it can be considered in two aspects—the clause is inapplicable, first, because the cargo was outside the contractual description, and, secondly, because there was a breach of a fundamental or basic provision of the contract. A demurrage clause is merely a clause providing for liquidated damages for a certain type of breach. It is, presumably, the parties' estimate of the loss of prospective freight which the owner is likely to suffer if his ship is detained beyond the lay-days. The demurrage rate in this case appears to have been a good deal lower than the freight market rate, and I suppose I need not shut my eyes to the fact that a sum produced by demurrage is generally less than damages for detention, which are, presumably, assessed by reference to the market rate of freight at the time of the breach. To this extent a demurrage clause may be in practice a concession to the charterer, but I am not, and I do not think I could be, invited to consider it as different in its nature from an ordinary liquidated damages clause.

At first sight it would appear that a demurrage rate should be as applicable to dangerous cargo as to any other sort of cargo. If the discharge of the dangerous cargo takes longer, the demurrage will be larger. Counsel for the shipowner has argued, however, that the shipment of dangerous cargo often results in the necessity for paying danger money or some other sort of bonus to officers and crew, and so, if the contract had covered dangerous cargo, a higher rate of freight and of demurrage might well have been demanded. The arbitrator thought so too, so let it be accepted. It seems to me that it is just because it may well be that neither the demurrage clause nor any other clause of the contract was originally intended to apply to the new situation created by a wrongdoer that the aggrieved party is given his choice whether he desires them to apply or not. If he thinks that the freight and demurrage rates provided by the contract are insufficient to compensate him, he can rescind and sue on an implied contract for an adequate remuneration. A further consideration reinforces this view. It is not contended by counsel for the shipowner that the owner has any option in the matter of applying the demurrage clause. His argument is that it does not apply at all, whether the owner wants it or not. The result is that, if the demurrage rate were higher than the market rate of freight at the time of the detention—and, even though the former may be designed to be lower, there is always the possibility of a slump in freight rates—the owner would be bound to take the lower rate, and the wrongdoer would thus profit from his own wrong. A similar consideration assisted LORD ATKIN ([1936] 2 All E.R. 601) and LORD WRIGHT, M.R. (ibid., 608), in Hain's case (16) to reject the argument that deviation automatically cancelled the contract, and to prefer the view that it gave the aggrieved party the option of rescinding or affirming. It is plain, however, that after an election to affirm the whole there cannot be a further option to rescind in part. So counsel for the shipowner is driven to argue that the impact of the new situation ipso facto robs the clause of applicability. That might be so if it had been due to no wrongdoing. The principle laid down in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (18) and applied in Sir Lindsay Parkinson v. Commissioners of Works (10) requires that the contract should become inapplicable without any default of either party. Where there is default, the offended party has the advantage of making his choice. It does not appear to me that the argument, the general nature of which I have considered, is rendered any more attractive by being put as a matter of construction of the demurrage clause and reading “the cargo” in that clause as referring to contract cargo. If this is true of the demurrage clause, it must be true of every other clause. It must follow, therefore, that, notwithstanding that the contract as a whole is affirmed, no clause in it which refers expressly to “the cargo” can be applicable to the dangerous cargo. A glance at cl. 7, 9, 10 and 17 of the charterparty shows the devastating effect that this would have, but, of course, all the clauses expressly or impliedly refer to “the cargo,” and whether the words are expressly used or not is often a mere accident of draftsmanship. The argument seems to me to lead logically to the conclusion that no part of the affirmed contract can apply. I think the true view is that the party who affirms the contract in circumstances such as this treats the dangerous cargo, subject to his right to damages, as coming within the contract description, and that the term “the cargo” is to be construed accordingly.

I turn now to consider the second aspect of this argument whereunder counsel for the shipowner distinguishes between the breach of a fundamental obligation and the breach of an ordinary term, contending that the demurrage clause does not apply to the former. There is an express obligation on the charterers under this charterparty to furnish a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise. They have broken that obligation, and it is not disputed that thereby they broke a fundamental obligation, by which I understand to be meant a condition going to the root of the contract the breach of which entitled the owner to rescind. No doubt in the circumstances of this case, as they were explored in the arbitration, that was a proper view to take. The turpentine consisted of 1,546 tons, though what proportion of the cargo it formed I do not know. Counsel for the shipowner says that, unless it was de minimis, there is a breach entitling the owner to rescind, just as he would be able to reject in a contract for the sale of goods. If this is so, the question of the master's implied authority to consent to shipment may require some consideration. If it be the law that an owner who at the end of a voyage discovers that a small portion of cargo (enough to be above de minimis) outside the contract description has been shipped, albeit with the knowledge of the master, can tear up the whole contract, it may result in some practical inconvenience. No such question arises for my consideration here, since the owners themselves chose to affirm. The result of the affirmation is that the breach of condition is to be treated as if it were a breach of warranty. In Wallis, Son & Wells v. Pratt (19) LORD LOREBURN, L.C., puts the position in this way ([1911] A.C. 395):

“ . . . he may treat the breach of the condition as if it was a breach of warranty, that is to say, he may have the remedies applicable to a breach of warranty. That does not mean that it was really a breach of warranty or that what was a condition in reality had come to be degraded or converted into a warranty. It does not become degraded into a warranty ab initio, but the injured party may treat it as if it had become so, and he becomes entitled to the remedies which attach to a breach of warranty."

A In the same case in the Court of Appeal FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. ([1910] 2 K.B. 1013) treats the remedy of damages as being common to all terms of the contract. In the case of a breach of condition, the injured party has the option of another and higher remedy, but if he does not avail himself of it, he will have to be content with his right to damages. I can see nothing in principle to suggest that the damages for the breach of a warranty ex post facto, as it is sometimes called, should be any different from those for the breach of a warranty ab initio, nor can I see any reason in principle why a liquidated damages clause should not apply with equal efficacy to both.

B Counsel for the shipowner does not argue that, if the obligation not to load a dangerous cargo had not been, in its original form, a fundamental obligation, the demurrage clause would not have applied. He would be precluded from doing so by authority. It is useful to review the state of the authorities on this point, because I think that by so doing I can be led to the right conclusion on the merits of counsel's distinction. It is well settled that, in relation to the cargo, a charterer has two distinct obligations. The first is to furnish a full and complete cargo which complies with the charterparty. The second is to load and discharge it within the lay-days. This distinction first became of practical importance when a charterer, who had failed to get his cargo down to the loading place, contended that he was excused by virtue of an exceptions clause applying to events which prevented loading. In Grant & Co. v. Coverdale, Todd & Co. (20) the House of Lords held that he was not. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said (9 App. Cas. 475):

E "It would appear to me to be unreasonable to suppose, unless the words make it perfectly clear, that the shipowner has contracted that his ship may be detained for an unlimited time on account of impediments, whatever their nature may be, to those things with which he has nothing whatever to do, which precede altogether the whole operation of loading, which are no part whatever of it, but which belong to that which is exclusively the charterer's business. He has to contract for the cargo, he has to buy the cargo, he has to convey the cargo to the place of loading and have it ready there to be put on board; and it is only when he has done those things that the duty and the obligation of the shipowner in respect of the loading arises."

F A similar point was discussed in Ardan S.S. Co. v. Weir (Andrew) & Co. (21). The Lord Ordinary (LORD PEARSON) held ([1905] A.C. 502) that:

G "... the delay was caused, not by the exceptional congestion of shipping, but by the failure of the defenders to perform their primary duty of providing a cargo, and that the principle upon which a reasonable time is allowed to the charterers for loading does not apply to such a case."

H The reference to "primary duty" was adopted by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in the House of Lords (ibid., 510). This appears to be the first place in which the term, which recurs in later cases, was used. Unless it has a special significance in Scots law, I think that the Lord Ordinary was using it merely as a convenient term to describe the nature of the charterer's duty as laid down by LORD SELBORNE, L.C. The discharge of the duty is preliminary to the obligation to load. In that sense it is primary.

The owner obtained damages for detention in both these cases, but no question of demurrage arose. The point was, therefore, unsettled whether a demurrage clause would apply not only to a failure to load within the lay-days, but also to a breach of the primary obligation. This question was answered in the negative in Inverkip S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Bunge & Co. (22). This was a decision of the Court of Appeal in which WARRINGTON and SCRUTTON, L.J.J., delivered judgments with which LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., concurred. It will suffice to quote two passages. WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1917] 2 K.B. 198):

"It was contended that on the true construction of the charterparty the clause I have read [the demurrage clause] is confined to mere delays in loading and does not extend to cover detention occasioned by failure to provide a cargo. Reliance was placed on the case of Ardan S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Weir (Andrew) & Co. (21) as establishing that the obligation to load in accordance with the charterparty and the obligation to provide a cargo are separate and distinct obligations, and I accept that view. But I cannot hold that in the present case the provision for demurrage is confined to delay in loading."

SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 203):

"If there was a breach in not having cargo ready on Aug. 25 the only consequence is detention of the ship, and the damages for that, which is the same detention, however it arises, are agreed in the charter and have been paid."

The authority of this case concludes the point I have to determine unless it can be distinguished, as counsel for the shipowner seeks to distinguish it, on the ground that in it the delay in providing the cargo was not a breach of a fundamental obligation. It is argued that the furnishing of a cargo contrary to the charterparty is a breach of contract which by itself and forthwith goes to the root of the matter, whereas delay in providing a cargo depends on the length of the delay. It was not considered necessary in Inverkip S.S. Co. v. Bunge & Co. (22) to decide whether the delay was sufficiently long to entitle the owner to rescind if he had so desired. SANKEY, J., in the court below ([1917] 1 K.B. 31) thought that it was. WARRINGTON, L.J. ([1917] 2 K.B. 198) expressed no opinion, and SCRUTTON, L.J. (ibid., 201) thought that it was not, inasmuch as the circumstances showed that the charterer was not repudiating. The case does, however, show that nobody thought it important to determine whether the breach was fundamental or not. To that extent it accords with the view that I have already expressed, and it remains, therefore, to consider the authority on which counsel for the shipowner relies as showing that the point is decisive.

This is the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in Akt. Reidar v. Arcos, Ltd. (23). That case decided a point up to then left undetermined. Inverkip S.S. Co. v. Bunge, Ltd. (21) had decided that damages for detention for breach of the obligation to provide a cargo were covered by the demurrage clause. Supposing, however, that the breach of such an obligation gave rise to damages of a different character, not for detention at all. The demurrage clause could not then provide the measure. Ought the clause to be construed as exhaustive, so that no damages which could not be measured by it could be recovered at all, or ought it to be construed merely as applying to damages for detention, leaving damages of any other character to be assessed at large? The Court of Appeal decided the latter. The facts were that the vessel was chartered to carry a cargo of timber from a White Sea port to an English port. If she reached the English port before Oct. 31 she could discharge there a cargo of 850 standards, but if she reached there after that date, she could not, by reason of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, enter the port with more than 544 standards. That meant that to carry a full and complete cargo her loading must be completed by Oct. 20. In breach of the charterparty it was not completed by that date with the result that she did not load more than 544 standards, and the owners sued the charterers for dead-freight. This is a problem which might be dealt with in one of two ways. One way is to say that there has been a breach of contract causing dead-freight as damage and that dead-freight is not excluded by the demurrage clause, which is not exhaustive. On that way of looking at it, the question whether the breach was of a primary or fundamental duty is irrelevant. The alternative way is to say that there has been a breach of the primary or fundamental obligation to load a full and complete cargo and therefore that the demurrage clause does not apply. On that way of putting it the nature of the damage, whether it was dead-freight or detention, would be irrelevant. It seems to me plain that the Court of Appeal chose the former way of dealing with it. BANKES, L.J., thought it unnecessary to decide whether there was a breach of the obligation to load a full and complete cargo, and said ([1927] 1 K.B. 362) that the loss was recoverable simply as damages for the breach of contract to load at the agreed rate. ATKIN, L.J., said (ibid., 363):

"If the lay-days expire without a full cargo having been loaded the charterer has broken his contract. The provisions as to demurrage quantify the damages, not for the complete breach, but only such damages as arise from the detention of the vessel."

Neither of these lords justices refer in terms to any primary or fundamental obligation. GREER, J., in the court below ([1926] 2 K.B. 88), and SARGANT, L.J. ([1927] 1 K.B. 366), did refer to the breach of a primary obligation; and it is on the latter judgment particularly that counsel for the shipowner relies. SARGANT, L.J., said:

"The loss inflicted on the owners and claimed by them is loss of another character—namely, loss of freight caused by the breach by the charterers of their contract to load a full and complete cargo, as prescribed by cl. 1 of the charterparty. The obligation of cl. 1 is, in my judgment, rightly described by the learned judge as the primary obligation. The object of the second sentence of cl. 3 is to provide compensation for a detention of the vessel in the course of fulfilling this primary obligation, not to give compensation for the breach of the primary obligation itself."

Neither GREER, J., nor SARGANT, L.J., in the passage I have quoted, disregard the fact that the loss caused was dead-freight; SARGANT, L.J., particularly refers to it. If they had been intending to decide the case on the ground that the demurrage clause did not apply to the breach of a primary obligation, it would clearly be necessary to distinguish Inverkip S.S. Co. v. Bunge (22) and explain the difference in the character of the obligations in the two cases. In my judgment, the ratio decidendi in Akt. Reidar v. Arcos (23) is to be found in the judgments of BANKES and ATKIN, L.J.J., and the reference by SARGANT, L.J., to a primary obligation is, strictly speaking, irrelevant. I think that the point I have to consider is in principle determined by Inverkip S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Bunge (22) and is not touched by the reasoning in Akt. Reidar v. Arcos (23).

In the result, I think that the damages are limited by the demurrage clause. Accordingly, I answer the first question set out in para. 15 in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative. The third question does not arise because counsel for the shipowner agrees that it should be answered negatively as the arbitrator has done. The effect of this is that the alternative award for £2,216 15s. is upheld; and as I have answered in the negative the question of interest, no sum will be added to that by way of interest.

v. GRAHAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.J.J.), March 13, 1950.]

Hire Purchase—Conversion—“ Owners may terminate hiring ” on default of hirer—Right to immediate possession of chattel hired—Need of notice.

On May 8, 1947, the plaintiffs let a motor-car on hire purchase to C. The hire purchase agreement provided, inter alia, that during its continuance the hirer should not loan nor part with possession of the vehicle nor attempt to sell, pledge, charge, assign, sub-let or otherwise dispose of it. The agreement further provided by cl. 7: “ (i) If the hirer shall fail to pay any sum due hereunder or to observe or perform any stipulation on his part herein contained, the owners may terminate the hiring; and thereupon the hirer shall pay to the owners the whole of the sums specified under the heading ‘ Terms of Hire ’ in the schedule hereto . . . (ii) If this hiring be terminated for any reason appearing at the beginning of this clause the owners may by written notice to the hirer and subject to similar stipulations put an end to the hiring under any other agreements subsisting between them and the hirer.” In June, 1947, C. instructed the defendant, an auctioneer, to sell the car for him; on July 2, 1947, the defendant sold the car; and the plaintiff now sought damages for its conversion.

HELD: on the true construction of the hire purchase agreement the plaintiffs acquired a right to immediate possession as soon as any breach of cl. 7 (i) occurred, without giving any notice to terminate the agreement, and, therefore, they were entitled to sue in conversion.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of LEWIS, J., sitting without a jury at Nottingham, dated Dec. 19, 1949. LEWIS, J., held that under the terms of a hire purchase agreement the plaintiffs were not entitled to possession of a motor car at the date of the sale thereof by the defendant, and that, therefore, they could not maintain conversion against him. The facts appear in the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J.

Pocock for the plaintiffs.

Elwes for the defendant.

COHEN, L.J.: I will ask ASQUITH, L.J., to give the first judgment in this case.

ASQUITH, L.J.: In May, 1947, the plaintiffs bought a motor car, and, on May 8, they let it on hire purchase to a man called Cole. Cole took delivery and used the car and began to pay instalments, but, in June or July, 1947, he appears to have got into money difficulties, and, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs and in breach of his contractual obligations, he instructed the defendant, an auctioneer, to sell the car for him. On July 2, 1947, the defendant sold the car to a man called Selby for £202 10s. and Selby sold it to a man called Sibley. It was not until January, 1948, that the plaintiffs discovered that their car was registered in the name of Sibley. Correspondence followed, to which I need not refer, and on Nov. 4, 1948, a writ was issued demanding damages against the auctioneer (the defendant) for conversion of the car by him.

A The hire purchase agreement is expressed to be made between the plaintiffs and Cole, and in cl. 4 a number of obligations are set out. The only one of these which is directly relevant is cl. 4 (e), where the hire purchaser covenants not to “do or allow to be done anything which will tend prejudicially to affect the ownership or financial position of the owners in relation to the vehicle.”

By cl. 5, which is directly in point, it is provided:

B “During the continuance of this agreement the hirer shall not sell, pledge, charge or assign the benefit of this agreement, nor loan nor part with the possession of the vehicle nor attempt to sell, pledge, charge, assign, sub-let or otherwise dispose of the vehicle . . .”

Clause 7 provides:

C “(i) If the hirer shall fail to pay any sum due hereunder or to observe or perform any stipulation on his part herein contained, the owners may terminate the hiring; and thereupon the hirer shall pay to the owners the whole of the sums specified under the heading ‘Terms of Hire’ in the schedule hereto . . . (ii) If this hiring be terminated for any reason appearing at the beginning of this clause the owners may by written notice to the D hirer and subject to similar stipulations put an end to the hiring under any other agreements subsisting between them and the hirer.”

Clause 10 provides:

“This agreement is only a contract of bailment for hire.”

E In his judgment, Lewis, J., was admittedly much influenced by the fact that this is not one of those hire purchase agreements in which the effect of a breach by the hire purchaser is expressed ipso facto to put an end to the agreement. It is, on the other hand, plainly a hire purchase agreement of the type which, on specified breaches occurring, vests in the lessor on hire purchase the option to terminate the hiring or not as he chooses. Lewis, J., said:

F “In my view, the question that I have to decide in this case is whether, on the true construction of the terms of this contract, when there has been no action taken by the owner to terminate the contract, the fact (to give an example) that the hirer was late one month in paying his hire purchase instalment ipso facto terminates the hire purchase agreement. Directly the hire purchase agreement is terminated, of course possession of the goods vests once more in the owner, and, therefore, in that event, he is G the person who is entitled to possession of the goods. As I have said, the whole point here is whether, in the events which happened in this case, the right to possession was in the owners.”

At the end of his judgment he stated his decision in these terms:

H “In my view, the position here is that the argument of counsel for the defendant, namely, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to possession at the time of the sale, prevails; and the defendant, therefore, is entitled to succeed on the ground that the plaintiffs have not satisfied me on the terms of the hire purchase agreement that they were entitled to possession in view of the events which happened in this case.”

The point which falls for decision may be very shortly stated and it is this. When a bailor and lessor on hire purchase sues in conversion by reason of the wrongful sale of the article bailed by the bailee, it is essential for him to show that he is entitled at the time of the sale to immediate possession of the goods, and the question is whether, under the terms of this hire purchase agreement, the plaintiffs were in that position at the time of the sale.

Counsel for the plaintiffs raises another point, which is independent of the precise terms of the hire purchase agreement. He says that a bailee who comports himself in a manner utterly repugnant to the terms of the bailment terminates the bailment, and thereupon the right to possession re-vests in the bailor. A bailee who sells the thing bailed without the knowledge or consent of the bailor is clearly guilty of such conduct. That, as a general principle of law, is not really in dispute. It applies in cases in which the contract is either a very simple one or one which does not make specific provision as to the rights of the parties in the event of particular breaches, but, of course, where there is a contract which makes such special provision (and that is this case) what has to be taken into account is, not the general law, but the position which arises having regard to those express stipulations.

The question, therefore, is whether, having regard to the terms of cl. 7, and, particularly, cl. 7 (i), the effect of the breach was, not merely to give the plaintiffs a right to terminate the hiring, but also to entitle them to say that at the time of the sale they had a right to immediate possession of the goods. Several cases were cited to us: Manders v. Williams (1), Jelks v. Hayward (2), and Bradley v. Copley (3) being the principal ones. Jelks v. Hayward (2) is by far the closest on its facts to the present case. It appears from the headnote that in that case

"Furniture was let for hire with an option of purchase under a hire purchase agreement, which contained a clause giving the owners the right without previous notice to determine the hiring and re-take possession of the furniture, if it should at any time be seized or taken in execution. The furniture was taken in execution by the high bailiff of a county court, and, no claim having been made to it, was appraised and sold under the execution and the proceeds paid into court, and the furniture delivered to the purchaser. On the day after the sale the owners heard for the first time of the seizure and sale of the furniture, and gave notice of their claim to the proceeds. An interpleader summons was issued at the instance of the high bailiff, and in the course of the interpleader proceedings the execution creditor admitted the title of the claimants, who gave a notice claiming damages against the high bailiff in respect of the alleged conversion of the furniture by selling it:—Held, that, as under the hiring agreement the claimants had a right to re-take possession immediately upon its being taken in execution, the sale by the high bailiff amounted to an act of conversion for which he was responsible in damages to them."

KENNEDY, J., said ([1905] 2 K.B. 467):

"Whatever interest the apparent possessor, the execution debtor, had in the goods seized, he had by the terms of the hire purchase agreement between him and the respondents; it was an interest terminable ipso facto on the occurrence of such a seizure as actually took place; in other words, the respondents became entitled to the possession of the goods without notice or demand immediately upon that act of seizure by the bailiff. In order to maintain an action of conversion for the subsequent sale by the bailiff, there must be a right in the plaintiff to immediate possession of, as well as a property in, the goods. In the present case there is no question that the goods sold were the property of the respondents: had they also a right to their possession at the time of the sale? In my opinion, they had, because the act of the bailiff in seizing entitled them to take possession of the goods immediately upon the seizure."

If in that case there had not been the words "without previous notice" it seems to me that it would have been precisely on all fours with the present case, and one of the problems that we have to consider is whether that makes the whole difference. There are two possibilities. One is that you can terminate the hiring on a breach by simply re-taking possession. Supposing that that is the proper construction of this clause, then clearly a person who has a right to re-take possession must necessarily have had a right to immediate possession in the events that happened. Therefore, to avoid that conclusion, it is necessary for the defendant to establish that some other act, additional to or other than re-taking possession, was necessary to terminate the hiring. The easiest one to imagine is some form of notice, and the question, to my mind, reduces itself to this: On the true construction of this contract, was any notice needed to terminate the agreement?

In answering that question, it is to be noted that, if notice is needed, it can only be by virtue of an implied term, and I can see no necessity for such an implication. Moreover, it is fair to look at sub-cl. (ii) of cl. 7, because it is apparent that the learned judge who tried the case below was influenced by the language of that clause in his construction of sub-cl. (i). Sub-clause (ii) deals with contracts of hiring other than that of the car in respect of which a breach has occurred, and it provides that, if the lessor wishes to terminate those agreements, he is to give written notice. Surely (though the learned judge drew a different inference from sub-cl. (ii)) some significance attaches to the omission of any similar words in sub-cl. (i), which lies cheek by jowl with it. There is, apparently, no direct authority on the construction of the words "may terminate the hiring," and it is a little startling that there should not be because it is the commonest form of expression in hire purchase agreements and one would have expected that there would be cases which decided whether those words implied the necessity of notice as a condition precedent to the termination of the hiring or whether a mere re-taking would in itself constitute such a termination.

That being the case, I think that on the expressio unius exclusio alterius principle of construction we ought to hold that it is possible to terminate the hire in cl. 1 without any notice and that the moment a breach of the kind covered by cl. 7 (i) occurs the owner has a right to immediate possession. I think that the law, on the authorities generally as cited to us, is correctly summarised in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW, p. 166, where the learned authors say:

"The remedies of the bailee are not always exclusive, for the bailor by reason of his right to possession may retain concurrently with him a sufficient right to maintain trespass and theft against strangers. This seems to be the case wherever the bailment is revocable by the bailor at his pleasure either unconditionally or upon a condition which he may satisfy at will. But if the bailment is for a term certain (as in the case of goods let to the tenant of furnished lodgings) or determinable only after notice or after a default by the bailee or upon any other occurrence which does not depend on the will of the bailor, then until the term has expired or been determined or become determinable at will it seems that the bailor is excluded and cannot maintain either trespass or theft or trover even against a stranger."

If the bailor in this case had a right to terminate this hiring at will the moment after a breach such as has occurred in this case, then it seems to me that within that language it becomes a case in which the bailor has an immediate right to possession, and can sue a third party in conversion. For those reasons, I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons, but, as we are differing from the learned judge in the court below, I will add a few words of my own. The case is not altogether an easy one. It turns, as the learned judge said, on the question whether, on the true construction of the contract and in the events which have happened, the plaintiffs became entitled to possession. As a matter of construction, I agree with ASQUITH, L.J., that cl. 7 (i) of the agreement does not require notice as a condition precedent to the exercise by the plaintiffs of their right to terminate the hire. They can, I think, terminate the hire in any appropriate way, including the most obvious way of taking possession of the car. That being so, I think that Jelks v. Hayward (2) is clear authority for the view that the plaintiffs were in a position to maintain an action for trover. A

I must further point out that Mr. Cole, in instructing the defendant to sell, and in selling, the car, committed a breach of the contract which goes to the root of it. In those circumstances, a passage in HALSBURY, Hailsham ed., vol. 1, p. 736, para. 1211, seems in point. It says:

"The act of the bailee in doing something inconsistent with the terms of the contract terminates the bailment, causing the possessory title to revert to the bailor, and entitling him to maintain an action of trover." B

That view is stated in somewhat similar language in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW, p. 132, where it is said:

"Any act or disposition which is wholly repugnant to or as it were an absolute disclaimer of the holding as bailee re-vests the bailor's right to possession, and therefore also his immediate right to maintain trover or detain even where the bailment is for a term or is otherwise not revocable at will, and so a fortiori in a bailment determinable at will." C

The authority cited for both those passages is Fenn v. Bittleston (4), the relevant passage occurring in the judgment of PARKE, B. (7 Exch. 159). D

Those passages, which seem to me, if I may respectfully say so, to be a correct statement of the law, definitely support the view which my brother has expressed, namely, that the plaintiffs are in a position to maintain an action in trover. Counsel for the defendant says that they only apply where the contract is silent on the subject, and that here the contract provides what is to happen in the event of a breach of any stipulation and merely gives the right to terminate the contract. That, he says, is something distinct from a right to enter into possession, and the latter right is only exercisable after notice has been given to terminate the contract. As I have said, I do not so construe the contract, and I am glad to find that the construction which I place on it accords with the view of what the law would be in the absence of express provision, and, if I may say so respectfully, with what is a very reasonable position in the circumstances of the case. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed. E F

Divorce—Costs—Poor person—Discretion to order poor person to pay opponent's costs unfettered—Order for payment of profit costs in "special circumstances"—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (1) and r. 31B (1) (2).

A A husband and wife, both suing as poor persons, brought petitions for the dissolution of their marriage. The commissioner found for the wife on both petitions, but he refused an application by the wife for an order for the payment by the husband of her out-of-pocket costs on the ground that under R.S.C., Ord. 16, rr. 28 (1) and 31B (1), in the absence of special circumstances a successful poor person was not entitled to receive costs from the other party to the proceedings.

B HELD: under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), the discretion of the court to order the husband to pay the out-of-pocket expenses of the wife is unfettered; Olds v. Olds ([1948] 2 All E.R. 61), followed. The provisions of Ord. 16, r. 31 (B) (1), relate only to the making, on special circumstances being shown, of an order for the payment to the poor person in respect of profit costs.

E APPEAL from a decision of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., dated Jan. 11, 1950, refusing to make an order for the payment in divorce proceedings by an unsuccessful poor person husband of the out-of-pocket costs of the successful poor person wife. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Tyndale, K.C., and Stuckey for the wife.

Middleton, K.C., and Arnold-Baker for the husband.

F BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., made on Jan. 11, 1950, whereby he refused to order the husband to pay the wife's poor persons' out-of-pocket costs. At the material time both husband and wife were poor persons. The wife brought a petition on the ground of cruelty and succeeded. The husband denied cruelty and asked for a decree to be pronounced in his favour because of his wife's desertion, but that was refused.

G The case was heard by the commissioner on June 15, 1949. On that day, when the commissioner was asked to award to the wife out-of-pocket costs, he said:

H "With regard to the costs of these two petitions, both the husband and wife are poor persons. The wife has succeeded on both petitions, but, though I have found the husband guilty of cruelty, it is not the type of case which casts any reflection against him as a man. It is simply these two individuals do not fit. The husband is a person of much greater sexual vigour than the wife, and, although his behaviour does, in fact, amount to cruelty towards the wife, it is a pure misfortune. It is not a case in which I should feel it proper to make any special order, and, therefore, the question what is the proper order to make as to costs reduces itself to a question of what is the proper interpretation of the poor persons' rules in the absence of any special circumstances. If it were not a poor persons' case, on those facts I should almost automatically exercise my discretion by saying that the husband should pay his wife's costs unless there were good reasons shown to the contrary. Here the difficulty is because of the apparent conflict of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (1) and r. 31B (1). As at present advised, I think the proper interpretation of those two rules together is that in the absence of any special circumstance a poor person pays no costs whether to a poor person or to an ordinary litigant. However, it is argued on behalf of the wife that apart from any special circumstances the ordinary rule would be that he would pay poor persons' costs to the successful party. As it is desirable this matter should be more fully argued I express no further opinion."

The question was then adjourned for further argument.

As regards the normal practice about poor persons' costs counsel for the wife (who has had great experience in poor persons' cases) informed the court that the usual rule is to give the poor person wife her out-of-pocket costs if she is successful against her poor person husband. So far as my experience goes, as judge of first instance in the Divorce Division for some years, I frequently made such an order and do not remember refusing to make such an order if asked to do so. I think the commissioner has not taken the usual practice sufficiently into consideration, and was in error in this preliminary judgment when he said that unless there are special circumstances "a poor person pays no costs whether to a poor person or an ordinary litigant." I read those words of the commissioner as meaning that the poor persons' rules which deal with costs prohibit the judge from granting to the successful wife any costs unless there are special circumstances.

I must refer to the two rules which are most relevant to the point. They are part of R.S.C., Ord. 16. Rule 28 (1) provides:

"No court fee shall be payable in respect of the filing of the certificate nor in respect of the memorandum to be issued under r. 27 of this Order and after such filing the poor person named in the certificate shall not be liable for any court fees and unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order no poor person shall be liable to pay costs to any other party or be entitled to receive from any other party any profit costs or charges."

It is clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Olds v. Olds (1) that this rule gives the judge who tries the case an absolute discretion to give the poor person his or her costs against another person who is a poor person. Rule 31B (2) says:

"Where it appears to the court or a judge that any other party has acted unreasonably in bringing or defending the proceedings or in his conduct of them, or that the special circumstances of the case require it, the court or judge may order the other party to pay the costs of the poor person, including profit costs, or a proportion of profit costs, or a sum of money in respect thereof, in addition to out-of-pocket expenses properly incurred in the course of the proceedings but not fees to counsel . . ."

The other party therein referred to clearly also includes some one who is not a poor person. I think that the commissioner read into r. 28 (1) a limitation as regards the special circumstances referred to in r. 31B (2) which he ought not to have done, because by so doing he fettered the absolute discretion given to the judge under r. 28 to make an order as to costs if he was so minded.

That having taken place on June 15, 1949, in January, 1950, the matter was further argued and leading counsel were brought in because the case appeared to raise a question of general importance. The commissioner then gave a more elaborate judgment and in its course he said:

"The wife succeeded. On the facts of the case I was of opinion that there was no ground on which I ought to make any special order. Counsel for the wife who had succeeded said that in those circumstances on a proper interpretation of the poor persons rules, that is to say, R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 22, onwards, the wife should receive what are usually called poor persons' costs, namely, her out-of-pocket expenses. On the other hand, on behalf of the husband, it was argued that he, being a poor person should not, in the absence of a special order, pay costs . . . For convenience I will use the phrase 'special order' (used by TUCKER, L.J., in Olds v. Olds (1)) to mean an order ordering otherwise than under r. 28 (1). Using that phrase, r. 28 (1) provides (i) unless there is a special order 'no poor person shall be liable to pay costs to any other party'; and (ii) unless there is a special order 'no poor person shall be entitled to receive from any other party any profit costs or charges.' One is a limitation on the liability of a poor person to pay costs; the other is a limitation upon the right of the poor person to receive costs, and, apart from any special order, first he is not liable to pay any costs at all, and, secondly, he is not entitled to receive any profit costs or charges."

Later, he said:

"If there is no special order then it appears to me that r. 28 (1) covers the matter. A poor person is not liable to pay any costs and is not entitled to receive from any other party any profit costs or charges . . . If there is no reason for a special order, what happens then? Does the poor person wife get her out-of-pocket expenses or does the poor person husband pay nothing?

Then he cited from the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., in Olds v. Olds (1), and eventually summarised the position this way:

"If the husband is a poor person, the wife does not get her costs, apart from a special order. I see no reason why, if she is also a poor person, she should get out-of-pocket expenses because she is a wife, apart from a special order. On the true interpretation of these sections I think there has to be an affirmative exercise of the court's discretion under r. 28 (1), what, in this judgment, I have called a special order, to entitle a successful poor person to receive costs from an unsuccessful poor person."

With great respect to the commissioner, I think, that he erroneously tried to read r. 28 in the light of r. 31B. His constant use of the phrase "special order," which is not in the rules, seems to indicate that. I cannot see why an order giving poor persons' costs to a successful wife against her unsuccessful husband should be regarded as a special order. All that r. 28 requires is that there should be an order by the court to that effect, and an order to pay costs is required in every case. I think that the commissioner has misdirected himself in this respect and that it would be unfortunate if his judgment were to stand because it seems to me to indicate that, unless there are circumstances which justify a special order, a poor person wife is not entitled to get her out-of-pocket costs from her poor person husband. There is no point in using the word "special" unless there are special circumstances calling for it. That being so, I think that this is a case in which it is proper for us to reverse the decision of the commissioner. I think the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: In Olds v. Olds (1) this court held that the power under r. 28 to order a poor person to pay costs was in the unfettered discretion of the court. The commissioner seems to have felt himself fettered by considering that there ought to be "special circumstances." That, I think, was wrong. When a poor person wife brings a suit against a poor person husband, the court has an unfettered discretion to order the husband to pay the out-of-pocket expenses of the wife and has repeatedly done so for many years. So long as the court realises that it is making an order against a poor person, the order for costs is perfectly good, even though it does not say on its face that it is a discretionary order. If Collins v. Collins and Dove (2) decides the contrary, I cannot agree with it. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. The wife was a poor person, and, therefore, under r. 31B she could not recover more than her out-of-pocket expenses unless there were special circumstances, but there the relevance of r. 31B in this case ceases as no more than out-of-pocket expenses were claimed. I can see here no possibility of any conflict between r. 28 and r. 31B. It seems to me that the commissioner had to consider whether under r. 28 he should "otherwise order," because it is plain that, if he did not "otherwise order," the respondent husband, as a poor person, would not be liable to pay any costs. In considering whether he would "otherwise order," he had an unfettered discretion. It seems to me that he did not fully appreciate that he was thus placed, but that he felt that there was some limitation on his discretion. It would also seem that he did not take account of what I understand to be the prevailing practice in regard to poor persons in divorce matters. I, accordingly, agree that this appeal should be allowed.

HYDE v. HYDE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), March 22, 1950.]

County Court—Appeal—Claim exceeding £200—Issue tried in county court by consent—Decision on question of fact—Right of appeal—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE PUGH, made at Bow County Court on Dec. 14, 1949.

Elson Rees for the defendant.

Lester for the plaintiff.

Case referred to:

(1) Braddock v. Tillotsons Newspapers, Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 306; [1950] 1 K.B. 47.

The parties to the action agreed to the issue being tried in the county court, although the amount claimed by the plaintiff exceeded £200. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the facts of the case, and the defendant thereupon appealed to the Court of Appeal for leave to adduce further evidence.

HELD: in a case which had been tried by consent in the county court the right of appeal was the same as in all other cases tried in the county court, and, as there was no point of law in the case, but merely a question of fact, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, no appeal lay.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), February 22, 23, March 8, 1950.]

Perpetuities—Settlement—Limitation dependent on void limitation—Accord with previous valid limitations—“Issue.”

A By a deed of declaration of trust a settlor settled certain investments (called “the trust fund”) on trust to pay one half of the annual income thereof to his wife during her life and the other half thereof to his daughter during her life, and to pay the whole of the said income to the survivor of his wife and his said daughter. On the death of the survivor the trustees were directed to stand possessed of the trust fund in trust in equal shares for all or any the children of his said daughter then living who attained the age of twenty-one years or being female married under that age, and to hold each such child's share on trust to pay the income thereof to such child for his or her life. The settlor further provided: “6. After the death of each of such children the capital and income of the share of such child shall be held in trust for all or any one or more exclusively of the others or other of the issue of such child (whether children or remoter descendants) at such time and if more than one in such shares with such provisions for maintenance education advancement and otherwise at the discretion of any persons and with such gifts over and generally in such manner for the benefit of such issue or some or one of them as such child shall by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint but so that under any appointment a child of the appointor shall not (otherwise than by way of advancement) take a vested interest except upon attaining the age of twenty-one years or upon marriage And in default of and until and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any the children or child of such child who attains the age of twenty-one years or being female marry under that age and if more than one in equal shares. . . . 8. Upon the death of the survivor of the wife and the said daughter and in the event of the said daughter dying without leaving issue who attains a vested interest the trustees shall sell and convert into money such part of the trust fund as does not consist of money and shall distribute the proceeds in manner following . . .” and the settlor gave certain sums of money to various charities and directed that the balance of the trust fund be distributed amongst certain named persons. On May 11, 1939, the settlor died. On Nov. 10, 1948, the settlor's daughter died, having married, but without there having been issue of her marriage. The settlor's widow survived the daughter.

G HELD: (i) on the construction of the deed, the word “issue” in cl. 8 was referable exclusively to cl. 6 and was not intended to include children of the daughter; as cl. 6 was admittedly void for perpetuity, cl. 8 was limited to operate on the failure of a class which, had it come into being, would have been precluded from taking; and, therefore, cl. 8, which did not accord with previous valid limitations, was also void.

Monypenny v. Dering (1852) (22 L.J.Ch. 313) and Re Thatcher's Trusts (1859) (26 Beav. 365), applied.

H (ii) although the gift of income to the survivor of the widow and the daughter was not expressly limited to endure only for her life, having regard to the other provisions of the deed such a limitation should be implied, and, in the circumstances, the corpus of the trust fund would, on the widow's death, result to settlor's estate.

Cur. adv. vult. D

Mar. 8. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. By the above-mentioned deed of declaration of trust the settlor, Mr. Henry Mill, settled certain investments for the benefit of his widow and his daughter and any children or remoter issue that his daughter might have. In the event of his daughter, who was then a spinster, leaving no issue who should attain a vested interest, the settlor introduced certain beneficial dispositions in favour of charities (including the defendants, the Jewish Board of Guardians) and others under a gift over, and it is the terms in which the gift over is expressed that has in part given rise to the present application. E

So far as material the deed is in the following terms:

"2. The trustees shall stand possessed of the investments aforesaid and the varied investments for the time being representing the same (all of which are hereinafter referred to as 'the trust fund') and of the annual income of the trust fund upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers hereafter declared concerning the same. 3. The trustees shall pay one half of the annual income of the trust fund to the wife of the settlor during her life and the other half thereof to his daughter Agnes Martha Mill (hereinafter called 'his said daughter') during her life and from and after the death of either his wife or his said daughter the trustees shall pay the whole of the said annual income to the survivor of them. 4. From and after the death of the survivor the trustees shall stand possessed of the trust fund in trust in equal shares for all or any the children of his said daughter living at the death of the survivor of his wife and his said daughter who attains the age of twenty-one years or being female marry under that age. 5. The trustees shall stand possessed of the share of each of such children or the investments representing the same and the accumulations (if any) of income made during his or her life and while unmarried which investments and accumulations are hereinafter included in the description of such child's share (subject to any advancement which may be made for his or her benefit under the power for that purpose hereinafter mentioned) upon trust to pay the income thereof to such child for his or her life. 6. After the death of each of F G H such children the capital and income of the share of such child shall be held in trust for all or any one or more exclusively of the others or other of the issue of such child (whether children or remoter descendants) at such time and if more than one in such shares with such provisions for maintenance education advancement and otherwise at the discretion of any persons and with such gifts over and generally in such manner for the benefit of such issue or some or one of them as such child shall by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint but so that under any appointment a child of the appointor shall not (otherwise than by way of advancement) take a vested interest except upon attaining the age of twenty-one years or upon marriage And in default of and until and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any the children or child of such child who attains the age of twenty-one years or being female marry under that age and if more than one in equal shares. 7. Any child of such child who or whose issue takes any part of the share of such child under any appointment by such child shall not in the absence of any direction by such child to the contrary take any share in the unappointed part without bringing the share or shares appointed to him or her or his or her issue into hotchpot and accounting for the same accordingly. 8. Upon the death of the survivor of the wife and the said daughter and in the event of the said daughter dying without leaving issue who attains a vested interest the trustees shall sell and convert into money such part of the trust fund as does not consist of money and shall distribute the proceeds in manner following that is to say. . . ” and the settlor then gave certain sums of money to various bodies including one of £100 to the Jewish Board of Guardians, and then directed the distribution of the balance of the trust fund among certain named persons. Clause 9 provides: “The statutory power of advancement shall apply for the benefit of any child or other issue of the said daughter.”

The settlor died on May 11, 1939. He was sole trustee of the trust fund during his lifetime, and the plaintiffs and the first defendant (the settlor's widow) are now the trustees of the deed, they being the settlor's legal personal representatives. The trust fund is of an approximate value of £23,000. The settlor's daughter, described in the settlement as Agnes Martha Mill, married the defendant, Israel Levine, but there was no issue of the marriage. She died on Nov. 10, 1948, intestate, and letters of administration issued on Dec. 17, 1948, out of the Exeter District Registry to her husband and her mother.

Accordingly, as matters now stand, the whole income of the trust fund is payable to the settlor's widow, but the parties are anxious to know now what are the trusts, in the events which have happened, that affect the corpus of the fund. It is argued on behalf of the settlor's widow and the daughter's estate that the gift over of the fund by cl. 8 of the settlement is void. On the other hand, the defendants, the Jewish Board of Guardians, as representing the beneficiaries under that clause, are concerned to maintain its validity. Now, although, had cl. 4 of the settlement stood alone, children of the settlor's daughter would (subject to surviving the widow and fulfilling the requisite age or marriage qualification) have taken the corpus of the fund, the effective gifts of capital are to be found in cl. 6, and these gifts, which are in favour of grandchildren and remoter issue, were, accordingly, intended to qualify or cut down the earlier interests conferred on the children by cl. 4. The gifts in cl. 6, however, are manifestly void in that they infringe the rule against perpetuity. The event on which the gift over in cl. 8 is to take effect is the event of the daughter dying without leaving issue who attains a vested interest. Counsel for the settlor's family contend that this is one compound event and that, as the settlor did not himself “split” the event into two alternatives, cases such as Re Bence (1) show that the court will not divide up the event itself. They, accordingly, contend that, inasmuch as cl. 6 is admittedly invalid, cl. 8 is equally so as being dependent on it. They further contend that the gift over must necessarily fail in that it does not "dovetail in" with the earlier valid trusts, namely, those declared by cl. 4 and cl. 5, and as to this I was referred to Monypenny v. Dering (2).

Counsel for the charities concedes that the event on which the gift over is expressed to take effect cannot be split into alternative events, but he claims that the gift is valid on the following grounds. He argues that the gift over does not offend against the perpetuity rule because the words in cl. 8 "dying without leaving issue" mean "dying without leaving issue living at the death of the daughter"; and in this connection reliance was placed on Re Davey (3). Such issue, it is said, could consist of children of the daughter (taking under cl. 4) or more remote issue (taking under cl. 6) and that as a child or grandchild, living at the daughter's death, would attain a vested interest (if at all) not later than twenty-one years from such death no question of remoteness can arise. As to this, it is true that if the daughter had had children they might well have taken by virtue of the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (4) on failure of the trusts grafted on their original shares. As a question of construction, however, I am of opinion that the word "issue" in cl. 8 is referable exclusively to cl. 6 and was not intended to include children of the daughter. There is a clear distinction drawn in the settlement between children of the daughter and more remote issue. It is to the latter alone that the enjoyment of the capital was intended to pass, and it is with reference to them alone that the words "vested interest" had previously been used. Accordingly, in my judgment, the event referred to in cl. 8 is the event of the daughter dying without leaving grand-children or remoter issue who attain a vested interest under cl. 6. Is, then, this gift over good? It appears to me that it is not. On the footing that "leaving" postulates living at the death, one may assume the case of the daughter outliving her mother and dying survived by a daughter and such daughter's infant son. Had cl. 6 been valid that grandchild of the settlor's daughter would attain a vested interest at twenty-one and, in that event, the gift over to the charities under cl. 8 would never have taken effect. On the other hand, as cl. 6 is wholly invalid, the grandchild could never attain a vested interest even if it did attain twenty-one. The settlor only intended the charities to take if the grandchild died before twenty-one, and, in my opinion, the charities could not claim to take on an event in which they were never intended to take and in the place of a person, namely, the grandchild, who was intended to take.

The principle applicable is, in my judgment, that propounded by LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., in Monypenny v. Dering (2) and commented on by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in Re Thatcher's Trusts (5). So far as material the headnote in Monypenny v. Dering (2) is:

"J.M. by his will devised the Maytham Hall estate, being of gavelkind tenure, to trustees upon trust to sell a competent part for the payment of debts, and subject thereto upon trust for P.M. for life, and after his decease for the first son of P.M. for life, and after his decease for the first son of such first son and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue, for every other son of P.M. successively for the like interests and limitations, and in default of issue of the body of P.M., or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, for T.M. for life, and after his decease for T.G.M. the eldest son of T.M. for life, and after his decease for the first son of T.G.M. and the heirs male of his body, and in default of issue of the body of the said T.G.M., for every other son of T.M. successively for the like estates and interests, and on failure of all such issue of the body of T.M., upon trust for him, his heirs and assigns for ever; P.M. never had any children:—Held, that P.M. took an estate for life with remainder to his first unborn son, if such son had been born, and that all the remainders over were void:—Held, also, that effect was to be given to the gift over to T.M. and his sons in default of issue of the body of P.M. etc., as an independent clause, and that it was consequently valid . . . Where there are gifts over which are void for perpetuity, and there is a subsequent and independent clause on a gift over which is within the line of perpetuity, effect cannot be given to such clause unless it will accord with previous valid limitations."

A It is with reference to that proposition alone that I wish to refer to LORD ST. LEONARDS' judgment. He deals with it as follows (2 De G.M. & G. 180):

"This brings me to the clause containing the gift over, and a very important question is certainly raised on that clause. After having provided for the unborn children and issue of unborn children of Phillips Monypenny, the testator says, 'And in default of issue of the body of my said brother, Phillips Monypenny, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, upon trust for my said brother, Thomas Monypenny, for and during the term of his natural life,' etc. If this was a regular remainder, depending upon the previous limitations, it would, of course, be open to the same objections as those limitations, and, those limitations being void, it could not take effect. The law, as to this part of the case, stands in a peculiar position. The case of Longhead v. Phelps (6) shews that where there are two clauses containing a gift over, the first being a good gift over on a particular event, and the second being one which would be too remote, and therefore void, advantage may be taken of the former without any notice being taken of the latter clause. The point did not arise in the case just mentioned on a gift over following any disposition illegal on account of perpetuity; but it did so arise in a very important case which was not cited, and which was very much agitated both in this court and the courts of Common Law, I mean Beard v. Westcott (7). There were in that case successive life estates for terms of years to the testator's grandson and his unborn issue (as in Somerville v. Lethbridge (8)), which were clearly void beyond the first son, and then followed a disposition to this effect: 'And in case there shall be no issue male of the same John James Beard (the testator's grandson), nor issue of such issue male at the time of his death, or in case there shall be such issue male at that time, and they shall all die before they shall respectively attain their respective ages of twenty-one years without lawful issue male,' then the estate was to go over. The case was sent to the Court of Common Pleas, and they were of opinion (that part of the case is cited in a note to GILBERT ON USES, p. 270) that the several gifts, after the gift to the unborn son of the grandson, were void, but they were also of opinion that, if the event mentioned arose, the gift over would take effect, the event in question being within the legal limits of perpetuity. With this decision I could not agree, and for this reason, that the testator never meant that the gift over should take effect unless the parties interested under the previous limitation, if they had lived, were capable themselves of taking, and that, consequently, the gift over must be void. Having had great difficulty in prevailing on SIR WILLIAM GRANT to send the case to the Court of Common Pleas originally, and that court having decided that the consideration I have just stated did not affect the validity of the gift over, I applied to and prevailed on LORD ELDON to send a case to the Court of King's Bench. That court held that the gift over was void, not because it was not within the line of perpetuity, but expressly on the ground I have adverted to, namely, that that limitation over was never intended by the testator to take effect, unless the persons whom he intended to take under the previous limitation would, if they had been alive, been capable of enjoying the estate, and that he did not intend that the estate should wait for persons to take in a given event, where the person to take was actually in existence but could not take; and LORD ELDON affirmed that decision.

This shews that where there are gifts over which are void for perpetuity, and there is a subsequent and independent clause on a gift over which is within the line of perpetuities, effect cannot be given to such a clause unless it will dovetail in and accord with previous limitations which are valid. This reasoning will apply to the case before me in this manner; if the gift in question can be read as a gift in the alternative, that, in case there is no issue living at the death of the brother, the estate is to go over, then effect may be given to it consistently with Beard v. Westcott (7) and every other authority, because the estate over would not be carried under the limitation at the expense of any person whom the testator intended to take, and no objection on this ground could consequently be raised."

In Re Thatcher's Trusts (5) the headnote is:

B

"The testator by his will, dated in 1835, gave one-fifteenth of the produce of his real and personal estate to his grand-daughter Elizabeth Hobbs for life, and after her decease in trust for the child, if only one, and if more than one, for the children of her, the said Elizabeth Hobbs, the grand-daughter, to be equally divided between or among the same children, if more than one, share and share alike, and to be vested in such of the same children as should be a son or sons when he or they should attain the age or respective ages of twenty-five years, or die under that age leaving issue, at his or their death or respective deaths, and on such of the same children as should be a daughter or daughters, when she or they respectively should attain the age or respective ages of twenty-five years, or be married (with consent), which as to each of them should first happen, and to be payable as soon after the respective ages or days should be attained, and also after the death of the said Elizabeth Hobbs, his grand-daughter, as conveniently might be. And in case any child of Elizabeth Hobbs 'should depart this life, being a son or sons, under the age of twenty-five years, without leaving any issue living at the time of his or their death or respective deaths, or being a daughter or daughters should die under that age and without having been married' with consent, then her share was to be divided between the other children. 'And in case there should be no child of Elizabeth Hobbs, who being a son should attain the age of twenty-five years, or die under that age leaving issue, or being a daughter should attain that age or be married with consent,' the fund was to be held in trust, as to one moiety, for William Hobbs, and as to the other moiety upon the same trusts as were thereinbefore declared respecting another one-fifteenth, which the testator had previously bequeathed to Ann Tuckwell for her life, and afterwards to her children in a similar manner. But in case the said William Hobbs and Ann Tuckwell should both have departed this life without leaving any child or children, or the issue of any deceased child, then the fund was to be held in trust for the testator's next of kin."

The Master of the Rolls, after holding that the gift to the children of Elizabeth Hobbs, was void for remoteness, said (26 Beav. 369):

G

"Then arises the question, whether the gift over to Mrs. Tuckwell for life is good, this being a limitation to a person in existence at the date of the will. The distinctions on this subject are well defined, although they may not be in every case susceptible of a ready application to the particular words of a will. On the one hand, it is clearly settled that if there be two alternative limitations, one branch of which is too remote, and the other of which is capable of taking effect, the court will disregard the invalid limitation and give effect to that which is legal. Longhead v. Phelps (6) is an instance of this distinction, which rests on sound and settled rules of construction. On the other hand, if the limitations are ulterior to or expectant upon limitations which are too remote, they are void also, although made to a person in existence at the date of the will. The case of Beard v. Westcott (7) and Monypenny v. Dering (2) are instances of the second class of cases. Nothing can be more distinct than the mode in which this is explained by LORD ST. LEONARDS, both in his argument and also in his judgment in Monypenny v. Dering (2)."

I might point out there that when SIR JOHN ROMILLY refers to LORD ST. LEONARDS' argument he is referring to his argument in Beard v. Westcott (7). At first sight it looks as though he argued and delivered judgment in Monypenny v. Dering (2). Then the judgment goes on (ibid., 370): "He says that the Court of King's Bench held the gift over in Beard v. Westcott (7) void." He cites from a judgment of LORD ST. LEONARDS which I have already read, and goes on to say (ibid.):

"This is strictly applicable to the present case; it is impossible here to say that the limitation to Mrs. Tuckwell is an alternative limitation; it is clearly one expectant upon the failure of the previous limitation to the children. It does not, to use the words of LORD ST. LEONARDS, 'dovetail in and accord with previous limitations which are valid' but it is intended not to take effect unless the children, whom he intended to take effect under the previous limitation, would have been capable of taking. The testator never intended Mrs. Tuckwell to take if there were children in existence but who were prevented by law from taking. I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole limitation fails, and that an order must be made in accordance with the prayer of the petition."

Applying the principles stated in these judgments to the present case, it seems to me impossible to say that the gift to the charities "dovetails in and accords with previous limitations which are valid." Such previous limitations are those to the daughter's children in cl. 4 and cl. 5, and the gift over in cl. 8 in no sense fits in with them. Indeed, unless it is read in relation to cl. 6, it is not intelligible at all. In my judgment, the gift over is expectant on the failure of a class (or certain members of a class) which the settlor intended to benefit, but which, had it come into being, would have been precluded by law from taking and is avoided by the principles recognised in the two decisions to which I have referred.

The next question that arises is whether, in these circumstances, the fund subject to the trusts of the deed (a) is held in trust for the defendant, Annie Mill, absolutely as to both income and capital, or (b) subject to a life interest for the said defendant, devolves by way of resulting trust on the estate of the settlor. The suggestion that the first defendant is entitled to the fund absolutely is founded on the fact that, whereas, by cl. 3, the income of the fund is originally divided between the widow and daughter expressly for their respective lives, the trust which is to take effect on the death of either of them is "to pay the whole of the said annual income to the survivor of them," no reference to the life of the survivor being expressed. Although an indefinite gift of income may in some cases be tantamount to a gift of the corpus which produces the income, it is, I think, reasonably clear in the case of this settlement that the survivor of the settlor's widow and daughter were only intended to take the income for life, having regard to the other provisions of the deed, and I have no difficulty in implying such a limitation in cl. 3. The result is that, subject to Mrs. Mill's life interest, the trust fund devolves on the settlor's estate by way of resulting trust.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the settled fund.

WALTER v. ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), March 13, 1950.]

Local Government—Superannuation—Decision of claim by “ authority concerned ” —Scheme administered by county council—Employees of rural district council entitled to participate—Claim to annual superannuation allowance by former employee of rural district council—Claim admitted by rural district council, but rejected by county council—Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (c. 68), s. 35.

The plaintiff, who was employed by a rural district council, was entitled, under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 4 (1), to participate in the benefits of a superannuation fund maintained by the county council. Under s. 1 (3) of the Act, the county council were the “ administering authority ” of the fund. On giving notice that he was unable, owing to ill-health, to continue to discharge his duties efficiently, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled, under s. 8 of the Act, to an annual superannuation allowance. His claim was admitted by the rural district council, but rejected by the county council, and his appeal from the decision of the county council was dismissed by the Minister of Health. In an action by the plaintiff against the two councils, claiming a declaration that he was entitled to a superannuation allowance, the county council contended that, under s. 35 of the Act, the Minister's determination of the question was final. The plaintiff contended that the question was not one for the determination of the Minister under s. 35, because the rural district council were “ the authority concerned ” within the meaning of the section, and, as they had accepted his claim, the county council, as the “ administering authority,” were merely under a duty to pay him.

HELD: it was the right and duty of the “ administering authority ” to see that an employee, who claimed to be paid out of the fund, was entitled to be paid; therefore, the county council, being the “ administering authority ” of the fund, were “ the authority concerned,” within the meaning of s. 35; and, accordingly, the determination of the Minister on the appeal from their decision was final, and the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaration asked for.

[FOR THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1937, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., p. 569.]

ACTION against the Eton Rural District Council and the Buckinghamshire County Council claiming a declaration that the plaintiff, a former employee of the rural district council, was entitled, under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 8, to an annual superannuation allowance out of the superannuation fund which was maintained and administered by the county council and in which the employees of the rural district council were entitled to participate. The plaintiff's claim to an allowance was admitted by the rural district council, but rejected by the county council who contended that he was not entitled to the declaration as the Minister had dismissed his appeal from the decision of the county council, and, under s. 35 of the Act, the determination of the Minister was final. The facts appear in the judgment.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and Ronald Bernstein for the first defendants, Eton Rural District Council.

Simes, K.C., and Roots for the second defendants, Buckinghamshire County Council.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The plaintiff, a former employee of the Eton Rural District Council, has brought this action against that authority and the

A county council of Buckinghamshire claiming a declaration that he is entitled to be paid an annual superannuation allowance under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, at the appropriate rate. The rural district council have put in a defence to the effect that, in their view, which they have stated, the plaintiff is entitled to be paid and he should not have brought the action against them. The second defendants, the county council, say, in effect, that the question whether he is entitled to a superannuation allowance has to be decided by them and not by the rural district council, and that, as they have decided against him and his appeal from their decision has been dismissed by the Minister under s. 35 of the Act, he is not entitled to the declaration.

B Under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 1 (1), a superannuation fund has to be established by certain local authorities. The Buckinghamshire County Council already had such a fund, and, under s. 4 (1) of the Act, the fund maintained by them is the appropriate superannuation fund in relation to the plaintiff, as, by an admission agreement made in 1925, the employees of the rural district council are entitled to participate in the benefit of the fund maintained by the county council. By s. 1 (3) of the Act, the county council are the "administering authority" of the fund. By s. 35:

C "Any question concerning the rights or liabilities of an employee of a local authority, or of a person claiming to be treated as such an employee, under any of the provisions of Part I or this Part of this Act, or any regulations made under this Act, shall be decided in the first instance by the authority concerned, and if the employee is dissatisfied with any such decision or with the authority's failure to come to a decision, shall be determined by the Minister, and the Minister's determination shall be final."

D The plaintiff gave notice to the rural district council that, by reason of permanent ill-health and infirmity of body, he was unable to discharge his duties efficiently. The rural district council accepted his notice, agreed that he was in the state of health described, and forwarded the notice to the county council. The plaintiff then claimed that, as a contributory employee to the superannuation fund, he was entitled, under s. 8 of the Act, to receive an annual superannuation allowance.

E It is contended by the county council that I cannot decide the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to the allowance, as, under s. 35 of the Act, it is one for the Minister, with whom the final decision rests. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that this is not a question for the Minister because the authority concerned in this case is the rural district council, and, as they have decided that the plaintiff is entitled to the superannuation allowance, the county council, as the "administering authority," are merely under a duty to pay him. I should like to be able to accept that argument, but I do not think I can.

F The words used in s. 35 are: "Any question concerning the rights ... of an employee of a local authority, or of a person claiming to be treated as such an employee ... shall be decided in the first instance by the authority concerned ..." and the question is: Who are "the authority concerned"? G Counsel for the county council contends that "the authority concerned" is the authority who have to administer the fund. He points out that s. 8 of the Act merely gives an employee the right to receive a superannuation allowance if certain conditions are fulfilled, and does not confer a right or duty on any authority to make a decision, and, therefore, it is the authority who have to pay, i.e., the "administering authority," who must satisfy themselves that the employee has brought himself within the provisions of s. 8, and, if he has not done so, the "administering authority" cannot pay, and have the right and the duty to refuse to pay. I think that the argument of counsel for the county council is right. "The administering authority" have to see to the proper application of the fund and, if an employee claims to be paid out of it, it seems to me that the body who have the duty of paying must satisfy themselves that he has the right to be paid. If they decide that he is not entitled to be paid, and the employee is dissatisfied with their decision, then, under s. 35 of the Act, the question concerning the rights of the employee is to be determined by the Minister, whose determination is to be final. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that this action fails.

BORTHWICK-NORTON AND OTHERS v. ROMNEY WARWICK ESTATES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Cohen and Singleton, L.J.J.), March 15, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Suffering premises to be used as a brothel—User by sub-tenant—Knowledge of tenant—Imputation of knowledge—Relief—Exercise of discretion of court—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 146 (2).

The lease of certain premises contained a covenant by the tenants not to do, or suffer to be done, on the premises any act which might be an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the landlords or their tenants, and to use them as a private dwelling-house only, and there was a proviso for re-entry in the event of a breach of covenant. The premises had been divided into a number of flats, and in 1947 the tenants sub-let the top flat to Mrs. Y. Complaints regarding Mrs. Y.'s conduct and the manner in which she was using her flat were made to the tenants by their sub-tenants in other flats on the premises, but the tenants took no steps to ascertain whether or not the allegations were true. On Aug. 30, 1948, Mrs. Y. was convicted of keeping the flat as a brothel. On Sept. 14 the tenants gave her notice to quit, and she thereupon vacated the flat. Pursuant to the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1), the landlords served a notice on the tenants complaining that they had committed a breach of covenant by suffering the premises to be used as a brothel. In an action by the landlords for forfeiture and possession, the tenants contended that they had not suffered the premises to be used as a brothel because they had no knowledge that they were being used in that manner. The judge held that the law would impute knowledge to them as they had received sufficient warning of what was going on on the premises, but had wilfully shut their eyes to the true state of affairs. Accordingly, he found them guilty of a breach of covenant, and, having regard to their conduct, he held that they were not entitled to relief under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925. The tenants appealed.

HELD: (i) there was ample evidence to support the conclusion of the judge that the tenants had deliberately shut their eyes to the true state of affairs, and, therefore, they were guilty of a breach of covenant.

(ii) the discretion given to the court by s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925, to grant relief against forfeiture was not to be exercised in favour of persons who suffered premises to be used as a brothel, and, therefore, as the tenants were found guilty of a breach of covenant by suffering the premises to be used as a brothel, they were not entitled to relief under the section.

Decision of HILBERY, J. (ante, p. 362), affirmed.

[AS TO RELIEF AGAINST FORFEITURE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 260, 261, para. 293; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 487, 488, Nos. 6354-6356.]

A APPEAL by the defendant company from an order of HILBERY, J., dated Jan. 23, 1950, and reported ante, p. 362, in an action for possession of premises on the ground of breach of covenant.

B The plaintiffs were the present trustees of the Paddington Estate. In 1869 the premises, 81, Warwick Avenue, Paddington, were demised by the then trustees of the estate to John Kellond for a term of ninety-seven and a quarter years from June 24, 1869, and the lease contained a covenant by John Kellond for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns that he would not do, or suffer to be done, on the premises any act which might be, or grow to be, an annoyance, damage, or disturbance to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (who were parties to the deed), or the trustees for the time being or their tenants, and would keep and use the premises as and for a private dwelling-house only. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry by the trustees in the event of any breach of covenant. In 1938 the lease became vested in Mrs. Ada Purnell, and on June 21, 1947, the defendant company became the assignees of the residue of the term created by the lease. The defendant company was a family concern, and was managed by John Edward Purnell, the chief shareholder, and his mother, Mrs. C Ada Purnell, and the rents of the properties owned by the defendant company were collected weekly by Mr. or Mrs. Purnell. The premises, 81, Warwick Avenue, had been divided up into a number of flats or tenements, and the top flat was let by Mrs. Purnell, on behalf of the company, to a Mrs. Young. When collecting the rent from Mrs. Young, Mrs. Purnell used to go into the living room of the flat, but, according to her evidence, she "saw nothing to make her feel uncomfortable." On Aug. 30, 1948, as a result of observations kept on the premises by police officers on Aug. 18 and 19, Mrs. Young was charged with keeping the top flat as a brothel. She admitted the offence and was convicted. On Sept. 14, the defendant company served on her a notice to quit the premises, and she quitted them on Sept. 25, 1948. On Oct. 19, 1948, the solicitors for the plaintiffs wrote to Mrs. Purnell stating that they had been instructed by the plaintiffs to take the necessary steps for the forfeiture of the lease, on account of Mrs. Young's conviction, and, pursuant to the Law of Property Act, 1925, F s. 146 (1), they served a notice on the defendant company complaining that the defendants had "done or suffered to be done on the . . . premises an act which is an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the . . . trustees and that you have not used the said messuage or tenement as and for a private dwelling-house only, in that you have used or suffered to be used the same or part thereof during 1948 as a brothel contrary to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (2)." G On Oct. 25, the defendant company's solicitors wrote stating that Mrs. Purnell had no knowledge of the use to which the top floor of the premises was being put until Sept. 13, 1948, when she learnt of Mrs. Young's conviction, and that she had thereupon served Mrs. Young with a notice to quit, and they suggested that, in the circumstances, the notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, H s. 146, should be withdrawn. The plaintiffs, however, refused to withdraw the notice, and brought the action for possession. HILBERY, J., found that the defendant company had received ample warning of what was going on on the premises, and he held that it was guilty of a breach of covenant and was not entitled to relief under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the plaintiffs.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of HILBERY, J., in an action brought by the superior landlords for the forfeiture of the lease of a house in Warwick Avenue, Maida Vale. The ground on which forfeiture was sought was breach of a covenant against suffering the premises to be used in any way as an annoyance or a nuisance. The annoyance and nuisance that was alleged was that the defendant company had suffered the premises to be used as a brothel. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs and awarded them possession of the premises.

[HIS LORDSHIP set out the facts, and continued:] It is said that the learned judge was wrong in holding that Mr. Purnell and his mother, Mrs. Purnell, the two directors of the defendant company, had any knowledge that the top floor of the premises was being used by their tenant, Mrs. Young, as a brothel. The learned judge found that they ought to have known what was going on, but that they would not know. The evidence in the case shows that there had been constant complaints by other tenants in the house with regard to the conduct on the premises, i.e., noise, and riotous and disgusting behaviour. There is also no doubt (because Mr. Purnell admits it) that one of the tenants, Mr. Daltrey, complained to him that the place was being used as a brothel. Whether Daltrey used the word "bawdy-house" or the words "funny business" does not in the least matter. Purnell admits that, whatever form of words was used, he knew that Daltrey was complaining that the premises were being used as a brothel. What impressed the learned judge so strongly was that, notwithstanding these complaints, Mr. Purnell did absolutely nothing. He could have watched the premises, or caused them to be watched, or he could have spoken to the police, but he did, in fact, nothing. This was not a case of some surreptitious use being made of the premises by a prostitute, as the evidence of the police was that Mrs. Young and another woman were going, quite openly, in and out of the premises, with different men, at all hours of the afternoon and night. There is no evidence when Mrs. Young began to act as a prostitute, but she had been one long enough to be well-known to the police in that district. Mrs. Purnell and, more frequently, Mr. Purnell used to go to collect the rent at these premises, and it is certainly a remarkable state of affairs that they could have had this common prostitute living on the premises for a considerable length of time and could have gone to her flat, week in and week out, to collect the rent, and yet they did not know her character. It suggests a degree of innocence and ignorance on the part of a landlord that one can only say would be surprising. When, in addition, one finds that serious complaints were made by other tenants, and that no attempt was made to find out what was going on, it is not astonishing that the learned judge came to the conclusion that he did. In the opinion of this court, there was ample evidence to support the conclusion to which he came, viz., that Mr. and Mrs. Purnell deliberately shut their eyes to the true state of affairs. If the learned judge had found on these facts that the two directors of the company knew the use to which the premises were being put, I think that he would have been justified in doing so.

There is one matter which has been a good deal pressed on the court, although we have not heard counsel for the plaintiffs. The learned judge, having come to the conclusion that he did, said that he was supported in his conclusion by a further fact which emerged in the course of the case, and he went on to say (ante, p. 365):

"At 66, Warwick Avenue, which was also owned by the defendant company, and the rents of which were collected by Mr. or Mrs. Purnell, Mrs. Purnell retained one room, which she used as an office and in which she spent a good deal of time at all hours of the day. By September, 1948, [which is after Mrs. Young's conviction] a flat in that house was being used as a brothel, and, after the police had kept it under observation for four nights, they reported that two women were seen to take twenty-six different men to the premises. In that case also, Mrs. Purnell said that she had observed nothing irregular happening at the house."

There had been cross-examination on that point, but there was no evidence that No. 66, Warwick Avenue was being used as a brothel, and the cross-examination was, strictly, only going to credit. There was evidence of some statements made by the police in a letter, but the statements in the letter are not evidence, and the police were not called. I am not saying that they should have been called on that point, although they might have been called if their evidence had become material on the question whether the judge should exercise his discretion under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2), to grant relief against forfeiture. Be that as it may, it was, perhaps, unfortunate that so much stress was laid on this letter, and that counsel for the plaintiff returned more than once to the letter, because, as I have said, the statements in the letter were not evidence. The learned judge, however, had already shown, before referring to that fact, that his mind was not in any doubt on the matter. Before dealing with that point, he said (ante, p. 365):

"I have formed the view that, in all the circumstances, neither Mrs. Purnell nor her son wanted to know any more about what was going on."

It is only fair to the son to say that cross-examination of him with regard to that letter was not persisted in. Another matter on which there was cross-examination, and to which the learned judge evidently did not pay any attention, was whether there had not been a conviction of a man for living on the immoral earnings of the woman who was living at No. 66. There, again, I do not think that the evidence would have been material on the main issue, although it was a matter on which Mrs. Purnell could be cross-examined, but, after she had said that she did not know of this conviction, the matter ought to have been allowed to drop, because that again could only go to her credit, and it was not evidence that was material in the case, except, possibly, on the question of discretion.

In this case the question of discretion to grant relief against forfeiture, under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925, and the question of breach of covenant stand or fall together, as, had there been no knowledge on the part of the directors of the defendant company, the action would have failed, because, when the direct notice of Mrs. Young's conviction was received, they served a notice on her to quit the premises. If until that time they had had no knowledge that the premises were being used as a brothel, they would have been entitled to succeed in the action, and no question of the exercise of discretion would have come into the matter. If, on the other hand, they knew what was going on on their premises, or, as the learned judge found, they could have known if they had not deliberately refrained from taking notice, so that knowledge must be attributed to them, no one can suggest that this was a case in which discretion ought to have been exercised in their favour. The discretion which is given by s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925 is not to be exercised in favour of people who suffer premises to be used as a brothel, and the learned judge, having found that the defendant company was suffering these premises to be used as a brothel, was justified in refusing to exercise discretion in their favour. The consequence is that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

v. LAWSON AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), March 16, 1950.]

Executor—Fund for payment of legacies and legacy duty—Whether payable out of residue or primarily out of lapsed share of residue.

By her will, dated Apr. 3, 1947, a testatrix, who died on Aug. 26, 1948, gave certain specific and pecuniary legacies free of duty, and further provided: "I give devise and bequeath all my real estate and all my personal estate not hereby otherwise disposed of . . . unto my trustees upon trust that my trustees shall sell call in and convert into money the same . . . and after payment of all my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts shall stand possessed of the residue thereof in trust to pay and transfer the same equally between [A., B., C., and D.] absolutely." A. predeceased the testatrix and her share therefore lapsed, but B., C. and D. survived her.

HELD: as the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 34 (3) and sched. I, pt. II, did not provide for the incidence of legacies and the duty payable in respect of legacies given free of duty, the law in that respect which was applicable before 1926 had not been altered, and the legacies and the duty in respect thereof were payable out of the residuary estate before its division into four shares, and not primarily out of the lapsed share.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and by virtue of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 34 (3), sched. I, pt. II, the share of the testatrix's residuary estate purported to be given by her will to Bertha Lawson (who predeceased the testatrix) was primarily applicable towards the discharge of the legacies bequeathed by the said will and the duty in respect thereof, or whether the said legacies and duty were payable out of the whole residue.

J. A. Armstrong for the plaintiffs, the executors of the will.

Arthur Bagnall for the first defendant, one of the persons beneficially interested under the will in the residuary estate, who was also the personal representative of another of such persons.

The second defendant (whose interest was similar to the beneficial interest of the first defendant) was not represented at the hearing.

Winterbotham for the third defendant, interested on the testatrix's intestacy.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The testatrix made her will on Apr. 3, 1947, and died on Aug. 26, 1948, and the question which arises is in regard to the incidence of legacies given by the will and the duty payable on those legacies.

By her will, the testatrix, after appointing executors, gave certain specific articles free of duty. She then gave a number of pecuniary legacies, free of duty, and proceeded as follows:

"I give devise and bequeath all my real estate and all my personal estate not hereby otherwise disposed of (including all property over which I shall have power to appoint) unto my trustees upon trust that my trustees shall sell call in and convert into money the same or such part thereof so far as shall be necessary and after payment of all my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts shall stand possessed of the residue thereof in trust to pay and transfer the same equally between the said Minnie Lawson Isabel Lawson Bertha Lawson and Joanna Millin absolutely."

Bertha Lawson predeceased the testatrix, and the only residuary legatee living at the present time is Minnie Augusta Lawson, the first defendant. Both Isabel Lawson and Joanna Millin survived the testatrix but have since died. Minnie Augusta Lawson is the personal representative of Isabel Lawson, so that two out of the three surviving shares are represented before me.

The question is whether these various burdens are to be borne wholly by the quarter share given to Bertha Lawson, which has lapsed, or are to be paid out of the whole of the residuary estate before any question of division arises so that each person takes a share of the whole, diminished accordingly, and the only lapse is of such a diminished share. The relevant provisions of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, are in s. 34 which provides:

"(3) Where the estate of a deceased person is solvent his real and personal estate shall, subject to rules of court and the provisions hereinafter contained as to charges on property of the deceased, and to the provisions, if any, contained in his will, be applicable towards the discharge of the funeral, testamentary and administration expenses, debts and liabilities payable thereout in the order mentioned in pt. II of sched. I to this Act."

There is no question that the quarter share is property undisposed of by the will. Turning to pt. II of sched. I to the Act, there is a number of different classes of property. The schedule provides:

"ORDER OF APPLICATION OF ASSETS WHERE THE ESTATE IS SOLVENT. 1.

Property of the deceased undisposed of by will, subject to the retention thereout of a fund sufficient to meet any pecuniary legacies . . . 5. The fund, if any, retained to meet pecuniary legacies."

It seems to me, as argued by counsel for the third defendant that, in effect, no provision has been made in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 34 (3), with regard to such things as legacies. There is no doubt, on the authorities, that the funeral, testamentary and administration expenses, debts and liabilities come out of the whole residuary estate before division, because that is what the will says. There is no question about that, but it seems to me that the position of the legacies depends on the old law. Under the old law, before the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, legacies would plainly come out of the residuary estate, and, although in this will there is not in terms a gift of residue, there is a gift of "all my real estate and all my personal estate not hereby otherwise disposed of," and it seems to me that the old law applies unless something can be indicated in the Administration of Estates Act which eliminates, or modifies, the old law as to the extent of such burdens. On this point I am assisted by a decision of CLAUSON, J., in Re Thompson (1), in which he held that the old law laid down in Re Boards (2) still remained operative after the Administration of Estates Act came into force so as to cast the primary burden of legacies on the personal estate.

It seems to me, therefore, in the present case that the pecuniary legacies and the specific legacies and the duty on these legacies (which is in the form of an additional legacy, or has the effect of an additional legacy) are all payable out of the whole estate before the division into four equal parts, so that the lapsed share is simply a lapsed share of the estate after those burdens have been cleared.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

GOWER v. GOWER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ.), March 6, 7, 1950.]
Divorce—Adultery—Standard of proof.

In 1942 the wife divorced the husband, and the husband was ordered to pay her a certain sum for the maintenance of herself and their child. In August, 1945, the wife and child began living at the same address as C., a married man living apart from his wife, and thereafter the wife and C. moved together to various addresses, taking the child with them, until December, 1949, when C. went to live away from the wife. Evidence was given that at one address the landlord knew the wife as Mrs. C., and that at another the wife and C. occupied one bedroom. The husband sought to have the amount which he had been ordered to pay the wife reduced, and on the issue as to the wife's misconduct, HELD: it had been proved beyond any reasonable doubt that the wife and C. had committed adultery.

Per DENNING, L.J.: I do not think that this court is irrevocably committed to the view that a charge of adultery must be regarded as a criminal charge, to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 178 (2), as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4, which simply requires the court on a petition for divorce to be "satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved" lays down a standard and puts adultery on the same footing as cruelty, desertion or unsoundness of mind. So far as the Act of 1925 is concerned, no valid distinction can be drawn between the standard of proof of cruelty and adultery, nor does public policy require any such distinction.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of BARNARD, J., dated Jan. 25, 1950.

In 1942 the husband, Leonard Maurice Gower, was divorced by the wife on the ground of his adultery, and an order was made that he should pay to the wife £130 per annum less tax. In August, 1945, the wife wrote to the husband saying that she was staying with friends at a certain address in London, and it appeared that she was living in a flat with the child of the marriage (who was aged eleven) where also was living the tenant of the flat, a Mr. Cockburn, a married man living apart from his wife. The flat consisted of a bed-sitting room, a kitchen, and a bathroom. The landlord of the flat gave evidence that she knew the wife as Mrs. Cockburn. In November, 1945, the wife, the child, and Mr. Cockburn moved to Wolverhampton where they remained until April, 1946. Evidence was given that at the house to which they then moved the wife and Mr. Cockburn occupied one bedroom. Later, they went to London together, and then to Richmond where they remained until December, 1949, when Mr. Cockburn left and went to another address. The husband applied to the court for a reduction of the amount which he had been ordered to pay the wife as maintenance, and PILCHER, J., directed an issue to be tried whether the wife had committed misconduct with Mr. Cockburn. BARNARD, J., tried the issue, and found that misconduct had not been committed, and refused leave to appeal. The Court of Appeal granted leave to appeal.

Crispin for the husband.

A BUCKNILL, L.J. (having considered the facts): The learned judge came to the conclusion that adultery was not made out, mainly on the ground that there was not a scrap of evidence of any inclination. I venture to think that the learned judge has misdirected himself there. The vital question is: Where were these people sleeping during the time that they were together? If the evidence points almost irresistibly to the fact that they were sleeping in the same room, one does not want any further evidence than that. There is no need for evidence of kissing and that sort of thing. I ask myself this question: If Mr. Cockburn and the wife had not been called as witnesses, would there have been the slightest doubt on the evidence that adultery had been committed? Would not the evidence have been abundantly sufficient to establish adultery? I should have thought that there could be no doubt about that. Did these two witnesses remove that presumption? So far as the wife is concerned, I think that the letter which she wrote shows that she was lying then. The judge himself says that she was a very unsatisfactory witness, and I think that Mr. Cockburn is tarred with the same brush. This is not a case of demeanour. Where a judge has seen the witnesses and says that he believes one in preference to another, it is obvious that an appellate tribunal, which has not that advantage, has not the same means for deciding which is speaking the truth, but here it is solely a question of an inference to be drawn from the proved facts. In my view, the inference to be drawn from the proved facts is irresistible that these two persons committed adultery.

E Counsel for the wife laid great emphasis on the fact that this is a charge of adultery. He said that adultery is a quasi-criminal offence and must be proved as such. I have never quite understood what that meant. The standard of proof required in a criminal case is higher than the standard of proof in a civil action because in a civil action a matter may be proved on a balance of probabilities and the court may decide one way or the other on a very small margin of preference, while, on the other hand, in a criminal case the matter must be proved beyond any reasonable doubt. To put it in another way, if the case for the prosecution is based on circumstantial evidence, the evidence must be such as to be inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis other than the guilt of the accused. If the accused gives any reasonable explanation which is consistent with innocence, the matter is not proved beyond any reasonable doubt. I apply that test here. Is the evidence in this case consistent with innocence on the part of these people? I think that it is not. I think it is proved beyond any reasonable doubt that they committed adultery, and, therefore, this appeal should be allowed.

H DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In my view, it would have been much better if the whole application for a reduction of maintenance had been referred to one judge both to try the allegation of adultery and also to fix the amount to be awarded. That, however, has not been done, and all we have to deal with is the issue whether or not adultery has been committed. I agree with all that my Lord has said on this issue. I think the only reasonable inference is that this pair were living together as man and wife. I think the real reason why the judge fell into error may have been that he required an excessively high standard of proof. I would issue a caveat about the standard of proof. I do not think that this court is irrevocably committed to the view that a charge of adultery must be regarded as a criminal charge, to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt. I can well understand the judge applying that standard because of what was said in Ginesi v. Ginesi (1), but I would like to point out several things in regard to that case. First, it was not fully argued, because counsel conceded that the standard of proof of adultery was the same as in a criminal case. Secondly, the decision of the House of Lords in Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe (2) was not cited. It was there decided that a suit for divorce for adultery is a civil and not a criminal matter, and that the analogies and precedents of criminal law have no authority in the divorce courts. This strikes at the root of Ginesi v. Ginesi (1), which appears to have proceeded on the supposed criminal or quasi-criminal character of adultery. Thirdly, no reference was made to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 178 (2), as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4, which simply requires the court on a petition for divorce to be "satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved." This itself lays down a standard and puts adultery on the same footing as cruelty, desertion or unsoundness of mind. Fourthly, the High Court of Australia in Wright v. Wright (3), after full consideration, declined to follow Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) and held that, on a charge of adultery, the criminal standard of proof was not appropriate. Fifthly, this court, in Davis v. Davis (4), held that the "criminal" standard of proof did not apply to cruelty. So far as the Act of 1925 is concerned, no valid distinction can be drawn between the standard of proof of cruelty and adultery, nor does public policy require any such distinction: see a valuable note in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, vol. 66, pp. 35-38. These matters may well be sufficient to entitle this court to re-consider Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) if and when the occasion arises: see Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. (5) ([1944] 2 All E.R. 300). In the present case, I say simply that I am satisfied on the evidence that adultery has been proved. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

R. v. KELLY.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Birkett, JJ.),
March 6, 10, 15, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Juror—Disqualification—"Attainted of felony"—Conviction of receiving—"Free pardon"—Liability of jurymen to serve if name in jurors book, although entitled to exemption—When court will order venire de novo—Juries Act, 1870 (c. 77), s. 10—Juries Act, 1922 (c. 11), s. 2 (1).

By the Juries Act, 1870, s. 10: "... no man who has been or shall be attainted of any treason or felony, or convicted of any crime that is infamous, unless he shall have obtained a free pardon, nor any man who is under outlawry, is or shall be qualified to serve on juries . . . in any court or on any occasion whatsoever."

After the appellant had been found guilty of murder it was discovered that a member of the jury had been convicted, some five years before the trial, of receiving and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the jurymen, having been "attainted" of felony, was disqualified by virtue of the Juries Act, 1870, s. 10, and that, in consequence, there had been a mis-trial and the court should order a venire de novo.

HELD: (i) after the Forfeiture Act, 1870, came into operation on July 4, 1870, attainer was abolished, except in regard to persons outlawed or already attainted when that Act was passed, and when the Juries Act, 1870, s. 10, which came into operation on Aug. 9, 1870, imposed a disqualification on a person who "has been or shall be attainted" of felony the words "shall be" referred only to a person who might in future be convicted of an infamous crime.

(ii) attainer having been deliberately abolished, the words "a person attainted of felony" could not be read as meaning a person "convicted of felony," capital or non-capital; the jurymen had not been convicted of an infamous crime as defined in the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 46; and, accordingly, the objection against him could not be sustained.

(iii) a person whose name appears in the jurors book prepared under the Juries Act, 1922, s. 1, is liable to serve on a jury under s. 2 (2) of the Act whether or not he claims any exemption to which he is entitled.

Per curiam: (i) the court will not order a venire de novo on the ground of the lack of qualification of a juror except in cases of either the impersonation of a juror or a mistake as to his identity.

APPEAL against conviction at Liverpool Assizes of murder.

Mar. 15. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted before CASSELS, J., at the last Liverpool assizes of murder. He appealed to this court alleging various grounds of misdirection, but when the case was first in the paper for hearing on Mar. 6, counsel for the appellant asked leave to take a further point which had not been covered by the original notice, and she submitted that there had been a mis-trial in that one of the jurors was disqualified from sitting on a jury. The ground of disqualification alleged was that the jurymen in question had been convicted of felony. It was said that under s. 10 of the Juries Act, 1870, the conviction constituted such a disqualification that the trial must be considered to have taken place, not before twelve, but only before eleven jurymen, that this would constitute a mis-trial, and the court would be obliged to award a venire de novo. This, indeed, would have been the result if this court had been obliged to give effect to the objection, and a further trial would have had to take place. It is necessary to state that the name of the jurymen in question, which for obvious reasons I do not mention, appeared in the jurors book as a person qualified and liable to serve as a juror, that he was duly summoned, that his name appeared on the panel of jurors, and that he was duly called, was unchallenged, and was sworn. It also appears that some five years previously he had been convicted of the felony of receiving stolen goods and sentenced to one month's imprisonment.

The first statute to which it is necessary to refer is the Juries Act, 1870, s. 10, which provides:

" . . . no man who has been or shall be attainted of any treason or felony, or convicted of any crime that is infamous, unless he shall have obtained a free pardon, nor any man who is under outlawry, is or shall be qualified to serve on juries or inquests in any court or on any occasion whatsoever."

That Act, in effect, re-enacts the provisions of s. 3 of the Juries Act, 1825. I pause here to say that counsel for the appellant contended that at common law a convicted felon was disqualified from serving on a jury, citing in support passages from HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN and other works of authority. The court, however, is of opinion that since 1825 the qualifications and exemptions of jurors are governed by statute law and that we have to consider, not what the law may have been, and, no doubt, was, in the time of HALE, but what provisions Parliament has made on the subject by the various Acts dealing with juries that have been passed from 1825 onwards. We are satisfied that the whole law now is statutory. The importance of this case is manifest as there are conflicting views disclosed in textbooks which deal with the matter, and the exact point never seems to have been the subject of an express decision, although, as I shall explain before the end of this judgment, a point which is, in our opinion, indistinguishable was the subject of a decision by a court of high authority in the year 1828 very soon after the first Juries Act had been passed.

It will be observed that s. 10 of the Juries Act, 1870, deals with three classes of persons—those attainted of treason or felony; those convicted of any crime that is infamous (in either case unless they shall obtain a free pardon); and those who were under outlawry. Outlawry has been abolished by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938, and need no longer be considered. An infamous crime is shown by s. 46 of the Larceny Act, 1861, to mean buggery, assaults with intent to commit buggery, both of which are felonies, and an attempt to commit buggery which is a misdemeanour, and, as the jurymen in question had not, therefore, been convicted of a crime which was infamous, the remaining point to be decided was whether he was a person attainted of felony.

No doubt, the distinction between "convicted" and "attainted" has often been regarded as distinguishing between the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the court, but the true meaning is the result of a judgment following on conviction or judgment of outlawry in cases of treason or capital felony. If a person were convicted, but no judgment was passed, attainder would not follow.

The attaint was the result of the judgment in a capital case because thereby corruption of blood with all its consequences under the old law followed: see, on this point, the article on attaint in the ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, 2nd ed., vol. 1, p. 615, the author of which was Sir William Anson. The Juries Act, 1870, received the Royal Assent on Aug. 9, 1870, and a month previously, namely, on July 4 of that year, the Forfeiture Act, 1870, which abolishes forfeitures for treason and felony was passed. The preamble states:

"Whereas it is expedient to abolish the forfeiture of lands and goods for treason and felony . . ."

which (be it observed), as regards land, was a consequence of an attaint. The Act goes on to provide in s. 1:

"From and after the passing of this Act, no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of or for any treason or felony or felo de se shall cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat, provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the law of forfeiture consequent upon outlawry."

It is to be observed that the Act makes no distinction between verdict, conviction, or judgment as the cause of the attainder, but it seems clear that after July 4, 1870, there was no such thing left in the law as attainder except in regard to persons who were outlawed or already under that disability at the time of the passing of the Act. It is true that in the Juries Act, 1870, the words are "who has been or shall be attainted of any treason," but, in our opinion, the words "shall be" must be taken as referring to a person who may in the future be convicted of any crime that is infamous. It is impossible to suppose that attainder could have remained for any purpose once it had been deliberately abolished by s. 1 of the Forfeiture Act, 1870, except in the case of outlawry. We cannot read for this purpose "a person attainted of felony" as meaning "a person convicted of felony" capital or non-capital, and the juryman in this case, although he had been convicted of the non-capital felony of receiving, was not attainted, and, therefore, the objection cannot be sustained.

It is right that we should refer to one other matter which at one time rather impressed the court. By s. 12 of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938, outlawry proceedings were abolished, and by s. 20 (3) it was provided that:

"The Acts mentioned in the first and second columns of sched. IV to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent specified in the third column of that schedule."

Among the repeals are the proviso to s. 1 of the Forfeiture Act, 1870, which provided that "nothing in this Act shall affect the law of forfeiture consequent upon outlawry," and the words in the Juries Act, 1870, s. 10, "nor any man who is under outlawry."

At first it seemed as though the fact that Parliament had expressly repealed only the words dealing with outlawry might be used as an argument that they intended to leave the rest of the section effective, but as, in the view of this court, a person convicted after the coming into force of the Forfeiture Act, 1870, was not attainted, whether the section is expressly repealed or not, it can have no effect. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived on this point, it is, perhaps, unnecessary to consider the argument that was addressed to us that a person who has served his sentence is to be regarded as having obtained a free pardon. By the Civil Rights of Convicts Act, 1828, s. 3, it was provided that every punishment for felony, after it has been endured, should have the effect of a pardon under the Great Seal. We feel great doubt whether that section could be prayed in aid in interpreting an Act passed forty-two years later. It seems a more reasonable interpretation that the obtaining of a free pardon contemplated in s. 10 of the Juries Act, 1870, refers to the obtaining of an actual free pardon and not one implied by virtue of the Civil Rights of Convicts Act, 1828.

While this is really enough to dispose of the objection, in view of the argument addressed to us, we think it right to refer to two more matters. The first is as to the effect of the Juries Act, 1922. Section 1 of that Act contains elaborate provisions for the preparation of the jurors book and s. 2 provides :

"Every person whose name is included in the jurors book as a juror or special juror shall be liable to serve as such, notwithstanding that he may have been entitled by reason of some disqualification or exemption to claim that he ought not to be marked in the electors list as a juror or special juror . . ."

It is provided by s. 8 (2) (b) that :

"A person whose name is not included in the register of electors shall not be qualified or liable so to serve . . .", and there is a provision that a woman who is an avowed member of a religious order or community, although included in the jurors book, shall not be liable to serve. Although one would not expect a person disqualified, for instance, because he had been convicted of an infamous crime, to disclose that fact by claiming that he was disqualified, it seems to us that, as the Juries Act, 1870, imposed a disqualification, whether the person concerned claimed or did not claim exemption does not matter. If his name is included in the jurors book, he is liable to serve. It is true that his name might have been taken out if he had objected. It is true that his name might not have been included if the registration officer had been aware of his conviction, but it seems to us that the Act provides in terms that a person whose name appears in the jurors book is liable to serve as a juror and that that again is an answer to the present objection.

There remains always the right of the accused person to challenge either peremptorily or, if he has exhausted his peremptory challenges, for cause. This right remains unaffected, but it is said: How could he challenge if he did not know? It is also contended that the cases show that where information has come to the knowledge of the accused after conviction with regard to the qualification of a juror, effect has been given to it by the court and the trial treated as a nullity. It is perfectly true that there are such cases, but, so far as this court can ascertain, they have all been cases where there has been either impersonation of a juror or a mistake as to the identity of a juror. For instance, in R. v. Tremearne (1), on J. Williams being called to serve, his son, who was not on the panel and was under age and had no qualification, answered for his father and served on the jury. The court, consisting of ABBOTT, C.J., afterwards LORD TENTERDEN, BAYLEY, J., HOLROYD, J., and LITLEDALE, J., held that this was a fatal objection and that there was a mis-trial and made the rule absolute for a new trial. In R. v. Sutton (2) it was sought to obtain a new trial on the ground that an unqualified alien had sat on the jury, which fact was not known to the defendant until after the trial. The only two judges mentioned in the report were LORD TENTERDEN and BAYLEY, J., both of whom had been parties to the earlier case, but we think there can be no doubt that the other two judges, HOLROYD, J., and LITLEDALE, J., would also have been sitting. Whether they were or not, it appears that LORD TENTERDEN said (8 B. & C. 419):

"... I am not aware that a new trial has ever been granted on the ground that a juror was liable to be challenged, if the party had an opportunity of making his challenge. In the case cited [R. v. Tremearne (1)] no such opportunity had been afforded. We ought to be very careful in giving way to such an application, for if we must grant a new trial at the instance of a defendant after conviction, we must, also, do it at the instance of a prosecutor, when there has been an acquittal; and it seems to me that, without a precedent, we ought not to interfere in this late stage of the proceedings."

We can see no difference between a case where the disqualification arose from the juryman being an alien and one in which it arises by reason of his being convicted. The ground of the decision seems to be that there was no doubt as to the identity of the person called and the prisoner was given his challenges.

In R. v. Mellor (3) there had again been personation, or rather a mistake, for on a man of the name of Thorne being called, one Thorniley by mistake took his place and it was held to be a mis-trial. As late as 1918 there was before this court R. v. Wakefield (4) which was again a case of personation, and on the authority, among other cases, of R. v. Tremearne (1) and R. v. Mellor (3) the court set aside the verdict and ordered a venire de novo. So far as this court has been able to ascertain, this result has only been achieved where there has been personation in one form or another. We can find no case in which, where there has been no doubt as to the identity of the person called, the court has ever set aside the verdict. Our attention was called to Ras Behari Lal v. Regem (5), a case before the Judicial Committee, where LORD ATKIN certainly indicated that, if the objection to a juror was not known at the time of the trial, but arose afterwards, the court would interfere. It is not, however, necessary for us to go further into that case, which is not technically binding on us, though, of course, we should treat the decision with great respect, for not only are the facts very different from what they are here, but, for the reasons that we have already given on other grounds, we are satisfied that this objection cannot prevail.

It is not without a sense of satisfaction that the court has been able to come to the conclusion that it has in this case. While, no doubt, it is desirable that persons who have real criminal records should not serve on juries, if we had to give effect to this objection it would mean that any juvenile who had been convicted of a petty theft would for the rest of his life be disqualified from serving on a jury, and whatever may have been the position in the time of HALE, C.J., it would, indeed, be disastrous if we now were obliged to hold that a conviction for a petty crime, technically a felony, conferred disqualification for life on the offender who might have escaped with no more than a nominal penalty. It is worth remembering that when the Juries Act, 1825, was passed all but the most petty felonies were capital, so that on conviction and judgment attainder automatically followed. Though in that year the Judgment of Death Act, 1823, empowered the court to abstain from imposing the death penalty on persons convicted of any crime except murder if the offender seemed to the court a fit subject for the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy, it was not till 1826 that, at the instance of Sir Robert Peel, Parliament began to pass the series of Acts whereby the capital sentence was abolished for nearly all felonies, so that by 1870 it was only treason, murder, piracy by violence, and setting fire to His Majesty's ships and dockyards that remained capital and in which attainder would follow. The appeal is dismissed.

BARKER v. BARKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Somervell, L.J.J., and Vaisey, J.), March 3, 13, 1950.]

Divorce—Costs—Order against respondent wife—Discretion and duty of judge—Effect of Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 1.

A husband, who petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, was granted a decree nisi without costs against her in an undefended suit. It was proved in evidence that she left the matrimonial home, telling the husband that she was going to another man, but after two months she implored him to take her back and promised to undo the wrong she had done. The husband refused to take her back and told her to "stop pestering him." There was evidence that she was possessed of some means and was working for a weekly wage. On an appeal by the husband against the order as to costs,

HELD: (i) although the discretionary power of the court to make an order for costs against a wife was unfettered, it was not the practice to make such an order unless the wife had separate means sufficient to pay the costs. In a case where the wife had so acted as to increase the husband's costs unnecessarily the discretion of the court might properly be exercised by the making of an order. The judge who hears a petition for divorce must inquire into the whole matter and consider any question of condonation, connivance, conduct conducing, unreasonable delay in presenting the petition, or whether the husband, while innocent of any matrimonial offence, was partly responsible for the break-up of the marriage. The judge is not bound to state all or any of the reasons for the exercise of his discretion. If he has acted on facts connected with or leading up to the litigation, which have been proved before him or observed during the progress of the case, the Court of Appeal, although it may deem his reasons insufficient and may disagree with his conclusion, ought not to interfere with the exercise by him of his discretion.

Milne v. Milne & Fowler (1871) (L.R. 2 P. & D. 202) and Millward v. Millward and Andrews (1887) (57 L.T. 569), referred to.

(ii) the effect of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 1, was not to make the wife's means irrelevant to the question whether she should pay her husband's costs in a divorce suit.

Tickle v. Tickle (1945) (114 L.J.P. 29) and Jestice v. Jestice (1945) (114 L.J.P. 29 (n)), criticised.

Per BUCKNILL, L.J. : Where there is no doubt that a spouse has committed adultery, but proof of it cannot be obtained, it seems from the decision in Everitt v. Everitt ([1949] 1 All E.R. 908) that the innocent spouse may refuse to cohabit with the guilty spouse and may, at the end of three years, petition for a divorce on the ground of desertion. In such a case there is no room for the argument, which was successful in Pratt v. Pratt ([1939] 3 All E.R. 437), that repentance and a genuine wish to return home communicated to the deserted spouse brings the desertion to an end. If this is the law, surely the court should require the deserted spouse to take all reasonable steps to obtain proof of the adultery, and, if possible, bring a petition on that ground, because adultery is the solid basis of the decree. Constructive desertion in such a case is, in my view, somewhat of a legal fiction.

Per SOMERVELL, L.J. : The fact that leave to appeal is given on a matter of costs does not bring about a substitution of the discretion of the Court of Appeal for that of the judge.

APPEAL from an order of Mr. Commissioner LONGLAND, K.C., dated Dec. 15, 1949, refusing to award a successful husband petitioner in divorce proceedings costs against the respondent wife. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Hyamson for the husband.

The wife did not appear and was not represented.

Curr. adv. vult.

March 13. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal by a husband from that part of a decree made by Mr. Commissioner LONGLAND, K.C., whereby he ordered that the wife should not be condemned in the costs incurred in divorce proceedings taken by the husband. The commissioner gave leave to the husband to appeal from this order as to costs. On June 2, 1949, the husband filed a petition for divorce, on the ground of desertion and asked that the wife be condemned in the costs of the proceedings. The wife did not enter an appearance, nor did she appear at the trial on the question of costs.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The commissioner said that counsel for the husband was right when he submitted that the husband had good grounds for believing that the wife had committed adultery, and he was, therefore, quite entitled to refuse to take her back and that she then remained in desertion. On the question of costs the commissioner said this of the husband:

"If that is your belief that your wife had committed adultery you were entitled not to forgive her and you were entitled not to take her back, and if you ask me for a decree I shall have to give it to you, but I am not going to give you costs against her."

On the appeal counsel for the husband made three submissions: (i) A successful husband usually gets his costs against the wife who has separate estate; (ii) the commissioner misdirected himself by exercising his discretion for an irrelevant reason, namely, the refusal of the husband to have his wife back; (iii) the Court of Appeal will review the exercise of discretion on a matter of costs when the judge has misdirected himself.

As regards the first point, I do not think that one should regard a divorcee petition as being in the same category as a writ of summons in a civil action. Neither do I think that the rule of practice which requires an unsuccessful defendant to pay the successful plaintiff's costs in obtaining his judgment necessarily or usually applies in the case where a husband petitions for a divorce from his wife and obtains a decree. True, the court has an absolute discretion to grant costs against a respondent wife, whether she has separate estate or not, but I do not think that it is the practice to do so unless the wife has separate means sufficient to pay his and her own costs. Where the wife has put forward charges against her husband which are quite unfounded, or has denied matrimonial offences of which she is found guilty and in which she had no reasonable prospects of success, or where the wife has separate means which are sufficient to pay her own costs, as well as the husband's costs, the position is different. Until the decree is made absolute the woman remains the wife of the husband, and he is prima facie responsible for her maintenance (except, perhaps, in the case where she has been found guilty of adultery). I do not know of many reported cases in which the question has been considered whether the respondent wife, in an undefended divorce petition by the husband, should pay his costs of obtaining the decree. In Milne v. Milne & Fowler (1) the husband petitioned for a decree of divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery. The wife, in her answer, denied the adultery and pleaded condonation, connivance, cruelty, and wilful neglect, but she withdrew her plea at the trial. The husband had a moderate income and had five children dependent on him. The co-respondent was a man of small means. The wife was a rich woman, having separate estate producing an income of £4,100 per annum. The husband obtained his decree and then asked the court to condemn the wife in the costs of the proceedings. In that case LORD PENZANCE, in giving judgment, said (L.R. 2 P. & D. 204):

"As regards the respondent, the only reason why a wife as respondent is relieved from the payment of costs is, that in the majority of cases the wife has no property. The law assumes that on her marriage all her property passes to her husband, and in a very large number of cases the wife not only does not pay costs, but litigates at the expense of her husband. But this all depends upon the assumption that she has not got any property. Here it is exactly the other way. The wife has a large separate income, and the husband but moderate means, and there can be no reason why a wife with large property should not be made to pay the costs like any other suitor. It is improper to apply a rule to a case, in which the reason of such rule entirely fails. As a general principle, therefore, a wife who has property should be liable for costs. I say liable, for I do not mean that in every case I should condemn her in the costs, because that would be to affirm the proposition that she would be liable in cases in which blame might attach to her husband for her misconduct. It is therefore in the discretion of the court to exercise this power, and it becomes a question whether I should do so in this case. I am at a loss to discover any cause of blame in the conduct of the husband. She ran off with the co-respondent, her husband forgave her and took her back. Shortly afterwards she again left her home with the co-respondent, and has continued to live with him ever since. The husband is entirely free from blame, the wife is without excuse. I shall therefore condemn her in the costs, and it will answer all purposes for today if I condemn her in such costs as arise out of her pleas and the issues found against her."

In Millward v. Millward and Andrews (2) the husband petitioned for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. The case was undefended and the husband obtained a decree and asked that the wife should pay his costs. The wife appeared at the hearing to argue the question of costs. She had about £3,500 in her possession. The husband was a veterinary surgeon and received a good deal of financial help from his wife. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in his judgment said (57 L.T. 570):

"It is a source of daily pain to me, that I am obliged to inflict on unfortunate husbands the costs arising out of the misconduct of their wives. I am always extremely glad when it turns out that the guilty wife has separate means to answer costs. In cases where there has been a settlement the aggrieved husband is entitled to have it varied in his favour. Should the guilty wife remain, then, in cases such as this, where there is no settlement, in full possession of her property? I am very happy to learn, by the evidence in the present case, that, though upwards of £2,000 has been expended by the wife upon the common home, there still remains £3,500 in her possession. Like every other unsuccessful litigant, she must pay the costs. I wish that all guilty wives who come before this court had means of their own to answer costs."

Here, again, the order was based on the fact that the wife had ample separate means.

In Tickle v. Tickle (3) the husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's desertion and obtained a decree. The suit was undefended. The husband in his petition asked for costs against his wife, and she appeared by counsel to contest this claim. There was no proof that the wife had any means. DENNING, J., held that after the passing of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 1, a married woman might be in law liable to pay the costs in a divorce suit without special proof of means, and he made the order asked. A similar order in a similar case, Jestice v. Jestice (4), was made by WALLINGTON, J., a few weeks later, and is reported in a note to the report of Tickle v. Tickle (3), but in that case WALLINGTON, J., said that the wife had caused the costs to be incurred by her attitude. The reports of the judgments in these two cases are very brief. If the decisions lay down the proposition that the Act of 1935 made the wife's means irrelevant to the question whether she should pay her husband's costs in a divorce suit, I respectfully must say that I do not agree.

Although the court has complete power to make such an order without proof of separate means of the wife, in my opinion, a judge would not exercise his discretion improperly if he refused to make such an order in a case where the wife had done nothing to increase the costs of the husband and where there was no evidence that she had sufficient means to pay the husband's costs. The statute ordains that the judge who hears a petition for divorce must inquire into the whole matter. He must consider the question of condonation, connivance, conduct conducing, or unreasonable delay in presenting the petition. All this has to be done because the State is an interested third party in a divorce petition. Its interest is to see that due regard is paid to the binding sanctity of marriage. The costs of the hearing of the petition are costs which are in a sense required by the law to be incurred before a decree can be pronounced. In these circumstances I think it may well be considered proper that the costs of the petitioning husband should not be placed wholly on the wife's shoulders in a case such as the present one. Therefore, I think that the commissioner in this case could not be said to have exercised a wrong discretion if he had refused to make the wife pay the costs on the ground that he was not satisfied on the evidence as to her ability to pay them.

As regards the second point taken by counsel for the husband, it is not clear from the transcript what reason or reasons moved the commissioner to refuse to order the wife to pay the husband's costs in whole or in part. The transcript reads as if the main reason was that he considered the husband should have forgiven his wife. If it was apparent that this was the only reason, I should be disposed to think that it was not a valid reason. Of course, if it appeared from the evidence that the husband behaved towards his wife in a way which was blameworthy, that would be a very adequate reason for refusing to make the order, but, so far as I can see from the transcript, no question was put to the husband by the court which suggested to him any such blameworthy conduct, so that the husband might have an opportunity of dealing with the point.

As regards the third point, the difficulty I feel about interfering with the exercise of the commissioner's discretion is that I do not know all the reasons which may have induced him to make the order. He may have thought that the evidence of the wife's means was insufficient to justify an order; or he may have thought that the husband, on his own evidence, made no attempt to establish a case of adultery and to bring the co-respondent to book, and that he should have done so; or he may have thought that the husband, although he was not bound to take the wife back, should have shown some ray of pity for her. All these are possible reasons for the exercise of a discretion in this case. I do not think a judge is bound to state all or any of the reasons for the exercise of his discretion. To quote the words ([1920] 2 K.B. 53) of LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., in Ritter v. Godfrey (5) and cited with approval ([1927] A.C. 809) by VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. Pollak (6):

"If, however, there be any grounds, the question of whether they are sufficient is entirely for the judge at the trial, and this court cannot interfere with his discretion."

Again, applying in a measure the words of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in a later part of his speech to this particular case, the commissioner deliberately intended to exercise his discretionary power and has acted on facts connected with or leading up to the litigation which have been proved before him or observed during the progress of the case. I think that the Court of Appeal in such a case, although it may deem his reasons insufficient and may disagree with his conclusion, ought not to interfere with the exercise by the judge of his discretion in the matter of costs.

In connection with a possible reason for the refusal to make the order asked for, I wish also to say a few words on the extension of the rule laid down in Everitt v. Everitt (7) and the cases therein cited to the present case and to cases like it. Where there is no doubt that the spouse has committed adultery, but proof of it cannot be obtained, it seems from the decision in Everitt v. Everitt (7) that the innocent spouse may refuse to cohabit with the guilty spouse and may, at the end of three years, petition for a divorce on the ground of desertion. In such a case there is no room for the argument, which was successful in Pratt v. Pratt (8), that repentance and a genuine wish to return home communicated to the deserted spouse brings the desertion to an end. If this is the law surely the court should require the deserted spouse to take all reasonable steps to obtain proof of the adultery, and, if possible, bring a petition on that ground, because adultery is the solid basis of the decree. Constructive desertion in such a case is, in my view, somewhat of a legal fiction. To take an extreme case. The wife in a temper tells her husband that she committed adultery on one occasion with a man, now dead, and then leaves the matrimonial home. The next day she implores the husband to let her come back and persists in her entreaties, but the husband refuses to do so or to have anything more to do with her, and makes no independent enquiries as to the truth of her statement. The husband waits for three years and then petitions for a divorce on the ground of desertion. Assuming that he satisfied the court that he honestly believed that his wife had committed adultery, the principle, as stated in Everitt v. Everitt (7) should enable him to obtain a decree. It may be that the commissioner had some thoughts of this kind when he refused to give costs against the wife, feeling that in reality the wife had not wished to desert the husband for three years—nay, on the contrary had earnestly and sincerely desired to return to him and had repeatedly told him so—and that she was in reality being divorced because she had implanted in her husband's mind the belief that she had committed adultery, a belief which the husband entertained without much show of resistance. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

- SOMERVELL, L.J.: The circumstances in which this court will interfere with a judge's order as to costs are set out in British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook Ltd. v. Associated Newspapers Ltd. (9) and in Lever Brothers Ltd. v. Masbro' Equitable Pioneers Society, Ltd. (10), and I do not propose to re-formulate them. SCRUTTON, L.J., in British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook Ltd. v. Associated Newspapers, Ltd. (9) makes it clear that the fact that leave to appeal was given does not bring about a substitution of the discretion of this court for the discretion of the judge. There is a dictum of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in the opposite sense in Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. Pollak (6) ([1927] A.C. 757). We are, however, bound by the decision of this court, and, with all respect to VISCOUNT DUNEDIN, it seems to me right. Otherwise, a judge might feel he ought to give leave to appeal in any case where there was a reasonable scope for argument as to how he had exercised his discretion. Leave should, in my opinion, be given only in cases where he feels he may have proceeded on a wrong principle.
- C We were referred to defended and undefended cases in which costs were given against a wife: Miller v. Miller (11), Milne v. Milne & Fowler (1) and Millward v. Millward and Andrews (2). I agree with what has been said by BUCKNILL, L.J., on the decision in Tickle v. Tickle (3). In the present case I think there was sufficient evidence of means. I think in a case such as this a judge, although he grants a decree, is entitled to take into account the general conduct of the petitioner and respondent in relation to the marriage which is sought to be dissolved. Suppose, for example, he came to the conclusion that the husband petitioner, although entitled to his decree and not guilty of conduct conducing to the offence, had been in part responsible for the break up of the marriage, or was, perhaps, though guiltless of any matrimonial offence himself, glad to be free. I should have thought such matters were relevant for the judge to consider if he chose on the issue of costs. In many cases he may come to the conclusion that costs should follow the result in the ordinary way. In divorce cases there are often faults on both sides, and there should, I think, be a wide discretion in respect of costs which have not been incurred by reason of the respondent disputing issues on which the judge has found against him or her. Coming to the present case I think on the transcript, and not having seen the husband, I should have given him his costs. That, however, is not the issue. The commissioner seems to me to have based his refusal to give the husband his costs on his attitude when his wife implored him to take her back, said that she had learnt her lesson, would try to undo the wrong she had done, and so on. They are pathetic letters. On the other hand, she had left him, as she said, to go to another man, and two months after leaving him wrote saying she would not return and the marriage had better be ended.
- G If a petitioner was deprived of costs by reason only of the fact that he did not forgive and take back a wife in these circumstances, I would have said this was in itself no reason. There was, however, more than this, and the commissioner, who saw the husband, may have been in a position to draw inferences other than those which appear from the transcript. The sincerity of the letters was not questioned. They were not answered. The first letter was in January, 1947. The husband saw the wife in January, 1948, and told her to stop interfering and pestering him. She was very young at the time of the marriage. If he had answered the first letter saying he was sorry but after what had happened he felt or knew it would be hopeless, the picture would be a different one. Did his conduct then, and, possibly, the way in which he answered some of the questions put to him, provide relevant material with regard to his conduct and attitude as a husband which entitled the commissioner to exercise his discretion as he did ? I do not find the question an easy one. I think, however, it is important that those who try this class of case should have a wide discretion as to costs, on the general lines which I have tried to indicate, and in the result I think we should not interfere.

VAISEY, J. (read by SOMERVELL, L.J.): I think that this appeal should be dismissed. It is sometimes regarded as a matter for regret that the divorce laws operate in some respects so mechanically and automatically, and without regard to the particular circumstances of the particular cases. A single act of adultery by either party to a marriage, if neither condoned to nor condoned, entitles the other party, if innocent, to a decree of divorce as of right. It matters not what the temptation or other precedent circumstances may have been, and neither the contrition of the erring party, however deep and sincere, nor the recriminations of the other, however violent or pharasaical, are allowed to have anything to do with the case. They lie wholly outside the purview of the judge who has no option but to grant the decree. I should be very sorry indeed to hold that the innocent, the injured, party is entitled without regard to any of those matters to which I have alluded, and in every event, to the costs of regaining his or her status of freedom from the matrimonial tie. Decent and courteous behaviour is, in my judgment, obligatory as between husband and wife in all circumstances. I am glad to be able to hold that the commissioner was entitled to exercise his discretion as to the costs of the husband in the present case if he thought, as he evidently did, that the husband had fallen short of the standard of conduct which was to be expected of him. I am not sure that I should myself have come to that conclusion, but if I had seen the husband in the witness box I might well have done so. Suppose that this had been an action for the dissolution, not of a marriage but of a partnership, in which the plaintiff had succeeded in all his contentions so that normally the defendant would have been condemned in costs, and suppose that the plaintiff had, before action brought, written a series of abusive letters to the defendant, surely, in such a case, the judge would have been entitled to show his disapproval of conduct so unbecoming in a partner by leaving him to bear his costs of the action. So too, in the present case, where there was conduct unbecoming in a husband, as the commissioner thought and was, I think, entitled to think. The discretionary control over costs is, no doubt, difficult to exercise, and the exclusion of irrelevant considerations is very important. None the less, I venture to think that it should be jealously guarded and not whittled down unnecessarily. I am glad to feel that we need not interfere with the commissioner's decision.

WINTER v. CARDIFF RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Jowitt, L.C., Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), January 23, 24, March 29, 1950.]

Master and Servant—Duty of master—Proper system of working—Extent of master's duty—Need to give instructions—Question for decision.

- A Apart from statute, an employer is under certain obligations to his servants to provide for their safety. He may delegate the carrying out of such obligations, but he cannot delegate or avoid his own responsibility for their proper performance. So, if the person left to carry out such an obligation is negligent in carrying it out and that negligence causes injury to a fellow servant, the employer is liable in damages and cannot rely on the rule of common employment. One of these obligations is to provide a safe system of working. A system of working normally implies that the work consists of a series of similar or somewhat similar operations and the conception of a system of working is not easily applied to a case where only a single act of a particular kind is to be performed. The duty to provide a safe system of working is not absolute, but only to do his best to fulfil the obligation imposed on him, though, indeed, a high standard is exacted. That duty must be considered in relation to the circumstances of each particular case, and the question to be answered is whether adequate provision was made for the carrying out of the job in hand under the general system of work adopted by the employer or under some special system adapted to meet the particular circumstances of the case. It is always a question whether the negligence complained of is the failure of the employer to inaugurate and maintain a safe system or the casual departure from that system as the result of the negligence of an individual fellow workman. The difference is between a case where sufficient and adequate provisions have been made, which will, if carried out, protect the workman unless one of his fellows does not use proper care in carrying out the system, and a case where the system itself makes no such provision. The duty of the employer is to act reasonably in all the circumstances. One of those circumstances is that he is an employer of labour, and it is, therefore, reasonable that he should employ competent servants, should supply them with adequate plant, and should give adequate directions as to the system of work or mode of operation, but this does not mean that the employer must decide on every detail of the system of work or mode of operation. Where the system or mode of operation is complicated or highly dangerous or prolonged or involves a number of men performing different functions, it is naturally a matter for the employer to take the responsibility of deciding what system shall be adopted. On the other hand, where the operation is simple and the decision how it shall be done has to be taken frequently it is natural and reasonable that it should be left to the foremen or workmen on the spot. The giving of proper instructions may well be a part of a proper system of working, and the omission to give them may constitute a defect in the system of working, or, alternatively, a breach of the employer's obligation to take reasonable steps for the safety of those employed on the task.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BUCKNILL and SINGLETON, L.JJ., COHEN, L.J., dissenting) dated Dec. 17, 1948, affirming an order of MORRIS, J., dated Apr. 16, 1948.

While riding on one of the respondents' lorries which was carrying a heavy voltage regulator, the appellant, who was employed by the respondents as a labourer, was injured through the negligence of the respondents' charge hand in having failed to secure the regulator to the lorry. The Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of MORRIS, J., found that the appellant was in common employment with the charge hand; that the respondents had not failed to provide a safe plant or a safe system of work; and, therefore, that the appellant could not recover against them in respect of his injuries. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

Beney, K.C., and David Pennant for the appellant.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and Meurig Evans for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 29. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated Dec. 17, 1948, which by a majority (BUCKNILL and SINGLETON, L.JJ., COHEN, L.J., dissenting) dismissed the appeal of the appellant from a judgment of MORRIS, J., of Apr. 16, 1948.

The facts are short and not seriously in dispute. The appellant was a labourer, aged sixty-four, and was employed by the respondents in their electricity department. Prior to and on May 14, 1946, he was employed in a gang laying a cable in the village of Pentyrch, which is about one mile from the respondents' depot at Creigau. In connection with the work the respondents had near to Pentyrch a voltage regulator, weighing about fifteen hundredweight, and being about four feet, six inches high, four feet broad and one foot, six inches, deep. It had projecting handles or door knobs at the back and front, i.e., on the two opposed sides measuring four feet, six inches, by four feet. When the laying of the cable was finished, the mains superintendent of the respondents, named Foster, instructed the foreman of the gang, one Hayman, a charge hand, to remove the regulator to the depot and for that purpose to make use of a named motor lorry belonging to the respondents. The lorry in question lacked a tail board and near side board and its off side board was unsupported. Block and tackle and a rope of about 150 feet in length, together with planks and rollers, were provided for the purpose of moving heavy weights on and off the lorry. Hayman had had no previous experience of transporting heavy loads, but he was believed by Foster to be a very capable and competent workman and quite capable of carrying out the job of moving the regulator without any instructions, a belief which MORRIS, J., found to be justified. In fact, Foster gave him no instructions as to how the regulator should be carried although he knew its dimensions and that the handles protruded, and was aware of the condition of the lorry and had ordered a new body to be fitted to it. Hayman, however, carried out the orders given him, and under his supervision, the gang, including the appellant, moved the regulator on the rollers up the planks into the lorry by means of the block, pulley and rope. They placed the regulator on its side on the front part of the platform with one end resting on a roller and the other on some bricks so as to keep the handles and door knobs clear of the lorry's floor, and discussed the question whether they should lash the regulator to the lorry, but decided not to do so though they could have used the rope for this purpose had they wished to do so. The appellant, together with the other men who had been engaged in the loading, then mounted the lorry. Hayman sat in front with the driver and the others on the platform. The appellant sat on the near side on part of the regulator. The lorry was carefully driven, but when

A nearing its destination, and while taking a corner of the road near Pentyreh Farm, the regulator slid across the platform and over the near edge, carrying the appellant with it, and fell on him as he lay in the roadway, causing him serious injuries. In the court of first instance the learned judge held that Hayman had been negligent in failing to lash the regulator to the lorry before starting on the journey to Creigau, but that the respondents were not liable, because
B Hayman's negligence was that of a fellow servant of the appellant when engaged on a common employment, and this judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. On this state of facts the appellant's case against the respondents was that they were negligent in that they failed to provide safe plant, failed to adopt a safe system of working, and did not exercise proper supervision over the conduct of the work. The statement of claim also contained an allegation that
C they had been guilty of a breach of statutory duty in that the requirements of reg. 67 of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1941, had not been complied with. This last contention, however, was not persisted in save as providing a standard with reference to which the requisite care to be observed could be estimated. So regarded, it merges in the question whether the respondents were guilty of negligence for which the responsibility was theirs, though the actual immediate or intermediate cause of the injury was the negligence of a fellow servant.

The plant said to be unsafe was the motor lorry, and it was alleged to be unsafe because it lacked a back and near side board. I can imagine cases in which the lack of these fitments might constitute negligence, e.g., if the lorry
E were used to carry parcels and these were merely placed on its open floor, but an open lorry is a perfectly safe vehicle to carry a single heavy regulator. Side or back boards are neither suitable nor capable of retaining it unless it is tied. No doubt, the provision of a side board might have retarded its progress for a brief instant of time, but I can see no reason for supposing that the presence of a side board would have prevented the accident. On the contrary, it might well
F have added to the danger by crushing the appellant's legs in the course of being carried away. In any case a truck provided with a platform and without back or side boards would be a safe vehicle on which to carry a heavy weight even if shaped as this regulator was, provided the regulator was made fast. Indeed, the provision of all three boards might be used as an argument (though I think the argument would be unsound) for contending that the men engaged in the
G work had been induced to think the vehicle safer than it was. In my view, the lorry was adequate for its task and was provided with the necessary equipment in as much as the rope was available and known to be available for tying on the regulator, but was not used because the foreman, and, indeed, the men generally knew their journey was a short one and wrongly either thought the use of the rope to fasten the regulator unnecessary or were minded to take the
H risk. Indeed, this is the explanation of the failure to fasten the regulator which the learned judge has accepted and is his reason for holding Hayman negligent. The substantial ground of appeal, however, is that the respondents' system of work was unsafe, and to establish this contention the appellant relies on the assertion that some senior official should have superintended the loading, and that Hayman was inexperienced and had failed to receive sufficient instruction in the course of his general training or to have been subjected to adequate supervision on this particular occasion.

The doctrine that a master is not responsible to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant is not of very remote origin. It is said to have first been mooted in Priestley v. Fowler (1), and it has now been abolished. In the meantime it has given rise to a crop of cases in which the limitation of the doctrine and the consequent liability of the master have been discussed, and of these Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co. v. English (2) takes a leading place. LORD WRIGHT in that case, quoting the wording approved in Bulter (or Black) v. Fife Coal Co. (3) ([1912] A.C. 173), said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 640):

"The obligation is threefold, 'the provision of a competent staff of men, adequate material, and a proper system and effective supervision.'"

My Lords, in the present case the learned judge has found that Hayman was believed to be, and, in fact, was, competent to perform the duty placed on him, and, as I have indicated, the material provided was adequate for the purpose for which it was required. The only outstanding question, therefore, is whether there was an adequate system and effective supervision. I did not myself understand that any complaint was made of the system except that Hayman had not received specific instructions as to the carrying of heavy material of unusual shape, and that, in any case, if such material was to be transported, the master remained liable for the proper supervision of the means adopted for its carriage.

The duty cast on the master is, of course, not absolute, but only to do his best to fulfil the obligation imposed on him, though, indeed, a high standard is exacted. As the law stands, that duty must be considered in relation to the circumstances of each particular case, and the question to be answered is whether adequate provision was made for the carrying out of the job in hand under the general system of work adopted by the employer or under some special system adapted to meet the particular circumstances of the case. Undoubtedly, such an obligation may be imposed on the employer if the circumstances require it, but it is always a question whether the negligence complained of is the failure of the employer to inaugurate and maintain a safe system or the casual departure from that system as the result of the negligence of an individual fellow workman. The difference, as I see it, is between a case where sufficient and adequate provisions have been made, which will, if carried out, protect the workman unless one of his fellows does not use proper care in carrying out the system, and a case where the system itself makes no such provision. One can illustrate the distinction by comparing the resultant liability where a well-trained chauffeur brings about an accident by careless driving with a case where such a driver is set the task of driving a motor of unusual construction without any steps being taken to see that he can fulfil the duty with which he is entrusted. In the first case the master would be free from blame in respect of injury to a fellow servant. In the second there would, I imagine, be a failure to provide a safe system of proper instruction and supervision.

In the present case the negligence appears to me to be the negligence of a fellow employee to fulfil a task which he was fully competent to carry out and which his master was justified in believing that he would so fulfil, and the accident to be due to that negligence and to no failure on the employer's part. Such was MORRIS, J.'s, judgment and he had ample evidence to support it. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. In my opinion, the common law duty of an employer of labour is to act reasonably in all the circumstances. One of those circumstances is that he is an employer of labour, and it is, therefore, reasonable that he should employ competent servants, should supply them with adequate plant, and should give adequate directions as to the system of work or mode of operation, but this does not mean that the employer must decide on every detail of the system of work or mode of operation. There is a sphere in which the employer must

A exercise his discretion and there are other spheres in which foremen and workmen must exercise theirs. It is not easy to define these spheres, but where the system or mode of operation is complicated or highly dangerous or prolonged or involves a number of men performing different functions, it is naturally a matter for the employer to take the responsibility of deciding what system shall be adopted. On the other hand, where the operation is simple and the decision how it shall be done has to be taken frequently, it is natural and reasonable that it should be left to the foreman or workmen on the spot. In the present case the question to be decided was whether to lash the regulator on the lorry or not to lash it, and both courts have held, as I think, rightly, that that was a matter for the decision of the charge hand on the spot. Transport of goods would, I apprehend, be impossible to carry on efficiently if the method of securing every load had to be decided by the employer. It might almost as well be suggested that the tying up of every parcel in a shop is a matter for the employer's decision. A good leader of men (and an employer is a leader of men) leaves to his men as much discretion as he can, otherwise unforeseen circumstances will upset the best laid plan. The question is in each case: Is it a matter for the employer's decision or for the man's?, and I have no doubt that the courts below were right in holding that in the present case it was for the charge hand to decide whether this load should be lashed on the lorry or not.

LORD MACDERMOTT (having stated the facts): My Lords, unfortunately for the appellant, he received his injuries before s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, which abolished the doctrine of common employment, came into force. He cannot, therefore, succeed against D the respondents merely by establishing negligence on the part of Hayman, for the latter was undoubtedly his fellow-servant. This was conceded, but the appellant contended that his injuries were also due to the negligence of the respondents, his employers, in failing to provide (a) proper plant and equipment for the job, and (b) a proper and safe system of working. If default of this nature was a cause of the accident, it is clear that the doctrine of common E employment would not afford a defence, for the duties underlying these two types of negligence are and remain the personal obligations of the employer: see Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. v. English (2). These duties, it may be well to add, are not absolute in nature. They lie within, and exemplify, the broader duty of taking reasonable care for the safety of his workmen which rests on every employer, and they may be more accurately described as (a) the duty to F use reasonable skill and care to provide proper plant and equipment, and (b) the duty to use reasonable skill and care to provide a proper and safe system of working where the task is such as to call for the laying down of a system or mode of working in the interests of safety. The test throughout is, I think, that of what is reasonable and proper to be done for the safety of the workman in the circumstances of the particular case.

G For the appellant it was said that the respondents were in breach of the first of these duties because the lorry was not suitable for carrying the regulator in that its tail-board and near side board were missing. The learned trial judge rejected this contention and expressed the view that the lorry was quite safe and adequate for this purpose. The tail and side boards would, no doubt, have been useful to contain a loose load, such as sand or stones, but there is nothing H that I can find in the evidence to suggest that they were designed, or could properly have been used, without more, for the purpose of containing a weighty single object such as the regulator. Sides or no sides, the proper way to secure it was to lash it to the platform. If that had been done, as it could and ought to have been done with the rope provided, the accident would not have happened. Whether it would have happened differently or with better or worse results for the appellant had the missing boards been in position must on the evidence remain a matter of conjecture, and, in any event, the issue is not whether the presence of the boards would have prevented the accident. It is whether the respondents acted with reasonable care for their workmen's safety in providing what was, to all intents and purposes, a lorry without sides, but with the necessary gear for transporting the load in safety. On this there was, in my opinion, ample evidence to support the finding of MORRIS, J. I cannot, for myself, see any sound ground on which a different conclusion might have been based.

The next question is whether the respondents were at fault regarding the provision of a proper and safe system of working. Since this House in Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd. (4), approved the propositions laid down with respect to this obligation by the Court of Appeal in Speed v. Thomas Swift & Co., Ltd. (5) it cannot, I think, be doubted that the duty to provide a safe system can arise in relation to a single task which may never have to be repeated under the same conditions, but that does not mean that there must be a scheme of work thought out for every operation, nor can the duty always be distinguished from the kindred obligation to provide proper plant and equipment. Here, for example, the nature of the tackle provided indicated the scheme or method to be applied in placing the object to be removed on the lorry, and in that sense the job was one for the provision of a scheme of work. The appellant, however, made no complaint in respect of the method or scheme followed in hoisting the regulator on the lorry. His contention on this branch of the case was that the respondents, presumably through Foster, the mains superintendent, should have instructed Hayman to lash down the load when in position. It was admitted that no such instructions had been given and this omission, it was said on behalf of the appellant, constituted a defect in the system of working which ought to have been provided, or, alternatively, was in itself a breach of the respondents' personal obligation to take reasonable steps for the safety of those employed on the task. The giving of proper instructions may well be part of a proper system of working, but I do not think it really matters here under which of these alternatives the point is considered. The question of substance is the same in either case: Did the respondents fail to take due care for the safety of their workmen in not telling Hayman to lash the regulator with the rope provided? MORRIS, J., was of opinion that the respondents had not failed in their duty in this respect, and the majority in the Court of Appeal upheld him in this, COHEN, L.J., taking the contrary view.

For the appellant it was urged that the removal of the regulator was an unusual operation calling for a degree of skill and care which the respondents could not reasonably have expected Hayman to show unless he had been specially instructed. The load, it was said, was particularly awkward and difficult on account of the projecting knobs as well as of its weight, and the securing of it should not have been left to the discretion of one of Hayman's limited experience. My Lords, here again, the evidence, in my opinion, was amply sufficient to justify the learned trial judge in rejecting this point of view and in holding as he did on this aspect of the case. It is true that Hayman had not supervised the removal of a regulator of this sort before, but he had been in the employment of the respondents for fifteen years and was accustomed to moving electrical apparatus by lorry. According to his testimony this particular job was in the ordinary course of the day's work and he did not expect to receive any special instructions about it. Foster, the mains superintendent, said "he was a very capable and competent man," and considered him fit to deal with the removal of the regulator and to settle the details of the work. After referring to the evidence to this effect, MORRIS, J., in the course of a careful and considered judgment, states his conclusion as to the conduct of the respondents thus:

"It was, in my view, quite reasonable for them to give instructions to Hayman to remove the regulator, while leaving it to him to decide in detail as to the exact way in which he would perform his task."

The learned judge had previously referred at some length to Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd. (4) and Speed v. Thomas Swift & Co., Ltd. (5), and I have no doubt that in reaching this finding he was directing himself to the duty to take reasonable care for the safety of their employees which lay on the respondents. That being so, I can see no ground for disturbing his decision that the respondents had not failed in their duty towards the appellant. In the event, no doubt, Hayman made a mistake and fell short of what was expected of him, but, as against this, it must be remembered that he was a witness and that the learned judge had an opportunity of assessing his intelligence and forming a view as to whether he was the kind of man to whom the respondents might reasonably commit this particular job without special instructions. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

LORD REID: My Lords, apart from statute, an employer is under certain obligations to his servants to provide for their safety. He may leave a servant to carry out such obligations, but he cannot delegate or avoid his own responsibility for their proper performance. So, if the servant left to carry out such an obligation is negligent in carrying it out and that negligence causes injury to a fellow servant, the employer is liable in damages and cannot rely on the rule of common employment. One of these obligations is to provide a safe system of working. A system of working normally implies that the work consists of a series of similar or somewhat similar operations and the conception of a system of working is not easily applied to a case where only a single act of a particular kind is to be performed. Recently, however, this obligation has been extended to cover certain cases when only a single operation is involved.

I think that the justification for this is that, where an operation is of a complicated or unusual character, an employer, careful of the safety of his men, would organise it before it was begun and in that sense provide a safe system of working for it. Where such organisation is called for, an employer must provide it and he cannot delegate his responsibility for it, but cases in which such a duty has been found to exist are comparatively few and it has never even been suggested that such an obligation arises in every case where a group of the employer's servants are doing some work which may involve danger if negligently performed. In the most recent reported case, Rees v. Cambrian Wagon Works Ltd. (6), TUCKER, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court said (175 L.T. 221):

"... the operation was one which required proper organisation and supervision, or, in other words, a reasonably safe system."

I think that this is the right criterion.

In the present case the operation in the course of which the appellant was injured was a simple one. A voltage regulator, weighing about fifteen hundred-weight, but of somewhat awkward shape, had to be loaded on a lorry and carried for a mile or so. The employer provided a lorry and tackle for loading the instrument on it. The loading was done safely and properly and without difficulty, but the load ought to have been tied to the lorry so that it could not move on the journey, and rope was available for this purpose. The man in charge did not think it necessary to do this and on the journey the load fell on the side of the road, carrying the appellant with it and severely injuring him. It was argued that the lorry was defective in that it ought to have had a side board and that the presence of a side board would have been some safeguard. This is by no means certain, but, assuming it to be so, it is certainly not the case that a lorry without a side board was an unsafe vehicle to carry the load. It is not disputed that, if the load had been tied on, the lorry was perfectly safe, side board or no side board. I, therefore, think that the absence of the side board was immaterial. It was also argued that the employers did not provide a sufficiently experienced man to take charge of the operation. The man whom they sent had been in the respondents' service for a number of years and he was accustomed to moving electrical apparatus. It is true that he had never handled this particular type of instrument before, but he was regarded by his employers as a competent and capable man well qualified to be entrusted with this responsibility and he did not, himself, expect to receive specific instructions about this operation. I think that MORRIS, J., was well justified in saying:

"It was, in my view, quite reasonable for them to give instructions to Hayman to remove the regulator while leaving it to him to decide in detail as to the exact way in which he would perform his task. The matter was not either intricate or bewildering. It was not an enterprise calling for elaborate planning or for precise and detailed instructions. The job required the exercise of judgment on the spot."

On this finding I think that he was right in holding that it had not been established that the respondents were negligent in any of the respects alleged.

There have been many cases in which a system of working was admittedly necessary and was provided and the issue was whether a negligent act by a servant, which caused injury to a fellow servant, was an act which he was performing in the execution of his employer's duty to provide and maintain a safe system of work or was an independent or casual act of negligence. I do not think that these cases afford much help in determining whether a system of work was necessary at all, but in Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd. (4), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., having referred to Speed v. Thomas Swift & Co. (5), said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 328):

"... the judgments of LORD GREENE, M.R., and MACKINNON and GODDARD, L.JJ., appear to me to carry the analysis of 'system of working' to the furthest point that can be reached. I agree with the propositions there laid down, but, as long as the doctrine of common employment continues to apply, do not think that the employer's liability at common law arising from this duty can be further extended."

My Lords, in my judgment, this appeal could not be allowed without a considerable further extension of that liability and I agree with your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, VISCOUNT JOWITT, L.C., asked me to say that he agrees with the opinion which I have expressed.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), March 8, 15, 1950.]

Divorce—Decree absolute—Wife's petition on ground of adultery—Reconciliation after decree nisi—Resumption of cohabitation—Subsequent desertion by husband—Wife's application for decree absolute after more than a year—Need to disclose full facts—Notice to parties affected by charges—Jurisdiction of court—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 40.

On June 14, 1948, the wife obtained a decree nisi against her husband on the ground of his adultery. Shortly afterwards the parties became reconciled and they lived together from September, 1948, to May, 1949, when the husband left the wife. She then applied out of time for the decree nisi to be made absolute.

HELD : (i) the husband's conduct in leaving his wife amounting to an act of desertion, there was no need for the wife, who had disclosed all the material facts that had arisen since the decree nisi, to have recourse to fresh proceedings.

(ii) the court had jurisdiction to allow the decree to be made absolute, and the wife, having adequately accounted for her delay, was entitled to a decree absolute.

Per WILLMER, J.: in the absence of any provision in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, parties and their professional advisers making applications for a decree nisi to be made absolute in cases where there has been a resumption of cohabitation are under a duty to disclose to the court all the material facts, and, if allegations are made which affect the opposite party or persons not parties to the suit, to serve a notice on such persons giving full particulars of the charges made.

Beard v. Beard ([1945] 2 All E.R. 306); Moore v. Moore ([1892] P. 382); and Rogers v. Rogers ([1894] P. 161), applied.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. Until recently decrees absolute were pronounced in open court as a judicial act, but now, under r. 40 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, such decrees are granted by the ministerial act of the registrar. In this case WILLMER, J., called attention to the fact that that rule calls for no disclosure by applicants of their own conduct since the decree nisi was made, and that the registrar has no power to make any inquiry. Even when applications are made outside the year prescribed by the rule the only requirement is that the applicant should set out in an affidavit the grounds for the delay in making the application. Where there has been condonation of the respondent's offence after the decree nisi and the petitioner alleges fresh matrimonial offences he or she may, instead of bringing fresh proceedings, elect to rely on the original offence. In such cases the fresh charges set out in the affidavit may gravely affect third parties. In order to afford such parties the opportunity, if they are so minded, to answer these allegations WILLMER, J., pointed out that there was need to amend the rule, and until that change is made he emphasised the present duty resting on solicitors, first, to ensure that their clients disclose fully to the court all the material facts of their own conduct, and, secondly, to serve notice on all persons against whom allegations, generally charges of adultery, are made in affidavits supporting applications for decrees absolute.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The wife applied more than a year after the date on which she had been granted a decree nisi on the ground of her husband's adultery for the decree to be made absolute. In her supporting affidavit she stated that, after becoming reconciled with her husband after the decree nisi had been granted, she lived with him for nine months, at the end of which he deserted her. The registrar referred the matter to WILLMER, J., who asked for the assistance of the King's Proctor and adjourned the matter into court for argument.

Mar. 15. WILLMER, J., read the following judgment. This was an application by a wife petitioner for leave to apply, after the lapse of more than a year from decree nisi, to have the decree made absolute. The matter was referred to me by the registrar in view of the unusual circumstances disclosed in the petitioner's affidavit, and, having regard to the difficult questions that appeared to arise, I asked for the assistance of the King's Proctor and adjourned the summons for hearing in open court. The hearing took place on Mar. 8, when the matter was argued fully by counsel on behalf of the wife and of the King's Proctor. At the conclusion I was able to announce my decision, namely, that leave would be granted to apply forthwith to have the decree nisi made absolute (which has since been done), but, in view of the importance of the questions argued before me, I have thought it right to take time to reduce into writing the reasons for my decision.

The material facts were clearly and fully set out in the wife's affidavit, and may be very briefly stated. She obtained a decree nisi on June 14, 1948, on the ground of the husband's adultery. Shortly afterwards, owing to the tragic death of one of the children of the marriage, the parties became reconciled, and from September, 1948, until May, 1949, they lived together again at an address in Ireland where the husband had acquired a property. Differences then again arose between them, as a result of which the husband refused to continue living with the wife. I have before me two letters written by the husband in May and June respectively, which make it quite clear that it was his decision and his act which brought to an end the resumed cohabitation. No sufficient cause is put forward for his refusal to continue living with his wife, and I am left in no doubt—especially after hearing the result of the King's Proctor's independent investigation—that the husband's conduct amounted to an act of desertion. The parties have never since resumed cohabitation. The situation in this case, therefore, is exactly that which arose in Beard v. Beard (1), and on the authority of the decision in that case there can be no doubt that in the events which have happened the wife has good grounds for seeking relief. The question which gave rise to doubt in my mind is whether she is entitled to relief in these proceedings. It is clear that, if she had taken steps to have this petition dismissed and had then launched a fresh petition, alleging the original act of adultery, admitting the subsequent condonation, but setting up the husband's later desertion by way of revival of the condoned adultery, she would have had an impregnable case. The wife was reluctant to take that course, because, as she alleged, there were grounds for thinking that since the previous proceedings the husband had abandoned his English domicile and had acquired a new domicile of choice in Ireland. In the circumstances it was strenuously argued before me that there was no need to have recourse to fresh proceedings, but that the wife, having disclosed all the material facts which have arisen since decree nisi, was entitled to obtain her relief in this suit, in which no question of domicile arose.

I have come to the conclusion that this case is covered by the authority of Moore v. Moore (2). In that case a period of over eight years had elapsed, during part of which the wife resumed cohabitation with the husband and continued to live with him until she again left him on the ground of his cruelty. On an application to make absolute the decree nisi granted eight years before, it was held by GORELL BARNES, J., that the subsequent cruelty of the husband placed the petitioner in the position which she occupied when she obtained the decree nisi, and that she was entitled to have the decree made absolute. Two years later, in Rogers v. Rogers (3), where a wife, having obtained a decree nisi, condoned her husband's misconduct, but alleged that such condonation was cancelled by subsequent adultery on his part, counsel for the Queen's Proctor expressly raised the question whether it was competent for the court in the existing proceedings to take notice of the subsequent adultery for the purpose of granting a decree, or whether, on the other hand, there must be a fresh suit.

On this point, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., held himself bound by Moore v. Moore (2) and stated that he would have held that the condonation proved did not form a ground for rescinding the decree, but on the particular facts of that case he held that the Queen's Proctor was entitled to succeed on the ground of collusion, and on that ground the decree nisi was rescinded.

- These cases were, of course, decided under the powers conferred by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, as amended by s. 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860. The statutory provisions now in force, namely, s. 181, s. 182 and s. 183 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, do not differ in any sense material to the present case. The great change which has taken place is in the procedure prescribed by rules of court for obtaining a decree absolute. Whereas until recently the decree absolute was pronounced, as a judicial act, by the judge in open court, provision is now made, by r. 40 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, for a decree absolute to be obtained by a ministerial act on the part of the registrar. No machinery exists under the rule for dealing with the sort of question that has arisen in this case. The rule imposes no obligation on the party who has obtained the decree nisi to make any disclosure with regard to his or her conduct since decree nisi, nor has the registrar any duty, or (it would seem) any power, to inquire. If the application is made within a year from the date of the decree nisi, it would appear that the registrar is bound under the rule to let the notice be filed, on being satisfied that no appeal is pending and that no appearance has been entered, or affidavit filed, on behalf of any person wishing to show cause against the decree being made absolute. If more than a year has elapsed, the party who obtained the decree nisi must, it is true, file an affidavit and the registrar has a discretion to grant or withhold leave, but it is clear that, so far as the rule is concerned, the applicant's affidavit is required only for the purpose of accounting for the delay, and the registrar's discretion is apparently limited to this aspect of the matter. What strikes me as even more arresting is the fact that no provision is made under the rule for giving notice to other parties who may be affected. Suppose a petitioner, after obtaining a decree nisi, has condoned the respondent's offence, but wishes to apply for a decree absolute on the ground that the original offence has been revived by fresh misconduct on the part of the respondent. It may be sought to make the most horrible charges, as, for instance, of cruelty or bestiality, but no provision is made by the rule for giving notice thereof to the respondent or for affording him or her an opportunity to be heard thereon. If it is alleged that the respondent has been guilty of subsequent adultery, there is no machinery under the rule for giving notice to the party with whom such adultery is alleged to have been committed. It may be that, if any such matter is brought to the attention of the court, the powers of the court under s. 197 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, are sufficient to protect the rights of such third parties, but it is at least a matter for some surprise that no provision has been made in the rules for such an eventuality, and it seems clear that when the present rules were drafted it was never contemplated that applications for decree absolute might be made in such circumstances. Yet, if the wife is entitled to apply for a decree absolute in the present case, plainly she could equally have done so had she relied on an allegation of adultery, instead of desertion, as reviving the husband's previous misconduct.
- Having regard to the provisions of the rules as they now stand I have given anxious consideration to the question whether jurisdiction now exists to allow an application for a decree absolute in circumstances such as those of the present case. I have come to the conclusion that counsel for the wife and for the King's Proctor were well founded in their submission that the jurisdiction of the court cannot be restricted or taken away by a mere alteration of the rules. It is clear that in 1892 and 1894 jurisdiction existed to pronounce a decree absolute in a case such as the present, as is shown by Moore v. Moore (2) and Rogers v.

Rogers (3). If the court had jurisdiction at that date, such jurisdiction could only be taken away by subsequent statutory enactment. I can find nothing in any subsequent statute which either expressly or by implication takes away the jurisdiction that was exercised in those two cases. On the contrary, as I have previously pointed out, the provisions of the statutes in force today are, so far as this point is concerned, substantially the same as those in force sixty years ago. I have come to the conclusion that, provided I am satisfied on the particular facts of this case, I have undoubted jurisdiction to allow this decree to be made absolute. The fact that the present rules of court make no provision for dealing with this sort of case is much to be deplored, but I cannot regard it as a good reason for refusing to exercise a jurisdiction which I am satisfied I have. It is much to be hoped that, in view of what has come to light in this case, an early opportunity will be taken of re-considering and revising the present rules. In the meantime, in the absence of any provision in the rules, I think it right to take this opportunity to emphasise that in cases such as the present parties making applications for decree absolute, and their professional advisers, are under a duty to make the fullest possible disclosure to the court of all material facts, and, furthermore, where allegations are made which may affect the opposite party or persons not parties to the suit, notice should be served on such parties giving full particulars of the charges made. In the present case I am informed that the wife's solicitors did, in fact, take the precaution of serving notice of this application on the husband, with a copy of the wife's affidavit. I am satisfied that the husband has had an opportunity of rebutting the charge of desertion made against him, and that his failure to take advantage of that opportunity has been due to his recognition that he has no defence to the charge. I am also satisfied that the wife has adequately accounted for her delay in making application to have the decree made absolute—indeed the reasons for the delay reflect nothing but credit to her. In the circumstances I can see no good reason for withholding the relief sought by the wife, and I have, therefore, as already stated, granted leave to apply for a decree absolute.

Criminal Law—False pretences—Indictment—Need to state to whom pretences made—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 32 (1)—Indictments Act, 1915 (c. 90), s. 3 (2), sched. I, appendix, form 12.

The applicant was charged on an indictment containing eight counts of obtaining money by false pretences contrary to the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 32 (1), and was convicted on all counts. The grounds of his appeal were, inter alia, that the indictment was bad in that it did not state to whom the false pretences were made.

HELD: in view of the provisions of the Indictments Act, 1915, sched. I, appendix, form 12, it was no longer necessary to state to whom the pretences were made.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against conviction at Kingston Quarter Sessions.

- Ackner for the applicant.
- B The Crown was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: So far as the conviction is concerned, in the opinion of the court there is nothing to be said. There was one point taken in the notice of appeal which counsel for the applicant has, very properly, not pursued. It was said that the indictment was bad because

C the counts did not state, in so many words, to whom the false pretences were made. The first count was:

- “ . . . that on or about Nov. 5, 1948, at Reigate in the county of Surrey with intent to defraud you obtained from William John Moir a valuable security, to wit, a cheque for £170 6s. 0d., by falsely pretending that you were in a position to supply to the said William John Moir a secondhand
- D David Brown tractor.”

The count does not state that the false pretence was made to William John Moir, although it says that the applicant obtained the cheque by falsely pretending that he was in a position to supply that person with a tractor.

- E There is a passage in ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING, EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE, 32nd ed., p. 687, which says:

“The indictment must state to whom the pretences were made, and from whom the goods, etc., were obtained.”

- The authority quoted for that proposition is R. v. Sowerby (1), decided in 1894, where the form of indictment in R. v. Hunter (2) was held to be bad. The
- F Indictments Act, 1915, sched. I, appendix, form 12, now makes provision for the form of a count for false pretences and the above statement in ARCHBOLD'S work is no longer accurate.

MUNRO v. MUNRO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Denning, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), March 9, 1950.]

Divorce—Restitution of conjugal rights—Petitioner's refusal to share matrimonial home with mother-in-law—Departure from matrimonial home—Willingness to resume cohabitation elsewhere—Order that respondent "return home to the petitioner and render to her conjugal rights." A

In June, 1947, the parties were married and went to live in a flat contained in a villa belonging to the husband's mother in the south of France. The mother was of a dominating personality, and the husband was addicted to drink and was without employment. In March, 1948, the wife, having failed to reform the husband and being of the opinion that the mother was having a bad influence on him, left her husband and went to live in London. In May, 1948, the husband visited the wife in London, but he refused to resume cohabitation there and suggested that the wife should return to the villa in France. This the wife was not prepared to do, although she was willing to make a home for the husband provided that it did not involve living with his mother. On a petition by the wife for restitution of conjugal rights an order was made that the husband "do within six months from the service of this order on him return home to the petitioner and render to her conjugal rights." For the husband it was argued that, for such an order to be well founded, the facts must disclose that the respondent to the petition had withdrawn from cohabitation, and that in the present case the wife had left the husband, and, therefore, she was not entitled to a decree. B C D

Held: the husband's offer of a home in the villa was one which it was reasonable for the wife to refuse; he had thus failed in his duty to provide a proper home for the wife and could be held liable for wilful neglect to maintain her; and, accordingly, a decree could be made directing him to render her conjugal rights. APPEAL by the husband against a decree of restitution of conjugal rights granted to the wife by Mr. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK, K.C., and dated Dec. 5, 1949, whereby it was ordered that the husband "do within six months from the service of this order on him return home to the petitioner and render to her conjugal rights." G

The wife, having, as she alleged, found life impossible in the home provided by the husband, left him. For the husband it was contended that, since the wife and not the husband had withdrawn from cohabitation, the case was not one in which such an order ought to be made, since, in view of its terms and the facts, it was inappropriate. H

Mattar for the husband.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and O'Malley for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The main point taken on behalf of the husband is that in law the facts do not establish a case in which a decree of restitution of conjugal rights ought to be made. It was said that the respondent to this form of decree must have withdrawn from cohabitation and must be ordered to return to it. It is said here that the husband never did withdraw from cohabitation, but that it was the wife who withdrew from cohabitation when she left the villa in France, because, as she says, life there was impossible, and came back to her home in Chelsea where she wanted her husband to live. It is true that the form of the order seems to indicate that the cases in which an order may properly be made are those where the respondent has withdrawn from cohabitation and the petitioner is wanting to get him or her back. It is also true that no case has been cited to us which is similar to the present case.

We have been asked to look on this case as one in which the husband has, in effect, offered no reasonable home. In the course of the argument I put a hypothetical case where the husband provided the wife with rooms in a house part of which was being used as a brothel. In such a case, in my opinion, a husband could not say that that was a proper home for the wife, and she would be entitled to leave and ask for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights and the provision of a proper home. That that is a correct view is borne out by the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J., in Fassbender v. Fassbender (1) where the parties had never cohabited at all and, nevertheless, the learned judge there made an order for restitution of conjugal rights. If an order for restitution could not be made in a case such as the present, the wife might have been placed in a difficult position because, at any rate until the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, was passed—it was not the law at the time this case was under consideration—she could only proceed in the magistrates' court for an order on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain, which was limited at that time to £2 per week. She could not get any order for maintenance on the ground of desertion from the High Court, but had to wait for three years until she could bring a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. I think one ought to apply, in a case of this kind, the same sort of reasoning as that which was applied by the Divisional Court in McGowan v. McGowan (2) where the question was considered whether the offer of a home by the husband to the wife was a reasonable offer. If it was not a reasonable offer, the wife was entitled to reject it, and, if she was entitled to reject it, the court held that the husband would be liable to pay maintenance on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain, although he had, in fact, made an offer of a home.

I have come to the conclusion that the question which the learned commissioner put to himself was the right question, viz.: Was the offer by the husband to the wife of a home in this villa in all the circumstances one which it was reasonable for the wife to refuse? The learned commissioner came to the conclusion that it was. The husband has, therefore, not offered her a home which can reasonably be regarded as a home, and it was proper that a decree should be made directing him to render her conjugal rights. In my judgment, the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: The setting up of a home by this couple has failed hitherto owing to the unreasonableness of the husband. He took his wife to the south of France to live in a flat next door to his own mother who has a very dominating personality, and he himself spent most of his time in drink and did no work. The wife stayed for six months, and, then, being unable to stand the conditions there any longer, she came back to England. It is plain that the wife had just cause for leaving. The only invitation which the husband has since made to her is that she should go back to live under the same conditions. That, clearly, she was not bound to do. What then is her remedy? She asks for an order for restitution of conjugal rights and I see no reason why she should not have it. The conjugal rights of a wife comprise many things, the precise extent of which depends on the circumstances of each case. This wife is, I think, entitled to ask her husband to provide a reasonable home away from the mother-in-law, as he could and should do. The court, of course, does not, and cannot, attempt specifically to enforce an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, but the order means that, if the husband does not comply with it, the wife will at least be able to get maintenance without more ado. A

Until recently an order for restitution of conjugal rights was often the only way in which a wife could get reasonable maintenance. That has been remedied now by s. 5 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, which enables the High Court to make an order for periodical payments in the case of wilful neglect to maintain. In the present case it is not maintenance so much that this wife wants, as her conjugal rights. She wants to reform her husband. She wants him to get work and make a home for them both. So far as the court can help the wife to attain this object by an order for restitution of conjugal rights, I see no reason why she should not have it. The form of the order is not altogether apt for the present situation, but the meaning is clear enough and that is what matters. The husband must provide a reasonable home for his wife, failing which he must provide reasonable maintenance for her. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. B

The landlord terminated the tenant's contractual tenancy by giving her notice to quit, and, on the expiration of the notice, sought possession of the whole house, or, alternatively, of the room sub-let, on the grounds that (i) as the use of the kitchen was shared, neither the tenant nor the sub-tenant had a separate dwelling, and that, therefore, neither was protected by the Rent Acts, and (ii) the tenancy of the room which was sub-let was not protected inasmuch H

Per LORD NORMAND, LORD MACDERMOTT and LORD REID: The implication contained in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (d), was that the court had no power under that paragraph to make an order for the recovery of possession of a dwelling-house to which the Act applied on the ground that a part of the dwelling-house was sub-let without the landlord's consent, provided that the tenant remained in occupation of the part not sub-let.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. It was conceded that the order for possession which was made in this matter before the commencement of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, came within the words "anything done" in s. 10 of that Act. If, however, it had been successfully contended to the contrary, their Lordships' decision in this case must also have been in the tenant's favour, having regard to the retrospective effect of the Act under s. 10, and the terms of s. 9, which provides that where the tenant of any premises has sub-let a part, but not the whole, of the premises, then, as against his landlord, or any superior landlord, no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply by reason only that the terms on which the sub-tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons, or that part of the premises is let to any person at a rent which includes payments in respect of the use of furniture (proviso (i) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920). Therefore, as regards circumstances similar to those in this case and in view of the present decision the law is unchanged by the Act of 1949. APPEAL by the tenant from an order of the Court of Appeal, made on Feb. 17, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 560, dismissing her appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Croydon County Court, and dated July 14, 1948, granting to the landlord possession of a dwelling-house. The Court of Appeal ordered execution to be stayed on certain conditions, but, the tenant having broken those conditions, the landlord proceeded to execution and had regained possession at the date of the hearing of the present appeal by the House of Lords. Mar. 29. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal by the defendant from an order of His Majesty's Court of Appeal (England) dated Feb. 17, 1949, dismissing the appeal of the appellant, the defendant in the action, from the judgment of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., dated July 14, 1948, under which judgment was entered for the respondent, the plaintiff in the action for possession of a dwelling-house known as No. 22 Inwood Avenue at Old Coulsdon in the county of Surrey. H

The facts as proved or admitted are not in dispute and can be shortly stated. The respondent is the owner of the house in question which is of a rateable value within the limits prescribed by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. The house is a small bungalow comprising three rooms and a kitchen, bathroom and lavatory with an attic room upstairs. Prior to January, 1948, the respondent let the house to the appellant's husband, C. L. Baker, on a weekly tenancy at a rent of £1 6s. 9d. per week. On Jan. 6, 1948, the appellant's husband died and the appellant, who was living in the house, succeeded to the tenancy and continued to live there. On Feb. 14, 1948, she sub-let, to a Mr. L. Setter at a rent of £1 15s. per week, a furnished bed-sitting room together with the right to use the kitchen. Mr. and Mrs. Setter went into occupation of the bed-sitting room and, in accordance with an arrangement made with the appellant when negotiating the sub-tenancy, paid about 6s. per week for gas and 1s. 2d. per week for electric light in addition to the rent of £1 15s. per week, and used the kitchen under the terms of the agreement concluded between them. The appellant and Mr. and Mrs. Setter each purchased their own food separately, and normally cooked their meals and ate them independently of each other. The appellant's contractual tenancy was determined by a written notice to quit which expired on Mar. 29, 1948, but the sub-tenancy subsisted, and at the date of the commencement of the present action both the appellant and Mr. and Mrs. Setter resided in the house in conformity with the terms agreed between them.

These being the facts, the respondent issued a plaint in the Croydon County Court for possession of the whole house, or, alternatively, of the furnished room let to Mr. Setter, on the grounds that (i) as the use of the kitchen was shared, neither the appellant nor Mr. Setter had a separate dwelling, and therefore no part of the house, as then divided, continued to be a separate dwelling so as to afford to either tenant or sub-tenant the protection of the Acts; (ii) that in any case the furnished room was no longer protected by the Acts, inasmuch as (a) it was furnished, (b) its occupation was coupled with the use of the kitchen, and therefore it was not a separate dwelling. The appellant on her part claimed the protection of the Acts, and maintained that nothing she had done deprived her of that benefit. The learned county court judge, following and extending the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (1), found that the agreement between tenant and sub-tenant resulted in a sharing of the kitchen, and so prevented the tenant from retaining, or the sub-tenant from acquiring, a separate dwelling—neither was separate, each was enjoyed with mutual, or, at any rate, shared rights over the kitchen. The Court of Appeal upheld this contention, and, I think, also decided that inasmuch as the bed-sitting room was let furnished it was by that circumstance alone taken out of the protection of the Acts.

When the questions were argued in the Court of Appeal it was thought that the house came under old control, i.e., that it had been subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts passed prior to 1939, and, therefore, that the determination whether the bed-sitting room constituted a separate dwelling depended on the true effect of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. It appears, however, that this was a mistake. The house actually was not built until about 1935, and, therefore, is subject to the provisions of the Act of 1939 and that only. But the error has no effect on the question to be decided. It is true that s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 has been repealed by sched. I to the Act of 1939, but, by s. 3 of this later Act, the principal Acts, i.e., the Acts of 1920 to 1938, apply to every other dwelling-house (i.e., to every house not already subject to the earlier Acts) of which the rateable value does not exceed a prescribed figure. By s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933:

“ ‘ Dwelling-house ’ has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let.”

“ Dwelling-house ” therefore means separate dwelling-house, and the Act of 1939 applies, as, by s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, that Act applied, only to a house or part of a house let as a separate dwelling. So, with respect to houses let furnished, s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939 expressly provides that the principal Acts shall not apply to any dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of use of furniture. The problem, therefore, is unchanged, though the question has now, as it turns out, to be decided in reference to a house subject to new and not to old control. But before the substance of the dispute is decided, a preliminary question has to be determined. It was contended on the part of the respondent that the right of appeal had lapsed on two grounds, (i) that leave to appeal to your Lordships' House had only been granted by the Court of Appeal on condition that the appellant gave three undertakings, that she had not carried out those undertakings, and that her conditional leave to appeal was therefore withdrawn, and (ii) that the learned county court judge's order for possession, as affirmed by the Court of Appeal, had been executed, the landlord had obtained actual possession of the premises, and that in face of this fait accompli the case was finally concluded and done with.

As to (i), the order of the Court of Appeal is in the following terms:

"Upon the defendant by her counsel undertaking (1) To pay the taxed costs of the appeal to this court to the plaintiff's solicitors within two months of the taxing master's certificate on their personal undertaking to return the same if the appeal to the House of Lords be successful; (2) To prosecute the appeal to the House of Lords with all reasonable despatch; (3) To pay her rent promptly pending the said appeal,

It is ordered that execution upon the aforesaid judgment of the Croydon County Court, in as far as it relates to possession of the premises described therein only, be stayed pending the hearing of the appeal to the House of Lords, with liberty to the plaintiff to apply to this court to remove the stay in the event of any breach of the defendant's undertaking.

It is further ordered that the defendant be at liberty to lodge a petition of appeal to the House of Lords on the ground that a question of public importance is raised by this appeal."

I do not read this order as bearing the meaning contended for by the respondent. It seems to me to make two separate provisions: (a) to grant a stay of execution on certain terms which have not been fulfilled, and (b) to give leave to appeal on a matter of public importance. It is the stay, not the leave to appeal, which is conditional, and the fact that the stay has ceased to operate is irrelevant to the continued existence of the right of appeal. Moreover, it is to be observed that the leave given is to lodge a petition of appeal, and it would be an odd result even if it were a possible one if a petition lawfully lodged to your Lordships' House, as has happened in this case, could be withdrawn without the leave of the House because some condition subsequent had not been fulfilled.

(ii) The argument that the appeal has abated because the judgment of the Court of Appeal had been executed would, I think, logically lead to the result that whenever a stay had not been granted a successful litigant, if sufficiently active and astute, could execute his judgment and so prevent the determination of any doubtful point of law, even in a case where an appeal lay as of right—e.g., from Scotland or Northern Ireland or from an appellate court to your Lordships' House—or from the High Court to the Court of Appeal. The contention was sought to be supported by a reference to Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada v. Jervis (2), and Metropolitan Real and General Property Trust, Ltd. v. Slaters & Bodega, Ltd. (3), but those cases gave rise to very different considerations. In the first, the appellants were given leave to appeal on the terms that they would pay the costs as between solicitor and client in the House of Lords in any event, and not ask for the return of any money ordered to be paid by the Court of Appeal. It followed that, win or lose, they would receive nothing and consequently there was no actual living issue between the parties. In the present case, on the contrary, the appellant stands to gain any advantage which will accrue to her as the result of setting aside the order of the Court of Appeal and of the county court judge. As to the second case there was no dispute that the defendants owed a sum of money ordered by the court to be paid, but they applied under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, for a stay of execution and resulting postponement of payment. The learned judge, reversing the order of the master, gave the plaintiffs leave to proceed to execution and also granted leave to appeal, but made no order staying execution. Before the appeal was heard, the defendants paid all sums due under the judgment. In these circumstances, as the only remedy would have been to order the repayment to the defendants of a sum admittedly due and paid, the Court of Appeal held that the basis of the appeal was destroyed. But that decision depended, in my view, on the fact that the sum paid was admittedly due, and the only application before the court was for a temporary stay. If, as is the position in this case, the decision of the appellate court would have affected the substantive right of the parties, the decision would have been otherwise. The lis is not ended by the levying of execution or by the landlord obtaining possession of the house: he may have achieved his object by a mistaken decision which it is your Lordships' function to rectify. The preliminary point, in my opinion, fails, and accordingly the House is faced with the duty of determining whether the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right or not.

- In the first place, then, it has to be decided whether a bed-sitting room, if let separated from the rest of the house but with a super-added right for the tenants to use the kitchen of the house of which it formed part, can constitute a separate dwelling, and, further, whether, if it be not a separate dwelling, the remainder of the house which is not sub-let has ceased to be a separate dwelling because certain rights have been granted over its kitchen. My Lords, the effect on the letting or sub-letting a portion of a dwelling-house, which portion in itself constitutes a separate dwelling, of coupling the tenancy with a right to use other portions of the house in common with the landlord has been frequently dealt with by the Court of Appeal. The main results of decisions may, I think, be tabulated as follows: (i) A portion of a house which is let by a landlord to a tenant, even if in itself separate, ceases to be a separate dwelling or to be protected by the Acts if the terms of the letting contain a provision that the tenant shall have the right of using a living room belonging to the landlord: Neale v. Del Soto (1). (ii) To take away the protection of the Acts, the room over which rights are given must be a living room: a bathroom, lavatory or cupboard will not avail, but for this purpose a kitchen is a living room: see Cole v. Harris (4). (iii) Furthermore, if a landlord lets two portions of the same house to two separate tenants giving each a separate portion of the house of which he alone is in occupation, but at the same time grants to each tenant the joint use of other portions of the house, neither tenant is in possession of a separate dwelling: Llewellyn v. Hinson (5). (iv) A portion of a house let with such right over other portions can be recovered by whoever lets it without being met by the defence of the Acts, because the portion which is let is not a separate dwelling: Kenyon v. Walker (6). (v) The material time at which it has to be determined whether the house is protected or not is the moment when action is brought: Prout v. Hunter (7), and Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (8).

What has never been determined is whether the portion retained has ceased to be a separate dwelling-house because the sub-tenant has been granted a right of user over a living room in the retained portion. The question might have arisen in Kenyon v. Walker (6). In that case the use of the kitchen for cooking purposes only was granted by a tenant to a sub-tenant, and, in spite of the limited nature of the use so granted, it was held that no separate dwelling had been created, and that the tenant could recover possession from his sub-tenant. At the same time, however, the landlord claimed possession of the whole house, but his ground for so doing was not that the house had been divided into two portions, neither of which was separate from the other, but because, as he alleged, the tenant was charging an excessive rent to his sub-tenant, and that under s. 4 of the Act of 1933 that fact gave the court jurisdiction to make an order for possession. In this claim he failed, and he also failed to recover that part which was sub-let with rights over the retained portion because he had claimed to be re-possessed of the whole and not of a part of the house. Whether he could have recovered possession of the portion sub-let was not in issue or decided, and no claim was made nor the possibility envisaged that the retained portion had itself ceased to be a separate dwelling.

I have refrained in this analysis from speaking of a sharing of the kitchen between the two parties although that expression is frequently used in the relevant cases. The phrase is, in my opinion, inaccurate in expression and may give rise to inaccuracy of thought. A landlord who lets, or for the matter of that a tenant who sub-lets, a portion of the house he occupies and gives a right to his tenant to use the kitchen, does not share his kitchen. He retains many rights which the tenant does not enjoy. One can illustrate the difference by taking a case where a tenant first lets one portion of his house to one sub-tenant with a right to use the kitchen, and then another portion to another sub-tenant with a similar right. Unless his cooking facilities or other enjoyment of the kitchen were interfered with, the first sub-tenant would have no ground of complaint. But a sub-tenant would have no right to permit a third person to use the kitchen in any way even though that third person were an occupier of another part of the house or were a tenant of the person enjoying the facility. The tenant continues to have general control of the kitchen subject only to the rights he has granted: the sub-tenant has nothing but the rights which his landlord has given. The position is to some extent complicated by the assertion that the so-called statutory tenant has only a personal right. This statement is made in the plainest terms in John Lovibond & Sons Ltd. v. Vincent (9) following Keeves v. Dean (10). For the purpose for which it was used the expression was accurate enough: all it meant was that he had no interest which could be transmitted: it did not mean that his only right was to use the kitchen and that except for user he had no dominion over it. That the statement had no such meaning is clear from SCRUTTON, L.J.'s words in the latter case, where he says ([1924] 1 K.B. 694):

"... Parliament has ... called him a tenant, and he appears to me to have something more than a personal right against his landlord. I take it that he has a right as against all the world to remain in possession until he is turned out by an order of the court, and that he could maintain trespass against any person who entered the premises without his permission."

Such a right is, I think, inherent in the status of a statutory tenant and differs toto coelo from the right granted to a sub-tenant to use the kitchen for cooking or otherwise. It does not follow, therefore, that a statutory tenant has parted with his separate dwelling because he has given a right of user over his kitchen to a sub-tenant, even if it be conceded that the sub-tenant has not acquired a separate dwelling when the rooms let to him are coupled with a right to use the kitchen.

I have thought it desirable to make these observations to your Lordships because counsel for the appellant was content to accept the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (1) and the cases which followed its principles as being correctly decided. For the purpose of the present case, I also am prepared to treat these decisions as right, more particularly as the law as therein decided has now been altered by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. But such an acceptance does not, in my view, make the position of the lessee in pari casu with that of the sub-lessee. For the reasons indicated above, the lessee, in my opinion, continues to have and enjoy a separate dwelling. With all respect to the view of the Court of Appeal, I do not assent to the conclusion that if A shares his kitchen with B and as a result B has no separate dwelling, it must follow that A on his part has no separate dwelling because he shares with B. The inevitability of the conclusion is, as I think, falsified because there is no true sharing, and because, in my opinion, the rules of formal logic must not be applied to the Acts with too great strictness. As SCRUTTON, L.J., has more than once pointed out, they must be viewed in the light of their aim and object, and it must always be remembered that the difficulty in construing them is enhanced by the fact that words and phrases apt to describe the relationship of a common law landlord and tenant one to another have been used without specific definition of another and statutory relationship, viz., that of a protected tenant or sub-tenant to his immediate or perhaps remote landlord.

Even, however, if he fails in this claim the respondent maintains that he is entitled to recover the bed-sitting room because it is let furnished and therefore outside the protection of the Acts. The exemption from protection is now contained in s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939, which enacts that the principal Acts shall not apply to any dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of the use of furniture. The principles at stake have been dealt with directly and indirectly in a number of cases, but it is, I think, enough to consider three only. In the first, Prout v. Hunter (7), a house let unfurnished was sub-let furnished, and the tenancy was held to be unprotected, and the landlord entitled to recover possession, because the occupying tenant held under a furnished letting. In Leslie & Co. v. Cumming (11), the tenant had sub-let, not the whole, but part only of the house furnished, and it was held that the landlord could not recover the whole house because each part was a separate dwelling and only part was let furnished. It was further held that he could not even recover part because his claim was to the whole. The third case, Barrell v. Fordree (12), is a decision of your Lordships' House. In that case, the tenant had sub-let furnished two portions of the house of which she was a statutory tenant as separate dwellings, she herself being tenant of the whole house unfurnished. In these circumstances, the House adjudged that the head landlord could recover the two portions sub-let furnished, inasmuch as they had become separate dwellings and as such, being furnished, had lost the protection of the Act. In none of the three cases were the occupants of the divided portions of the houses granted any right over other portions—each part was strictly self-contained and in Barrell's case (12), the decision turned directly on the fact that the rooms sub-let were separate dwellings. In the present case the facts are different. It is conceded on behalf of the respondent, and indeed strenuously argued, that the bed-sitting room is not a separate dwelling because the tenant thereof enjoys rights over the kitchen of the retained portion. In this set of circumstances it is said to be exempted from the protection of the Acts by reason of the terms of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939. In my view, it is not. That sub-section exempts only a dwelling-house let furnished, and dwelling-house means a separate dwelling. Ex concessis the bed-sitting room is not a separate dwelling, and, accordingly, that sub-section has no application to it. The tenant could recover it because it is not a separate dwelling, but the landlord cannot recover it because it is not a separate dwelling, even though it has been let furnished. In my view, the landlord fails on both his contentions, and I would allow the appeal with such costs in your Lordships' House and below as the leave to appeal in forma pauperis permits, and declare that the landlord is not entitled to possession of the house, or any part of it.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, on the two preliminary objections to the competence of the appeal I agree with all that has been said by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and I have nothing to add. On the merits of the appeal there are two propositions to be considered. First, it is said by the respondent that if at the date of the termination of the contractual tenancy of a house (within the statutory rateable value), the state of things is that a room is in possession of a sub-tenant who has also under his sub-tenancy agreement the right to use the kitchen of the house for cooking and eating meals, and the tenant is living in the rest of the house subject to the sub-tenant's right to use the kitchen, neither the tenant nor the sub-tenant has a house let as a separate dwelling-house within the meaning of the Acts. If that proposition is correct the Acts do not apply to the house or to any part of it. The second proposition is alternative to the first: it is that if the room sub-let to the sub-tenant with the use of the kitchen is sub-let furnished, that room at least is not within the protection of the Acts, either (a) because, under s. 3 (2) coupled with s. 3 (1) and sched. I of the 1939 Act, the Acts do not apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of use of furniture so as to prevent the landlord from recovering possession, or (b) because the tenant has transferred and lost possession of the room under a sub-tenancy agreement, without thereby letting it as a dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house to which alone the Acts apply.

I shall consider these propositions in their order, and it will be convenient to approach the first and major proposition by dealing with two matters about which there is little controversy between the parties. In Prout v. Hunter (7), it was decided that the date at which the landlord seeks to recover possession is the relevant time at which to consider the status of the house as a protected dwelling-house or a non-protected dwelling-house, and, if at that date there is a sub-tenant, the status of the house as affected by the sub-tenancy is a material consideration. In that case the plaintiff had let a flat unfurnished to a tenant, who had furnished it and sub-let it to a sub-tenant. The plaintiff gave his tenant notice to quit, and thereafter brought an action against the tenant and sub-tenant to recover possession. The Divisional Court held that proviso (i) of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, which enacts that the Act "shall not . . . apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of . . . use of furniture," applied, and that the plaintiff was entitled to possession. This judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. BANKES, L.J., said ([1924] 2 K.B. 741):

"It is argued that in s. 12 (2), the statute is dealing with the status of the house rather than with the rights of the particular party to the litigation. The Act is not to apply to a dwelling-house which is let furnished. But at what time is its status of a furnished house to be considered? It would seem that the material time is when the landlord seeks to obtain possession. If at that time the status of the house is that of a house let as a furnished house it is immaterial that at some earlier date its status was that of an unfurnished house."

The rule laid down in Prout v. Hunter (7) has frequently been followed and it is accepted by the parties to this appeal.

The other matter relates to the sub-tenancy in such a case as this. In Neale v. Del Soto (1), Mrs. Del Soto sub-let to a tenant two unfurnished rooms in a seven-roomed house of which she was lessee. The sub-tenancy agreement provided for the use by the sub-tenant jointly with the tenant of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coal-house and conservatory. The sub-tenant applied under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 for an apportionment of the standard rent. The county court judge dismissed the application, holding that there was no letting of a separate dwelling-house to the sub-tenant. His order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. MORTON, L.J., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 193):

"The real substance of the matter is that there was a sharing of this house; each party had the exclusive use of some rooms and the two parties together had the use in common of certain other rooms."

A In Cole v. Harris (4), however, it was held by a majority of the Court of Appeal that when the tenant had a lease of a bedroom, living room and kitchen together with the joint use with the landlord and another tenant of a bathroom and w.c. there was a letting of the three rooms as a separate dwelling-house and not a sharing of the whole house. MORTON, L.J., with whom MACKINNON, L.J., agreed, after referring to Neale v. Del Soto (1), said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 151):

"It is, however, a matter of great difficulty to determine where the line should be drawn, so as to distinguish between a 'sharing' of a house and a letting of part of a house as a separate dwelling."

B He subsequently said (ibid., 152):

"... I do not think that the legislature intended that the sharing of a w.c. with the landlord or with others should be sufficient to prevent a letting of rooms from being a letting of part of a house as a separate dwelling within the meaning of the Acts."

C The test which he accepted (ibid.) is that it is not a sharing of the house when

"the accommodation which is shared with others does not comprise any of the rooms which may fairly be described as 'living rooms' or 'dwelling rooms.' To my mind a kitchen is fairly described as a 'living room,' and thus nobody who shares a kitchen can be said to be tenant of a part of a house let as a separate dwelling."

D LAWRENCE, L.J., dissented, but his dissent was on the limited ground that a lavatory is an essential part of a dwelling-house. All the members of the court were agreed that "sharing" was a matter of degree, and that the sharing of accommodation not essential to a dwelling-house was immaterial. The only other case to which I need refer on this matter is Llewellyn v. Hinson (5). In that case two tenants had each of them exclusive possession of certain living rooms, but they shared in common a kitchen, a bathroom and a w.c. It was held that neither was protected by the Acts, since neither was a tenant of a house let as a separate dwelling or of part of a house so let. ASQUITH, L.J., referring to Neale v. Del Soto (1) and the cases which followed it, said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 96):

F "The gist of those decisions is that where what the landlord under the agreement of tenancy parts with to the tenant consists of two things (a) exclusive possession of a room or rooms, plus (b) user, jointly with someone else, of another living room or rooms, then the tenant cannot say that he is the tenant of a 'house or part of a house, let as a separate dwelling'."

G Counsel for the appellant did not challenge these decisions, which have lost their importance since the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (see s. 7, s. 8 and s. 9). But they decide nothing about the position of a tenant of a house who sub-lets a room to a sub-tenant with right to use the kitchen. There is in the passage cited above from the judgment of MORTON, L.J., in Cole v. Harris (4) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 152), a sentence which apart from its context would apply to the position of the appellant as well as to that of the sub-tenant in this case. But the present question was not before the court, and was not considered either in Cole v. Harris (4) or in any other of the cases. The statement cited above from the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J., in Llewellyn v. Hinson (5) therefore states the effect of the cases with the appropriate limitation.

H I turn now to the immediate question before the House. The argument for the respondent was not based on mere "sharing" and it distinguished the present case from a case in which either a lodger or someone living outside the tenant's house was given a contractual right to use the tenant's kitchen for cooking. The argument came to this:—that when a sub-tenant must be held, under the rule established by Neale v. Del Soto (1) and the cases which followed it, not to have a house let as a separate dwelling, it necessarily follows that the tenant must be held not to have a separate dwelling, because he as much as the sub-tenant has but a share of the kitchen. It was this argument that was sustained by the Court of Appeal. My Lords, the test which must be applied is the test prescribed by the Act itself: Was the house, as occupied by the appellant, a house let as a separate dwelling? The conception of sharing may well have been helpful in considering the questions before the court in Neale v. Del Soto (1) and the other similar cases, yet it may prove misleading when it is used indiscriminately. It is not accurate to say that the kitchen was shared between the tenant and sub-tenant. If anything was shared it was the use of the kitchen, and the sharing of the use of a room is at best an inexact conception which may be serviceable in some cases but not in others. There are at least three differences to be noted between the tenant's and the sub-tenant's rights in relation to the kitchen, and these differences existed not only in the period between the grant of the sub-lease and the expiry of the notice to quit, but also thereafter. First, the tenant continued to have every use of the kitchen for every purpose that did not prevent the sub-tenant from cooking and eating meals in it; second, the tenant could have granted the right to other persons to use the kitchen, and the sub-tenant could neither have done this nor been entitled to object; third, the tenant continued to have the right to prevent the intrusion into the kitchen of strangers and trespassers, and no such right was conferred on the sub-tenant. These differences are differences of degree and kind and are inconsistent with the conception of a sharing of the use of the kitchen between the tenant and sub-tenant. In spite of the sub-tenancy agreement the tenant remained in possession of the kitchen, and continued to occupy it as part of a house let to her as a separate dwelling-house.

The respondent answered these difficulties by submitting that nothing but the user of the kitchen should be considered. That is, in my judgment, to ignore the statutory test whether the house is let as a separate dwelling-house. In Wolfe v. Hogan (13) the test of user per se was considered and rejected. The premises in that case were let as a shop, but subsequently the tenant used them both as a dwelling-house and as a shop. When the landlord sought to recover possession the tenant maintained that she was entitled to the protection of the Acts because there was no prohibition in the lease against the use of the premises otherwise than as a shop, and because they were at the time when the landlord sought to recover possession occupied by her as a dwelling-house. EVERSHED, L.J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 573):

“ ‘Let as a separate dwelling’ must refer to the subject of a contract of letting as a separate dwelling. If it is to be shown that premises come within that definition, prima facie, at any rate, as it seems to me, it must be shown that the two parties to the contract have let, on the one hand, and taken, on the other hand, the premises in question as a separate dwelling. That may be shown either by the terms of the bargain or, where one party has altered the user with the full knowledge of the other, by that other party accepting the changed position, so that there must again be implied a mutual consensus of the two parties to the contract in regard to the use.”

In the present case the tenant, when the landlord served his notice to quit, still had the rights of occupation and possession which the lease gave her, save that she had parted with the right of possession and occupation of one room to her sub-tenant. Her contractual rights as regards the kitchen were not shared with her sub-tenant and her use of the kitchen was an exercise of her rights under her lease, and not of rights partitioned or shared under the sub-lease. I would therefore hold that the appellant was still the occupier of a separate dwelling-house consisting at least of the whole house except the room sub-let.

I think that the same conclusion may be reached from a consideration of the terms of sched. I, para. (d), to the Act of 1933. That paragraph empowers the court to make an order for recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the Act applies if

- A "the tenant without the consent of the landlord has ...sub-let the whole of the dwelling-house or sub-let part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sub-let."

The implication is that the court has no such power if a part of the dwelling-house is sub-let without the landlord's consent provided that the tenant remains in occupation of the part not sub-let. This implication was, I think, judicially affirmed in Roe v. Russell (14). There the sub-let was a sub-let of a separate dwelling-house, but a sub-let of a non-separate dwelling-house is an exercise of a power to sub-let, and the word "sub-let" in the paragraph is not qualified by the words "as a separate dwelling-house" or by words which have that meaning by definition. There seems to me to be no sufficient reason for reading into the paragraph this qualification, and without it the tenant enjoys the same protection whether, as a result of a sub-lease by him, the sub-tenant has a dwelling "let as a separate dwelling-house" or a dwelling that falls short of being "let as a separate dwelling-house." If that is the correct view of the paragraph, it is in accordance with what I think are the realities of the situation and the true position of the tenant after he has granted a sub-lease of a room with use of the kitchen or of another living room, so long as he does not cease to occupy the dwelling-house except that part which he has sub-let.

- D The respondent's argument, based on the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 9 and s. 10, that the legislature must be taken to have approved of the judgment of the Court of Appeal, in this case appears to me to be without logical foundation. No such inference can be drawn from the cited sections. It may have been that Parliament thought that the Court of Appeal had erred in its construction and that it amended the Act so as to avoid the possibility of a repetition of the same construction. Or it may have been that Parliament thought that the Court of Appeal had correctly construed the Act and therefore that the Act stood in need of amendment. But it cannot be determined whether Parliament took the one view or the other. The respondent's claim that he is entitled to an order against the appellant for possession of the single furnished room calls in the first instance for consideration of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939 which substantially re-enacts proviso (i) of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. So far as material to the present case, s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939 provides that the principal Acts shall not apply to any dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of use of furniture. But, by s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933, "dwelling-house," unless the context otherwise requires, "has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let," and this definition is adopted by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1939 for the purposes of that Act. It follows from this that "dwelling-house" in s. 3 (2) (b) means, unless the context otherwise requires, a "house let as a separate dwelling or a part of house being a part so let." There is nothing in the context which requires a different meaning to be put on the word "dwelling-house," and since the respondent's claim in respect of the one room is made on the footing that it was not let as a separate dwelling-house, it cannot find any support in s. 3 (2) (b). The fact that the room was let furnished is thus irrelevant, but there still remains the argument that the appellant by sub-letting it ceased to possess or occupy it and that she transferred it into the possession of a sub-tenant as a dwelling not protected by the Acts, because it was not sub-let as a separate dwelling-house. The question is whether the landlord can recover possession of the room while the tenant continues to reside in the remainder of the house as a separate dwelling-house. If, as I think, the sub-let of a non-separate dwelling is an exercise of the power to sub-let and within the powers which the Act contemplates that the tenant may exercise without prejudicing the protection which the Act gives him in respect of the entire dwelling-house, the answer must be that the landlord's claim to recover possession fails. It may appear anomalous that the landlord can recover possession of a part of a dwelling-house which the tenant has sub-let furnished as a separate dwelling-house (Barrell v. Fordree (12)), but that he cannot recover possession if the sub-let was of part of the dwelling-house furnished with use of a kitchen which was not sub-let. On the other hand, the distinction between that kind of sub-let and a letting of rooms to lodgers who are permitted to cook their meals in the kitchen must appear unreal to those most concerned. There are many who, through shortage of houses and economic circumstances, are forced to be content with something less than a home wholly their own and furnished with their own furniture. If they take a house furnished as a separate dwelling, the Acts give them no protection. If they take from a landlord a lease of rooms, whether furnished or unfurnished, with a right to use a kitchen the Acts give them no protection. If they take a sub-let of rooms with right to use the kitchen from a tenant in occupation of the remainder of the house as a separate dwelling-house, they have no protection under the Acts against the tenant, but I think they have a qualified protection against the landlord through the protection to which the tenant, from whom they derive their rights, is still entitled. I would allow the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I also agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack on the preliminary objections, but, in my opinion, the judgments of the Court of Appeal and of the county court judge were right and this appeal should be dismissed.

The question is whether the appellant, who was at the date of the summons a statutory tenant, was a person who "retains possession of a dwelling-house to which" the Rent Restrictions Acts applied within the meaning of s. 15 of the Act of 1920, that is to say "a part of a house let as a separate dwelling." At that date, the appellant retained possession of the house originally let to her husband by the respondent except one room which the appellant had sub-let furnished with the right to use another room, viz., the kitchen, jointly with herself. The appellant does not challenge the correctness of any of the decisions on these Acts, and it is therefore necessary to consider the few which are directly relevant.

In Neale v. Del Soto (1) the Court of Appeal decided that a tenant who rented two unfurnished rooms together with the use jointly with his landlord of other accommodation including the kitchen was not in possession of a separate dwelling-house, and in Llewellyn v. Hinson (5), where two tenants having exclusive possession of certain rooms in a flat shared the kitchen, a bathroom and a w.c., they were held not to be in occupation of separate dwelling-houses. In spite of these decisions, which are unchallenged, it is argued for the appellant that although a sub-tenant who shares the use of the kitchen with his landlord (the tenant) does not occupy a separate dwelling, yet the tenant who shares the use of the kitchen with the same sub-tenant does occupy a separate dwelling. This argument is, I understand, based on the view that the tenant's rights are different in quantity and quality from those of the sub-tenant. The tenant's rights are derived, so it is argued, from the head landlord, and they are or may be greater in quantity or degree since the sub-tenant only has the use of the kitchen for cooking, and possibly for eating, whereas the tenant may use it for any purposes not inconsistent with the use conceded to the sub-tenant. With the greatest respect to those of your Lordships who take a different view, I think that these considerations have nothing whatever to do with whether the dwelling in the room is separate. The words "separate" and "dwelling" do not appear to me to have any reference to legal interests or to the quantity or degree of enjoyment. If a bedroom is occupied by two persons, one in a bed and the other on the floor, it does not appear to me to be used as a separate bedroom by the one in the bed any more than by the one on the floor. As to the quality of the rights, I think the rights of both the tenant and the sub-tenant are derived from the same Acts and from nowhere else, though it is true that the Acts adopt to a certain extent the terms of the tenancy and sub-tenancy agreements: see the Act of 1920, s. 15. It has been suggested that the position of lodgers created difficulty in the interpretation which I put on the words "separate dwelling,"

A but lodgers and persons residing with a statutory tenant are expressly referred to in the Acts (cf. the Act of 1933, sched. I, para. (b)). Moreover, lodgers are not in the same position as sub-tenants, and can never acquire the statutory rights which the Acts confer on sub-tenants. The position of lodgers has, therefore, in my view, no bearing on the meaning of the words "separate dwelling" in the Acts.

B On the subsidiary question whether the respondent is entitled in any event to an order for possession of the room let furnished by the appellant, I am also of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal is right. The appellant's counsel contends that since the Acts have no application to the sub-tenancy agreement because, as he concedes, it did not create a separate dwelling, the respondent cannot recover possession of the furnished room sub-let on the ground that it is

C let furnished. But unless the Acts confer some protection on the appellant in respect of this room, the respondent, having given notice to quit in accordance with the terms of the tenancy agreement, is entitled at common law to possession of any part of the house not protected by the Acts, whether furnished or not.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, the relevant facts in this case are

D not in dispute. The premises in question are known as 22, Inwood Avenue, Old Coulsdon, Surrey. They consist of a bungalow containing three rooms and a kitchen, bathroom and lavatory, all on the ground floor, with an attic upstairs. Prior to 1948, the respondent let the premises at the weekly rent of 26s. 9d. to the appellant's husband. He died on Jan. 6, 1948, and the appellant then became the contractual tenant. On Feb. 14, 1948, the appellant sub-let one of the three

E ground floor rooms as a furnished bed-sitting room with—I quote from the rent book—"use of kitchen" to a Mr. Leonard Setter at a weekly rent of 35s. Mr. Setter and his wife went into occupation and paid, in addition to this rent, 6s. a week for gas and 1s. 2d. a week for electric light. On Mar. 29, 1948, the appellant's contractual tenancy was determined by notice to quit expiring on that date. On June 16, 1948, the respondent commenced the present suit in the

F Croydon County Court, claiming possession of the bungalow or, alternatively, of the room sub-let to Mr. Setter. The sub-tenancy was then still subsisting, but the appellant was the sole defendant and Mr. Setter was not a party to the suit at any time. The appellant, in her defence, claimed the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts. I shall speak of these statutes collectively as "the Acts" and of each of them by reference to the year of its

G enactment. The learned county court judge held in favour of the respondent, and ordered possession to be given of the entire premises. On Feb. 17, 1949, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appellant's appeal, and on Feb. 18 it gave her liberty to lodge a petition of appeal to your Lordships' House. To this summary of the facts it will be convenient to add here a reference to certain other matters which were conceded or agreed in the course of the argument.

H Before the creation of the sub-tenancy, the bungalow was let and used as a separate dwelling, and by reason of this, and of its rateable value, was a dwelling-house to which the Acts applied, being what is sometimes termed a "new control" house, that is to say, a house first brought within those Acts by the Act of 1939. The sub-letting was lawful, and the sub-let bed-sitting room, if a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Acts, was a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent of which a substantial portion was attributable to the use of furniture; in short, a furnished letting for the purposes of the Acts. After the sub-letting, and until evicted under the order for possession as mentioned later, the appellant continued to live in the bungalow, which was not at any material time used otherwise than as dwelling accommodation.

At the beginning of the hearing before your Lordships, counsel for the respondent submitted that the appeal was no longer competent. It is necessary for an understanding of this preliminary point to refer to the order of the Court of Appeal giving leave to appeal and to what happened thereafter. The material part of this order reads thus:—

“ And upon the defendant by her counsel undertaking 1. To pay the taxed costs of the appeal to this court to the plaintiff's solicitors within two months of the taxing master's certificate on their personal undertaking to return the same if the appeal to the House of Lords be successful. 2. To prosecute the appeal to the House of Lords with all reasonable despatch. 3. To pay her rent promptly pending the said appeal.

It is ordered that execution upon the aforesaid judgment of the Croydon County Court, in as far as it relates to possession of the premises described therein only, be stayed pending the hearing of the appeal to the House of Lords, with liberty to the plaintiff to apply to this court to remove the stay in the event of any breach of the defendant's undertaking.

It is further ordered that the defendant be at liberty to lodge a petition of appeal to the House of Lords on the ground that a question of public importance is raised by this appeal.”

The respondent's costs were taxed at some £90, the taxing master's certificate being given on June 24, 1949. On July 14, the appellant lodged her petition of appeal. On July 29, this House gave her leave to prosecute the appeal in forma pauperis and to dispense with printing. The appellant was unable to pay the respondent's costs as ordered by the Court of Appeal, and on Oct. 30 it removed the stay of execution, as from Nov. 30, on the application of the respondent. It does not appear whether the Court of Appeal was informed at the time of this application that this House had granted the appellant leave to proceed in forma pauperis. But, however that may be, the respondent proceeded to execution, and on Jan. 16, 1950, the appeal being then set down for hearing by this House, he caused the appellant to be evicted and her furniture to be seized.

Counsel for the respondent advanced two points in support of his contention. First, he said there was no longer a lis. The respondent having regained possession of the premises in dispute, there was, he argued, no living issue between the parties such as must exist before this House will embrace an appeal, and he cited Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada v. Jervis (2). And, secondly, he submitted that the order of the Court of Appeal giving leave to appeal was conditional and that, in the events which had happened, such leave no longer existed. My Lords, both these points are, in my opinion, without substance. As to the first, the decision referred to has nothing to say to the facts of this case. I express no opinion as to what the appellant's precise position will be if she succeeds in this appeal; but that her rights must be affected by a favourable decision cannot be doubted. There is nothing in the present situation to make inapplicable the general rule that if a successful party chooses to execute on foot of a judgment which is under appeal, he does so at his peril and without thereby obtaining any right to halt an appeal then proceeding according to law. The second point was based on the view that the last paragraph of the order of the Court of Appeal was subject to the triple undertaking which is recited immediately before the penultimate paragraph, and has not been fully complied with. This is an impossible construction. The last paragraph is a separate and distinct part of the order, not only grammatically but of necessity. Once a petition of appeal is lodged for the consideration of this House it is not,

I apprehend, for the Court of Appeal to control the proceedings on it. The order seems to me to have been drafted with this in mind; and, apart from that, it is not possible to annex to leave to lodge a petition of appeal a condition such as that relating to the payment of rent pending the appeal, which could not, of course, be fulfilled until after the lodgment.

A I come then to the merits of the appeal. It is agreed that the enactment immediately in point is s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1939. By that sub-section, when read with the definition of "dwelling-house" in s. 16 of the Act of 1933, the Acts of 1920 to 1933 are made applicable, subject to the modifications prescribed by sched. I to the Act of 1939, to this bungalow if "let as a separate dwelling," or to a part of it "being a part so let." The issues for determination are whether, when the contractual tenancy ended on Mar. 29, 1948, the appellant was, by virtue of the Acts, entitled to retain possession of either the whole bungalow or the whole bungalow less the room sub-let. It is perhaps well to observe, at this stage, that no question arises as to the terms and conditions applicable to a statutory tenancy of the bungalow. Though s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920 was much canvassed before your Lordships, it only deals with the rights and obligations of the tenant who retains possession under the Acts. It is, therefore, not directly relevant here, for the sub-letting was made during the contractual tenancy and the real question is whether the appellant ever became entitled to hold over as a statutory or protected tenant. It is common ground that, had the appellant not made the sub-letting, she would have been so entitled. What is urged against her is that, after and because of the sub-letting, the whole bungalow or, alternatively, the room sub-let, was not let as a separate dwelling, and was therefore not a dwelling-house to which the Acts applied.

B Before going further, it is necessary to refer to the nature of the main argument on which these contentions are founded, for it has been accepted by the courts below to an extent which breaks new ground in what is by now a much cultivated field. It consists of two propositions. The first but states a principle laid down by a group of Court of Appeal decisions, the most important of which are Neale v. Del Soto (1), Sharpe v. Nicholls (15), Cole v. Harris (4) and Llewellyn v. Hinson (5). I need not deal with the facts of these cases save to say that they related to a particular type of letting, namely, a letting of part of a dwelling-house by which the tenant obtained exclusive possession of one or more rooms with the use, jointly with his landlord or some one else, of some other part or parts of the house. The question raised—I think for the first time in Neale v. Del Soto (1)—was whether such a letting was a letting of part of a dwelling-house as a separate dwelling, and thus a dwelling-house within the meaning and protection of the Acts. The principle applied by the Court of Appeal in answering this question appears sufficiently from the following passages in two of the judgments. In Cole v. Harris (4), MORTON, L.J., says ([1945] 2 All E.R. 152):

G "I think that the true test, where the tenant has the exclusive use of some rooms and shares certain accommodation with others, is as follows: there is a letting of part of a house as a separate dwelling, within the meaning of the relevant Acts if, and only if, the accommodation which is shared with others does not comprise any of the rooms which may fairly be described as 'living rooms' or 'dwelling rooms.' To my mind a kitchen is fairly described as a 'living room,' and thus nobody who shares a kitchen can be said to be a tenant of a part of a house let as a separate dwelling."

H Then in Llewellyn v. Hinson (5), which applied this doctrine to cases in which the joint user was by the tenant and some one other than his landlord, ASQUITH, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, states the principle thus ([1948] 2 All E.R. 96):

"This court cannot consider whether Neale v. Del Soto (1) and its satellite cases were properly decided. It can only inquire what they, in fact, decided, and about this there can, in our view, be little doubt. The gist of those decisions is that where what the landlord under the agreement of tenancy parts with to the tenant consists of two things (a) exclusive possession of a room or rooms, plus (b) user, jointly with some one else, of another living room or rooms, then the tenant cannot say that he is the tenant of a 'house or part of a house, let as a separate dwelling.' The ratio is that the 'dwelling' of the tenant on the facts assumed consists of the totality constituted by (a) plus (b), and that part of the totality is not 'separately' let to him because the possession or user of it is to be shared by him with others, a state of affairs which is inconsistent with the word 'separately,' and, indeed, with the word 'let,' for both of these terms connote exclusive possession or enjoyment."

Such is what I may call the Del Soto doctrine which was adopted by the respondent as his first proposition. Before coming to his second it will be well to interpolate a reference to the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, as ss. 7 to 10 thereof (inclusive) were obviously enacted to counter the wide-spread and important consequences of that doctrine. Section 7 deals with cases where a tenant shares accommodation with his landlord, and s. 8 with cases where a tenant shares accommodation with persons other than his landlord. Section 9 relates to sub-tenancies and provides, inter alia, that no part of the tenant's premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply by reason only "(a) that the terms on which any person claiming under the tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons . . ."

This Act was passed on June 2, 1949, but s. 10 gives the sections already mentioned a retrospective effect, "but not so as to affect . . . anything done or omitted" during any period before the commencement of the Act. These are difficult words; but it is unnecessary to dwell on them, as it was conceded that the order for possession in this case came within the expression "anything done." That being so, I need not consider the scope of s. 7, s. 8 and s. 9, or say more than that, as I read them, they leave it open to this House to review the Del Soto doctrine should occasion to do so arise.

The respondent's second proposition was to this effect. If a tenant sub-lets part of his dwelling on sharing terms of the Del Soto type so that both tenant and sub-tenant share some part of the dwelling, such as the kitchen, which may be fairly described as living or dwelling accommodation, then the tenant can no longer be said to hold what is excluded from the sub-demise as a separate dwelling. That, taken with the first proposition, of which it was said to be a necessary consequence, comes to this. Once a tenant "shares" living accommodation with a sub-tenant in this way, each must stand deprived of the protection of the Acts for the same reason. What A shares with B, B shares with A and, therefore, neither has a separate dwelling.

These propositions were then applied in this manner. They were linked together and used to strip the entire bungalow of the protection of the Acts. Alternatively, if the second was ill-founded, the first remained and sufficed, it was contended, to justify an order for possession limited to the sub-let bed-sitting room. This alternative claim was also supported on another and distinct ground, which may be conveniently mentioned here. The bed-sitting room as a furnished letting was, the argument proceeded, outside the scope of the Acts by virtue of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939 and could not, therefore, be withheld by the appellant having regard to the decision of this House in Barrell v. Fordree (12). The Del Soto doctrine was not challenged before your Lordships on behalf of the appellant, and the debate proceeded throughout on the basis that the sub-let bed-sitting room had not been let as a separate dwelling and accordingly was not at any time a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Acts. The respondent's first proposition was thus, if not conceded, at least not disputed. His second proposition, however, was vigorously contested, as was his application of the first to the alternative claim. I will revert to the Del Soto doctrine later. Meantime I assume its validity for the purpose of considering the contentions of the parties.

A I start, therefore, with the respondent's second proposition. The view of the Court of Appeal appears to have been that it flowed logically from the first. With all respect I am unable to agree. I appreciate that where the sharing is between two tenants of the same landlord it may well be that, if the test laid
B down in Cole v. Harris (4) applies to one of the tenants, it must apply to the other. But where the sharers are tenant and sub-tenant, the matter seems to me to stand on quite a different plane. The word "sharing" is then only appropriate in a colloquial sense. There is no balance or equality of rights in respect of what is shared. The sub-tenant has but a right of user; the tenant, C on the other hand, remains tenant of the entirety of his kitchen or whatever the shared room is. He may keep others out of it—at least to the extent of those he has not undertaken to admit. He may decorate and re-furnish it. He may be liable to keep every part of it in repair. In short, he remains in possession subject, at most, to whatever right of user he has granted to others. In such
D circumstances to say that, because the sub-tenant, by the kind of arrangement under discussion, has got what is not a separate dwelling, the separate dwelling which the tenant has had let to him must have ceased to be separate in whole or in part is, I think, a complete non sequitur. I can see nothing in the ratio of the Del Soto doctrine to require such a result. That doctrine was directed to the determination of the character of what has been let to the person granted a right to share. If part of the living accommodation as demised to him is not
E to be enjoyed by him exclusively, then he has not been let, and is not tenant of, a separate dwelling. That reasoning cannot, however, be applied as a matter of course to the position of the person granting the right to share, for the facts regarding him and his tenancy need not be the same, and will generally be quite different. Here they are essentially different, for what was let to the appellant was the bungalow as a separate dwelling with the right to possession of the entirety—a right which, by reason of the sub-letting, was lost only as regards the bed-sitting room.

If then, as I would hold, the respondent's second proposition cannot be derived from the Del Soto doctrine, it remains to inquire whether the act of sub-letting a part of the bungalow as dwelling accommodation, but not so as to constitute a separate dwelling, has diminished the protection from eviction
F which the appellant would otherwise have been entitled to under the Acts. It is, in my opinion, not open to doubt that a tenant who lawfully sub-lets a part of his house as a separate dwelling remains entitled to the protection of the Acts in respect of his entire holding. That seems to follow from Roe v. Russell (14), and to be the necessary effect of para. (d) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 and s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1923. The former of these provisions, when read
G with s. 3 of the Act of 1933 and sched. I to the Act of 1939, in effect provides, as respects new control houses, that no order for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply shall be made unless the court considers it reasonable so to order and

"(d) the tenant without the consent of the landlord has at any time after Sept. 1, 1939, assigned or sub-let the whole of the dwelling-house or H sub-let part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sub-let."

Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1923 does not apply to new control houses, but it is nevertheless relevant to the point now under consideration for it shows, I think clearly, what the policy of the legislature was in this regard. I need not set out the sub-section in extenso. Suffice it to say that it provides, inter alia, that a statutory tenant may be made liable to an additional increase of rent in respect of his entire holding

"where part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is lawfully sub-let, and the part so sub-let is also a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies . . .”

Now that provision is in terms restricted to a sub-tenancy which constitutes a separate dwelling, but I do not think the language used can be said to suggest that a statutory tenant cannot sub-let dwelling accommodation which is not separate in this sense. What then of para. (d) which I have just quoted? Does its reference to the sub-letting of a part include the sub-letting of a part which is not in itself a dwelling-house? Even if this paragraph is to be read as relating to the sub-letting of dwelling accommodation only, it cannot, in my opinion, be restricted to the sub-letting of separate dwellings as, if it were, it would not apply at all (on the present hypothesis) where a whole house was, by a succession of sub-lettings, parcelled out to sub-tenants with the last having a right to use the kitchen. And if this is so, the right to sub-let short of the entirety which the paragraph plainly recognises ought not, in my opinion, to be so restricted either. I do not see anything in this to offend the policy of the Acts, or to conflict with any of their provisions. On the contrary, I think s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 indicate that a tenant may (in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary) sub-let with impunity a part which is something less than a separate dwelling for they both say “any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let” in the event of the tenant’s interest coming to an end. Had the legislature intended to refer to a part which was also a separate dwelling, it is but reasonable to assume that it would have said so as it has in clear terms in s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1923 and s. 4 (1) and (4) of the Act of 1933.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that a tenant who lawfully sub-lets a part of his holding which, though dwelling accommodation, falls short of being a separate dwelling within the meaning of the Acts, does not thereby lose the protection of those Acts in respect of any part of the dwelling-house comprised in his tenancy. I, therefore, conclude that the respondent’s main contentions are unsupported either by the Del Soto doctrine or the relevant legislation. This means that the part of the bungalow which was not sub-let was protected, and also, if I am right in my reasoning, that the Del Soto doctrine affords the respondent no right as against the appellant to the recovery of the part which was sub-let. But the position as to that part also involves the further contention which was founded upon the furnished nature of the sub-letting, and the decision in Barrell v. Fordree (12). If that contention is to succeed, it must be by virtue of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1939, which provides that, subject to certain immaterial exceptions, the Acts shall not apply “to any dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of . . . use of furniture.” On the assumption, however, that the Del Soto doctrine applies, the sub-letting was not of a dwelling-house, and s. 3 (2) (b) and Barrell v. Fordree (12) are alike inapplicable. This further submission cannot, therefore, succeed. On these grounds, I am of opinion that if the Del Soto doctrine is applied the respondent’s claim must fail in its entirety.

My Lords, thus far I have assumed the correctness of that doctrine. This has been a convenient procedure having regard to the course of the argument; and the appeal may properly be decided on it in view of the fact that the parties have been at one in accepting the sub-letting as not that of a separate dwelling. But the validity of the doctrine has not been debated and it is possible—I do not say more—that its effect has not been entirely neutralised for the future by the Act of 1949. I do not, therefore, express any final opinion regarding it. Nor do I state any conclusion as to the true construction of s. 12 (8) of the Act of 1920 which relates to the letting of rooms in a dwelling-house and has, perhaps, never received as much attention in this connection as it deserves. For the reasons already mentioned I would allow the appeal as regards the whole bungalow, with costs here and in the courts below.

LORD REID: My Lords, the respondent is the owner of a bungalow house at Old Coulsdon, Surrey. This house was not subject to rent control before 1939, but, being a dwelling-house of which the rateable value did not exceed £75, and not being otherwise excluded, it was brought within the scope of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts by s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1939. The house was let to the appellant's husband on a weekly tenancy at a rent of 26s. 9d. per week, and, on the husband's death, the appellant succeeded to the tenancy. Shortly thereafter she offered accommodation to Mr. and Mrs. Setter, and this offer was accepted. A rent book was given to Mr. Setter which showed that a furnished bed sitting room was sub-let and "use of the kitchen" was given for a rent of 35s. per week from Feb. 14, 1948. Thereafter, the respondent gave to the appellant a notice to quit which terminated her contractual tenancy on Mar. 29, 1948, and on June 15, 1948, the respondent brought the present action in the county court for possession of the whole house, or, alternatively, for possession of the sub-let room. At that date, the Setters were living in the house under the agreement with the appellant. Neither the precise extent of the Setters' right to share the house, nor the way in which it was shared in practice, is very clear; but it appears that the Setters purchased their own food and cooked and ate their own meals in the kitchen. The notes of the learned county court judge record this evidence of the appellant :

"I said come and live with me and share home, pay 35s. a week and so much for gas, use of bathroom and kitchen . . . They have the run of the place."

That appears to be a fair description of the position. It is not disputed that Mr. Setter became in law the sub-tenant of the furnished room, and that, as regards the kitchen, he was only a licensee entitled by agreement to use it. I agree with your Lordships that the respondent's preliminary objections to the competency of the appeal cannot be sustained.

The main question in this case is whether the fact that the Setters were sharing the use of the kitchen under this agreement entirely deprives the appellant of the statutory right to retain possession of the house after the end of the contractual tenancy which she would otherwise undoubtedly have had. The statutory protection does not apply if the subject of which the owner seeks to obtain possession is not a "dwelling-house." "Dwelling-house" is defined as follows by s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933 :

" 'Dwelling-house' has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let."

I do not refer to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 because that sub-section does not apply to a house brought under control by the Act of 1939, but there is no material difference between that sub-section and the definition which I have quoted. The respondent's case is that in June, 1948, when this action was brought the house was not "let as a separate dwelling" because it or at least an essential part of it was being shared with the Setters. The words "let as a separate dwelling" are difficult to interpret, but one or two points are now clear. In the first place, it is the state of things when the action is brought that matters. Secondly, "let" is not limited to a letting under a contractual tenancy. It has long been settled that the Rent Acts do not prevent an owner from terminating the tenancy of his tenant in the ordinary way : what they do is to give to a person who has been tenant a right to remain in possession after the tenancy has gone. A person with such a right is commonly called a statutory tenant, but that name, though convenient, is inaccurate. The true position of such a person was stated as long ago as 1923 by BANKES, L.J., in Keeves v. Dean (10) ([1924] 1 K.B. 690) :

"... he is not a tenant at all ; although he cannot be turned out of possession so long as he complies with the provisions of the statute, he has no estate or interest in the premises such as a tenant has."

It follows that, as a main purpose of the Rent Acts is to confer a statutory right to possess after the end of a contractual tenancy, the word "let" must be interpreted in a sense wide enough to include subjects held or possessed by virtue of that right. The question at issue may therefore be stated in this way : Was the house on June 15, 1948, held or possessed by the appellant as a separate dwelling ?

It is, perhaps, easier to say what is not a separate dwelling than to say what is one. In Neale v. De Soto (1), the owner of a house, in addition to letting two rooms to a tenant, gave him the right to share the use of other rooms including the kitchen. In Llewellyn v. Hinson (5), the landlord let certain rooms to one tenant and other rooms to another tenant, and in addition gave to each of them the right to share in the use of the kitchen. In these cases, it was held that no separate dwelling had been let. I have no doubt that these decisions are correct. If a tenant has to share with another person a living room which is not let to him, it is, in my view, impossible to find anything which is let to him as a separate dwelling. It cannot be the let rooms plus the right to use the other room, because that other room is not let to him at all—he is only a licensee there. And it cannot be the let rooms alone, because his having to share another room shows that the let rooms are only a part of his dwelling place. It follows that the subjects let to Mr. Setter were not let to him as a separate dwelling, and that he did not become a statutory tenant. But I think that quite different considerations apply when the tenant has no right or need to go beyond the subjects let to him, but chooses to share the use of a part of those subjects with someone else. I do not think that it is possible to say that a tenant who agrees to share his house with lodgers or other licensees thereby ceases to possess his house as a separate dwelling. No doubt the words "separate dwelling" in an appropriate context might mean the dwelling place of a separate or single family or household, but it is to my mind clear that that is not their meaning in the Rent Acts. The Acts recognise that a tenant may sub-let or take in lodgers (e.g., para. (b) of sched. I to the Act of 1933). I leave aside for the moment the question of sub-letting. I can find nothing in the Acts, or in any authority of which I am aware, to suggest that a tenant who lives in the house can cease to hold it as a separate dwelling merely because he has agreed to share it or some part of it with licensees. Such sharing might take many forms. On the one hand, a lodger might act and be treated as a member of the tenant's own family. On the other hand, lodgers might keep aloof from the tenant and his family and be given a right to the exclusive use of the kitchen at certain times of day. I can find nothing to suggest that one such form of sharing has different legal consequences from another. Indeed, the tenant may devote the greater part of his house to the use of lodgers without ceasing to hold the whole house as being let to him as a separate dwelling. In Vickery v. Martin (16), a tenant, who made a business of taking in paying guests and devoted the greater part of the house to that purpose, did not lose the statutory protection. If the Setters, instead of having a sub-lease of their bed-sitting room, had been lodgers or licensees, they might have had precisely the same right to share the use of the kitchen, but that sharing would certainly not, in my view, have impaired the appellant's statutory protection. Why should it be different because Mr. Setter had a sub-lease of the bed-sitting room instead of a licence to use it ? It was argued that a licence to use the kitchen coupled with a leasehold interest in another part of the house is materially different from a licence not coupled with a leasehold interest. But at the time when this action was brought there was no longer any leasehold. The appellant had no power to create a sub-tenancy to endure beyond her own tenancy and that came to an end on Mar. 29, 1948. I cannot find any difference in quality between a right to share accommodation enjoyed by one who was formerly a sub-tenant and still has an exclusive right to occupy another part of the house, and a similar right enjoyed by one who has no such exclusive right, which would justify the one, but not the other, being held to prevent a statutory tenant from holding her house as a separate dwelling.

A I turn now to the other element in the case, the fact that Mr. Setter was originally sub-tenant of the furnished bed sitting room and was still in exclusive occupation of that room when this action was commenced. It was argued that, even if the appellant succeeded on the main question because sharing the kitchen did not deprive the appellant of her whole protection, yet the facts that the bed-sitting room was sub-let to Mr. Setter and that he had no statutory tenancy took the bed-sitting room out of the appellant's separate dwelling, and entitled the respondent to recover possession of it. The question of the application of the Rent Acts to sub-letting is not an easy one and I shall try to confine myself to those aspects of it which are relevant to the present case, but, in view of an argument founded on the decision of this House in Barrell v. Fordree (12), it is necessary to go considerably beyond the facts of this case. B There is no doubt that the appellant was entitled during her contractual tenancy to sub-let a part of her house. In fact, she sub-let so that the sub-let part was not let as a separate dwelling. But she could have sub-let so that the sub-let part was let as a separate dwelling. In that case the sub-let part would have been a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Acts. It must then have come within the scope of either s. 3 (1) or s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1939. If it fell C under s. 3 (1), the sub-tenant would at the end of his contractual tenancy have had the ordinary rights of a statutory tenant, but if, for example, it had been let furnished and therefore fell within the scope of s. 3 (2) (b), the Acts would not apply to it. Barrell v. Fordree (12) was decided on the proviso to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. That sub-section does not apply in the present case, but there is no material difference between it and s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1939. In Barrell v. Fordree (12) the tenant had sub-let parts of her house to two sub-tenants, and there was no sharing of accommodation. Those parts were sub-let furnished. It was never suggested that the parts sub-let were not let as separate dwellings. They were treated throughout as "dwelling-houses" within the meaning of the Acts, and, as they were let furnished, they were, by virtue of s. 12 (2), dwelling-houses to which the Acts did not apply. Accordingly, after the contractual tenancies were terminated, there was nothing to prevent the owner of the property from recovering possession of them. As I read it, the decision of this House was based entirely on the fact that the sub-let parts were dwelling-houses to which the proviso to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 applied. But neither that proviso nor the corresponding provision in the Act of 1939, s. 3 (2) (b), applies to anything which is not a "dwelling-house." The words of s. 3 (2) are quite clear : D E F G

"The principal Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply . . . (b) save as is expressly provided in the said Acts, as amended by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of board, attendance or use of furniture."

H I think that it is impossible to interpret "dwelling-house" in this context as having a meaning wider than that given to it by the definition in s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933. Section 3 (2) of the Act of 1939 is, in effect, an exception from s. 3 (1) and "dwelling-house" must have the same meaning in the two sub-sections. "Dwelling-house" in s. 3 (1) cannot have a meaning wider than the definition, because, to give it a wider meaning there, would extend the whole system of rent control to some unspecified class of houses not included in the definition. For the reasons already stated, the room sub-let to Mr. Setter was not a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Rent Acts, and therefore neither s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1939 nor the decision in Barrell v. Fordree (12) is of any avail to the respondent in this case. If he is to succeed, it must be on some other ground. There is no provision in the Acts which expressly applies to the present case, but, as I understood it, the argument for the respondent was that the Acts only protect a tenant who is in possession, and that a tenant who has sub-let a part of his house being no longer in possession of the sub-let part can derive no benefit from the Acts with regard to that part. It is true that a tenant who has wholly given up possession of his house loses his statutory protection, but it does not necessarily follow that a tenant who has retained possession of and continues to live in part of the house will lose his protection for the rest of the house which he has sub-let. The Act of 1933 provides in sched. I, para. (d), that a court has power to make an order for recovery of possession if the tenant has assigned or sub-let the whole of his house, or has sub-let part of it the remainder being already sub-let, that is to say if he has parted with possession of the whole house. This general provision by omitting the case when the tenant has retained possession of part of the house and sub-let the rest clearly distinguishes it. It does not prevent an order for recovery of possession in such a case if, as in Barrell v. Fordree (12), the circumstances bring it within some other provision of the Acts which warrants such an order. But it does, I think, indicate that the mere fact that a part of the house is sub-let is not enough, and I can find nothing else in the present case to warrant the order which the respondent seeks. For these reasons, I think that the respondent has no right to resume possession of the sub-let room. I therefore agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs. Cause remitted to Croydon County Court with a declaration that the respondent was not entitled to possession of the premises or any part of them.

GRAHAM AND SCOTT (SOUTHGATE), LTD. v. OXLADE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), February 28, March 1, 14, 1950.]

Agent—Estate agent—Commission—Contract to pay commission on introduction of person “willing and able to purchase”—Person willing to purchase “subject to satisfactory survey”—“Subject to contract.”

The plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, after being instructed by the defendant to negotiate the sale of his property, wrote to him: “We beg to confirm and thank you for your instructions to assist in the disposal of your property . . . We confirm that in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase we shall look to you for the payment of the usual commission . . .” The defendant accepted the terms contained in this letter, and the plaintiffs introduced a person who was prepared to purchase the property “subject to contract [and] satisfactory survey.”

HELD: proof of an offer on a condition which left the offeror free at his will, even if the offer were accepted, not to proceed with the purchase was not evidence that the offeror was a person able and willing to purchase, and, therefore, the plaintiffs had not discharged the onus which rested on them of proving that the person whom they had introduced was willing to purchase the property, and their claim must fail.

Per SINGLETON, L.J.: I do not know that there is any decision of the Court of Appeal which supports the view that commission is payable to estate agents if all they do is to produce a person who is willing to purchase "subject to contract." It may be so if the owner has agreed to such a term, or if he has introduced it himself. The question must always be determined by the terms of the contract between the owner of the property and the agents.*

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of ROXBURGH, J., sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division, dated Dec. 16, 1949 (reported ante p. 91), whereby he dismissed the plaintiffs' claim to commission on the introduction to the defendant of a prospective purchaser of the defendant's house.

On Sept. 1, 1949, the plaintiffs, who were estate agents, received instructions from the defendant to sell his property, 2, Merrivale, Southgate, N.14, at the price of £5,000, nothing being then said about commission. On the same day the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant: "... we beg to confirm and thank you for your instructions to assist in the disposal of your property as above. As instructed we are quoting £5,000 freehold and hope to have the pleasure of submitting an acceptable proposal within the course of a day or two. We confirm that in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase we shall look to you for the payment of the usual commission ..."

The plaintiffs introduced as a proposed purchaser a Mrs. Smith, who at first was prepared to offer £4,450, but subsequently increased her offer to £4,650. This figure was accepted by the defendant who instructed the plaintiffs to proceed with the sale. On Oct. 3, 1949, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant: "... we beg to confirm that acting in accordance with your instructions we have accepted the increased offer of our applicant Mrs. Dinah Smith ... to purchase your property as above in the sum of £4,650 freehold, subject to contract, satisfactory survey, vacant possession on completion on or before Oct. 27 ...". On the same day the defendant's solicitors had written to the plaintiffs informing them that the offer of Mrs. Smith was not acceptable to the defendant who was arranging to dispose of the property elsewhere. ROXBURGH, J., held that, in view of the condition contained in the words "subject to satisfactory survey," the prospective purchaser was not "a person willing to purchase" within the meaning of the agreement, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not entitled to their commission.

Mar. 14. The following judgments were read.

COHEN, L.J. (after stating the facts): The learned judge found that the defendant had entered into a contract with the plaintiffs on the terms set out in the letter of Sept. 1, but he came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had never found a person able and willing to purchase. He intimated that, had he not been bound by authority, he would have found that any offer which was not a firm offer capable of acceptance so as to constitute a contract would not establish that the person making the offer was willing to purchase, but he recognised that the authorities made it impossible for him to hold that an offer "subject to contract" might not be evidence that the person making it was willing to purchase. He stated, as was the fact, that there was no reported case dealing with an offer "subject to satisfactory survey." Such a condition, he said, left the person making the offer the arbitrator of whether the survey was satisfactory. He considered it would be strange if an estate agent could earn his commission when the necessary business of having a survey had not been carried out. Accordingly, while he recognised that there was no logical distinction between "subject to contract" and "subject to survey", he held that the fact that an offer was "subject to survey" precluded the possibility of the maker of the offer being a person willing to purchase before he had expressed his satisfaction with the survey. Counsel for the plaintiffs said that the distinction between "subject to contract" and "subject to survey" was a distinction without a difference, since under a provision "subject to contract" an intending purchaser could refuse to sign a contract if he was dissatisfied with a survey. With this view I agree. I turn, therefore, to consider what is the state of the authorities on the subject.

I commence with Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd. v. Cooper (1). As the court construed the contract in that case, commission was only payable if the introduction actually resulted in a sale. In such a contract their Lordships refused to imply a term that the principal would not dispose of the property himself or through other channels or otherwise act so as to prevent the agent from earning his commission. Some of their Lordships, however, pointed out the distinction between such a contract and a contract under which commission becomes payable on the agent introducing a person who makes an adequate offer. Thus, VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 40):

"It may be useful to point out that contracts under which an agent may be occupied in endeavouring to dispose of the property of a principal fall into several obvious classes. There is the class in which the agent is promised a commission by his principal if he succeeds in introducing to his principal a person who makes an adequate offer, usually an offer of not less than the stipulated amount. If that is all that is needed in order to earn his reward, it is obvious that he is entitled to be paid when this has been done, whether his principal accepts the offer and carries through the bargain or not."

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN makes the distinction clearer. Thus, he says (ibid. 44):

"I do not assent to the view, which I think was the view of the majority in Trollope (George) & Sons v. Martyn Bros. (2), that a mere promise by a property owner to an agent to pay him a commission if he introduces a purchaser for the property at a specified price, or at a minimum price, ties the owner's hands and compels him, as between himself and the agent, to bind himself contractually to sell to the agent's client who offers that price, with the result that, if he refuses the offer, he is liable to pay the agent a sum equal to, or less than, the amount of the commission, either (a) on a quantum meruit, or (b) as damages for breach of a term to be implied in the commission contract."

Later he says (ibid., 47):

A "I have already expressed my view as to the true meaning of a contract to pay a commission for the introduction of a purchaser at a specified or minimum price. It is possible that an owner may be willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or minimum price, but such a construction of the contract would, in my opinion, require clear and unequivocal language."

B This decision inspired estate agents to set about devising formulae intended to ensure that principals should not be able to escape liability by refusing to accept offers from persons willing to purchase. One such formula came under consideration by LEWIS, J., in Giddys v. Horsfall (3). In that case the plaintiff's terms of commission were set out in a letter to the principal which contained the following paragraph:

C "We take this opportunity of enclosing herewith a copy of our terms of commission which are on the usual scale and which would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms of your instructions or on terms acceptable to you."

D Giddys introduced a Mrs. Stow who made an offer "subject to contract" at the price required by the defendant. The defendant refused to sell at that price, but when Mrs. Stow was so informed, she increased her offer to the price demanded by the defendant. After negotiation, however, the defendant refused to proceed. LEWIS, J., held that Giddys were entitled to their commission. He cited the passages I have read from the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in the Luzor case (1), and said the question he had to decide was whether the contract clearly showed that the commission was to be payable if Giddys introduced a person who was willing to purchase, and he answered the question in the affirmative. He, therefore, gave judgment for Giddys. The arguments in the case are not reported, and there is nothing in the report of the judgment to show that the learned judge's attention was called to such cases as Chillingworth v. Esche (4), which establish that, as a general rule, where an offer is made and accepted "subject to contract" neither party is bound unless and until a definite contract is executed. The point was, however, I think, present to his mind for towards the end of his judgment LEWIS, J., says ([1947] 1 All E.R. 463):

G "It might be the fact that, as Mrs. Stow did not, in fact, purchase and did not even enter into a binding contract, the plaintiffs should be held to be wrong, but looking at that paragraph [from the commission note], I think it is abundantly clear that the plaintiffs were saying: 'The scale commission—the arithmetic of it—is to be found on the printed circular which we enclose, and commission at that rate will be payable by you if we introduce a bona fide person who is prepared to pay and is capable of paying the price you are asking for "Redlands".' Mrs. Stow was perfectly able and willing and capable. She was anxious to buy and I am constrained to say that the plaintiffs are entitled to the commission which they claim."

H In my opinion, therefore, Giddys v. Horsfall (3) is authority for the proposition that a person may be willing to purchase notwithstanding that his or her offer may have been made subject to contract.

In E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (5), the contract between principal and agent was in slightly different terms from that under consideration in Giddys v. Horsfall (3), but the court construed it as having the same effect. The agents introduced a person who signed a memorandum containing an offer of the price required by the principal, the memorandum being expressed to be "subject to contract." It is clear from the report that no argument was addressed to the judge based on the memorandum being expressed to be "subject to contract" and that he did not have the point in mind. This case, therefore, carries the matter no further than Giddys v. Horsfall (3).

The only other case to which I need refer is the decision of this court in E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6). In that case the contract between principal and agent was in similar terms to that in Giddys v. Horsfall (3) and indistinguishable in any material particular from the contract in the case before us. In E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6), however, the person introduced by the plaintiffs never actually got to the stage of making an offer. The material facts are stated by BUCKNILL, L.J., as follows ([1949] 2 All E.R. 586):

"... Mrs. Payne arrived, having been sent by the plaintiffs. She liked the bungalow, but said she wished her husband to see it, but he could not come until the next day, and asked the defendant to keep it for them. The defendant said she could not do so, as it might be sold before they had reached a decision. Mrs. Payne then went away, but she returned in the afternoon with her husband. The defendant then said that the house was sold, that she had given an option on it, and that a deposit had been paid."

It was admitted that at all material times Mr. Payne was able, ready and willing to purchase the premises, and the only question decided was that an obligation, binding morally or in a business sense but not in law, to sell to someone else, did not excuse the principal from his liability to pay commission under such a contract as we are considering. It is, however, relevant to observe that both Giddys v. Horsfall (3) and E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (5) were cited, for BUCKNILL, L.J., says (ibid., 587):

"That being so, it seems to me that these terms are perfectly plain. It is not disputed that Mr. Payne was a man able, ready and willing to purchase the property. The property was not, in fact, sold at the time when his wife came to see it, and, therefore the defendant is liable. I need not refer to the various cases which have been drawn to our attention in the course of the argument except to point out that in no less than three cases, Giddys v. Horsfall (3), E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (5) and Dennis Reed, Ltd. v. Nicholls (7), a contract in its essentials similar to this has been before the courts and in each case the defendant has been held to be liable to pay the commission although the person introduced has not purchased the property."

That being the state of the law counsel for the defendant invites us to say that Giddys v. Horsfall (3) was wrongly decided and that the proper view is that which obviously commended itself to ROXBURGH, J., in the present case, that is, that under a contract to pay a commission to an agent who introduces a person able and willing to purchase a property the agent can never recover unless he can prove that the person so introduced made an offer, or was willing to make an offer, which by acceptance could be turned into a firm contract.

Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that we were precluded from so holding by the decision of this court in E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6). I do not think this is so. The question of the effect of the words "subject to contract" does not appear to have been discussed and the question did not arise on the facts of the case. As I read the judgment, we were in that case only relying on the decisions cited as authority for the proposition that the mere fact that the person introduced did not actually purchase the property did not preclude the agent from recovering commission. E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6) carried the matter a stage further in that it established that the fact that the person introduced had not actually made an offer was not fatal to the agent's claim. It is not, however, in my opinion, any authority for the proposition that an offer on a condition which leaves the offeror free at his will, even if the offer is accepted, not to proceed with the purchase is evidence that the offeror is a person able and willing to purchase. The only case which supports this proposition is that of Giddys v. Horsfall (3), and that case is not binding on us. I am unable to agree with it. In reaching my conclusion I am not saying that the introduction into the preliminary arrangements of the expression "subject to contract" would necessarily in all cases prevent the agent establishing that the person he introduced was willing to purchase. It clearly would not be fatal to the agent's claim if it was introduced by the vendor in accepting an unqualified offer, but, if it was introduced by the prospective purchaser, the normal inference would be that he did so with a view to reserving to himself a locus poenitentiae, conduct which seems to me inconsistent with the view that he is a willing purchaser.

In reaching my conclusion I derive some assistance from a recent decision of this court in Cunliffe v. Goodman (8). In that case we had to consider the effect of the decision of this court in Salisbury v. Gilmore and Marcel (9) where it was held that, in deciding whether a tenant had proved that premises were, shortly after the termination of the tenancy, to be pulled down, the test was the intention of the landlord at the termination of the tenancy. In Cunliffe v. Goodman (8) the question was as to the meaning in that contract of the word "intention." We came to the conclusion that, while the intention might be revocable, it must not be provisional or conditional. I said in that case (ante, p. 723):

"Reading the correspondence as a whole, I have come to the conclusion that the landlord never reached more than a provisional decision. She would obviously not re-build unless the proposed scheme would provide an adequate return on the capital she would have to sink in it. It was plain that she could not reach a judgment on this point until she knew (a) what conditions the authorities would impose as to rent, etc., (b) what the proposed buildings would cost, and (c) what interest she would have to pay in order to finance the scheme. The financial aspect was plainly present to her mind throughout, and, reading the correspondence as a whole, I find it impossible to conclude that the tenant has discharged the onus which rests on him of proving that before Nov. 30, the landlord had decided to pull down the building and that that intention was still existing at that date."

Applying that case by analogy to the case before us, I think that the agent may prove that a person he has introduced is willing to purchase the property by showing that that person has made an unqualified offer or expressed an unqualified intention to make an offer notwithstanding that such an offer until accepted could be withdrawn. On the other hand, if the evidence shows that the offer is qualified by a condition inserted to prevent the other party turning the offer into a contract by acceptance, I think it is impossible to say that the agent has discharged the onus which rests on him of proving that the person he has introduced was willing to purchase the property. In my opinion, the agent only succeeded in E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6) because, as BUCKNILL, L.J., said, it was not disputed that Mr. Payne was a man able, ready and willing to purchase the property. Had the evidence indicated that when Mr. Payne returned with his wife to inspect the bungalow, he had not expressed his willingness to buy, the decision might, I think, well have been the other way.

In the present case there was some evidence that Mrs. Smith was keen on purchasing. She had continually increased her offer to meet the rising appetite of the defendant and she was described by her husband as anxious to purchase, but she never made an unqualified offer and her anxiety was at all material times qualified by "subject to satisfactory survey." Such an offer meant that Mrs. Smith had constituted herself the arbitrator whether the survey was satisfactory and the principal could not by accepting her offer constitute a binding contract. In these circumstances I think the learned judge was right in his conclusion and that the plaintiffs had not established that Mrs. Smith was a "person willing to purchase the property." For these reasons I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is a case of importance from the point of view of estate agents and also from the point of view of the public. It appears that since the decision of the House of Lords in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1) estate agents have adopted a new form of contract under which one who wishes to dispose of his property and who puts it into the hands of agents is asked to sign a form or to agree to a term that the ordinary rate of commission shall become payable to the agents in the event of their being instrumental in introducing a person prepared to purchase, or willing and able to purchase, on the terms of the clients' instructions. That kind of contract was considered by LEWIS, J., in Giddys v. Horsfall (3), in which case the agents had produced a Mrs. Stow who was prepared to purchase at an agreed figure, but whose offer was "subject to contract." The owner backed out. It was held by LEWIS, J., that, though the owner was not bound to sell to Mrs. Stow, still the agents were entitled to their commission as against the owner. The plaintiffs rely on that decision and they claim that it was approved by this court in E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (6). In that case the court decided that an owner might be liable to pay commission although the person introduced had not purchased the property. BUCKNILL, L.J., in the course of his judgment, referred to Giddys' case (3) as one of several supporting that view. Further than this the court did not go. No question arose on the words "subject to contract." There was no such term in that case. I do not know that there is any decision of the Court of Appeal which supports the view that commission is payable to the agents if all that they do is to produce a person who is willing to purchase "subject to contract." It may be so if the owner has agreed to such a term, or if he has introduced it himself. The question must always be determined by the terms of the contract between the owner and the agents.

In the case under appeal commission was payable to the agents "in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase." The agents introduced a Mrs. Dinah Smith. Their letter of Sept. 26, 1949, introduces the words "subject to contract." It appears uncertain how the words "subject to contract" came to be introduced. It may be that they have become more or less common form with some people, but a further term or condition was introduced in the letter from the agents dated Oct. 3 (which contains the introduction on which they rely as giving them a right to commission). The agents wrote to the owner:

"... acting in accordance with your instructions we have accepted the increased offer of our applicant, Mrs. Dinah Smith ... to purchase your property as above in the sum of £4,650 freehold, subject to contract, satisfactory survey ..."

"Subject to satisfactory survey" means either subject to the proposed purchaser receiving a surveyor's report which is satisfactory to him, or subject to the report being a satisfactory one. So far as I can find, there had been no mention of this beforehand. Mr. Ewen, the agents' manager, gave evidence as to a conversation with the defendant on the afternoon of Oct. 3 in which the defendant told him he could carry on with the sale to Mrs. Smith at £4,650, and the defendant was not called to deny this. Mr. Ewen did not say that there was any mention of "subject to survey." There is importance in such a term. There might be dry rot in the house, the drains might be out of order, or the value when the condition of the property was seen might be far below that which was asked. These are matters of a kind which the owner might prefer not to have raised, and there is no reason why he should agree to the introduction of any such term.

It was submitted that the words "subject to satisfactory survey" add nothing to the words "subject to contract," and that, consequently, this court ought to follow the decision of LEWIS, J., in Giddys' case (3) (and inferentially of this court in Nelson's case (6)) and hold that commission is payable to agents in the present case. In Chillingworth v. Esche (4) the purchasers agreed to purchase certain freehold land from the vendor subject to a proper contract to be prepared by the vendor's solicitors. It was held that the document was only conditional and did not contain a firm contract. WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1924] 1 Ch. 109):

"It has been held over and over again that where you have a document relating to the sale and purchase of land framed in these terms, the object of inserting those words is to avoid binding the parties unless and until the contract referred to has been prepared and signed by both parties."

Later he says (ibid. 111):

"I am clearly of opinion that this document of July 10, 1922, was nothing more than a conditional offer and acceptance, and would only ripen into a contract when a formal document was signed."

SARGANT, L.J., said (ibid., 114):

"... they are words appropriate for introducing a condition, and it would require a very strong and exceptional case for this clear prima facie meaning to be displaced."

Bearing this in mind I cannot accept the decision of LEWIS, J., in Giddys' case (3) as correct. An owner is willing to sell his property for a certain sum. If on a contract such as there was in that case the agent produces a person willing to purchase at that price the agent may well be entitled to commission, but, if the person introduced makes his offer or acceptance "subject to contract," I do not think that the agent is entitled to commission unless it can be said that the owner has, in one way or another, agreed to that term. In other words, the acceptance is a conditional acceptance and no more than that.

In the present case there was introduced the further term "subject to satisfactory survey." To the mind of the trained lawyer that may add nothing beyond "subject to contract," but it did mean something to the purchaser and to the agents, else it would not have been introduced. It was said in the course of the argument that the words "subject to contract" have become more or less common form, inserted by agents, but, if an owner receives an acceptance "subject to satisfactory survey," attention is drawn to the fact that the person is keeping open questions in regard to the condition of the property. Why should it be regarded as an acceptance of the owner's offer of the property? It is not an unconditional acceptance, nor is it one which the owner is bound to accept even if he was prepared to accept an offer "subject to contract." The latter is usually taken to mean "provided that our respective lawyers can agree upon the form of contract," though it may have a wider legal significance. The owner may well be disposed to say: "I am not going to accept an offer which re-opens the question of the condition of the property"—the more so if he has an equally good, or a better, offer independent of any such term.

In my view, it has not been shown that the person introduced, Mrs. Dinah Smith, was willing to purchase. The evidence of Mr. Smith shows that she required a surveyor's report and her offer (or acceptance) was conditional on that. In order that the agents may substantiate their claim to commission they must show that they introduced someone willing to purchase on the owner's terms or on terms acceptable to him, and they have not done that. No doubt Mrs. Smith was anxious to purchase the property, but her willingness to do so was dependent on the surveyor's report, and it was so stated in the letter of Oct. 3. Any other view would put agents in a position which, to my mind, is completely untenable. A property might be in the hands of half a dozen agents each of whom produced a person prepared to pay the price asked "subject to contract and subject to satisfactory survey." Is each entitled to commission regardless of the introduction of that term which proved a complete obstacle in each case? The same firm of agents might produce first one and then another person each of whom was prepared to purchase at the price asked subject to such terms, and each might turn down the property on surveyor's report. Is the firm entitled to commission in respect of each introduction? Surely not unless the owner can be said to have embraced in his offer those conditions, or to have accepted them. I agree with ROXBURGH, J., that the agents have not proved that they are entitled to commission, and I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

McCALLUM v. HICKS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Denning, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), March 20, 1950.]

Agent—Commission—Estate agent—Agreement to purchase "subject to formal contract."

The defendant verbally instructed the plaintiff, an estate agent, to "find someone to buy my house," a price of £1,250 being mentioned, but nothing being said about commission. The plaintiff introduced a Mrs. K. who offered £1,200 for the house, and an agreement was entered into between the defendant and Mrs. K. whereby Mrs. K. agreed to purchase the house for the price offered "subject to formal contract." Before any further steps had been taken in the matter, the defendant withdrew his instructions from the plaintiff. On a claim by the plaintiff for commission,

HELD: on construction, the words "find someone to buy," meant "find a purchaser"; an agreement by the defendant to pay the plaintiff a commission on his finding a purchaser was to be implied; an agreement to pay commission in that event contemplated the agent procuring a binding and enforceable contract to purchase; the agreement between the defendant and Mrs. K. was not such a contract, but was made "subject to formal contract;" and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to commission.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE PRATT made at Newton Abbot County Court, on Dec. 15, 1949, whereby he awarded the plaintiff £37 10s. in respect of commission.

The defendant instructed the plaintiff, an estate agent, through his (the plaintiff's) clerk to "see if he can find someone to buy my house." No written memorandum of the contract was drawn up and nothing was said as to commission. The plaintiff introduced a Mrs. Kelly as a prospective purchaser and an agreement was entered into "subject to formal contract" between the defendant and Mrs. Kelly, by which the defendant agreed to sell the house to Mrs. Kelly for £1,200. The defendant subsequently refused to complete. On a claim by the plaintiff for commission the learned county court judge held that the words "someone to buy" should be construed as someone who was ready, willing and able to buy, that Mrs. Kelly was such a person, and, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to commission.

E. Dennis Smith for the defendant.

Herrick Collins for the plaintiff.

BUCKNILL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The whole point in this case is whether the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was that the defendant should pay a commission if the plaintiff found a purchaser or whether he should pay a commission if the plaintiff found someone ready, willing and able to buy the house. The learned county court judge said: "I must interpret 'someone to buy' as someone who was ready and willing and was able to buy," and he found as a fact that the plaintiff did the work he was instructed to do. A good deal has to be read into what took place to spell out a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, because there is no mention in any conversation between the parties about a commission. Therefore, one must imply an agreement by the defendant to pay a commission if the plaintiff could find someone to buy his (the defendant's) house. To me that means: "I will agree to pay a commission if you find a purchaser of my house." "Someone to buy" is a more colloquial way of saying "a purchaser." If one reads the expression in the way in which the learned judge has read it, it seems to me not only to be a strained construction of those words, but also to introduce a term which is unreasonable. It is unreasonable in two respects. First, it would mean that, in a case of this kind, if Mrs. Kelly, before any formal contract had been made, had decided to withdraw from the negotiations because she had found another house more suitable, the defendant would have been liable to pay the commission because the plaintiff had found someone who was, at any rate at one time, ready, able and willing to purchase. Then, again, if the defendant were a poor man, without any private means other than his house, he would pay the commission out of the purchase price, which he would not receive until a formal and binding contract had been made. It would be unreasonable to suppose that he ever contemplated having to pay a commission to anyone who had not, in fact, found a purchaser for the house. In addition, the defendant, being anxious to sell the house quickly, had put the house in the hands of a number of agents, and it would be unreasonable if he thereby made himself liable to pay commission to any agent who found a person ready, able and willing to buy. In my view, the learned judge put an erroneous construction on the contract made between the plaintiff's agent and the defendant, and this appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: The words "find a purchaser" and "introduce a purchaser" have a meaning which is well understood. When a house owner goes to a house agent and asks him to "find a purchaser," that means that the agent is to find a person who will actually complete the purchase of the house, it being understood that the agent's commission is to be paid out of the purchase price. That is the common understanding of men in these matters. If the sale is not completed, the agent gets no commission unless he has procured an actual binding and enforceable contract for purchase. Once the purchaser and vendor have signed and exchanged a contract, the agent has earned his commission because, if the purchaser does not complete, the vendor can recover the amount of the commission from the purchaser by way of damages. LORD ROMER put it succinctly in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1), where he said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 64):

“Where an owner of property employs an agent to find a purchaser, which must mean at least a person who enters into a binding contract to purchase . . .”

It is only then that the agent becomes entitled to commission.

Some agents recently have been endeavouring to alter the ordinary understanding of the expressions “find a purchaser” or “introduce a purchaser” by getting a house owner to sign a document which makes him liable for commission if the agent introduces “a person able, ready and willing to purchase.” Once such a form is signed, they say they are entitled to commission if they introduce a person who makes an offer but does not sign a binding contract. If this is correct, it means that where a number of house agents induce a house owner to let them put his house on their books, the owner may find himself liable to pay commission, not only on the sale which is completed through one agent, but also on offers which have been made through other agents and never reached a binding contract: see, for instance, Giddys v. Horsfall (2), E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (3), and E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (4). This is so contrary to the common understanding of men, and also to common fairness that the courts will endeavour to interpret the contract so as to avoid such a result. As I pointed out in John Lee & Son (Grantham), Ltd. v. Railway Executive (5) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 584), the common law is vigilant to prevent any abuse of freedom of contract, and, rather than permit any abuse, it will assume that the party intended to be reasonable and will give the contract a reasonable interpretation. This is especially so in the case of forms which the public are invited to sign without legal advice. So, recently, in the notable decision of Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (6) this court held that a person could not be said to be “willing” to purchase if all he had done was to sign “subject to contract” or “subject to survey.” This shakes the authority of previous cases and opens the way to an interpretation of the new form of words so as to give them the same effect as “find a purchaser.” A person may not properly be said to be “willing” to purchase so as to entitle an agent to commission unless he is irrevocably willing, that is, unless he has given irrevocable proof of his willingness by entering into a binding contract to purchase. In the present case, however, there was nothing in writing. There was simply an oral request. The house owner went to the house agent and said: “See if you can find someone to buy my house.” What is the proper interpretation of that contract? I have no doubt that it is the same as: “Find me a purchaser.” The agent is entitled to a commission if the sale is completed, or if a binding contract is made. Neither of those two things happened. The sale was not completed, and there was no binding contract. It was all “subject to formal contract.” The house owner sold his house through another agent and paid that agent commission. The plaintiff is not entitled to any commission. I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, J.: The learned county court judge found as a fact that at the end of August, 1949, the defendant instructed the plaintiff to find someone to buy his house at £1,250, or near offer. It is not necessary, in my opinion, for this court to go further than to construe those words. In the Luxor case (1) VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., referred ([1941] 1 All E.R. 41) to the usual arrangement made with house agents, and quoted with approval the observations of WILLIAMS, J., in Prickett v. Badger (7), where the latter speaks of (1 C.B.N.S. 305):

"... the implied understanding that the agent is only to receive a commission if he succeeds in effecting a sale, but, if not, then he is to get nothing."

It is necessary, as LORD RUSSELL pointed out in the Luxor case (1), for an agent, if he wishes to go beyond the usual established practice, to introduce terms which make it clear that he is to get a commission at a point short of a completed sale.

- A On the interpretation of these words I think it is impossible so to find. "Someone to buy my house" means in its plain meaning, in the light of the established practice, a buyer of the house, which in terms is equivalent to a purchaser of the house. There was in this case no contract for sale, as has been admitted. In those circumstances, I think it unnecessary to consider further whether, if the learned county court judge had been justified in interpreting the words as being
- B willing, able and ready to buy at the figure named, there was evidence in this case which would justify a judgment in favour of the plaintiff. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HARRIS v. ROTOL, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.J.J.), March 6, 7, 28, 1950.]

- E Workmen's Compensation—Industrial disease—Certifying surgeon's certificate given after July 5, 1948, in respect of disablement suffered before that date—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 43 (1), (2)—National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1) (a).

- F On Aug. 17, 1949, a workman obtained a certificate of a certifying surgeon appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, that he was suffering from dermatitis and that the date of his disablement was Feb. 6, 1948. He claimed compensation from his employers under s. 43 of the Act of 1925. The National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, which came into force on July 5, 1948, provides by s. 89 (1) that workmen's compensation shall not be payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day (July 5, 1948), and that, accordingly (inter alia), the Act of 1925 was repealed as from that day,
- G provided that "(a) the said enactments shall continue to apply to cases to which they would have applied if this Act had not been passed, being cases where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where . . . the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury."

- H HELD: the right to compensation under s. 43 of the Act of 1925 did not arise until the certificate was given, and, as no certificate was given before the appointed day, no right to compensation could arise under that section because the certifying surgeon, having regard to s. 89 (1) of the Act of 1946, became functus officio on the appointed day, and, therefore, the application of the Act of 1925 was not saved by proviso (a) to s. 89 (1) as regards the workman's disablement.

(1) Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd., [1950] 1 All E.R. 149.

APPEAL by a workman from an order of His Honour JUDGE DONALD HURST, K.C., made at Gloucester County Court, and dated Dec. 5, 1949, dismissing an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43, based on a certificate of a certifying surgeon dated Aug. 17, 1949, on the ground that, at the date of the certificate, the certifying surgeon was functus officio. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

Beney, K.C., and E. V. Falk for the workman.

Lloyd-Jones, K.C., and Lyne for the employers.

Mar. 28. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment. The workman in this case seeks to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43. He alleges that the date of disablement was Feb. 6, 1948, that being the date so certified by a certificate dated Aug. 17, 1949, of a certifying surgeon appointed under the Act of 1925. The employers made no admission as to the facts, and took a preliminary objection in the following terms:

"The respondents deny their liability to pay compensation on the ground that [the workman's] right to claim compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts did not arise before July 5, 1948, as from which date the Workmen's Compensation Acts were repealed, and they contend, therefore, that they are not liable to pay compensation under the said Acts in respect of incapacity from the alleged industrial disease."

This objection was based on an argument that the right to compensation did not exist until a certificate was given by a certifying surgeon, and that, as in the present case that certificate was not given until after the appointed day fixed pursuant to the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, the workman had no right to compensation at the appointed day.

The learned judge upheld this contention, and dismissed the application saying:

"The certificate of the certifying surgeon was headed Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43 (1) (i). I consider, and so held, that on the date when the certificate was given, namely, Aug. 17, 1948, that particular section no longer existed. I held that on July 5, 1948, the certifying surgeon was functus officio the Act of 1925, and could give no certificate under that Act. I was fortified in this view by the wording of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, s. 89 (1) (b), which appeared to me to provide for such a contingency as the present, by the existence of S.R. & O., 1948, No. 1262 (National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) (Medical Certification) Regulations, 1948), and by the existence of s. 89 (1) (c) covering such exceptions as were intended by the legislature."

From this award, the workman appeals. The relevant section of the Act of 1946 is s. 89. This provides:

"(1) Workmen's compensation shall not be payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day, and accordingly the enactments set out in sched. IX to this Act are hereby repealed as from that day to the extent mentioned in the third column of that schedule . . ."

In the schedule appears the Act of 1925. Had the section stopped there the learned judge would have been right, since the appointed date was fixed as July 5, 1948, but then follow three provisos:

A “(a) the said enactments shall continue to apply to cases to which they would have applied if this Act had not been passed, being cases where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where, in the case of a disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of Part IV of this Act, the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury; (b) regulations may make such transitional or consequential provisions as appear to the Minister to be necessary or expedient, having regard to the repeal of the said enactments in relation to diseases and to injuries not caused by accident, including provision for modifying or winding-up any scheme made thereunder; (c) the repeal of the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1925, shall not affect any rules of court made under the Workmen’s Compensation (Transfer of Funds) Act, 1927, or the power to make new rules of court thereunder.”

B The first part of the first proviso applies to all accidents, notional as well as actual. Its effect has been considered by this court in Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd. (1). The judgment of the court was delivered by SOMERVELL, L.J., and he considers the position in the case of an actual accident, saying ([1950] 1 All E.R. 152):

D “We will take a case, put by BUCKNILL, L.J., in the course of the argument, of a groom kicked by a horse before the appointed day. The groom is not ‘disabled’ at the time and is able to carry on with his work. After the appointed day injury develops and he has to go to hospital. His right to compensation, as it seems to us, ‘arises’ at the time of his disability or incapacity. The Act of 1925 gives compensation, not for pain and suffering, but for total or partial incapacity, but in the case put, this right, though arising after the appointed day, is in respect of employment before the appointed day, and the proviso to s. 89 (1) preserves his rights under the Workmen’s Compensation Acts. The case where incapacity is continuing at the appointed day is plainly covered. There is also, as it seems to us, no difficulty about the case where there has been a temporary recovery at the appointed day, but later incapacity, the result of the pre-appointed day injury, re-develops. This re-development gives a right to compensation which ‘arises’ after the appointed day, but it is in respect of employment before the appointed day. If this is right, then the words ‘the right to compensation’ are given what seem to us their natural construction, and, so far as ordinary accidents are concerned, the provisions clearly mean what one would expect them to.”

E From this passage it is clear that in the case of an ordinary accident, i.e., an accident which is not a notional accident within s. 43 of the Act of 1925, the proviso will operate if the accident arose out of employment before the appointed day notwithstanding that the right to compensation (which arises only at the time of disablement or incapacity) does not arise until after the appointed day.

G We are, however, concerned not with an ordinary accident but with a notional accident, and I must, therefore, refer to s. 43 of the Act of 1925 which, so far as material, provides:

H “(1) Where—(i) the certifying surgeon appointed under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, for the district in which a workman is employed certifies that the workman is suffering from a disease mentioned in sched. III to this Act and is thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed; . . . and the disease is due to the nature of any employment in which the workman was employed at any time within the twelve months previous to the date of the disablement or suspension, whether under one or more employers, he or his dependants shall be entitled to compensation under this Act as if the disease or such suspension as aforesaid were a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of that employment, subject to the following modifications:—(a) The disablement or suspension shall be treated as the happening of the accident . . . (2) For the purposes of this section the date of disablement shall be such date as the certifying surgeon certifies as the date on which the disablement commenced, or, if he is unable to certify such a date, the date on which the certificate is given.”

Then there are provisos which I need not read. As regards notional accidents, SOMERVELL, L.J., says (ibid., 153) that the early part of the proviso does not apply completely, at any rate, to the case of industrial diseases. None the less, counsel for the workman here say that the principle laid down by SOMERVELL, L.J., applies equally to the notional accident in this case. They put their case in two ways. First, they say that the certificate is mere matter of proof, not a necessary element in the right, and that, although the certificate was not given until after the appointed date, it has retrospective effect under s. 43 (2). Secondly, they say that, having regard to the interpretation placed on the first part of the proviso by SOMERVELL, L.J., the exception in it should be construed as if it read “if the right does not arise out of employment before the appointed day.” On that construction, they say that, as the disability plainly arose out of employment before the appointed day, they are not within the exception to the proviso.

Counsel for the employers seeks to support the conclusion of the judge by saying that (i) s. 43 (1), by its very terms, makes the giving of a certificate a sine qua non and, indeed, the first step in founding a right to compensation; (ii) no certificate having been given before the appointed day, no right to compensation can have arisen before that day, and it can never arise thereafter since, under the opening words of s. 89, s. 43 has been repealed; (iii) we need not, therefore, consider the exception to the proviso since the workman never brings himself within the opening part thereof. This construction, he says, does not make the proviso meaningless in the case of notional accidents, since, if a certificate had been given before the appointed day, the proviso would operate, and it would be necessary to preserve the old Acts in operation for many purposes, e.g., for the purpose of review under s. 11 of the Act of 1925.

Counsel for the workman argued that this construction would lead to strange results—for instance, if A. and B. both had similar notional accidents on the same date and one obtained a certificate before the appointed date but the other did not, they would have different rights although their cases were indistinguishable. I am not, however, impressed by this argument. It seems to me that the policy of the Act is to make a clean cut and to provide that any rights accruing after the appointed date should be dealt with under the new Act. A more serious criticism of the argument of counsel for the employers is, however, that it would leave a hiatus. Counsel for the workman says that there are cases where the workman would have no remedy for the period between the date of contraction of the disease and the appointed date. To appreciate this criticism I must turn to the provisions of the Act of 1946. Section 1 provides:

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, all persons employed in insurable employment shall be insured in manner provided by this Act against personal injury caused on or after the appointed day by accident arising out of and in the course of such employment.”

Part IV deals with notional accidents arising out of industrial diseases and industrial injuries not caused by accident. Section 55 provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a person who is under this Act insured against personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment shall be insured also against any prescribed disease and against any prescribed personal injury not so caused, being a disease or injury due to the nature of that employment and developed on or after the appointed day."

A Sub-section (2) gives power to the Minister to prescribe what diseases are to be included under Part IV. Sub-section (3) enables him to include in regulations made under sub-section (2) a provision ante-dating the effect of the regulations to any specified date not being earlier than the appointed date. Sub-section (4) provides:

B "Provision may be made by regulations for determining the time at which a person is to be treated for the purposes of this Act as having developed any disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of this Part of this Act, and the circumstances in which any such disease or injury is, where the person in question has previously suffered therefrom, to be treated as having recrudesced or as having been contracted or received afresh."

C Regulations have been made under the above powers which are difficult to construe. I need not, I think, refer to them in detail since it was agreed that the effect of them is that a workman who was found to be suffering from dermatitis after the appointed date could recover compensation for any period of disablement or incapacity subsequent to that date, but that there is no provision enabling him to do so in respect of any earlier period of incapacity unless, of course, he had obtained a certificate of a certifying surgeon before the appointed date and could rely on the first proviso to s. 89 (1). D Counsel for the workman was, therefore, right in saying that under the Act and regulations as they stand there is a hiatus not covered by either Act. No doubt it was not Parliament's intention to leave such a hiatus, and, if there is an ambiguity in the construction of s. 89 (1), we might adopt that construction which would fill the gap. E I am, however, unable to find that ambiguity. It is, I think, clear from what was said by SOMERVELL, L.J., in Hales' case (1) that the right to compensation does not arise until the time of the disability or incapacity. It is also, I think, plain that, under s. 43 of the Act of 1925, until a certificate is given there is no right to compensation at all. In these circumstances, I think that counsel for the employers was justified in saying that F in any case where there was no certificate before the appointed day, the certifying surgeon was functus officio and could not, thereafter, found a right by giving a certificate.

I arrive at this conclusion with less reluctance because (a) in the present case on the facts the hiatus does not exist, (b) I think counsel for the workman was right in suggesting that the Minister could, if he thought fit so to do, G bridge the gap by regulation under the power conferred by proviso (b) to s. 89 (1). For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. ASQUITH, L.J., asks me to say he has read this judgment, and agrees with it.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

PARMEE v. MITCHELL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), March 17, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Alternative accommodation—Sub-tenant of part of house purchasing reversion—Whether part of house occupied by tenant suitable alternative accommodation as compared with whole house—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1) (b). A

The defendant, who was the tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts, sub-let the upper part of the house to the plaintiff. Subsequently, the plaintiff purchased the reversion on the defendant's tenancy and gave the defendant notice to quit. The plaintiff sought an order for possession of the whole house, offering, as alternative accommodation, within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1) (b), the part of the house already occupied by the defendant. B

HELD: (i) there would be an order for possession, subject to a proviso that the defendant should be entitled to remain in occupation of the part which he, in fact, occupied. C

(ii) (SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., dubitante): the part of the house already occupied by the defendant could properly be regarded as suitable alternative accommodation. D

Case referred to:

(1) Thompson v. Rolls, [1926] 2 K.B. 426; 135 L.T. 446; 31 Digest 580, 7291.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE HARGREAVES, made at West London County Court, on Dec. 19, 1949, granting possession of a dwelling-house to the plaintiff, and further ordering that the operation of the order for possession be subject to the plaintiff granting the defendant alternative accommodation in the part of the house already occupied by the defendant. The defendant contended that no suitable alternative accommodation was offered to him, and that it was not reasonable to make the order. The facts appear in the judgment of JENKINS, L.J. F

C. C. P. Hodson for the defendant.

R. B. Willis for the plaintiff.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to give the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of the learned county court judge giving the plaintiff possession of the premises, No. 19, Ackmar Road, S.W.6, subject to granting the defendant alternative accommodation, which consisted of the part of the premises then actually occupied by the defendant. G

Originally the plaintiff was the defendant's tenant of the upper part of the house. Later, the plaintiff bought the house, and thus became the defendant's landlord while at the same time he was the defendant's sub-tenant of the upper part. The plaintiff having bought the house, wishes to be in occupation of the upper part of the house in his own right as owner instead of holding it as sub-tenant of the defendant, or, in other words, to simplify the position so that he will be in possession of the house as owner, occupying the upper part himself and letting the lower part to the defendant. He puts his case in this way. It is said that the defendant by himself or his tenant, the plaintiff, is in possession of the whole of the premises. It is said that the lower part of those premises, H now in the actual occupation of the defendant, constitutes suitable alternative accommodation, and it is claimed, therefore, that, subject to the court considering it reasonable to make the order, the case is one in which an order for possession can properly be made under s. 3 (1) (b) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. The propriety of the order made by the learned county court judge has been attacked by counsel for the defendant on the ground that it does not lead to any alteration in the physical possession of the premises, but merely strengthens the plaintiff's position in point of title and deprives the defendant of such chance as he might otherwise have, if he were so minded, of extending his accommodation by obtaining possession, on one or other of the statutory grounds, of the upper part of the house against the plaintiff as his tenant. These arguments are, at first sight, attractive because superficially it seems somewhat absurd to make an order for possession subject to alternative accommodation being provided and to treat as alternative accommodation the rooms already occupied by the tenant, thus, in effect, cancelling the operation of the order for possession, but I think that that difficulty is only superficial. It is true that the defendant is only in occupation of the lower part of the house, but he is, nevertheless, in possession of the whole. The plaintiff has no option but to make a claim for possession extending to the whole of the premises, for that is the only way in which he can determine the defendant's interest.

Looking at the matter from that point of view, the alternative accommodation offered is not simply the identical premises of which the defendant is in law in possession, but the part of those premises of which he is in actual physical occupation and which represents the only part of such premises that is necessary to provide the accommodation he wants. The lower part of the premises can, therefore, in my view, properly be regarded as "alternative accommodation" although it is part of the entire house of which the defendant is at present in possession. That view is borne out by the judgments of the Divisional Court in Thompson v. Rolls (1), where there arose a situation in some respects similar to that in the present case, the difference being that the rooms not occupied by the defendant, instead of being sub-let to the plaintiff, were used by the defendant for furnished letting. The Divisional Court found no difficulty in holding that the rooms in the actual occupation of the defendant in the entire house could be regarded as alternative accommodation as compared with the house as a whole. In my view, that decision was right, and I hold, accordingly, that the decision of the county court judge in the present case was in substance correct. I think, however, that the form of the order he made is, perhaps, capable of some improvement. On the whole, I think it is right that there should be an order for possession of the whole of the premises subject to a proviso that the defendant is to be entitled to remain in occupation of the lower part of the premises on suitable terms. I gather that the appropriate rent for that part of the premises has already been fixed, and I, therefore, suggest that the proviso should be simply to the effect that, notwithstanding the order for possession, the defendant is to be entitled to remain in occupation of the lower part of the premises as a weekly tenant of the plaintiff at that weekly rent. As the appeal has in substance failed I think the defendant should pay the costs.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. Prior to the notice to quit the defendant was, of course, the tenant of the whole of these premises, part of which he had sub-let to the plaintiff. After the service of the notice to quit, apart from the Rent Restrictions Acts, prima facie the plaintiff would have been entitled to an order for possession of the whole premises, but, having regard to the Rent Restrictions Acts, the defendant's position falls to be considered. The learned judge said :

"There was no suggestion that this part [the lower part] was not suitable to the defendant's needs in all the respects required by the Act, including the rent required for it."

Therefore, it seems to me that, subject to the defendant being safeguarded with respect to that accommodation, there is no obstacle provided in the Acts to the making of an order for possession. The only question that arises, as it seems to me, is whether the order for possession should be made for part of the house—that part which the defendant does not desire to occupy—or for the whole house. I have come to the conclusion that the proper form of order is that there should be an order for possession of the whole house. This is necessary and right in order to get rid of the defendant's right to possession of the whole house as statutory tenant. The order should, however, be subject to the defendant remaining as tenant, on terms which, apparently, have been agreed, of that part of the house which he has occupied and will continue to occupy. I think that the appeal, therefore, fails, subject to some possible question as to the wording of the order. A
B

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : I have felt no doubt that the substance of the order made by the county court judge was just and correct, but, during the argument of counsel for the defendant, I think I felt a greater difficulty than my brethren with regard to an order in this form in the circumstances of this case—an order adjudging that the plaintiff recover possession of all the premises and that the defendant give the plaintiff possession of all the premises, an order which was not intended ever to be executed in those terms or to affect in the least the actual physical possession by either the plaintiff or the defendant of any room in the house, but, in view of the opinion of my brethren, and realising that "possession" does not by any means necessarily mean physical possession, I do not further pursue that matter. I add that, were it not for the fact that the defendant has claimed to be entitled to remain as the landlord of the plaintiff in respect of the rooms originally sub-let—a claim which I think cannot be sustained—the difficulty would never have arisen. All that I think the defendant is entitled to is to be protected in some proper form in his continued occupation of the rooms in which he now in fact lives as his home. It is unnecessary to express any view whether the accommodation actually enjoyed by a tenant could ever be "alternative accommodation" in itself, and in this case I certainly do not decide that it could, but I think, for the reasons which JENKINS, L.J., has stated, that that point does not here call for decision. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed, but I think that the order should be varied on the lines which JENKINS, L.J., has suggested. C

R. v. MINISTER OF HEALTH. Ex parte DINGLE AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Jones, JJ.),
March 28, 1950.]

National Health Service—Medical practitioner—Compensation for loss of right to sell practice—Assessment—“Last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day”—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 36 (1)—National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506), reg. 2 (1), reg. 7 (2).

On July 5, 1948, the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the name of one F.R.D., a medical practitioner, was entered on the list of medical practitioners undertaking to provide general medical services under the Act, and he thereupon became entitled to compensation under s. 36 (1) of the Act in respect of the loss suffered by him by reason of his inability to sell the goodwill of his practice by virtue of s. 35 (1) of the Act. By para. 7 (2) (a) of the National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948, “annual loss” is defined as “the average gross yearly receipts of [a] practice, as certified by a qualified accountant, calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day.” On Feb. 5, 1949, F.R.D. died. The applicants, as his personal representatives, submitted a claim for compensation to the Ministry of Health and supplied a certificate of the yearly receipts of the deceased's practice for the two years ending July 4, 1948. The Minister of Health refused to consider the claim unless the applicants furnished the gross receipts of the practice for each of the last two accounting years adopted for income tax purposes prior to July 5, 1948. On an application for an order of mandamus,

HELD: the “last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day” meant the last two annual periods before the appointed day for which the deceased normally had his accounts made up for income tax purposes, and not an account made up ad hoc for the two years ending on the appointed day irrespective of whether that was the date on which the deceased did, in fact, customarily make up his accounts. The applicants, therefore, had failed to supply accounts for the requisite period, and the application should be dismissed.

MOTION for mandamus directing the Minister of Health to consider and determine the claim for compensation under s. 36 (1) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, submitted by the applicants as personal representatives of a deceased doctor.

The deceased, who died on Feb. 5, 1949, was, up to the date of his death, and immediately before July 5, 1948, the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946, engaged as principal in general medical practice in and around Gateshead-on-Tyne. On the appointed day the name of the deceased was entered on the list prepared by the local executive council of medical practitioners undertaking to provide general medical services, and the deceased, thereupon, became entitled to compensation in accordance with s. 36 (1) of the Act in respect of loss suffered by him by reason that he then became, and thenceforward would be, unable to sell the goodwill of his practice in view of the provisions of s. 35 (1) of the Act. The applicants submitted a claim for compensation to the Ministry of Health and supplied a certificate by qualified accountants of the yearly receipts of the practice of the deceased for the two years ending July 4, 1948. The Minister claimed to be entitled to be furnished with the gross receipts of the practice for each of the last two accounting years used for income tax purposes prior to July 5, 1948. The applicants refused to comply with that request, and, thereupon, they were informed by the Minister that, having regard to the construction placed on reg. 7 (2) of the National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948, it must be held that the figures had not been furnished to enable the annual loss to be estimated in accordance with the said regulations, and that the claim as submitted could not be considered.

Havers, K.C., and Cantley for the applicants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and J. P. Ashworth for the Minister.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicants has moved for an order of mandamus directed to the Minister of Health commanding him to hear and determine an application by the administrators of the estate of one Dr. Dingle for compensation to which they claim to be entitled under s. 36 (1) of the National Health Service Act, 1946.

The point involved is a very short one. As medical practitioners who are on the list of doctors appointed to serve under the National Health Service Act, 1946, are, by virtue of s. 35 (1) of the Act, prohibited from selling their practices, provision is made for them to receive compensation for the loss of the right to do so, the compensation being paid when they retire from practice or at death. Certain regulations have been made for the purpose of assessing the compensation, and the main provision is in reg. 7 (2) of the National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506), which provides:

“For the purpose of these regulations ‘the annual loss’ [i.e., the loss sustained by the practitioner by his being unable to sell] means (a) in respect of the practice (not being a partnership practice) in which the practitioner was engaged on the appointed day, the average gross yearly receipts of that practice, as certified by a qualified accountant, calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day.”

If there was nothing else in the regulation, I should say that that provision meant that the compensation was to be calculated by reference to the accounts of the last two years made up in the normal way in which the doctor kept his accounts. Regulation 2 (1), however, provides:

“‘accounting year’ in relation to a medical practice means the period of twelve months for which the accounts of the practitioner engaged in that practice are made up.”

That assumes that a doctor, like any other professional man, will make up his accounts annually, to some particular date of his own choice. Whatever date he chooses, however, is that at which the necessary figures must be arrived at for the present purpose. Dr. Dingle’s administrators, however, have claimed to be entitled to take the two years immediately preceding the date on which the Act came into operation, and they have had accounts made up for two years to July 4, irrespective of whether those were the dates on which Dr. Dingle used, in fact, to make up his accounts. Therefore, the Minister has only asked for the accounts to which he is entitled, i.e., the accounts for the normal accounting year which Dr. Dingle used in his practice, and this application must fail.

HEATH v. HEATH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Hodson, J.), March 23, 1950.]

Divorce—Petition—Service by registered post—No acknowledgment—Need for substituted service—Probability that petition was received—Discretion to dispense with substituted service—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 8 (1), (2), (3), r. 10.

A A wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion against her husband, an American domiciled in Missouri, U.S.A., whom she had married in England in March, 1945. In October, 1945, the husband went back to America, and from that date he refused to make a home for the wife and had not maintained her or the child of the marriage, but in various letters he had said he did not intend to live with her and offered to do all he could to facilitate a divorce if she brought proceedings. The petition was sent by registered post to his last known address with a request that he would sign the acknowledgment of service. He made no reply, nor was the letter returned through the post, and inquiries made personally at the given address by a firm of American lawyers failed to trace him. An application was made in chambers for an order that the petition should proceed to trial forthwith, but WILLMER, J., declined to make the order and directed that there should be substituted service by advertisement in a Missouri newspaper.

D HELD: (i) although service of a petition by registered post was only effective if the respondent signed the acknowledgment of service the court could dispense with the further expense of personal service or substituted service by advertisement if the probability was that the respondent had received the petition and either declined or omitted to sign the acknowledgment.

E (ii) in the present case the facts and correspondence showed that the wife had done all that she possibly could do to effect service, and, although the Court of Appeal was reluctant to interfere with an order based on the discretion of the judge (as this order was by virtue of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 10), the court could do so where they were satisfied after examining all the facts that the judge was wrong.

H APPEAL from an order of WILLMER, J., dated Feb. 20, 1950, refusing to allow a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage to proceed to trial until substituted service of the petition had been effected by advertisement in a newspaper in Missouri, U.S.A., where the husband was domiciled. An attempt had previously been made to serve the petition by registered post, but the husband had not acknowledged service, and the letter had not been returned through the post. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This appeal raises an interesting and important question in divorce jurisdiction. On Dec. 11, 1944, the petitioner, then Margaret Elizabeth Heap, aged twenty, born of English parents and an English citizen, married in England Willie Heath, aged twenty-two, an American soldier serving in this country. In March, 1945, three months later she gave birth to a son of whom the husband is the father. In July, 1945, the husband went back to America and was demobilised there in the following October. From that date until now he has never contributed anything towards the wife's support or towards that of his son. From time to time the husband wrote letters to his wife from an address in Missouri which he gave as that of his home—405, Fletcher Street, Sikeston. That is the address to which the wife always wrote to him and where he obviously received her letters. There is a letter written by him from Sikeston on Dec. 2, 1945, in which he says this (sic):

"I dont guess there is any use of you in try to come over here for you are just as well of over there as you would be here. So if you ever want a divorce let me know and I will sign any kind of papers that you need me to to help you get it or if you want me to I will get it over here if you will sign the papers. I dont care if I ever get a divorce or not, cause I dont ever expect to get married any more. You are better of with your mother and father for they are old and need you there and my father and mother need me as he isnt able to work anymore . . . So if you want to get lose from me just let me know and I will do all I can to help you."

According to the wife's affidavit she from time to time pressed her husband to allow her to go over to America and to join him there or asked him to come to this country and join her here, but he did neither. The last letter she received was a typewritten letter from 405, Fletcher Street, Sikeston, dated Feb. 26, 1947. It is not in his handwriting and cannot be certainly identified as his, but its contents seem to me to indicate clearly that the letter was typed by him or by someone at his dictation. It says (sic):

"I guess that you think that I am pretty low down and I dont blame you for I didnt do a thing that I promised I would. I dont know what made me do like I have, I guess that I just went wild when I got home so if you want to get a divorce you can put in for it and send me the papers and I will sign them and send them back to you and you let me know how mutch it cost and I will send you the money."

Here, then, is a very definite request to her to send him the papers for a divorce which he says he will sign and send back to her. After that letter she received no further communication from him.

On Mar. 15, 1949, the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. Although the husband was domiciled in America she was entitled to proceed in this country by virtue of s. 1 of the Matrimonial Causes (War Marriages) Act, 1944. Having filed the petition the next difficulty in her way was to get it served. The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, deal very clearly with the method of service of such a petition. Rule 10 says:

"Unless otherwise directed, and save where the provisions of r. 8 (4) have been complied with, a petition shall not proceed to trial or hearing unless the respondent . . . (a) has entered an appearance; or (b) is shown by affidavit in accordance with Form 11 (which shall be filed) to have been served with the petition personally or in accordance with an order for substituted service; or (c) has returned to the solicitor for the petitioner, or to the petitioner if he is acting in person, an acknowledgment of service in accordance with Form 4 . . ."

The husband has not done any of the things indicated in paras. (a), (b) and (c), and, therefore, unless directions are given, this petition cannot proceed to trial.

The question is whether those directions ought to be given in this case. The mode of service of the petition is dealt with by r. 8, which says:

“(1) Unless otherwise directed (a) a copy of every petition shall be served personally or by registered post upon every respondent . . . (2) For the purposes of the foregoing paragraph of this rule a document shall be deemed to have been duly served by registered post if the document is sent by prepaid registered post to the party to” be served, and an acknowledgment of service in accordance with Form 4 of his identity and of his receipt of the document is signed by him and returned to the solicitor for the petitioner, or to the petitioner . . . (3) An application for leave to substitute for the modes of service prescribed by the foregoing paragraphs of this rule some other mode of service, or to substitute for service notice of the proceedings by advertisement or otherwise, shall be made ex parte by lodging with the registrar an affidavit . . .”

The vital question before WILLMER, J., was whether in this case he should give directions for leave to substitute for such service as is prescribed by r. 8, paras. (1) and (2), notice of the proceedings by advertisement in some newspaper.

Although the husband has not signed an acknowledgment of service in this case very careful steps have been taken to get the petition served on him by registered post. On Mar. 19, 1949, the solicitors acting for the wife, who is proceeding here as a poor person, wrote to the husband (addressed to him at 405, Fletcher Street, Sikeston) a registered letter in which they said:

“We have been instructed by your wife, Mrs. Margaret Elizabeth Heath, and we enclose herewith copy of a petition for dissolution of marriage which she has presented to the High Court of Justice. We also enclose memorandum of appearance (in duplicate) and notice to appear. We further enclose a form of acknowledgment of service, and shall be glad if you will please sign the same where we have written your initials in pencil, insert the date below your signature, and then return the acknowledgment to us at your earliest possible convenience.”

This letter was despatched by air mail. The petition, in addition to asking for a decree on the ground of desertion, asked that the husband should be condemned in the costs of the proceedings. It may well be that the husband noticed the claim for costs and decided that he was not going to sign any acknowledgment of service, and, therefore, he did not return it to the wife’s solicitors as requested. One wonders what has happened to the communication and whether it has not been received by the husband. The solicitors wrote again to the husband on May 7, 1949, at the same address, but received no reply. The solicitors then took the matter up with a firm of lawyers, Blanton & Blanton, carrying on business at Sikeston, Missouri. They sent to Blanton & Blanton copies of the letters which they had written to the husband and asked them to do their best to help them to get the husband to sign the acknowledgment of service of the petition. Blanton & Blanton tried hard to get the husband to their office. They wrote to the wife’s solicitors on Sept. 3, 1949:

“We have not overlooked your air mail letter of July 29, 1949. We, however, have been diligently endeavouring to get the defendant into our office to talk to him about this case.”

They wrote again on Oct. 3, 1949:

“In reply to your air mail letter of Sept. 30 we regret exceedingly that our repeated efforts to get Mr. Heath into our office to get him to execute the waiver of service has been unsuccessful. We will make one more effort, and if still unsuccessful, will return to you the papers as you suggested.”

Finally they wrote on Oct. 21, 1949:

“I have again called at 405, Fletcher Street, Sikeston, but the parties who now live there state that Mr. Heath has not resided at that place for many months, that they do not know his present whereabouts, that the mail we have been sending him had been left at the post office, which has apparently been forwarding my letters to Mr. Heath. However my last communication to Mr. Heath dated Oct. 3 has been returned to me by the post office marked 'unclaimed'. The envelope indicates that the mail carrier has tried two or three addresses without success."

That letter shows that Messrs. Blanton & Blanton had been writing to the husband at 405, Fletcher Street letters which had not been returned to them but had been received by the husband either at the post office or had been forwarded by the post office to him. It was only their last letter of Oct. 3 to the husband which failed to find him. I think that those facts establish beyond any reasonable doubt that this petition, which was sent in March, 1949, to the husband by registered post and has never been returned to the sender, was, in fact, received by him. That being so, what ought to be done?

There has been no proper service because, under r. 8, the husband must sign an acknowledgment of service, but is it a case where under r. 10 the judge should direct that the petition shall proceed on the grounds that he is satisfied that the petition has in fact been received? The only suggestion now made is that an advertisement should be put in the local Sikeston paper which would cost about £7. I ask myself what use would that be? Is it more likely that the husband will see the advertisement than that he received the registered letter sent to him at the address where he had been living? I see no reason to suppose that that would be more likely. I think that it would impose a great hardship on the wife to insist on advertisement in this case. In divorce causes it is highly important that a respondent should be fully informed of the proceedings which are being taken against him, but there is another point of view and that is the point of view of the petitioner. Here is a woman who has had a baby by this man three months after the marriage, has been deserted by him, and has had no maintenance from him for four years. She has done everything she can through the Poor Persons' Committee to get him served with the petition. He does not answer letters. Apparently he wants to be divorced, and yet it is suggested that this further expense ought to be incurred before the case can proceed. I am far from saying that advertisements are not useful in notifying parties in such a case as this. Where costs are being asked for the fact that the respondent does not reply to the advertisement is no evidence that he has not seen it. I think that everything that could reasonably be done here has been done to effect service.

One other point about which I ought to say a word is this. This is an appeal from an order which is based on the judge's discretion. If I thought that this was merely a matter of discretion I would be very reluctant to interfere with the decision of the judge. WILLMER, J., gave leave to appeal, and I, therefore, assume that he considered that the case raised some point of principle apart from the special facts of the case. It is difficult, however, to lay down any principle in a case of this kind, except the principles I have tried to indicate. One is that all reasonable steps should be taken to see that a respondent has knowledge of the proceedings, and the other is that an unreasonable burden should not be put on an innocent petitioner before she can be released from a marriage which is no marriage now except in its legal aspects, and from a man who has deserted her and her child in the way that this man has left this woman. I think, therefore, that this is a case in which we may properly allow the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: It is very important that everything that is reasonable should be done to bring a petition to the notice of a respondent. At one time there had to be personal service. Now service by registered post is permitted, but it is only effective if the acknowledgment of service is signed by the respondent. Often the respondent does not sign or return the acknowledgment, but, when that happens, it does not necessarily mean that the wife has to go to the expense of personal service or advertisement. If the probabilities are that the respondent has received the petition and simply declined or omitted to sign the acknowledgment, then the court can dispense with further service. That is a course which I have repeatedly taken when sitting in chambers in the Divorce Division. On the facts of the present case I should unhesitatingly have dispensed with further service.

A The only remaining question is whether this court should interfere with what is primarily a matter for the discretion of the judge. On this topic I would refer to what LORD WRIGHT said in Evans v. Bartlam (1). If this court is satisfied that the judge below was wrong then it can interfere. LORD WRIGHT said ([1937] 2 All E.R. 654):

B "The court must, if necessary, examine anew the relevant facts and circumstances, in order to exercise by way of review a discretion which may reverse or vary the order. Otherwise, in interlocutory matters, the judge might be regarded as independent of supervision."

In this case the judge had considerable doubt because he gave leave to appeal. I am clearly satisfied that he was wrong and that the appeal should be allowed.

C HODSON, J.: In form this was a summons by the petitioner for leave to proceed without service of the petition on the respondent, and, in form also, WILLMER, J., made an order that the petitioner's application for leave to proceed in that way was refused. In her affidavit in support of the summons the petitioner made it plain what she was really seeking to do, namely, to obtain an order to proceed without further service of the petition. It is necessary to consider the effect of the relevant rules, rr. 8 and 10 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947. [His LORDSHIP read the rules and continued]: Rule 8 (2) really deals with the proof of what has been done, but what has to be done still remains the same thing, namely, the copy of the petition has either to be served personally or by registered post. Rule 10, which deals specifically with proof of service, as the side note indicates, begins with the words "Unless otherwise directed." D Those words confer a discretion on the court to direct that, even though the particular formalities indicated in r. 10 have not been complied with, yet the court can draw the proper inference, namely, that in a given set of circumstances the petition has actually been served. In my judgment, the right inference to draw from the facts in this case is that this petition was brought to the attention of the respondent by being sent to him by registered post in the manner which the rules provide. For my part, I think WILLMER, J., did not attach the right weight to the fact that the document had been sent and that the correspondence which followed between the attorneys in America and the solicitors in England supported the inference that it had reached the respondent. If he did not, in our opinion, lend sufficient weight to that consideration, this court is justified in interfering with the exercise of his discretion under r. 10. I agree the appeal should be allowed.

Re DEAN'S WILL TRUSTS. COWAN v. BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL, PADDINGTON AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), March 28, 1950.]

Charity—Charitable purpose—Gift to a hospital to provide "accommodation for the use of relatives who come from a distance of patients who are critically ill." A

By his will, dated June 19, 1947, a testator, who died on Apr. 8, 1948, gave his residuary estate to the treasurer of St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, London, "for the purposes of that hospital and I direct that the same shall be applied by the governing body or management committee of the hospital for the purpose of providing accommodation for the use of relatives who come from a distance of patients who are critically ill and for the assistance of the work of the almoners of the hospital and any money not so applied shall be administered as a capital fund separate from the general funds of the hospital." It was accepted that the assistance of the work of the almoners was a charitable purpose, and that the purposes of the hospital generally were charitable. B

Held: the provision of accommodation for relatives of patients critically ill was a purpose of the hospital, and, therefore, was charitable. C

[AS TO CHARITABLE PURPOSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 4, pp. 111-115, paras. 147-152; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, p. 145, Nos. 40-49.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of the will of Dugald Smith Deans, the bequest of the testator's residuary estate constituted a valid charitable gift or whether it failed either wholly or in part for uncertainty or as transgressing the rule against perpetuities. D

The second question raised by the summons was whether, if the bequest were valid, the plaintiff ought to pay and transfer the said residuary estate to the Board of Governors of St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, on any, and, if so, what, trusts. HARMAN, J., held that, in view of the decision in Re Kellner's Will Trusts ([1949] 2 All E.R. 774) and having regard to the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 60, the residuary estate was payable (with the consent of counsel for the governors of the chartered corporation of the hospital) to the said board, to be held by them so far as practicable on the trusts declared by the will. Neville Gray, K.C., and Rink for the next-of-kin.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General. G

HARMAN, J.: This is a question arising out of the will, dated June 19, 1947, of one Dugald Smith Deans, who died on Apr. 8, 1948, leaving a considerable residue to the treasurer of St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington. That was before the appointed day (July 5, 1948) under the National Health Service Act, 1946, and the body controlling the hospital at that time was a corporation set up in the nineteen-twenties under a charter, a print of which is before me. I am not concerned at this stage with the Act of 1946. The instant question is whether the residue is validly devoted to charitable ends. It is said that it is not, because some of the purposes on which the money is to be spent are not, or may not be, charitable in the legal sense. It is said that it is enough to render the bequest bad if some part of it may not be devoted to charitable purposes, and that what I must find, if I am to hold that the gift is charitable, is that it is devoted wholly to charity. That, I think, is right. H

The testator makes the bequest in favour of "the treasurer of St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington," and that I take to be a gift direct to the hospital, i.e., to the corporation which then controlled the hospital. He goes on, "for the purposes of that hospital." If you stop there, there would not be any doubt that that is a good charitable bequest, but the testator continues:

A "and I direct that the same [the residue] shall be applied by the governing body or management committee of the hospital for the purpose of providing accommodation for the use of relatives who come from a distance of patients who are critically ill and for the assistance of the work of the almoners of the hospital."

B Those two purposes are to cover the whole of the money. It is mandatory that they should do so. It is clear that the gift is not limited to the spending of the income, and no question of perpetuity is involved in this case. It occurs to the testator then that that may not exhaust the whole of his fund. He continues:

"and any money not so applied shall be administered as a capital fund separate from the general funds of the hospital."

C At the date of the will (June 19, 1947) the Act of 1946 was on the statute book, having received the royal assent on Nov. 6, 1946, although it had not come into force, and one can have no doubt that in using the words he did the testator was trying to provide for that which he thought might come about under the new Act. He goes on:

D "And as from the appointed day under the National Health Service Act it shall be applicable by the hospital management committee for the special purposes above-mentioned [the two purposes recited] and any money not so applied shall be applicable for any purpose other than the general maintenance of the hospital at the committee's discretion."

E The hospital management committee is a body set up in the case of a non-teaching hospital, and was not set up in the case of this hospital because it was designated a teaching hospital. Of the two purposes specifically mentioned, it is admitted that one of them is charitable, namely, the work of the almoners. The controversy has been confined to the other purpose.

F In my judgment, none of the cases to which I have had my attention called has application to this one, which is a simple case where the language of the will, rightly interpreted, does not really lead me into any difficulty. As I see it, the testator has given his residue "for the purposes of" the hospital, but not for all those purposes, i.e., not for the purpose of general maintenance, but primarily for two other purposes which, in his view at any rate, are purposes of the hospital, one of them being the almoners' work (which nobody doubts to be a purpose of the hospital), and the other the provision of accommodation for relatives. If and so far as that is a purpose of the hospital, then, in my judgment, there is no difficulty because the purposes of the hospital generally are admittedly charitable purposes. If one of the purposes was not a "purpose" of the hospital properly so called, difficulty might arise, but I find no difficulty in saying that the provision of such accommodation may be a very important purpose of a hospital of this kind for the spiritual and psychological comfort of its patients, and, indeed, to aid their recovery. It may be absolutely necessary

H to house their relations near them when they are in extremis. It may make all the difference between life and death to a patient to know that his mother, his child, or his nearest relative, is at hand. Even though he or she may never see the relative in question, it may be vital to have that support. I am not at all surprised that Colonel Parkes, the house governor of the hospital, making an affidavit in support of the summons, says that accommodation for relatives has frequently been provided by the almoner, and, indeed, that the provision of such accommodation is one of the functions of the almoner of this hospital and would be regarded as a normal service. That I accept. In my judgment, therefore, the special purposes indicated by the testator are purposes of the hospital and are good charitable purposes, and this gift is a good and valid charitable gift, and I so declare.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the corpus of the estate.

WHITTY AND OTHERS v. SCOTT-RUSSELL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), March 15, 16, 17, April 3, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—"Dwelling-house"—Premises comprising house and cottage, contiguous but without internal communication—Covenant by tenant, in original tenancy agreement, to use "the premises as a private dwelling-house only"—Cottage sub-let by tenant—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 16 (1)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1), s. 3 (3).

By a written agreement, dated June 26, 1937, premises comprising a "dwelling-house and cottage with the garden and land thereto belonging" were let (for the first time in that conformation) at a rent of £75 a year for a term of three years. The house and cottage were contiguous, but without internal communication, and the garden was considerably larger than the site of the premises. The tenant covenanted "to use the premises as . . . a private dwelling-house only," and throughout the agreement the words "the premises," which were used frequently, referred to both the house and the cottage. The tenant took the cottage with the house because the landlord refused to let them separately, but he had no intention of living in the cottage and sub-let it immediately. On the expiration of the three years, he held over as a yearly tenant. In December, 1948, he received a notice to quit, but he failed to deliver up possession on the expiration of the notice and claimed to be within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

HELD: (i) as the house and cottage together constituted "the premises" under the original tenancy agreement and the agreement provided for the user of "the premises as a private dwelling-house only," the house and cottage together were "let as a separate dwelling" and, therefore, were one "dwelling-house," within the definition in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16 (1), notwithstanding that the cottage was sub-let at all material times.

Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich ([1949] 1 All E.R. 402). and H Wolfe v. Hogan ([1949] 1 All E.R. 570), applied.

(ii) for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (3), the "dwelling-house" was the complex constituted by the house plus the cottage, and was let together with land which, under the sub-section, was to be treated as part of the dwelling-house, and, therefore, s. 3 (1) of the Act applied, and the house and cottage together were a dwelling-house within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Tunbridge Wells County Court, and dated Dec. 15, 1949, in an action for possession of premises. The premises, which comprised a house and cottage and the garden and lands belonging thereto were let to the tenant by a written tenancy agreement, dated June 26, 1937, for three years at a rent of £75 a year, the tenant covenanting to use the premises as a private dwelling-house only. On the expiration of the three years, the tenant held over as a yearly tenant. The landlords served a notice to quit expiring on June 24, 1949, but the tenant failed to deliver up possession and contended that he was within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The county court judge held that the house and cottage together were one dwelling-house, within the meaning of the Acts, and that the tenant was protected by the Acts. The facts appear in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by ASQUITH, L.J.

- G Apr. 3. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the landlords from the refusal of the county court judge for Tunbridge Wells to grant them an order for possession of certain premises on the ground that such premises were protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The premises in question consisted of a dwelling-house and cottage and garden, known as Tower House and Cottage, Wadhurst, Sussex. The case proceeded on certain facts admitted in a specific document, but the facts alleged in the particulars of claim, which are somewhat more ample, were also common ground. These facts were that the premises in question only assumed their present conformation in 1937. The house and cottage were semi-detached, namely, contiguous but without internal intercommunication, and the garden covered considerably more than the site of the house. This complex of premises was let by Sir John Whitty, predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, the present landlords, to the tenant by a written agreement of June 26, 1937, for a term of three years at a rent of £75 a year payable quarterly. The tenant held over on the expiration of the three years as a yearly tenant. Sir John Whitty died on May 8, 1948, and his executors determined the tenancy by notice to quit, dated Dec. 22, 1948, and expiring on June 24, 1949. The plaintiffs became joint owners of the property by a vesting assent of Apr. 11, 1949. The tenant failed to deliver up possession on the expiration of notice to quit and still retains possession, the county court judge having held that he was entitled to do so under the Rent Restrictions Acts. A
- H

The terms of the agreement of tenancy of June 26, 1937, so far as relevant, further provide that the parcels are the "messuage or dwelling-house and cottage with the garden and land thereto belonging . . . described in the plan attached hereto." The tenant covenants variously in regard to "the premises." He covenants to repair the premises (except the roof and outer walls) and (this is important) "to use the premises as and for a private dwelling-house only"; also not to assign or under-let the premises without written consent of the landlord, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. The landlord covenants "to keep the outer walls and roofs of the said dwelling-house and cottage in good repair and condition," and there is a covenant for the quiet enjoyment of "the premises." Throughout this instrument "the premises"—a phrase constantly recurring—means an amalgam or conglomerate which includes either all three components—dwelling-house, cottage and garden—or at least the house and cottage, as in the case of the covenants to repair and to use as a private dwelling-house only. B C

The county court judge, His Honour SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., in a very short judgment on the agreed facts, says: D

"I held the defendant was a protected tenant of the premises comprised in the tenancy agreement, although the cottage had been sub-let by him from the start . . . I accepted the defendant's contention that the house and cottage were one dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The case seemed to me governed by the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich (1). An additional ground of defence is afforded by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (3): see Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2)." E

At the trial the onus was on the tenant to establish that the Rent Restrictions Acts protected him. This involved proving two things: (i) that the complex let to him was a "dwelling-house" within the relevant statutory definition, and, further, (ii) that it was a "dwelling-house to which the [Rent Restrictions] Acts apply." The county court judge evidently held that the tenant had established both propositions, as he had to do in order to succeed. The landlord alleges that neither has been established. F

We will examine each of these propositions in turn. First, was the "complex" let a "dwelling-house"? The material definition of a "dwelling-house" for the present purpose is that contained in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16 (1). This definition is expressed to mean the same as the corresponding definition in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, though the language of the Act of 1933 is slightly different, and runs as follows: G

" . . . a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let." H

In the present case, is what is let "a house" or two houses, and is it let as a "separate dwelling" or as two separate dwellings? Or is only part of it let as a separate dwelling? The main authority relied on by the tenant on this issue is Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich (1). That was a case in which two flats, not contiguous but forming part of the same block of flats under a single roof, were held to be a "dwelling-house" within the definition. SOMERVELL, L.J., in a judgment with which the other two members of the court concurred, said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 404):

“In my opinion, if the facts justify such a finding, two flats or, indeed, so far as I can see, two houses, could be let as a separate dwelling-house within the meaning of the definition.”

A The learned lord justice, if he had wished to adhere precisely to the terms of the definition, would have said “two houses” could be “a house let as a separate dwelling,” and, therefore, a “dwelling-house.” He appears to base this conclusion partly on the terms of the lease, under which the subject-matter let is expressed to be two flats; partly on the Interpretation Act, 1889, whereby the singular prima facie includes the plural, hence “house” in the definition includes houses; but partly also (in relation to the part of the definition which reads “let as a separate dwelling”) on the fact that the tenant in that case wanted the two flats as a home for his family or its overflow, which one flat would have been unable to accommodate. If the Interpretation Act, 1889, alone were concerned, this reasoning would be open to the comment that, if the inclusion of the plural in the singular permitted one to read “house” as including houses, it would equally permit (or perhaps require) one to read “let as a separate dwelling” as including “let as two separate dwellings.” An impartial application of the Interpretation Act might lead to odd results.

C It is unnecessary, however, to speculate on this, since we are bound by the decision in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich (1), of which this was part of the ratio decidendi. It enables us to read “house” as covering two houses. But is this (composite) “house” in the present case “let as a separate dwelling”? D In the Goldrich case (1) the tenant’s purpose in taking two flats was that his family should occupy both, as, in fact, they did. SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 404):

E “Here the tenant wished to accommodate in his home the relatives to whom I have referred and he wanted more accommodation than could be conveniently found in one flat. He, therefore, took the two flats and made those two flats his home.”

It would seem that the circumstance that the tenant intended to make the two flats—the totality of the parcels let—his home was thought material, and, indeed, necessary, by SOMERVELL, L.J., to his decision that the flats were let “as a separate dwelling.” If the flats had been let to the tenant, one to be dwelt in F by him and his family, the other not to be so dwelt in, the decision might, it appears, have been different. In the present case the tenant only took the cottage along with the house because the landlord refused to let the one without the other. He never lived in, and never from the start intended to live in, the cottage. It is, however, argued in answer to this objection that the Court of Appeal, in certain of its decisions of which the most recent is Wolfe v. Hogan (3), has held G that, where there has been a formal instrument of letting the terms of which express the purpose for which the premises were let, this is conclusive, and evidence of any other purpose derived from, e.g., the actual use, is excluded. In that case DENNING, L.J., used language which lends strong colour to such a contention when he said, in the opening sentences of his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 575):

H “In determining whether a house or part of a house is ‘let as a dwelling’ within the meaning of the Rent Acts, it is necessary to look at the purpose of the letting. If the lease contains an express provision as to the purpose of the letting, it is not necessary to look further, but, if there is no express provision, it is open to the court to look at the circumstances of the letting.”

In that case there was no express provision in the lease as to the “purpose.” In the present case the tenant expressly covenanted to use the premises as “a private dwelling-house only," and, if the proposition stated by DENNING, L.J., is to be taken as both authoritative and unqualified, it clinches the tenant's argument. EVERSLED, L.J., in the first judgment, appears to accept this view, though whether with some, and, if so, what, qualifications is a question which must be explored. BUCKNILL, L.J., gave no reasons but simply agreed with the judgment of EVERSLED, L.J. EVERSLED, L.J., cited Gidden v. Mills (4) and, among other passages from judgments of the Court of Appeal he cited ([1949] 1 All E.R. 574) a passage from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1925] 2 K.B. 227) in Barrett v. Hardy Brothers (Alnwick), Ltd. (5):

" 'The important matter is the rights under the lease, not the de facto user '."

EVERSLED, L.J., also cited (ibid.) a passage from the judgment of BANKES, L.J. ([1919] W.N. 171) in Epsom Grand Stand Assocn., Ltd. v. Clarke (6):

" 'If an agreement were to let premises as a barn, the tenant, even though he lived there, could not be heard to say that they were let as a dwelling-house '."

He then went on to approve a passage from MEGARRY ON THE RENT ACTS, 4th ed., p. 19:

"Where the terms of the tenancy provide for or contemplate the use of the premises for some particular purpose, that purpose is the essential factor, not the nature of the premises or the actual use made of them. Thus, if the premises are let for business purposes, the tenant cannot claim that they have been converted into a dwelling-house merely because somebody lives on the premises . . ."

MR. MEGARRY goes on to say that actual user at the time when possession is claimed must be considered where the tenancy agreement contemplates no specified use. The only qualification annexed to this general statement by EVERSLED, L.J., is contained in the following passage from his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 574):

"Again I wish to make it quite plain that I am saying nothing which should be taken as indicating that, if a tenant does change the user and creates a dwelling-house out of what was formerly a shop, and if that fact is fully known to and accepted by the other party to the contract (whether or not there is a prohibition), the result may not very well be that there will then be inferred a contract to let as a dwelling-house, although it may be a different contract in essentials from the contract which was originally made and expressed."

In other words, where the original contract was for a particular user, but, by the time the plaint is issued, it has been superseded by a subsequent contract providing for a different user, the subsequent contract may be looked to in deciding whether the premises are let as a "dwelling" or "separate dwelling." This qualification (which was obiter in Hogan's case (3)) does not apply to the facts of the present case, in which there have not been two successive contracts providing for different users, and the principle is asserted without any such qualification in earlier decisions of the Court of Appeal. In these circumstances, we are of opinion that the "complex" let in this case was a "dwelling-house" within the definition, and we are fortified in that opinion by the concession, in argument, that if X took a tenancy of a house consisting of, say, three floors and sub-let one floor at once and permanently, the fact of the sub-lease would not deprive the subject-matter of the head lease of its character as a dwelling-house, provided that in other respects it possessed that character. It cannot, in our view, make a crucial difference that, in the case supposed, the part sub-let and the part not sub-let possess internal intercommunication through the common stair, whereas in this case the two units, one of which is sub-let, are two houses clamped together and without such internal intercommunication. Indeed, the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., in the Goldrich case (1) appears to decide that two houses, even if wholly detached, can be "a house" within the definition; and Barrett v. Hardy (5), Epsom Grand Stand Assocn. v. Clarke (6) and, as we read it, Wolfe v. Hogan (3) decide that "a house" expressed in the contract of tenancy to be let "as a private dwelling-house" is none the less a house "let as a dwelling" and a "separate dwelling" although one of its components was sub-let from the start. We would only add to the authorities cited one more quotation from MEGARRY ON THE RENT ACTS, 5th ed., pp. 35, 36:

"Meaning of 'dwelling' . . . It seems to be immaterial whether the person who dwells on the premises is the tenant or his sub-tenants . . ."

The tenant, however, loses the protection of the Acts if he sub-lets the whole of the premises and moves out. For these reasons, we conclude that the subject-matter of the head lease in this case was a "dwelling-house" within the definition in s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933.

The second question is whether that subject-matter was not only a "dwelling-house," but a dwelling-house "to which the [Rent Restrictions] Acts apply"? It is common ground that, if the Acts apply at all, they can only do so by virtue of the Act of 1939. Section 3 (1) of that Act applies the Acts to this "dwelling-house" "subject to the provisions of this section." The provisions of the section are, so far as material, those contained in the latter part of sub-s. (3), which is as follows:

" . . . and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1938, as amended by virtue of this section, any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house; but, save as aforesaid, the principal Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply to any dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house."

It has been strenuously argued for the landlords that this sub-section excludes the dwelling-house here in question from the operation of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The argument is based on the grounds: (i) that, this being a dwelling-house let together with land other than its site, the concluding words of the sub-section so exclude it unless the conditions in the preceding limb of the sub-section are satisfied ("save as aforesaid"), and (ii) that these conditions are not satisfied, since, although the cottage is let together with the house, the cottage is not "premises let together with a dwelling-house," because "premises" must here be read as premises which are themselves not a dwelling-house or capable of being a dwelling-house. The argument relies, as regards the last link, on a passage (admittedly an obiter dictum) from the judgment of COHEN, L.J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 427) in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2) and on Read v. Goater (7), a decision on the wording of s. 12 (2) (iii) of the Act of 1920, which was in this respect somewhat similar to the latter part of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. This argument, which impressed us at the time, seems on reflexion to rest on a misconception as to what, on the facts of this case, is the "dwelling-house" to which s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 has to be applied. This is not the house without the cottage, but the two combined. This composite dwelling-house is, prima facie, one to which s. 3 (1) applies the Acts, subject to the provisions of the section, viz., s. 3 (3). Section 3 (3) does nothing to displace the application of the Acts if the word "dwelling-house," when it occurs in the sub-section, is read as the complex constituted by house plus cottage. If it be so read, this is a case where "land" (not premises) is "let together with a dwelling-house," and the sub-section provides that in that event the land (though considerably exceeding the area of the site) is to be treated as part of the dwelling-house and shares any immunity conferred on the latter by s. 3 (1). The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed.

KIRIL MISCHEFF, LTD. v. CONSTANT, SMITH & CO.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), March 15, 16, 1950.]

Arbitration—Award—Remission—Error of law on face of award—Remission to arbitrators to cure apparent defect—Admission of evidence on question whether award should be remitted.

A contract for the sale of goods provided: "Any dispute under this contract to be settled by arbitration in London. No claims entertained after goods taken from warehouse." On Dec. 5, 1949, the goods were landed at the port of London, and on Jan. 6, 1950, when some of them had still not been removed from the wharf, the buyers made a claim against the sellers in respect of the quality of the goods. The claim was disputed, and the arbitrators to whom it was referred stated in their award that "We have met and examined the facts, and, in our opinion, we consider the claim on quality was not made within a reasonable time from the final date of landing, and, thereby, we conclude that the buyers have no case." On a motion to set aside the award on the ground that it contained an error of law on the face of it, the sellers sought to refer to an affidavit and to correspondence between the parties leading up to the reference showing the existence of a common usage in the trade under which claims could not be made more than fourteen days after landing. It was not seriously disputed that there was an error of law on the face of the award.

HELD: (i) while the affidavit and correspondence could not be looked at to extract something therefrom to be read into the award as a term of it, it was proper to look at those documents to determine whether the court ought to exercise its discretion to send the case back to the arbitrators to clarify their award.

(ii) there was no reason why the award should not be remitted to enable the arbitrators to cure an apparent defect in the ground stated by them for their decision; it was suggested in the correspondence that one of the matters on which the arbitrators were asked to adjudicate was the existence of a custom as to time consistent with the contract, and it was possible that their conclusion was reached on the ground that there was such a custom; therefore, the arbitrators ought to make a specific award stating whether they found such a custom, and the matter would be remitted for that purpose.

MOTION by buyers to set aside an award on the ground that it contained an error of law on the face of it.

By a contract in writing dated Oct. 26, 1949, the buyers purchased from the sellers twenty tons of Turkish walnuts. A term of the contract provided:

A "Any dispute under this contract to be settled by arbitration in London.
No claims after goods taken from warehouse."

The cargo was landed at the Port of London on Dec. 9, 1949. On Jan. 6, 1950, the buyers wrote to the sellers:

B "On cracking representative samples sent us from the wharf we have found approximately forty per cent. bad nuts, and, therefore, claim that the delivery is not as per contract."

On Jan. 9, 1950, the sellers replied:

C "We cannot accept any claim against these goods at such a late date.
The final landing date of the s.s. Basis was Dec. 5, 1949, and in accordance with common usage of the trade, claims must be made within the ample time of fourteen days from the official date of landing."

On Jan. 10, 1950, the buyers answered:

"Our contract with you clearly stipulated 'no claim entertained after goods taken from warehouse' and as you know the total parcel has not been removed from the wharf where originally landed."

D The dispute was referred to arbitrators who, on Jan. 16, 1950, made an award in the following terms:

"We have met and examined the facts, and, in our opinion, we consider the claim on quality was not made within a reasonable time from the final date of landing, and, thereby, we conclude that the buyers have no case."

E On Feb. 20, 1950, when the motion was set down to be heard, the sellers were given liberty to file an affidavit, which was sworn on Mar. 8, 1950, by a Mr.
Albert Henry Smith. It contained the following statement: "It is a custom in the city of London and of the edible nut trade that it is a condition precedent for the making of any claims in respect of goods purchased on f.o.b. cost and freight or c.i.f. terms that the same should be made within a reasonable time of landing, and it is a further custom that a reasonable time as aforesaid is in no instance to be longer than fourteen days from the final date of landing of the goods."

F The buyers contended that the award contained an error of law on the face of it in that the finding that the claim was not made within a reasonable time on which the award was based was incompatible with the express term of the contract that no claim would be entertained "after goods taken from warehouse," and, therefore, that the award must be set aside. The sellers submitted that, as there was an ambiguity in the award, the court could look at the affidavit and at the correspondence to resolve it.

G E. W. Roskill and Michael Lee for the buyers.
Ahern for the sellers.

H DEVLIN, J.: This is a motion to set aside an award on the ground that there is an error of law on the face of it. The award was made on Jan. 16, 1950, by two arbitrators appointed by the parties (who were apparently so far agreed that they did not require the assistance of an umpire) and began in the following terms:

"We, the undersigned, having been called in to act as arbitrators in a dispute that has arisen on a contract between Messrs. Constant, Smith & Co. (sellers), and Messrs. Kiril Mischeff, Ltd. (buyers), in respect of contract dated Oct. 26, 1949, for twenty tons Turkish natural walnuts, in fifty kilo bags . . .”

Two further provisions of the contract were summarised, and then the award provides:

“We have met and examined the facts, and, in our opinion, we consider the claim on quality was not made within a reasonable time from the final date of landing and, thereby, we conclude that the buyers have no case.”

It has not been contested that I am entitled to have regard to the contract, and that the contract contained the following terms:

“Any dispute under this contract to be settled by arbitration in London. No claims entertained after goods taken from warehouse.”

Counsel for the buyers contends that on the face of it this award contains a legal proposition, namely, that the buyer had no case in law because the claim was not made within a reasonable time from the date of landing, and he further contends that the reason the arbitrators give—that the claim was out of time—is the only reason by which they seek to justify their conclusion. That that reason, he says, is plainly unsound in law appears as soon as one looks at the contract, because the contract provides only that no claim shall be entertained once the goods have been taken from the warehouse. The fact that there is an error of law on the face of this document is not seriously challenged, but counsel for the sellers argues that, in considering whether the award contains an error of law, I am not limited to the award and the contract, but can look at certain other documents consisting of an affidavit and correspondence between the parties leading up to the reference. It is clear that such documents could not be looked at in order to impeach the award or to see if any erroneous conclusion of law was reached by the arbitrators, but the position may be different when documents are looked at in order to assist the award. The authorities do not seem to decide the point one way or the other. I have been referred to RUSSELL ON ARBITRATION, 14th ed., p. 187, where there is a reference to Re Marshall & Dresser (1), the only case that deals with the question of an affidavit. Counsel for the sellers also contended that, if I cannot look at the affidavit, I can look at the correspondence, on the ground that the letters contain the submission in the case. It is unnecessary for me to decide whether I can look at these documents to construe some provision in the award or resolve some ambiguity in it. It is clear that I cannot look at them to extract something from them and insert it as a term into the award. That is what counsel would like me to do, but I have no right to do it. Accordingly, I think that this motion succeeds to the extent that counsel for the buyers has satisfied me that the award is bad on the face of it.

I next have to consider what course I should take—whether to set the award aside or remit it to the arbitrators. There are numerous authorities in which awards have been sent back, and I have been referred to a number of them, but they are all cases in which the award itself has been ambiguous and uncertain, and where, by sending it back, the ambiguity can be cured. What is, I think, novel about this case is that there is nothing in the award itself which is uncertain. The conclusion is clear—the buyers have no case. But the arbitrators have done something which they were under no obligation to do. They have given a reason for their decision, and that reason is defective. The question is whether in these circumstances the award can properly be sent back to them. No authority has been cited to me directly on the point, and counsel for the buyers says that it would be unprecedented if it were remitted.

It seems to me that I ought to consider, first, what is the error of law which the arbitrators have made. One possible view is that the arbitrators have completely failed to understand a clear and simple contractual provision in the sort of document with which they spend the whole of their commercial lives.

Another possible view is that, in setting out their reason, they have omitted to put in some essential step in their reasoning. It is conceivable, for example, that the contract was varied and that the arbitrators omitted to state that fact. Or, again, it is possible that the parties had waived a provision of the contract and substituted "within a reasonable time" for "after goods taken from warehouse" and the arbitrators concentrated on the issue of what was reasonable and forgot to state the fact of waiver. I am unable to hold that, in those circumstances, should they exist, there is any rigid rule that, because there is an error of law on the face of an award, it should never go back. As a matter of general principle, if an award contains defective reasoning and the defect may be due, not to an error of law, but to an omission to set out some step in the arbitrators' reasoning, it would not be improper to send it back to cure that defect of reasoning. It is true that the arbitrators are not obliged to give any reason for their decision, but, if they have done so and it appears to be defective, I cannot see why they should not be given an opportunity of curing that defect. This is the view at which I have arrived after I have looked simply at the award itself.

I think that this view is consistent with the general principles that have been laid down in these matters. The Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 10, provides:

"(1) In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the re-consideration of the arbitrators or umpire. (2) Where an award is remitted, the arbitrators or umpire shall, unless the order otherwise directs, make their award within three months after the date of the order."

It is worth referring to Hodgkinson v. Fernie (2) where COCKBURN, C.J., after referring to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 8, which contains the provisions now embodied in the Act of 1889, said (3 C.B.N.S. 201):

"I am, however, clearly of opinion that it was not intended by that enactment to alter the general law as to the principles upon which the courts has been in the habit of acting in determining whether they would or would not set aside awards; but merely to give the court power to remit the matter to the arbitrator for re-consideration in all cases, though the submission should not contain that extremely useful clause giving them that power, where it turned out that there was a fatal defect in the award, but of such a nature as not to render it expedient to set aside the award, and thus render nugatory all the expense that had been incurred under the reference."

That, in all these matters, is the determining consideration with regard to the use of discretion by the court. The court should have in mind the fact that the parties have chosen this tribunal and the arbitrators, and, if it is avoidable, they are not to be put to the expense of starting de novo.

I should qualify the general statement that I have made, by saying that an award should go back only if that can be done with justice to the parties. This is a matter which requires a little consideration because of the rather unusual nature of the defect in this case. If the award were to be sent back for re-consideration generally, with complete liberty to amend, the arbitrators might simply strike out their reason, in which case the award could not be successfully attacked. The court cannot permit that to be done. The arbitrators having given a reason, I think that a party who desires to do so ought to be able to show the court, on the face of the award, what moved the arbitrators to reach their decision.

Although I have held that I am not entitled to look at the affidavit or correspondence to supplement the award, I think that I can and should do so to determine whether this is a proper case for the exercise of my discretion. Odlum v. Vancouver City (3) deals with this matter in a short passage which is worth quoting. LORD DUNEDIN, giving the opinion of the Privy Council, says (85 L.J.P.C. 98):

"There remains the question of whether it [the award] should be set aside or remitted for re-consideration. This seems to their Lordships a question of discretion for the judges in the whole circumstances of the case, and unless that discretion has been obviously misused they do not feel inclined to interfere with it."

I think, therefore, that I can properly look at these letters for this purpose, and it then becomes plain that two things were referred to the arbitrators. It is clear that the buyers made a complaint of quality, and equally clear that the answer to them appears to be that the claim was out of time. [His LORDSHIP read extracts from the letters of Jan. 6, 1950, from the buyers to the sellers, and the sellers' letter of Jan. 9, 1950, to the buyers.] It seems, therefore, clear that one of the matters which the arbitrators were asked to decide was whether there was a custom in those terms or not, and that suggests that they may have reached their conclusion on the ground that they found such a custom and that they consider such a custom consistent with the contract. In those circumstances I think it right, instead of sending the award back generally, to remit it to the arbitrators for further consideration of one of the matters which was referred to them, that matter being the question whether or not there was a custom in the terms contended for by the sellers.

I, therefore, make an order that this matter should be referred back to the arbitrators for further consideration, and that they should make a specific award, stating whether they find a custom, and, if so, what that custom is. When the arbitrators have done that, their finding can be added to the existing award, and it will then be possible for the court to give consideration to the motion to set aside. Clearly, even if the arbitrators do find such a custom, it is not necessarily the end of the matter. The question of law will then arise whether the custom is consistent with the contract, but it is desirable that this point should be argued on whatever custom the arbitrators find proved.

J. W. CAFÉS, LTD. v. BROWNLOW TRUST, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), March 21, 22, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Agreement to grant—Breach through defect of title—No lack of good faith—Measure of damages.

The head lessee of land built shops thereon and sub-let them to tenants, each of the sub-leases containing restrictive covenants on his part not to permit the trade which the tenant of the shop intended to carry on to be carried on in any of the other shops owned by the head lessee in the immediate neighbourhood. In 1947 the head lessee assigned the head lease to the defendants, and in 1948 they entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs to grant to them a sub-lease of one of the shops for a term of eighty-four years, the sub-lease to be in the form annexed to the agreement. The form contained one restrictive covenant only, viz., not to use the premises for the business of an estate agent, but previous leases of the shop which had been granted by the head lessee, in accordance with the scheme for the neighbourhood, contained a number of restrictive covenants, which ran with the land, in regard to the user of the premises. On a requisition of title whether there were any restrictive covenants affecting the land, the defendants answered that there were not. Later, on receiving advice from counsel that this answer was not correct, they informed the plaintiffs that they could not grant the sub-lease in the scheduled form as they could not give a proper title, and they refused to grant the sub-lease unless they were given an indemnity by the plaintiffs in respect of any violations of the restrictive covenants. The plaintiffs refused to give the indemnity and brought an action for damages for breach of contract.

HELD: the failure of the defendants to complete was due to a defect of title, and as damages for breach of the agreement the plaintiffs were entitled merely to the return of the deposit which they had paid, with interest thereon, and to the expenses incurred by them in investigating the title.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract to grant a lease.

The defendants, who had acquired the head lease of a shop, entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs to grant them a long lease thereof, the lease to be in the form annexed to the agreement. Only one restrictive covenant was inserted in the form, but previous leases of the property by the defendants' predecessor in title had contained several restrictive covenants, which ran with the land, regarding the user of the property. After taking counsel's advice, the defendants refused to execute the lease in the agreed form unless they were given an indemnity by the plaintiffs in respect of any violation of the restrictive covenants affecting the property. The plaintiffs refused to execute the indemnity and brought the action. It was contended by the plaintiffs that the defendants could make title, but had refused to do so. The facts appear in the judgment.

Beyfus, K.C., and Astell Burt for the plaintiffs.

Percy Lamb, K.C., and Denys Buckley for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In 1947 the defendants acquired from a Mr. H. Frost, the head leases of certain property in Holloway Road, London. In 1948 they entered into an agreement to grant to the plaintiffs a lease of No. 355 Holloway Road, which was part of that property. The agreement, which was executed on Oct. 15, 1948, provided that the defendants should grant "... and the lessees [the plaintiffs] accept the lease of the premises described in the form of lease annexed hereto at the premium for the term at the rent and subject to the covenants and provisions in the said form of lease set forth."

The agreement also recited that the plaintiffs had already paid to Messrs. Drivers & Norris, as a deposit, the sum of £519 15s., being part of the premium of £4,750. The form of lease which was annexed to the agreement was of a lease to be granted in consideration of this payment of £4,750, for a term of eighty-four and a half years at a rent of £65 a year, and it contained one restrictive covenant only, viz., not to use the premises or any part thereof for the business of an auctioneer, surveyor, valuer or estate agent, or for any kindred business. Before the time fixed for completion had arrived, the parties had agreed that this restrictive covenant was to be supplemented by the insertion of the words "or as a factory." Mr. Frost, the original lessee under the head leases, was the builder of the shops comprising the property contained in the head leases, and in leases which he had granted in respect of No. 355 Holloway Road certain restrictive covenants running with the land and affecting the user of the premises had been inserted. This was in accordance with the usual practice where shop property is let by a builder to different lessees. The lessor covenants in each case not to permit the trade which the lessee in question intends to carry on to be conducted in any of the other shops which the lessor owns in the immediate neighbourhood, thus enabling each lessee to enjoy a quasi-monopoly in his trade for the duration of his lease. The plaintiffs intended to carry on the business of a milk bar, which includes the sale of sandwiches and other refreshments. The business of a restaurant keeper was already being carried on at No. 359 Holloway Road, and was protected by restrictive covenants. The question whether permitting the plaintiffs to carry on the business of a milk bar would have been a breach of this restrictive covenant does not arise in this case, but it was certainly an arguable point and would have depended very much on the nature of the business ultimately carried on by the plaintiffs, had they gone into occupation. During the course of the negotiations, requisitions of title were made, one of them being whether there were any restrictive covenants affecting the land. The defendants answered that there were none, but afterwards they consulted counsel who advised them that that answer was not correct and that the existence of the restrictive covenants affecting the user of the land must be disclosed to a lessee, as, if he wished to assign the property later on, his market would be severely restricted, because he would not be able to assign it to anyone who wished to carry on a trade which was already being carried on in one of the neighbouring shops, the lessees of which had the right to enforce these covenants. After receiving counsel's advice, the defendants at once told the plaintiffs that they could not give a proper title and were unwilling to execute the lease in the form scheduled to the contract since, not only could the lessees of the premises in question be restrained from carrying on a business of the nature described in the covenants in the leases of the other shops, but the defendants themselves would be liable to an action for breach of covenant if they let the premises for a purpose which violated one of the covenants. Therefore, they refused to grant the lease unless they were given an indemnity by the plaintiffs. I think that that was an honest offer to make a new contract between the parties. The defendants had refused to carry out the contract which they had made, but they were willing to make a new contract if they were properly protected. The plaintiffs, however, were not willing to give the indemnity, and they have now brought this action for damages for breach of contract, the breach being the refusal of the defendants to execute the lease. The defendants admit the breach.

There is no question in this case of any deceit or lack of good faith, the action being solely for breach of contract and not for damages for deceit or fraud. The measure of damages for breach of contract in actions in respect of real property is in many material respects different from that in actions in respect of personal property, as the complications of the law of real property are so great that it is assumed that the parties are bargaining on the footing that it may be impossible for the proposed vendor—and for this purpose I see no difference between a proposed vendor and a proposed lessor—to implement his contract because of some defect in his title. In Bain v. Fothergill (1) LORD CHELMSFORD said (L.R. 7 H.L. 207):

“... I think the rule as to the limits within which damages may be recovered upon the breach of a contract for the sale of a real estate must be taken to be without exception. If a person enters into a contract for the sale of a real estate knowing that he has no title to it, nor any means of acquiring it, the purchaser cannot recover damages beyond the expenses he has incurred by an action for the breach of the contract; he can only obtain other damages by an action for deceit.”

That is putting the matter very high, because the noble and learned lord gives the instance of a person entering into a contract for sale of real estate, knowing that there was no title. Yet he says that the law is settled beyond dispute that in an action for the breach of the contract the only damages recoverable are the expenses incurred by the purchaser, viz., the return of the deposit, with interest, and the costs and expenses to which the purchaser has been put in investigating the title and so forth. If, however, there is evidence of bad faith on the part of the vendor, the purchaser can recover damages on that account, but in that case he must bring an action for fraud or deceit, which would probably lie in a case, such as LORD CHELMSFORD gave, of a vendor entering into a contract knowing that he had no title, even though he would not warrant that it would be a good one.

B

There is no suggestion in the present case that there was any mistake of law or misunderstanding which led the defendants to say that there were no restrictive covenants when, in fact, there were and induced them to enter into an open contract except for the inclusion of the restrictive covenant against user of the premises for the business of an estate agent. Counsel for the plaintiffs suggests that there is no question but that the defendants can make title. I cannot, however, agree to that. The statement of claim shows that the plaintiffs are complaining that a title could not be made, and that is one of the reasons why the action is brought. If a landowner, or the lessee under a head lease, enters into a contract to grant a lease in a particular form and it turns out that he cannot grant the lease in that form because of covenants restricting the user of the land which ought to have been inserted in the contract, it seems to me that he cannot give that which he has contracted to give because he has not the title or right to give it. In this case, owing to the existence of the covenants affecting the user of the land, the defendants had no right to grant the lease in the form agreed by them. There was, therefore, a defect of title, and the defendants did not complete because they could not give to the plaintiffs that which they had contracted to give.

E

The measure of damages in a case of this kind has been settled for two hundred years, the rule having been laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill (2), which is discussed at length in Bain v. Fothergill (1). The plaintiffs are entitled to the return of the deposit, to interest on the deposit, and to the expenses incurred by them in investigating the title. On the authorities, in my opinion, that is all that the law allows them. Re Daniel (3), which was among the authorities relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs, seems to me to deal with an entirely different matter. If the difficulty is one which can be removed by the payment of money, it is the vendor's duty to remove it, e.g., if the defect or blot on the title is caused by the existence of a mortgage which the vendor can pay off, it is his duty to pay it off, so that he then has a clear title which he can convey. In the present case, however, the defendants cannot remove the covenants by making a payment. The lessees of the neighbouring properties are in possession under leases, granted by the defendants' predecessor in title, which give them the protection of the restrictive covenants. These covenants run with the land and the only way to get rid of them, I suppose, would be for all the lessees to enter into an agreement to release them. This is not a matter which is a fraud on the title or which can be removed in the way in which the difficulty in Re Daniel (3) was removed. For these reasons, I am of opinion that Bain v. Fothergill (1) applies, and damages must be calculated in the way indicated.

G

HARLOW v. MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), March 7, 8, 1950.]

Town and Country Planning—Highway—Stopping up—Power of Minister of Transport to override statute giving inhabitants right to use highway—“Development”—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 49 (1), s. 118 (1).

By the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 118 : “(1) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that the provisions of this Act, and any restrictions or powers thereby imposed or conferred in relation to land, apply and may be exercised in relation to any land notwithstanding that provision is made by any enactment in force at the passing of this Act, or by any local Act passed at any time during the present session of Parliament, for authorising or regulating any development of the land.” The Regulation and Inclosure (Totternhoe) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1886, provided that “with a view to the benefit of the neighbourhood . . . so far as may be practicable, the ancient roads or tracks respectively known as ‘the Drovers Way’ and ‘the Icknield Way’ be preserved in their present condition,” and that “there be reserved to the inhabitants of Totternhoe, and of the neighbouring towns and villages, and the public generally, at all times, a right of walking over all that part of the . . . common . . . to be regulated,” which included certain highways known as the Wheelbarrow Green Highway and the Quarry Green Highway. On Nov. 18, 1949, the Minister of Transport, purporting to be acting under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 49, made an Order—the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949—under which it was ordered, inter alia, that parts of the Drovers Way, the Wheelbarrow Green highway and the Quarry Green highway should be stopped up. The applicant sought to have the Minister’s Order quashed.

HELD : the Act of 1886 did not authorise or regulate any “development” of land as defined in s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1947, but merely maintained and confirmed the existing use, and, therefore, s. 118 (1) did not empower the Minister to override the Act of 1886, and the Order must be quashed.

MOTION by Arthur John Harlow to quash the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949, (S.I. 1949, No. 2130), made by the Minister of Transport under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 49, on the ground that the Order was ultra vires the Minister. BIRKETT, J. : This application is made by Mr. Arthur John Harlow, and the respondents are the Ministry of Transport and the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd. Mr. Harlow applies for an order to quash a highway Order made by the Minister of Transport on Nov. 18, 1949—the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949. He says that the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, does not give power to the Minister to make this highway Order; that it is bad in law because it is contrary to the provisions of the Regulation and Inclosure (Totternhoe) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1886, and the award made thereunder; and, in short, that the Minister has no power under the Act of 1947 to override the provisions of the Act of 1886. He says, moreover, that he is a person aggrieved because he is deprived of his right to walk over these specified highways which are set out in Part I of the schedule to the Act of 1886.

On Oct. 6, 1948, on the application of the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd., the Ministry of Transport, published a draft Order under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 49, for stopping up certain highways in the parish of Totternhoe in the county of Bedford. These highways included parts of the highways which were known as the Drovers Way, the Wheelbarrow Green Highway and the Quarry Green Highway. After that draft Order had been published, objections were made to it. In consequence of those objections the Minister, in accordance with sched. VI to the Act of 1947, caused a local inquiry to be held at Dunstable on Apr. 8 and 28, 1949. The objectors, who were represented by counsel, were fully heard, and they submitted, as I understand it, pretty well the case which counsel for the applicant has presented here today. They said that the Order should not have been made because, among other things, it was not necessary and was not reasonable, and so on, but one point taken was the main point taken here before me, that the Minister was without power to make the Order by reason of the provisions of the Act of 1886 and the award made thereunder on Jan. 14, 1891, which was confirmed on Feb. 19, 1891.

After the local inquiry and the report made to the Minister by the person appointed, Mr. Tudor Davies, on Nov. 18, 1949, the Minister made the Order which is now before me, the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949. After reciting various sections of the Act, it provides that the Minister “may, if he is satisfied that it is necessary so to do in order to enable development to be carried out in accordance with planning permission granted under Part III of the Act, by Order made in accordance with the provisions of sched. VI to the Act authorise the stopping up of any highway; And Whereas the Minister is so satisfied as regards the highways consisting of the greenways and footpaths in the rural district of Luton in the county of Bedford . . . specified in Part I of the schedule to this Order . . . Now, therefore, the Minister in exercise of the powers conferred upon him . . . makes the following Order: 1. The stopping up of the old highways is hereby authorised and the new highways shall be provided by the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd. . . . 2. The cost of providing the new highways shall be paid by the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd.”

In Part I of the schedule it is provided:

“Highways to be stopped up. 1. That part of the greenway known as the Drovers Way (or Green Lane) which extends from a point approximately 255 yards north-east of its junction with the Banbury Knap and Combe Green highway in an easterly direction to a point approximately forty yards west of its junction with the Sewell Footway; 2. That part of the greenway known as the Wheelbarrow Green highway which extends from a point approximately 225 yards south-east of its junction with the Sewell Green highway in a general south-easterly direction to its junction with the Drovers Way; 3. That part of the greenway known as the Quarry Green highway which extends from its junction with the Drovers Way in a southerly direction for a distance of approximately 355 yards."

The Act of 1886 and the award have both been before me. In the schedule to the Act the provisional Order for the regulation of the commons in the parish of Totternhoe is set out. The material passages are:

"Now, therefore, in pursuance of the powers given to us by the said Acts, we, the Land Commissioners for England, being satisfied that, having regard to the benefit of the neighbourhood as well as to private interests, the regulation of part of the said common is desirable, have framed, for the consideration of the persons interested, this our draft provisional Order, specifying the provisions for 'adjustment of rights' and for 'improvement' which are to be put in force, and the terms and conditions on which, provided the necessary consents are given thereto, we are prepared to certify that it is expedient the provisional Order should be confirmed by Parliament; that is to say: That the part of the said common to be regulated be the tracts known as the Dunstable Downs, Whipsnade Heath (so far as the same lies within the said parish), the cow common (except as hereinafter mentioned), and the Castle Hill, all of which are coloured light green on the map hereinbefore referred to and also the several pieces of land, baulks, and driftways which are coloured dark green in the said map, and also, as part of the cow common, the three pieces of common field land . . ."

It is said that those pieces of land, baulks and driftways coloured dark green on the map there referred to include the Wheelbarrow Green highway and the Quarry Green highway referred to in the Order of the Minister, and (less certainly) the Drovers Way. So far as the Drovers Way is concerned, the provisional Order provides:

"That, with a view to the benefit of the neighbourhood, the following provisions be made part of the terms and conditions of this Order . . ."

Then it deals with the Totternhoe Castle and tumuli on the Dunstable Downs, and provides:

"That, so far as may be practicable, the ancient roads or tracks respectively known as 'The Drovers Way' and 'The Icknield Way' be preserved in their present condition . . ."

So the Drovers Way, whether or not it comes within "baulks and driftways" in the earlier passage, is there specifically referred to. The provisional Order continues:

"That there be reserved to the inhabitants of Totternhoe, and of the neighbouring towns and villages, and the public generally, at all times, a right of walking over all that part of the said common which is to be regulated, with the exception of the cow common, and that, in addition, there be reserved as aforesaid a right of playing games and enjoying other reasonable recreation on the Castle Hill and the surrounding land, on the Dunstable Downs, and on Whipsnade Heath aforesaid, subject to the byelaws . . ."

It was part of the argument of counsel for the applicant that these highways to be stopped up, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 which were specified, were in fact the subject of the provisional Order and, indeed, the award of 1886.

On those facts counsel for the applicant submitted that there were no provisions in the Act of 1947 which permitted the Minister to make this Order in view of the provisions of the Act of 1886. Counsel for the Ministry of Transport and counsel for the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd., submitted that the Minister had the power and had, in fact, in his Order, exercised it properly. Some authorities were referred to, but the principle contended for by counsel for the applicant is really not challenged. He relied on Seward v. Vera Cruz (1) and the passage in the speech of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., where he says (10 App. Cas. 68):

“Now if anything be certain it is this, that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so.”

He also cited R. v. Minister of Health, Ex p. Villiers (2) for the reason that the Divisional Court, consisting of the late LORD HEWART, C.J., DU PARCQ, J., and GODDARD, J., in a considered judgment said that the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant also applied to prevent the Housing Act, 1925, overriding the special provisions of the London Open Spaces Act, 1893, with regard to Hackney Marshes. The passage in the judgment of the court which was relied on is ([1936] 1 All E.R. 823):

“In our judgment, the true grounds are stated by STIRLING, J., in Re Smith's Estate (3) where he says (35 Ch.D. 595): ‘Where there is an Act of Parliament which deals in a special way with a particular subject-matter, and that is followed by a general Act which deals in a general way with the subject-matter of the previous legislation, the court ought not to hold that general words in such a general Act of Parliament effect a repeal of the prior and special legislation unless it can find some reference in the general Act to the prior and special legislation.’ If express words are absent, there must at least be necessary implication. To the same effect is the speech of LORD HALDANE in Blackpool Corpn. v. Starr Estate Co. (4). Here we have a special subject-matter, and one, moreover, of a peculiar kind, namely, Lammas lands. To these lands the various Open Spaces Acts do not apply, and it is at least doubtful whether the Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866, applies to them. If it does apply, the procedure under that Act entails the passing of a special confirming Act. The subject-matter is also dealt with, not in a special but in a quite peculiar way. Under s. 12 the right to exchange for ‘adjoining’ land is given and the lands taken in exchange are to be deemed part of Hackney Marshes, and are so to be held by the council. We can find nothing in the Act of 1925 that indicates any intention on the part of Parliament to effect so radical a change in the Act of 1893 as to permit the council to build on a part of Hackney Marshes in exchange for lands so far as seven miles away, at Chigwell, and to deprive Hackney of an open space while providing one for a part of the population entirely different from that which now enjoys the advantages of Hackney Marshes.”

Again counsel for the applicant says that that case is analogous to the present one.

Counsel for the Ministry cited Garnett v. Bradley (5). In that case, LORD BLACKBURN says (3 App. Cas. 968):

“In all these cases, however, the particular statute relied upon was a statute in favour of a particular class of persons or the property of a particular class of persons. I do not take upon myself to say that all cases in which that rule has been applied have been such, although I am not aware of any case in which it has been applied to which that remark would not be applicable. But where that is the case, where the particular enactment is particular in the sense that it protects the rights, the property, the privileges of particular persons or a class of persons, the reason for the rule which has been acted upon is exceedingly plain and strong.”

He states the rule, and proceeds (ibid., 969):

"Therefore, I think that where only general words are used there is a strong presumption that the legislature did not intend to take away a particular privilege, right, or property, of a particular class, unless they have done something to shew that."

As I have said, the general principle of that matter was not really disputed, but what was said in this case by counsel for the applicant was that he relied on that doctrine because there is nothing in this case to prevent its application, whereas counsel for both the respondents said: "Indeed, there is. This is a special case inasmuch as special powers are given in the Act of 1947." I, therefore, refer to some of the provisions of that Act.

Section 49 of the Act provides:

"(1) Without prejudice to the provisions of s. 23 of the Act of 1944, as incorporated with this Act, or s. 3 of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, the Minister of Transport may, if he is satisfied that it is necessary so to do in order to enable development to be carried out in accordance with planning permission granted under Part III of this Act or to be carried out by a government department, by Order made in accordance with the provisions of sched. VI to this Act authorise the stopping up or diversion of any highway."

That is what he has done. Being satisfied as I have recited, the Minister has acted under s. 49. Counsel for the Ministry says that that sub-section conferred a general power on the Minister to authorise the stopping up or diversion of any highway, but for my own part I do not think s. 49 can possibly be read by itself. All sorts of other considerations would have to be applied.

I rather thought that counsel for the Ministry laid his greatest emphasis on the fact that there is a general power under s. 49 to stop up a highway, but if s. 118 is read in conjunction with it the power of the Minister is made plain. Section 118 provides:

"(1) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that the provisions of this Act, and any restrictions or powers thereby imposed or conferred in relation to land, apply and may be exercised in relation to any land notwithstanding that provision is made by any enactment in force at the passing of this Act, or by any local Act passed at any time during the present session of Parliament, for authorising or regulating any development of the land."

That, manifestly, was a power taken by the Minister because of the kind of difficulty which, it was foreseen, must inevitably arise in many cases, and the fear that where there was a desire for development and all the other Acts of Parliament had been complied with, nevertheless the Minister might be frustrated in his purpose by the existence of some enactment (which is defined in the schedule to the Act as including not merely an Act of Parliament itself but also the Orders made thereunder), dealing with the development of the particular land in question. I think it has always to be remembered, too, that in 1947 conditions were very different from those which existed in 1886, and clearly the Minister in s. 118 has taken the power, in the special circumstances there set out, to get rid of that frustrating element, a prior enactment which stood in his way, by the use of the words:

"... notwithstanding that provision is made by any enactment in force at the passing of this Act, or by any local Act passed at any time during the present session of Parliament, for authorising or regulating any development of the land."

The word "development" there, of course, is the important word, and the Act of 1947 itself defines "development" in s. 12 (2):

"In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the expression 'development' means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land . . ."

A With that definition in mind s. 118 would read: "... any ... powers ... conferred in relation to land ... may be exercised in relation to any land notwithstanding that provision is made by any enactment in force at the passing of this Act for authorising or regulating any carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land."

B Section 13, which also deals with the development of land, was brought to my notice by counsel for the applicant. As I said in the course of the argument, and as I still think, I am not sure that that section really helps very much in this matter. Section 13 provides:

C "(1) The Minister shall by Order provide for the grant of permission for the development of land under this Part of this Act, and such permission may be granted [in certain cases] ... (4) For the purpose of enabling development to be carried out in accordance with permission granted under this Part of this Act, or otherwise for the purpose of promoting proper development in accordance with the development plan, a development Order may direct that any enactment passed before the passing of this Act, or any regulations, orders or byelaws made (whether before or after the passing of this Act) under any such enactment, shall not apply to any development specified in the Order, or shall apply thereto subject to such modifications as may be so specified."

D So far as concerns that section, which is dealing with development as there set out and development orders, the express power is reserved and given to direct, in the Order, that any enactment in existence before the passing of the Act of 1947 shall not apply. Clearly s. 13 (4) contemplated: "In the case of these development orders referred to in this section, there may be enactments in force which would impede the proper development which we desire under the development Order. Power is therefore reserved and given to get rid of that difficulty in the development Order." I cannot think that it helps me much more than that, because I really have to deal with s. 118. There is no Order of the Minister here wiping out the previous enactment at all. Section 119 was also referred to, but I think only for the definition of "development," and later

E F for the definition of the word "enactment."

G Counsel for the applicant submitted that this Act of 1886 cannot be overruled by virtue of s. 118 of the Act of 1947, because, on the facts of this case, the provisional Order of 1886 (and, indeed, the award made thereunder), did not authorise or regulate any development of the land within the meaning of s. 12, and, therefore, there is no power on the part of the Minister to do these things. Counsel for the Ministry and counsel for the company, who made common cause, said that the Act of 1886 authorised and regulated development within the meaning of s. 118. The Commons Act, 1876, was cited to me in support of that contention, and, further, counsel for the Ministry said that s. 49 of the Act of 1947 was a general section which did give the Minister of Transport power because it referred to "any highway," and that the Act of 1886 was for

H the regulation and development of the land. He submitted, further, that it was not the Act which had made this change but the Order made thereunder, a point which I said at the time and still feel is not of any substance. I think it was generally agreed that the real question was whether this was a development within the meaning of s. 118.

I have come to the conclusion that the Order of the Minister ought not to have been made in respect of these matters. I am satisfied that "development" in s. 118, as defined by s. 12, must be strictly construed, and I cannot think that in this Act of 1886 the "development" was in any sense the "carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land"—which is the first head of the matter, or "the making of any material change in the use of any land"—which is the second head, and the head with which I am concerned. On the evidence before me, it would not appear that any material change had been made, or, indeed, any change at all, but that, so far as the Drovers Way, the Wheelbarrow Green highway, and the Quarry Green highway, the three highways specified in the Minister's Order, are concerned, it would appear, not that there had been any development within the meaning of s. 12, but that there has merely been a maintenance of the existing use. In those circumstances, I think that this notice of motion, which asks that the Order should be quashed in that it is not within the powers of the Act of 1947, must succeed.

CARTER v. MINISTER OF HEALTH.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), March 23, April 5, 1950.]

National Health Service—Medical practitioner—Compensation for loss of right to sell practice—Assessment—"Calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day"—Powers of arbitrator—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 36 (1)—National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506), reg. 7 (2) (a).

By the National Health Service (Medical Practice Compensation) Regulations, 1948, reg. 7, compensation, to which a medical practitioner became entitled by virtue of the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 36 (1), for the loss of the right to sell his practice, is determined by reference to the annual value (referred to in the regulations as the "annual loss") of the goodwill of a practice. Regulation 7 (2) (a) defines "annual loss" as "the average gross yearly receipts of that practice, as certified by a qualified accountant, calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day" (July 5, 1948). By reg. 11 a claimant aggrieved by the Minister's decision may have the annual loss determined by an arbitrator.

The accounting year of a claimant ended on July 9, and, accordingly, his two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day were those ending July 9, 1947. The claimant's average receipts for those years were £2,600, but, owing to an improvement in the practice, the average receipts for the two years ending July 9, 1948 (four days after the appointed day) were more than £3,000. The Minister determined that the "annual loss" was £2,600. The claimant applied for arbitration and the arbitrator, holding that he was entitled to refer not merely to the accounts of the last two accounting years, but to all the circumstances of the case, assessed the annual loss at £2,950.

HELD: the duty of the arbitrator was to calculate the average gross yearly receipts (as certified under the regulation) and so ascertain the yearly loss, and, in so doing, he was entitled to refer only to the two accounting years specified in the regulation and not to arrive at a figure which he thought just in all the circumstances of the case.

[FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 36 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 371.]

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrator.

- A The claimant was a medical practitioner entitled to compensation under s. 36 (1) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, in respect of the loss suffered by him by reason of his inability to sell the goodwill of his practice by virtue of s. 35 (1) of the Act. The compensation determined by the Minister of Health was £2,600. The claimant, being aggrieved by the Minister's determination, applied for his claim to be referred to an arbitrator, who assessed the compensation at £2,950. For the claimant it was contended in support of this award that,
- B on a true construction of reg. 7 (2) (a) of the National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948, in calculating the average receipts of the practice, the words "by reference to the last two accounting years" did not preclude the arbitrator from taking into consideration the receipts up to the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946, provided that the
- C period under consideration included the last two accounting years.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and J. P. Ashworth for the Minister.

Havers, K.C., and Cumming-Bruce for the claimant.

- D Apr. 5. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 35 (1), prohibits certain medical practitioners from selling the goodwill of their practices, and under s. 36 Parliament provided £66,000,000 as compensation for those who suffered loss through this prohibition. This case concerns the interpretation of the National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948, made under the Act to provide for the distribution of the compensation. The scheme of the regulations is that
- E there shall be ascertained for each practitioner what is called "the annual loss," that is, the annual value of his practice. He will then receive that proportion of the £66,000,000 which his annual loss bears to the total of all annual losses. The annual loss is defined by reg. 7 (2) to be (subject to two exceptions)

- F "the average gross yearly receipts of [the] practice, as certified by a qualified accountant calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day [July 5, 1948]."

With the first exception I am not concerned. The second is contained in the proviso (ii) to reg. 7 (2) and seems designed to provide for exceptional practices which cannot fairly be valued by the general measure. The effect of this proviso is that the Minister has a discretion to refer any claim to a committee, which

- G "shall fix as the annual loss ... such sum as they estimate fairly to represent the average gross yearly receipts of the practice."

The committee then report their findings to the Minister. Under reg. 10 the Minister must then determine the loss, whether by application of the general definition or with the aid of the committee's report. Under reg. 11 any claimant

H aggrieved by the Minister's decision may have the annual loss determined by an arbitrator sitting with two assessors.

The accounting year of the claimant, Dr. Carter, ends on July 9. Accordingly, the two accounting years specified in reg. 7 (2) ended in his case on July 9, 1947, and the annual loss calculated by reference to them is £2,600. The receipts of the practice, however, were rapidly rising, and if only the claimant had fixed the end of his accounting year four days earlier, or if it were possible to treat the last 361 days as a full year, the annual loss would be over £3,000. The claim was not referred to the committee under the second proviso. The Minister determined that the annual loss was £2,600. The claimant applied for arbitration, and the arbitrator, holding that, on the true interpretation of reg. 7 (2), he was entitled to refer, not merely to the two accounting years, but also to all the circumstances which he considered material and which are set out in the Special Case, assessed the annual loss at £2,950. The question of law in the Special Case is confined to the true interpretation of reg. 7 (2). It is not suggested that either the Minister or the arbitrator has any discretion in the application of the regulation, and I think it is right that their only function is to determine the annual loss as defined therein. A

My first impression of the regulation is that the Minister's interpretation of it is right. Two criticisms of this interpretation have been advanced. The first is that it gives no effect to the words "calculated by reference to." It treats the regulation as if it defined the annual loss as the average yearly receipts of the last two years. There seems to me to be no doubt that, on the Minister's construction, the words "calculated by reference to" are unnecessary, but I do not myself attach great importance to their presence. They are the sort of conventional bit of statutory phraseology which flows easily from the pen and sometimes escapes subsequent pruning. It is almost as conventional to provide for a "calculation" as it is to provide for "an appointed day." Since in this case the day was already appointed as July 5, 1948, it might have been shorter and simpler to have referred to the date itself. I say this intending no disrespect, but because every draftsman inevitably falls into habits of language, and it is not always a fair criterion, whether as criticism or used as an aid to interpretation, that the simplest and most direct form of words has not been used. B C D

The second criticism, which I think to be the more formidable, is that it is absurd to suppose that an arbitrator and two assessors are to be gathered together to add two figures and halve the total (or rather, since the Minister will already have done the arithmetic, to make sure that he has done it correctly) which on the Minister's construction would be their sole function. The Attorney-General has met this criticism to some extent by pointing out that, although the figures are to be taken as certified, questions might arise, particularly having regard to reg. 7 (4), which excludes remuneration received in respect of the holding of any appointment, as to what fees should be included in the receipts. I suppose that it is also conceivable that a question might arise as to when the accounting year began and ended. Counsel for the claimant says that cases of this sort would be a very small proportion of the whole, but it is nevertheless true that, whether they be one per cent. or ninety-nine per cent. of the whole, arbitration machinery would still be required and might conveniently be expressed in the same terms. Regulations 10 and 11 apply to all cases whether they come, so to speak, direct or through the committee. The latter class obviously offers scope for arbitration, and it may have been thought simpler to cover both classes by the same arbitration clause, even though the number of cases in the former class which would be suitable for arbitration would be very limited. E F G

These criticisms certainly should command attention, but they will not help the claimant unless he can advance some alternative construction of reg. 7 (2) which the words are capable of bearing. One thing about the language is quite clear. That is that the annual loss means average gross yearly receipts. What has to be calculated is, not the annual loss itself, but the average gross yearly receipts. The learned arbitrator, in assessing the loss at £2,950, does not appear to have calculated average gross yearly receipts at all. If he has, the method of calculation is not shown in the Special Case. It looks as if he had arrived at his figure as one which in all the circumstances he thought just. It is clear from para. 7 (5) of the Special Case that he regarded himself as having the same latitude as the committee. I do not, with respect, share the arbitrator's view H that the latitude given to the committee under the proviso is a reason for supposing that a similar latitude was intended to be granted under the main rule. On the contrary, I think that the insertion of the proviso and its terms strongly support the Minister's construction. The duty of estimating is to be contrasted with that of calculating, and the apparent object of the proviso is to provide relief in appropriate cases from the rigidity of the general rule.

- A Counsel for the claimant puts his argument rather more narrowly. He concedes that the result must be an average over some period, but he contends that the period is at large provided that it includes at least the last two accounting years. This is substantially the view expressed in para. 7 of the Case. It raises a short point of construction which is very much a matter of first impression. I mean, therefore, no disrespect to the argument or to the arbitrator's view when I say that I am not myself able to see how anyone could say "calculated by reference to the last two years" if what he means is "calculated by reference to such period as the Minister may think proper, provided it includes the last two years." Counsel for the claimant relied on the injustices which are said to arise from the Minister's interpretation of the regulation. That is a consideration which might be relevant if the regulation were ambiguous. In my opinion, it is not.
- C The fact that on the Minister's construction it admittedly contains more words than are strictly necessary is not enough. Circumlocution and ambiguity are not the same, but, in any event, I do not think that there is disclosed in the Case anything which reveals injustice in any sense that is material to the construction of the regulation. Injustice is not to be confused with hard cases. Any clearly drawn line is bound to be hard on those who are just the wrong side of it.
- D In the administration of justice, the choice always lies between the application of the fixed rule that is designed to be generally fair and to ensure uniformity of treatment and the investigation of each case on its merits, leaving the result to the length of the judge's foot. If in these regulations the legislature had intended the latter, it would have had to provide some method of investigation which would expose the bad points in a claimant's case as well as the good. In the absence of any such machinery, the construction which the arbitrator has adopted would, I venture to think, create as many hard cases as it relieves. Those who benefit by the formula (as, for example, the claimant would have if his practice had been declining instead of growing) would be unlikely to volunteer information which would lower their average, and those who lose by it would succeed in having their averages raised. Both classes would thus profit at the expense of the ordinary person for whose case the rule was primarily designed.
- F It is in relation to the normal case and not the abnormal that the justice of the regulation must be judged, for injustice is a relevant consideration only because it is to be supposed that the legislature would not have made a regulation which in its normal operation would cause injustice. I see no reason to suppose that the two years average, particularly when it is subject to a proviso that the Minister (who is in this matter a disinterested person, for it is immaterial to him how the fund is distributed) may refer special cases to the committee, is likely to cause injustice among the body of practitioners as a whole.
- G

I answer in the negative the question stated in the Special Case—whether the award of £2,950 is right in law—with the result that the alternative award of £2,600 is upheld.

HENLEY v. MURRAY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.J.J.), March 13, 14, 1950.]

Income Tax—Compensation for loss of office—Abrogation of service agreement—Separate agreement for payment of compensation—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1.

The taxpayer was employed as managing director of the G. Property Co. under a service agreement determinable at the earliest on Mar. 31, 1944. The G. Development Co., which was a subsidiary of the property company and of which also the taxpayer was a director, requested the trustees for its debenture holders, an assurance society, to assist it in the disposal of certain property. The trustees were unwilling to give such assistance except on certain conditions, one of which was that the taxpayer should leave the service of both companies. This he did on July 6, 1943, it being then agreed that he should be paid some £2,000, being an amount equal to that to which he would have been entitled under his service agreement had his employment continued until Mar. 31, 1944.

HELD: the sum, being payable in consideration of the abrogation of the taxpayer's contract of employment, and not under his contract of service, was not a profit from the taxpayer's employment in respect of which he was assessable to income tax under sched. E, r. 1.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated Oct. 26, 1949, whereby he held that a sum of £2,202 14s. 4d. paid to the taxpayer, a director of two companies, in consideration of the abandonment by the taxpayer of his contractual rights under his contract of service with the companies, constituted profits from his office or employment and was assessable to income tax under sched. E. The facts appear in the headnote.

Cyril King, K.C., and Honeyman for the taxpayer.

Selwyn Lloyd, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: It is clear that a man who has a contract in respect of which he is entitled to periodic remuneration may say: "Well, I will take a lump sum now instead of the periodic remuneration in the future, and, though I will continue to serve under my contract, I shall not be expected to do quite as much work," or he may even say: "I shall not be expected to do any work at all." If that were the form of the arrangement in this case, I think it would be true to say that the lump sum which was paid was profits which became payable under the taxpayer's contract of service and that it was paid to him by virtue of his office or employment of profit within the meaning of sched. E. Many of the cases cited were examples of that type of arrangement, for instance, Cameron v. Prendergast (1), Wales v. Tilley (2), and, lastly, the case which was relied on by the learned judge in the court below, Hofman v. Wadman (3). In the last-named case, the question was what was the construction of a certain document and MACNAGHTEN, J., said (27 Tax Cas. 197):

"There is no reason for construing it in any other way. The words are quite plain: 'That the existing service agreements dated May 2, 1940 . . . shall be cancelled forthwith, subject to the continuance of the fixed remuneration provided for in cl. 4.' I cannot read that as meaning anything else than the obligation of Parnall Components, Ltd., to pay that salary, and at the same time the waiver of its right to call upon Mr. Hofman to perform the duties of a works manager. It is said that he ceased to hold the office of works manager, and no doubt he did; but the continuance in the office of works manager does not affect the question of his liability to income tax . . ."

I should feel a little difficulty, as at present advised, in accepting the whole of the language that I have read. It is plain, however, that the real basis of the decision was (in the earlier of the sentences I quoted) that the bargain there was that the employers should remain liable under the contract for the remuneration they had contracted to pay though they gave up their right to call on Mr. Hofman, their works manager, to perform the duties under the contract which he was bound to perform. If that is a correct analysis, it seems to me that the case is clearly one of the first kind which I have stated—a case in which the contract persists. Though the right of one party to call on the other for performance of its terms may be modified, or, indeed, wholly given up, still the corresponding right to require payment either of the whole remuneration or of some less figure is preserved and is still payable under the contract.

There is another class of case where the bargain is of an essentially different character, viz., where the contract itself goes altogether and some sum becomes payable for the consideration of the total abandonment of all the contractual rights which the other party had under the contract. In the course of the argument an extreme case was put to counsel for the Crown of an employer who wrongfully breaks a contract of service and discharges a servant wholly therefrom and the servant then sues for damages for wrongful dismissal. Although, of course, it is true to say that the sum awarded as damages arises from the contract in the sense that if there had never been a contract the sum of damages could never have been awarded, counsel admitted that, in a case of that sort, it would be impossible to suggest that the sum awarded to the servant for damages was taxable under sched. E.

In the circumstances of the present case also it is not open to the Crown to say that this sum of £2,000 odd constituted profits from the office or employment, since, on its true analysis, it constituted the consideration payable to the taxpayer for the total abrogation imposed on him of his contract of employment, so that from July 6, 1943, no contract existed under which that figure or any other sum could be paid. I, therefore, come to the conclusion on the facts that this case is of the second class, namely, one in which the agreement itself ceased altogether to exist for all purposes on July 6, 1943.

Counsel for the Crown referred me to a passage from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Wales v. Tilley (2) which illustrates the basis on which I think the decision in the present case ought to rest. LORD GREENE said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 24):

"If a man agrees to serve in consideration of a lump sum and no periodical salary or a small periodical salary, that lump sum is just as much remuneration and taxable as such as a periodical salary or a larger periodical salary would have been—Prendergast v. Cameron (1). Indeed, the only real argument that was presented on behalf of the appellant on this aspect of the case consisted of an endeavour to draw a distinction between a lump sum paid at the beginning of the service and a sum paid, as in the present case, in consideration of an agreement to continue to serve for a reduced salary. There is no substance in this distinction. If a man who is serving at a salary of £1,000 a year agrees to serve for a reduced salary in consideration of a lump sum, he is merely commuting his salary and a sum so accepted in commutation of salary can in its nature be nothing but salary. The commutation merely substitutes one form of remuneration for another. It is in effect remuneration payable in advance and it is quite fallacious to speak of it as a capital payment. Indeed, I am unable to understand how a sum paid as remuneration can ever be capital in the sense that it escapes taxation, since remuneration as such is the subject-matter of tax under sched. E, whatever form it takes."

I accept every word of that passage, but there the whole of the language used relates to the first class of case which I have attempted to formulate earlier, i.e., where essentially the contract of service remains in one form or another. As the learned Master of the Rolls there pointed out, the essential question is not the form in which the salary is paid, but the fact that it is remuneration—that it is reward for services under a subsisting agreement. None of that language seems to me to have any application once the essential fact is accepted that in the present case there ceased to be any contract of service, and, therefore, from that date onwards there was no remuneration. This was not a sum paid in advance because there was no future claim which the taxpayer could ever assert, nor was it reward for his past service. It was a cash consideration paid for his agreeing to submit to the terms which the assurance society sought fit to impose.

Counsel for the Crown further said—I think rightly—that the use of formulae like "compensation for loss of office" is not a kind of magic abracadabra which provides the solution to the case. There was some suggestion in the earlier part of the argument of counsel for the Crown that we must look at the substance and not the form, and that the substance was something quite different from the legal conclusion which I think properly emerges from the evidence. On this question of substance, I would like to refer to, though I shall not quote, the passage in LORD TOMLIN'S speech ([1936] A.C. 19) in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Duke of Westminster (4). I quite agree that language which the parties may use, such as "compensation for loss of office," is not the determining factor when one has to decide what in truth was the bargain, and that the duty of the court is to see what in substance, and in truth, the bargain was and not to be blinded by some formula which the parties may have used. That proposition is not peculiar to tax cases, though there is perhaps a tendency for the subject to try to disguise the real nature of a transaction by forms of words if he thinks the result would be profitable. To take other examples, in the well-known type of case in which the question is whether a transaction is a lease or a licence the court is never bound or concluded by language which may be appropriate to the one form of transaction rather than the other. In cases under the Rent Restrictions Acts, the mere statement that the premises are furnished is not conclusive on the question whether the premises are in fact outside the Acts, but that, as I conceive it, is all that should be said as regards looking at the substance. The court is not entitled, having found what legal result the parties have in truth produced, to disregard that truth because the court thinks that the result which has been achieved could have been achieved in some other way and that other way would have been less convenient to the subject in the matter of taxes. The court is bound, having arrived at a conclusion what in truth the legal result was, to apply to that result the taxing statutes as they are found to be. It is not concerned to say whether the subject has been fortunate or unfortunate or to express any view whether the case is one which Parliament might have thought, if it had expressed its taxing statutes differently, would have been a proper case for taxation. Having arrived at the conclusion which I have stated, that the agreement here ceased altogether on July 6, 1943, it is impossible to say that the sum of £2,000 odd was profits which arose from the contract so determined.

I have forborne from referring to Hunter v. Dewhurst (5) and Henry v. Foster (5), I think, in working out a case such as the present, the examination which we have given to those cases has been useful because it has shown the way in which, in arriving at a conclusion, the main principles are applied according to the special facts of the case, but I think it is clear from later decisions that the decision of the House of Lords in Hunter v. Dewhurst (5) depended on very special circumstances, particularly the existence of a special article giving very unusual rights. Having regard to the care which judges in later cases have taken to distinguish Hunter v. Dewhurst (5), I do not think it would be useful for me in the present case to add to the many observations which have already been made on that case.

For the reasons which I have attempted to state I have felt compelled to a view different from that taken by CROOM-JOHNSON, J., for I think that this sum of £2,202 14s. 4d. does not fairly fall within the ambit of r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. It is conceded by the Crown that in a case where damages for wrongful dismissal are sued for, the sum awarded as damages is not only not within sched. E but, also, is not taxable as income under any other schedule.

If in the case of dismissal where the employee says: "I am wrongfully dismissed," and sues for damages, he is admittedly outside sched. E and untaxable, it seems to me to follow from that, if one goes by stages, that if one takes a case where equally the employer dismisses his employee and the damages are agreed without litigation, the fact that they are agreed instead of being awarded by a judge or jury cannot affect their legal position in regard to the income tax code. It seems to me on the evidence that that is what happened here. The employers said: "You must go." The appellant was forced into going at their request. The sum which he stipulated for must legally be in precisely the same position as would have been a sum for damages for wrongful dismissal.

I am dealing with the facts of this case only, and it is clear that, although there was not any abrupt or dictatorial act by the employer, the initiative and the request for the determination came from the employer. What would be the position if there were a mutual agreement between the employer and the employed that the service should be ended abruptly and a sum paid is a matter which can be dealt with when it arises. For these reasons I think that the learned judge was wrong, and that this appeal in respect of this sum must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. As the many cases on this topic show, it is often very difficult to determine the character of a payment made to the holder of an office when his tenure of the office is determined, or the terms on which he holds it are altered, and the question in each case is whether, on the facts of the case, the lump sum paid is in the nature of remuneration or profits in respect of the office, or is in the nature of a sum paid in consideration of the surrender by the recipient of his rights in respect of the office.

The only possible conclusion of law in the present case seems to me to be that the payment in question was not a payment of remuneration, but was one made in consideration of the taxpayer, at the request of the company, giving up his right to continue to be employed by the company down to Mar. 31, 1944, and to earn and receive his contractual remuneration down to that date. It is not suggested that the payment was a mere gratuity, nor is it suggested that the payment was in the nature of additional remuneration for the services which the taxpayer had already performed in the past for the stipulated reward, nor is it suggested that there was an arrangement of the nature sometimes met with under which, in effect, the holder of the office is given the equivalent of leave of absence on full pay for the residue of the contractual term. There is no evidence of any such arrangement. It was a simple case of resignation under which the office was to be immediately vacated, and no further services were to be performed. Accordingly, by a process of elimination, I arrive at the conclusion that this sum can only be regarded on the facts of this case as paid to the taxpayer in consideration of his surrendering his right to serve, and receive remuneration, to the end of his contractual engagement. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Income Tax—Compensation for loss of office—Term in service agreement for payment on termination of service agreement—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1.

By the terms of a service agreement the taxpayer, who was employed by a company, was entitled to a salary and commission, and it was provided that the company should be entitled to terminate the taxpayer's appointment at the end of the first or second year of the three years covered by the agreement by three months' notice, whereupon a lump sum would become payable to the taxpayer by way of compensation for loss of office. The company terminated the agreement at the end of the first year, and paid the agreed sum of compensation to the taxpayer.

HELD: the payment of compensation was one to which the taxpayer was entitled under the service agreement in the event, which happened, of the company electing to terminate the agreement, and, accordingly, the compensation was a profit from his employment in respect of which he was assessable to income tax under sched. E, r. 1.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners found that a sum of £10,000 paid, in accordance with the terms of his service agreement, to the taxpayer as compensation for loss of office on the termination of his appointment as assistant to the managing director of a company arose by reason of the premature determination of his employment and, therefore, was not assessable as a profit arising from his office or employment. The Crown appealed.

Apr. 3. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. The taxpayer, Mr. Pierre de Soissons, appealed to the Special Commissioners against an assessment raised on him for the year 1945/46 under sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of a sum of £10,000 paid to him by his employers, Gallaher Ltd., when he left their employment on Dec. 31, 1945. The taxpayer had, since 1929, assisted the managing director in the administration of the company. His remuneration and the terms of his employment had been governed by a number of service agreements. The last but one of these expired on Dec. 31, 1944, by effluxion of time, and, although the last agreement, which took effect on Jan. 1, 1945, had been made on July 5, 1944, it in no way modified or affected the previous agreement. The position, therefore, was that his employment was continued to the extent and in the manner provided by the last agreement.

By cl. 1 of that agreement it was agreed that the company

"hereby continues the appointment of Mr. de Soissons as assistant to the managing director of the company and Mr. de Soissons agrees to continue in such office for the period of three years from Jan. 1, 1945."

Clause 2 provides that the company

"shall pay to Mr. de Soissons as remuneration for such services (a) an annual salary at the rate of £3,000 per annum."

By cl. 2 (b) there was a commission payable by the company for each calendar year during the currency of this agreement at a rate specified in the clause. By cl. 3 it is provided:

"Mr. de Soissons shall unless prevented by ill health during the said term devote the whole of his time attention and abilities to the due management and conduct of the business and affairs of the company entrusted to his charge and shall in all respects conform to and comply with the directions and instructions to be given and made by the board of directors of the company and shall well and faithfully serve the company and use his utmost endeavours to promote the interests thereof."

Clause 4 provides:

"If Mr. de Soissons shall be prevented by ill-health from attending to his duties for a consecutive period of six calendar months the company shall be at liberty immediately to determine this agreement on paying to Mr. de Soissons a sum equal to one year's salary in lieu of notice. In the event of the agreement being determined under the provisions of this clause Mr. de Soissons shall be entitled to receive a proper proportion of the commission which would otherwise have been payable to him in respect of the year in which such termination takes place calculated down to the actual date of termination such proportion being payable to Mr. de Soissons in accordance with the provisions of cl. 2 (b) hereof."

Clause 5 says:

"If in the opinion of the board of directors of the company it is desirable for the better or more economical working of the company and conducive to the interests of the company so to do the company shall be entitled to terminate Mr. de Soissons' appointment hereunder as assistant to the managing director on Dec. 31, 1945, or on Dec. 31, 1946, on giving to him three months' previous notice in writing and on such termination of the said appointment becoming effective Mr. de Soissons' appointment hereunder shall be forthwith terminated and in the event of Mr. de Soissons' appointment hereunder being so terminated there shall be paid to Mr. de Soissons by way of compensation for loss of office the amounts following. If the agreement is terminated on Dec. 31, 1945, £10,000; and if terminated on Dec. 31, 1946, £6,000."

The company exercised its option to end the taxpayer's employment on Dec. 31, 1945, and paid the said sum of £10,000 accordingly. The circumstances in which the last agreement was made are set out by the Special Commissioners in the Case stated by them, but, in my judgment, the answer to the problem must be found by applying r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E to the written terms of this last service agreement, and it must be remembered that after Dec. 31, 1944, the taxpayer held his office or employment by virtue of the last agreement alone and only on the terms of that agreement, and that it was under that agreement that the £10,000 was paid to him. Rule 1 provides:

"Tax under this schedule shall be annually charged on every person having or exercising an office or employment of profit mentioned in this schedule . . . in respect of all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites or profits whatsoever therefrom . . ."

Counsel for the taxpayer submits that, although the £10,000 was paid under the agreement constituting the office or employment, it was not a profit arising from the office or employment, but was compensation for the loss of those profits by reason of the premature termination of the employment. This submission found favour with the Special Commissioners, who held that the £10,000 was paid to the taxpayer "as compensation for being deprived of the profits of his office or employment." It involves splitting the agreement into two parts. Clause 1, according to counsel's argument, creates a three-years tenure of office. Clause 5 provides for its premature determination. But, in my judgment, the agreement must be read as a whole. So read, it provides that the taxpayer's employment is to be for three more years unless curtailed under cl. 4 or cl. 5, and that he is to receive as the profits of his employment the payments provided by the agreement including (if the case requires) the payment provided by cl. 5. So regarded, the agreement is intra vires the company, but it would be ultra vires if construed as counsel for the taxpayer would have me construe it. Clause 5 is as much a part of the agreement as cl. 1. Therefore, the taxpayer never had any right to be employed for three more years. Therefore, he had no legal claim which would justify compensation.

There is no case directly in point. Henry v. Foster (A) and Henry v. Foster (J) (1) differ in that the sum was payable on voluntary retirement as well as retirement at the instance of the employer, and this is an important difference, but those cases do show that the parties cannot conclude the matter in favour of the taxpayer by using the phrase "compensation for loss of office" and do contain statements of the principles which I have adopted for the solution of the present case. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (145 L.T. 232):

" . . . if he is entitled to [payment] . . . it must be for services rendered. That is the consideration which he gives to the company and which moves the company to pay him. In the alternative, if his office had ceased . . . if we are not to take into account services rendered, for which a deferred payment is to be made, what right or power would the company have of making a present to his executors . . . inasmuch as the company, to my mind, would have no power to dispose of its funds in the same way as was done in Cowan v. Seymour (2), this payment must be related to the services rendered, and if related to the services rendered, it comes back to being a sum which is a profit which can be asked for and demanded as a profit arising from the office or employment of profit which had up to that time been enjoyed by the director."

A Moreover, in that same case ROMER, L.J., gives a definition of "compensation for loss of office" as follows (145 L.T. 234):

"... it means a payment to the holder of an office as compensation for being deprived of profits to which as between himself and his employer he would, but for an act of deprivation by his employer or some third party such as the legislature, have been entitled."

B I do not know in what sense the Special Commissioners used the term in the present case, but they cannot have used it in the sense indicated by ROMER, L.J., because the due exercise of an option reserved by the contract of employment itself could not be called "an act of deprivation," and it would generally be ultra vires a company to pay compensation for loss of office where the rights of the employee were not being injuriously affected. Nor is Hunter v. Dewhurst (1) in point. There was a very special bargain there which formed no part of the original terms of employment, and nothing was said in that case to suggest that compensation for loss of office can be stipulated for in the very instrument which creates the office.

C Henley v. Murray (3) is again a very different case, but I note the ground on which SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., rejected the Crown's contention in that case that the £2,000 constituted profits from the office or employment. He said (ante, 909):

"... it constituted the consideration payable to the taxpayer for the total abrogation imposed on him of his contract of employment, so that from July 6, 1943, no contract existed under which that figure or any other sum could be paid."

E No such argument is available in the present case. Moreover, the judgment of JENKINS, L.J., contains a passage of general application to this class of case which I respectfully adopt. He says (ante, 911):

F "... the question in each case is whether, on the facts of the case, the lump sum paid is in the nature of remuneration or profits in respect of the office, or is in the nature of a sum paid in consideration of the surrender by the recipient of his rights in respect of the office."

In the present case the taxpayer surrendered no rights. He got exactly what he was entitled to get under his contract of employment. Accordingly, the payment, in my judgment, falls within the taxable class, and the determination of the Special Commissioners must be reversed.

R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS AND ANOTHER.
Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Jones, JJ.), April 4, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction of indictable offence—Committal to quarter sessions for sentence—Offence not triable on indictment at quarter sessions—No power to sentence at quarter sessions—Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (c. 34), s. 1, s. 2—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 29 (3) (a).

By the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29 (1), a court of summary jurisdiction which has convicted a person of an indictable offence triable summarily may commit him for sentence to quarter sessions, which, by s. 29 (3) (a), "shall have power to deal with the offender in any manner in which he could be dealt with by a court of quarter sessions before which he had just been convicted of the offence on indictment." By the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, s. 2 (5) "... quarter sessions shall not have jurisdiction to inquire of, hear, and determine prosecutions on indictments for offences under this Act."

A court of summary jurisdiction convicted a man of an offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, s. 1, and, in view of his bad record, committed him for sentence to quarter sessions under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29 (1).

HELD: as quarter sessions could not have convicted the offender of the offence on indictment they had no power to sentence him under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29 (3), and, therefore, an application by the prosecution for an order of mandamus to quarter sessions to hear and determine the case must be dismissed.

PER LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Indictable offences of a grave nature should not be tried by justices summarily merely because they have that power, even though they can be sent to quarter sessions for sentence. They should be sent for trial to quarter sessions or the assizes.

MOTION by the Director of Public Prosecutions for an order of mandamus to be addressed to justices of Middlesex directing them to hear and determine a case brought before them under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29.

On Feb. 17, 1950, a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Wealdstone, convicted the respondent, Samuel Goldman, of an offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, and on Feb. 24 committed him for sentence to quarter sessions under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29. Quarter sessions held that, being expressly debarred from trying charges on indictment under the Act of 1906, they had no power to sentence the offender under the Act of 1948.

T. F. Southall for the justices.

James Burge for Samuel Goldman.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case the Attorney-General has moved for an order of mandamus directed to the justices of Middlesex to hear and determine a case brought before them under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29. The history of this section is now pretty well known. Before the passing of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, two cases were heard in the Court of Criminal Appeal—R. v. Sheridan (1) and R. v. Grant (2). In each a man charged before justices had elected to be dealt with summarily for an indictable offence, and the justices had consented to deal with him summarily, had heard the evidence, and had convicted him. They then heard that his record was very bad, and, considering that the maximum of six months' imprisonment which they could impose under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts was not a sufficient punishment, they committed him for trial at quarter sessions. At quarter sessions the plea of autrefois convict was put in, and it was held by the Court of Criminal Appeal that that was a good plea, because there had been a conviction by the court of summary jurisdiction although that court had not proceeded to pass sentence. Accordingly, by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, an entirely new procedure was set up, providing, generally speaking, that where an indictable offence could be dealt with summarily, the justices could deal with it summarily so far as the conviction was concerned, and, if they then heard that the prisoner's record was such that they did not consider that their powers were adequate to give proper punishment, they could send him to quarter sessions for sentence. Section 29 (1) of the Act provides:

"... the court may, in lieu of dealing with [the prisoner] in any manner in which the court has power to deal with him, commit him in custody to quarter sessions for sentence in accordance with the following provisions of this section."

Sub-section 2 provides for the court to which the prisoner is to be sent, and sub-s. (3) provides:

"Where an offender is so committed for sentence as aforesaid, the following provisions shall have effect, that is to say:—(a) The appeal committee or court of quarter sessions shall inquire into the circumstances of the case, and shall have power to deal with the offender in any manner in which he could be dealt with by a court of quarter sessions before which he had just been convicted of the offence on indictment..."

The respondent, Samuel Goldman, was charged before justices sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, s. 1, under which a person guilty of the offences therein described is "guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment... for a term not exceeding two years, or to a fine not exceeding £500, or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or on summary conviction to imprisonment... for a term not exceeding four months, or to a fine not exceeding £50 or to both such imprisonment and such fine."

In other words, offences under that Act may be dealt with either on indictment or summarily, and there are two different penalties prescribed. It is not a case of an offence being dealt with either on indictment or, on the election of the prisoner, summarily, like, for instance, larceny or false pretences. There are the two separate provisions—the prisoner may be dealt with either on indictment or in a court of summary jurisdiction.

Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1906 provides that a prosecution for an offence under the Act can only be instituted with the consent of the Attorney-General, and under sub-ss. (5) and (6):

"(5) A court of quarter sessions shall not have jurisdiction to inquire of, hear, and determine prosecutions on indictments for offences under this Act. (6) Any person aggrieved by a summary conviction under this Act may appeal to a court of quarter sessions."

It is curious that an offence created by statute can be dealt with by a court of summary jurisdiction, but, if the offender is committed for trial, the case cannot be heard by quarter sessions who yet have power to hear an appeal from the court of summary jurisdiction. In the present case the justices, having heard of the respondent's record, purported to act under s. 29 and sent him to quarter sessions for sentence, but quarter sessions took the view that they had got no power to sentence him.

In the opinion of the court, quarter sessions were right. No doubt, it is a casus omissus in the Act. The Act says that quarter sessions "... shall have power to deal with the offender in any manner in which he could be dealt with by a court of quarter sessions before which he had just been convicted of the offence on indictment."

This offender could not be dealt with by quarter sessions under that section because he could not have been tried and convicted on indictment before them. It may be that Parliament intended that any case which could be dealt with summarily could be dealt with by quarter sessions under this section, but they have not said so. They have expressly limited the case in the way described by the words used, and, as this is an entirely statutory procedure, it is obviously necessary that the provisions of the statute should be complied with strictly. We have been given an interesting list by the Attorney-General of other cases in which this same point may arise. It may be, therefore, that, if attention is called to this difficulty, the legislature may see fit to put the matter right, but, as it is, we think that the point which has been taken is a good one.

I would like to direct attention to one other matter. When giving addresses to justices, I have over and over again called their attention to the fact that because they have power to deal with a case summarily, that is by no means a reason why they necessarily should do so. It is not only a question of sentence. Many cases brought before justices, which they can deal with, are of a very grave character and ought to be sent for trial. There may be matters of mitigation in the case, so that the justices may think (and it may turn out) that the court before whom the case is brought in the end may only pass a nominal sentence or even bind the prisoner over. That, however, is not the point. Serious cases ought to be dealt with by the superior courts, and I hope, because Parliament has introduced this new method, prosecutors will not consider it sufficient to get justices to deal with cases and commit offenders for sentence only. Grave cases ought to be dealt with by a court of assize or a court of quarter sessions. Here a man was found guilty by justices of what appears to be a very serious offence—offering a food enforcement officer a bribe of £80—and other convictions are recorded against him. Why the Director of Public Prosecutions or his representative agreed to have the case dealt with summarily, I do not know. It is a case which ought to have gone for trial. I hope notice will be taken by justices of the fact that, when serious cases are brought before them, it is not enough to say: "We have got power to deal with the case, and, therefore, we will deal with it." They ought to consider whether it is not a case which should go forward to a court of assize or a court of quarter sessions as being the proper court to deal with serious cases. This application fails and will be dismissed.

DENNIS REED, LTD. v. GOODY AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Hodson, J.), March 24, 27, 28, April 4, 1950.]

Agent—Estate agent—Commission—Contract to pay commission on introduction of person “ready, able and willing to purchase”—Introduction of potential purchaser—Withdrawal by purchaser before completion.

The defendants, a husband and wife, instructed a firm of estate agents to find a purchaser for their house, and on May 11, 1949, the wife signed a printed form, prepared by the estate agents, which contained the following clause: “I hereby instruct you to find a person ready, able and willing to purchase the ... property for the sum of £2,825 or such other price to which I shall assent. Upon your introducing such a person I will pay you commission in accordance with the Incorporated Society’s scale ... I further authorise that, should you consider it desirable so to do, you shall be at liberty to obtain and execute a contract on my behalf.” The form also contained a statement that no road charges were outstanding. On May 17, 1949, the agents introduced H. as a potential purchaser, and on May 20 H. signed an agreement to buy the house for £2,750. The agreement contained a clause that, if any road charges were outstanding, the vendor would indemnify the purchaser. The defendants agreed to the price of £2,750, but wished to consult their solicitors before accepting the offer. The defendants’ solicitors thereupon drew up a draft agreement which contained no clause about road charges. The draft was approved by H.’s solicitors, but H. refused to sign it and withdrew his offer. The agents claimed the full commission from the defendants on the ground that, under the terms of the agreement contained in the form signed by the wife on May 11, commission became payable on the introduction by the plaintiffs of a person who made an offer to buy and was ready, able and willing to purchase at the time of the offer.

HELD : the words “upon your introducing” signified merely the services to be rendered by the agents, and not the time when the agents became entitled to commission, and, under the terms of the contract, the agents became entitled to commission, not when they had introduced a person willing to make an offer or even willing to enter into a contract, but when they had introduced a person who was ready, able and willing to complete the purchase; on the facts of the case, the agents had not introduced a purchaser who was “ready, able and willing to purchase,” because (a) H., the prospective purchaser, was not willing at the material time, having refused to complete the contract, and (b) the qualification in respect of road charges took him out of the category of a willing purchaser and, therefore, the agents were not entitled to commission.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of His Honour JUDGE NEAL, made at Maidstone County Court, and dated Jan. 30, 1950, whereby he dismissed the plaintiffs' claim to commission on the introduction by them to the defendants of a prospective purchaser of the defendants' house.

The plaintiffs based their claim on a written contract contained in a form which was prepared by them and signed by Mrs. Goody, the second defendant, on May 11, 1949. The form contained the details of the house and a statement that there were no road charges outstanding, and at the end of the form was the following clause: "I hereby instruct you to find a person ready, able and willing to purchase the above property for the sum of £2,825 or such other price to which I shall assent. Upon your introducing such a person I will pay you commission in accordance with the Incorporated Society's scale . . . I further authorise that, should you consider it desirable so to do, you shall be at liberty to obtain and execute a contract on my behalf." On May 17 the plaintiffs introduced a Mr. Himsley as a potential purchaser. Mr. Himsley offered to purchase the house for £2,750, and the defendants agreed to that price. On May 20 Mr. Himsley signed an agreement to buy the house from the defendants for £2,750 and paid a deposit of £275 to the plaintiffs as agents for the defendants. By the terms of the agreement the purchase was to be completed and vacant possession given to the purchaser on or before July 8, 1949, and there was a clause at the end of the agreement, inserted at Mr. Himsley's request, that the vendor would indemnify the purchaser against any road charges which might be outstanding. The defendants refused to sign the agreement until they had consulted their solicitors, and it was eventually agreed that the defendants' solicitors should prepare a draft agreement for the sale of the house. The defendants' solicitors prepared a draft contract which contained no reference to road charges. This draft was approved, with some slight alterations, by the solicitors who were acting for Mr. Himsley in the matter. The defendants signed their part of the contract, but Mr. Himsley, on finding that there was no clause relating to road charges, informed his solicitors that such a clause must be E inserted before he would sign the draft. As a result of a telephone conversation between Mr. Himsley's solicitors and the defendants' solicitors, the defendants agreed to the insertion of such a clause, but in the meanwhile, on June 21, Mr. Himsley wrote to his solicitors refusing to proceed with the purchase. The plaintiffs contended that they had introduced a purchaser who was ready, able and willing to purchase the property for a sum to which the defendants had assented, and, therefore, under the contract of May 11, 1949, they were entitled to the commission. The county court judge found that the negotiations broke down through the fault of Mr. Himsley and not through the fault of the defendants, and he held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to commission under the contract of May 11, 1949, as there was not at the material time a person willing to purchase the house.

Apr. 4. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: The plaintiffs, who are house agents, brought an action against Mr. and Mrs. Goody, the owners of a certain house, for £76 5s., which they claimed to be due to them by way of commission. His Honour JUDGE NEAL decided that the defendants were not liable and hence this appeal.

On May 11, 1949, a clerk of the plaintiffs visited the house, and Mrs. Goody, the second defendant, signed a form which constitutes the agreement sued on. It was orally agreed at the same time that the appointment of the plaintiffs as sole agents was to be for a period of one month. Part of the document is printed, but the details of the house, etc., are typed in. The material parts of the document are as follows:

E "Date when vacant possession will be given? Six or eight weeks from date deposit is paid. Are any road or paving charges outstanding? No. Do you desire to appoint us as your sole agent? Yes. I hereby instruct you to find a person ready, able and willing to purchase the above property for the sum of £2,825 or such other price to which I shall assent. Upon your introducing such a person I will pay you commission in accordance with the Incorporated Society's scale . . . I further authorise that, should you consider it desirable so to do, you shall be at liberty to obtain and execute a contract on my behalf."

F Nothing more was said at this interview about road charges. The defendants in their defence admitted that on May 11, 1949, they gave written instructions to the plaintiffs to find a person ready, able and willing to purchase the freehold of the said property for £2,825, or such other price to which they should assent, and agreed that, on the plaintiffs introducing such a person, they would pay to the plaintiffs commission in accordance with the Incorporated Society's scale. The sole question, therefore, is whether, on a proper interpretation of G these words, the plaintiffs introduced such a person.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The case made for the plaintiffs was that on May 20, 1949, a Mr. Himsley made an unqualified offer in writing to purchase the house for a sum which had already been agreed between the parties, and on terms which were reasonable and acceptable to the defendants. The plaintiffs had, therefore, on that date introduced a person ready, able and H willing to purchase the house, and the defendants were under an obligation to pay the sum which they had contracted to pay to the plaintiffs on introducing such a person. After a prolonged and very careful hearing, the learned judge came to the following conclusions. (i) The commission was due as soon as the introduction had been effected of a person possessing the qualities of readiness, ability and willingness on which the contract depends, and on proof, so far as the court was concerned, by the plaintiffs that those conditions were fulfilled. (ii) The qualities of readiness and ability, etc., must refer to some future time, because the agreement could not reasonably be interpreted as meaning that the person expressing his readiness to purchase had £2,825 in legal tender in his pocket at that moment of time when he expressed his willingness to buy. (iii) The proper time at which the court should decide whether the proposed purchaser was ready, able and willing to purchase was the time of the hearing. The learned judge summed up the matter thus:

"Although the condition of the qualities of the person introduced is to be judged as at the time of the introduction, the proof of those qualities must be extracted and given at the time of the hearing . . . If ability [to pay] is to be judged by power to perform the act at the proper time, willingness should also be judged by willingness to perform the act at the proper time. On June 21 the proper time had not passed, but the willingness had."

Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the decision of the learned judge was based on an erroneous interpretation of the critical words in the agreement sued on and the correct interpretation was that the commission was payable as soon as the agents had found Mr. Himsley, who was on May 20 a person ready and willing to purchase the property as proved by his signature to the agreement, and was, in fact, ready and able to purchase it because he owned assets sufficient to enable him to produce the purchase money at the time of completion of the contract of purchase. I think there is considerable weight in this argument. It seems to me that the plaintiffs place an interpretation on the words which would, in effect, make them equivalent to words such as "on introduction of a purchaser." I think the words of this clause which are in question are intended to give to the agents a claim to commission in circumstances which fall short of the execution of an enforceable contract on both sides. I do not think it unreasonable that house agents should try to arrange for their claim to commission to be earned in some cases where a sale through their introduction of a person willing to purchase is not in fact effected. In my opinion, if, subsequently to May 20, the defendants had refused to sell, while the purchaser remained willing and able to purchase, the commission would have been payable. The fatal defect in the plaintiffs' claim in this case, in my opinion, is that it was the purchaser, and not the defendants, who withdrew from the negotiations. On the other hand, the plaintiffs' claim to commission is, in my opinion, not established merely by showing that Mr. Himsley, the person whom they introduced, was able and willing to purchase the property at any one particular moment of time. They must prove that he was ready, able and willing to purchase up to the time when an enforceable contract for the purchase of the house was made between the parties, or, alternatively, up to a time when the defendants refused to enter into such a contract on terms on which Mr. Himsley was willing to purchase and the defendants were at one time willing to sell. In this case the judge decided that the conduct of the defendants in refusing to sign the draft agreement on May 20 and in failing to sign a contract before Mr. Himsley retired from the transaction was not unreasonable. I agree with the judge's decision on that point. I base my opinion in this case on the ground that Mr. Himsley, although ready, able and willing to purchase the house on May 20, changed his mind before the date for completion had passed, and it was his conduct, and not the conduct of the vendors, which caused the negotiations to break down. He was therefore, in my opinion, not a person ready, able and willing to purchase the house within the proper meaning of those words in the contract of agency sued on. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: In this case a firm of estate agents claim to be entitled to full commission although they never succeeded in effecting a sale. They only introduced a person who made a qualified offer and who withdrew it before any contract was concluded. The house owner was not at fault, but nevertheless the agents claim commission. They base it on a document which the house owner signed, and the case really depends on the true interpretation of that document. So many cases have now come before the courts on claims by house agents to commission that the document cannot, I think, be interpreted in vacuo. It must be interpreted in the light of the general law on the subject which I will endeavour to state.

- When a house owner puts his house into the hands of an estate agent, the ordinary understanding is that the agent is only to receive a commission if he succeeds in effecting a sale, but, if not, he is entitled to nothing. That has been well understood for the last hundred years or more: see Simpson v. Lamb (1), per JERVIS, C.J. (17 C.B. 616), and Prickett v. Badger (2), per WILLIAMS, J. (1 C.B.N.S. 305). The agent in practice takes what is a business risk. He takes on himself the expense of preparing particulars and advertising the property in return for the substantial remuneration—reckoned by a percentage of the price—which he will receive if he succeeds in finding a purchaser: see Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3), per LORD WRIGHT ([1941] 1 All E.R. 55, 56). No particular words are needed to create the relationship. All the familiar expressions “please find a purchaser,” “find someone to buy my house,” “sell my house for me,” and so on, mean the same thing. They mean that the agent is employed on the usual terms, but none of them gives any precise guide as to what is the event on which the agent is to be paid. The common understanding of men is, however, that the agent’s commission is payable out of the purchase price. The services rendered by the agent may be merely an introduction. He is entitled to commission if his introduction is the efficient cause in bringing about the sale: see Nightingale v. Parsons (4), but that does not mean that the commission is payable at the moment of the introduction.
- It is only payable on completion of the sale. The house owner wants to find a man who will actually buy his house and pay for it. He does not want a man who will only make an offer or sign a contract. He wants a purchaser “able to purchase and able to complete as well”: see James v. Smith (5), per BANKES, L.J. ([1931] 2 K.B. 318), and Martin v. Perry & Daw (6). Some confusion has arisen because of the undoubted fact that, once there is a binding contract for sale, the vendor cannot withdraw from it except at the risk of having to pay the agent his commission. This has led some people to suppose that commission is payable as soon as a contract is signed, and I said so myself in McCallum v. Hicks (7) ante, p. 866. This, however, is not correct. The reason why the vendor is liable in such a case is because, once he repudiates the contract, the purchaser is no longer bound to do any more towards completion, and the vendor cannot rely on the non-completion in order to avoid payment of commission, because it is due to his own fault: see Roberts v. Bury Improvement Comrs. (8) (L.R. 5 C.P. 326), and Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3), per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1941] 1 All E.R. 45), and per LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 55, 56). If, however, the vendor could show that the purchaser would not, in any event, have been able or willing to complete, he would not be liable for commission: see British and Beningtons v. North Western Cachar Tea Co. (9), per LORD SUMNER ([1923] A.C. 72). When it is not the vendor, but the purchaser, who withdraws, the case is entirely different, for, even though a binding contract has been made, nevertheless, if the purchaser is unable or unwilling to complete, the agent is not entitled to his commission: see James v. Smith (5), per ATKIN, L.J. ([1931] 2 K.B. 322), and Martin v. Perry & Daw (6).
- The vendor is not bound to bring an action for specific performance or for damages simply to enable the agent to get commission. If, however, the vendor does get his money, he would probably be liable to pay the commission out of it. It only remains to add that, when no binding contract has been made, the vendor can himself withdraw at any time without being liable to pay commission: see Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3). A fortiori, if the purchaser withdraws, the vendor is not liable for commission.

It is against that background that we have to interpret this document. Some estate agents have recently put a special clause in their printed forms, and used special words in their confirming letters. Their object is to get commission if they introduce a person who makes an offer to buy on the named terms, even though it never becomes a binding contract. It often happens that a house owner put his house in the hands of several agents, and each of the agents introduces someone who makes an offer. According to the agents, the house owner is liable under this new clause to pay commission, not only on the one offer which he accepts, but also on the other offers which he refuses. This contention has actually succeeded in at least one case that has come before the courts, and the house owner has found himself liable to pay double commission: see E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (10). In the present case the agents go further. They say that, once an offer is made by someone whom they introduce, they are entitled to commission, even though the offer is withdrawn by him the next day. They say that, if the person introduced is ready, able and willing at the time of the offer, that is sufficient, even if he thereafter becomes unable or unwilling. The new clause has been described by judges of this court as "rather stringent" and "rather undesirable." If it has the effect for which the agents contend, these descriptions are not one whit too strong. When an agent gets an offer which the house owner does not accept, it might be quite reasonable for the agent to ask for his out-of-pocket expenses or even for a reasonable reward for his time and labour, but it is not reasonable for him to ask for full commission at the same rate as if he had actually procured a sale. The commission is a substantial remuneration, not based on the time, labour or money expended—which may be little—but on a percentage of the purchase price. Remuneration on such a scale cannot be justified except on the footing that it is to come out of the purchase money, and should, therefore, in reason only be payable on completion of the purchase. I know that agents often say that they have earned their commission when they have done their part. That, however, is a fallacy. An agent does not earn commission as a labourer earns wages. Even though he has done his part, he does not become entitled to his commission until the purchase is completed.

It is necessary to consider the reasonableness of this clause, because, if it is capable of two interpretations, one reasonable and the other unreasonable, we ought to give it the reasonable one—all the more so in this case because of the way in which the document came to be signed. The clerk to the estate agents went to see the housewife and asked her for particulars of the house which she and her husband wanted to sell. He wrote all the particulars down on a printed form, asked her to read them through, which she did, and then asked her to sign the form. He told her it was "merely a routine matter" and she signed it. The document in fact contained at its foot the special clause. The clerk admitted that he did not explain the meaning of it to her. She herself, apparently, did not notice it, but signed because she thought the agents were all right. The clerk did not leave her a copy of the form, so she did not know what she had signed. She certainly had no reason for thinking that she was committing herself to any other than the usual terms on which estate agents are employed. In this situation, if the clause does mean what the agents contend, it may well be that the courts would not enforce it. The courts might well say to the agents: "If you insert stringent terms, giving you more than is reasonable, without explaining what you have done, you shall not have the aid of these courts to enforce them." That, however, would be a strong course to take, and the courts prefer to construe the terms so as to give them a reasonable effect: see John Lee & Son (Grantham), Ltd. v. Railway Executive (11).

On consideration of this clause I am satisfied that it is capable of a reasonable construction. The words "upon your introducing" do not mean that commission becomes due at the moment of introduction. The introduction takes place when the order to view is given, and no one knows then whether the person introduced will like the house or not. The words "upon your introducing" cannot, therefore, signify the time when an agent becomes entitled to commission, but can only signify the services to be rendered by the agent. They mean "In consideration of your introducing." Now, whom must the agent introduce? He must introduce:

- A " . . . a person ready, able and willing to purchase the above property for the sum of £2,825 or such other price to which I shall assent."

These words do not mean a person ready, able and willing "to make an offer," or even "to enter into a contract." They mean a person ready, able and willing "to purchase," i.e., to complete the purchase. He must be a person who is "able" at the proper time to complete, i.e., he must then have the necessary financial resources. He must also be "ready," i.e., he must have made all necessary preparations by having the cash or a banker's draft ready to hand over. He must also be "willing," i.e., he must be willing to hand over the money in return for the conveyance. This interpretation means that the special clause has practically the same effect as the usual terms on which an estate agent is employed. This is just as it should be, for, having regard to what took place when the housewife was asked to sign the document, I should not expect it to go beyond the ordinary understanding on these matters.

- C So far I have considered this particular clause only. I would, however, like to add that the various new clauses that have appeared seem to be capable of a similar interpretation. I can see no sensible distinction between instructions to "find a purchaser," "find a party prepared to purchase," "find a purchaser able and willing to complete the transaction," and "find a person ready, willing and able to purchase." The rights and liabilities of house owners in these cases should not depend on fine verbal differences. If estate agents desire to get full commission, not only on sales, but also on offers, they must use "clear and unequivocal language": see Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3), per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1941] 1 All E.R. 47). Such a claim is, indeed, so contrary to the ordinary understanding on these matters, that I think that the estate agent who desires it should bring it specifically to the notice of the house owner and get his specific agreement to it.

- E E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (10) might, at first sight, appear to be against the views that I have expressed, but there it was admitted that Mr. Payne was a person "ready, willing and able to purchase," so the court was not called on to consider the meaning of the words. A later decision, Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (12) seems to show that the admission was erroneous, because it was there held that a person who had made an offer "subject to contract" or "subject to survey" could not be said to be "willing" to purchase. It seems to follow that [in Rolfe's case (9)] Mr. Payne, who had made no offer, not even an offer "subject to contract," could not be said to be "willing" to purchase. Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (12) does not, however, decide at what time the purchaser must be willing. He must, I think, be willing up to the time for completion, unless he has been previously absolved by the vendor's withdrawal from the contract. What E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (10) does show, however, is that, if once this clause is given the stringent effect contended for by the agents, there is no implied term which will protect a reasonable vendor—for Mr. and Mrs. Rolfe were reasonable enough. The only solution is to give the clause itself a reasonable interpretation. The result of Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (12) also is that the three cases at first instance of Giddys v. Horsfall (13), E. H. Bennett and Partners v. Millett (14), and Dennis Reed, Ltd. v. Nicholls (15) can no longer be regarded as of authority, for in each of them the offer was "subject to contract."

Applying the interpretation which I have stated, I am of opinion that the agents here never introduced a person who was ready, able and willing to purchase. They introduced Mr. Himsley, who was at the beginning willing to make an offer, willing, indeed, to sign a contract, but never willing to make an open offer or to sign an open contract, nor, as it turned out, willing to complete. He backed out before a contract was concluded and the sale went off without any fault of the vendor. The agents are, therefore, not entitled to commission.

HODSON, J: This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE NEAL, who gave judgment for the defendants on Jan. 30, 1950, in an action in which the plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, claimed commission on a contract of agency entered into between the plaintiffs and the second defendant on May 11, 1949. The terms of the contract are contained in a document prepared by the plaintiffs on a printed form giving particulars of the property to be sold and the answers to various questions, one of which gave a negative reply to the question: "Are any road or paving charges outstanding?" At the end of the document above the signature are the following words:

"I hereby instruct you to find a person ready, able and willing to purchase the above property for the sum of £2,825 or such other price to which I shall assent. Upon your introducing such a person I will pay you commission in accordance with the Incorporated Society's scale, i.e., five per cent. on the first £300 of the purchase price, 2½ per cent. on the next £4,700 and 1½ per cent. on the balance. I further authorise that, should you consider it desirable so to do, you shall be at liberty to obtain and execute a contract on my behalf."

The main question in the appeal turns on the construction of the last clause. The learned county court judge found that there was not at the material time a person willing to purchase. The plaintiffs found a person, a Mr. Himsley, who, they contend, was ready, able and willing to purchase the property for the sum of £2,750 to which the defendants (whom I will call the vendors) assented. On May 20 Mr. Himsley signed a paper which contained an offer of the sum of £2,750. This, the plaintiffs contend, was an unqualified offer on the making of which commission became immediately payable. The offer was not immediately accepted by the vendors since they desired to consult their solicitors before so doing. On June 21, before the offer was accepted, the proposed purchaser withdrew his offer. The vendors, through no fault of their own, as the learned county court judge found, gained no benefit from the contract of agency, since it was not they, but the purchaser, who withdrew, and it would seem surprising that a contract should be drawn so as to make them liable to pay commission in such an event. Moreover, if there is any ambiguity in the contract, it must be construed contra proferentem.

Much turns on the time when the person referred to is to be ready, able and willing to purchase. There would appear to be three possible times when the readiness, ability and willingness must exist. (i) The time of the introduction of the qualified person. This is the contention of the plaintiffs who seek to synchronise the time of introduction with the moment when the offer was made, itself a proposition not without difficulty. (ii) The time of completion of the contract. (iii) The time when the contract for purchase was entered into. The last two are the alternative contentions of the vendors.

In support of their construction the plaintiffs argue that this contract is of the kind envisaged by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3), where he said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 40):

"There is the class [of contract] in which the agent is promised a commission by his principal if he succeeds in introducing to his principal a person who makes an adequate offer, usually an offer of not less than the stipulated amount. If that is all that is needed in order to earn his reward, it is obvious that he is entitled to be paid when this has been done, whether his principal accepts the offer and carries through the bargain or not."

This passage, however, must be read in conjunction with the warning words of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in his speech, where he said (ibid., 47):

A "It is possible that an owner may be willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or minimum price, but such a construction of the contract would, in my opinion, require clear and unequivocal language."

B The plaintiffs argue that the word "upon" in the contract is temporal, so that, when the offer was made, since the person introduced had then the necessary qualifications of ability, readiness and willingness, they became immediately entitled to sue for their commission. It makes no difference, according to this argument, whether the willingness persisted. Whether the sale goes off or not, it is said that the agent can sue before the purchase is completed. Reliance was placed on a decision of LYNKEY, J., in Dennis Reed, Ltd. v. Nicholls (15) where the words of the contract of agency corresponded very closely with those in this case, and on the decision of the Court of Appeal in E. P. Nelson & Co. v. Rolfe (10). In these two cases it is to be observed that the vendors withdrew before the contracts for sale were signed and no question arose as to the point of time to which the willingness or other qualities of the purchaser related. Indeed, in the last-named case, willingness and the other requisite qualities were admitted. At the time when the vendors drew back, the purchasers were still able and willing, and there was no reason to draw any inference from the facts other than that the ability and willingness would persist until the time for completion arrived. These cases are not, therefore, authority for the proposition that the willingness need exist only at the time when the offer is made in pursuance of the contract of agency, which is put forward to enable the agent to succeed. The agent was still entitled to succeed in those cases, because he had fulfilled his part of the bargain by introducing a person who fulfilled the required qualifications, and to bring his action before the time of completion or the time of execution of the contract for purchase. Similarly in Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (12), attention was not directed to the period of time after the vendor had withdrawn.

E Some reliance was placed on the decision of the Court of Appeal in James v. Smith (5), a case turning on the meaning of ability to purchase. There the sale went off because of the inability of the purchaser to find the price and the agent was held not to be entitled to his commission. ATKIN, L.J., used these words ([1931] 2 K.B. 322):

G "I think that 'ability' does not depend upon whether the purchaser has the money in hand at the time; to my mind it is a question of fact. I do not think it depends upon whether he has a binding agreement by which some third person is obliged to provide him with resources to carry out the contract. I think it is sufficient if it is proved by the agent or by the purchaser that the circumstances are such that if the vendor had been ready and willing to carry out his contract, he on his part at the proper time could have found the necessary money to perform his obligation."

H From this it appears that the ability to find the money at the proper time even though capable of proof in a variety of ways, means ability to find it at the time of completion. It is logical to read all the necessary qualities as bearing on that time. Moreover, the word "purchaser" of itself denotes completion of purchase, as was pointed out by HILBERY, J., ([1948] 2 All E.R. 931) in E. H. Bennett & Partners v. Millett (14) although the word may be qualified by other words used in connection with it. It is unnecessary to decide whether the word "purchase" in this contract has its primary meaning of completion of purchase or its secondary meaning of contract to purchase, since the purchaser withdrew his offer on June 21, 1949, before either event took place. On my reading of the contract, the word "upon" in the phrase "upon your introduction" is properly to be construed in a causal sense, and not temporally. The sale of the property having gone off by reason of the fact that on June 21 the purchaser ceased to be willing, in my opinion, on a true construction of the contract of agency dated May 11, the appeal fails, since on the evidence the purchaser was not willing at the proper time. In my judgment, the appeal also fails on other grounds. A

In order that the plaintiffs should succeed on the construction contended for by them, which I have rejected, they must, in any event, prove that the offer was an unqualified offer and within the terms contained in the contract of agency. The offer dated May 20, 1949, begins by setting out the names of the parties and recites the particulars of the property and goes on to deal with the payment to the agents of the deposit money and the date for completion and vacant possession. It also deals with the rights and claims to which the vendor is or may be entitled in development value in respect of the restricted user under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and the vendor is described as covenanting with the purchaser to do everything necessary to enforce any rights which he may have under that Act. Finally, at the end of the document there appears this paragraph: B C

"It is clearly understood that the purchaser is purchasing on the understanding that the road charges are paid in respect of the property, or, if not, the vendor will indemnify him against any road charges which may be outstanding."

If the offer was qualified, the purchaser was not willing: see the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade (12), where it was held that offers subject to contract or subject to survey take the offerors outside the category of willing purchasers. In this case, in my judgment, the qualification as to indemnity in respect of road charges is sufficient to take the purchaser out of the category of willingness, notwithstanding that the vendor had already given a negative reply to the question: "Are there any road or paving charges outstanding?" Further, the only contract which the plaintiffs were empowered to enter into with the purchaser on behalf of the vendors was an open contract in which only the parties, property and price were settled. The offer which was prepared by the plaintiffs and signed by the purchaser goes beyond this in various respects, first, as to the provision for deposit; secondly, as to the road charges; thirdly, in connection with rights under the Town and Country Planning Acts; and, fourthly, in the fixing of the date for vacant possession and completion. Readiness, willingness and ability to purchase must have relation to the vendor. The vendors in this case gave no authority to the plaintiffs for the inclusion of these terms, and, until the vendors had assented to the new terms, no offer within the scope of the agent's authority had been made. It is no answer to say that the terms were, or ought to have been, acceptable to the vendors. It was reasonable in any event for the vendors to have an opportunity of consulting their solicitors before entering into a contract for a sale of land—which is the very course they took on the offer of May 20 being made to them. On these grounds also, in my judgment, the appeal fails. D E F G

Practice—Summary judgment—Leave to sign judgment—Set-off and counterclaim—Bill of exchange given in pursuance of contract—Claim by defendants for damages for breach—R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1.

A The plaintiffs sued the defendants as the acceptors of a bill of exchange and applied for liberty to sign judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for the amount of the bill and interest. The defendants filed an affidavit in opposition, alleging that the bill was given in pursuance of a contract which the plaintiffs had broken, in respect of which breach the defendants were entitled to unliquidated damages in excess of the amount of the bill, and they contended that they were entitled to set-off against the plaintiffs' claim a sufficient amount of the damages to extinguish it. The master gave leave to sign judgment subject to a stay of execution pending trial of the defendants' counterclaim. On appeal by both parties to the judge, the defendants' appeal was dismissed and the plaintiffs' appeal against the stay was allowed. On the defendants' appeal to the Court of Appeal,

C HELD: having regard to the authorities, it was impossible to say that, in giving liberty to sign immediate judgment without a stay, the judge was guilty of an improper exercise of his discretion, and the appeal should be dismissed.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of LYNSEY, J., in chambers, made on Nov. 11, 1949, giving the plaintiffs leave to sign final judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1.

H On the plaintiffs' application under Ord. 14, r. 1, to sign final judgment in respect of their claim on a bill of exchange of which the defendants were the acceptors, the master gave leave to sign judgment subject to a stay of execution pending trial of the defendants' counterclaim. Both parties appealed to the judge, and LYNSEY, J., allowed the plaintiffs' appeal, and dismissed that of the defendants.

Before the Court of Appeal counsel for the plaintiffs took a preliminary point that, a form of consent to the dismissal of the appeal having been signed by the defendants and initialled by the president of the Court of Appeal, the defendants were precluded from proceeding on a fresh notice of appeal, although no order dismissing the original appeal had been made. The Court of Appeal gave judgment as reported, ante, p. 341, allowing the appeal to proceed.

Apr. 5. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment of the court. The plaintiffs' claim in this case was (i) for £20,000 (and £575 6s. 10d. interest) against the defendants as acceptors of a bill of exchange for that amount, and (ii) for £15,141 odd for work and materials. This court is not concerned with the second head of claim. As regards the claim on the bill of exchange, the plaintiffs, in proceedings for summary judgment under Ord. 14, swore a common form affidavit verifying the cause of action. The defendants put in an affidavit in opposition to judgment by one Lane (the contents of which will be considered later) indicating an intention to counterclaim. The master gave the plaintiffs liberty to sign judgment for £20,000, plus £575 interest, subject to a stay of execution pending trial of the defendants' counterclaim. Both parties appealed from the master's decision, the defendants asking for unconditional leave to defend, the plaintiffs asking that the stay pending trial of the counterclaim be removed. LYNSKEY, J., before whom these appeals came, dismissed the defendants' appeal and allowed the plaintiffs' appeal against the stay—that is to say, he gave the plaintiffs liberty to sign immediate judgment for the amount claimed on the bill and interest. From that decision the defendants' appeal to this court, reiterating their request for unconditional leave to defend.

The affidavit in opposition to judgment which was before the master, sworn by Lane, the defendants' managing director, can be summarised as follows. He deposed that early in 1948 the defendants employed the plaintiffs to repair and alter a ship. There was a specification and estimate for £15,000. He alleges that it was a condition of this contract that the repairs and alterations should be completed in time for the ship to reach Palermo by Dec. 1, 1948. He says that later there was a contract to pay reasonable charges for repairs up to £40,000 subject to the same conditions, the reason for which was that the ship had been chartered to carry displaced persons at a very high profit (£100,000) conditionally on its being ready by Dec. 1, 1948. He goes on to say that it was later agreed to raise the maximum of the repairs, etc., to £50,000, of which the defendants paid the plaintiffs £30,000 on account, and have accepted a bill of exchange for £20,000 for the balance. He says the plaintiffs violated the condition—failed to complete the repairs within the stipulated time—and that the defendants have lost a profit of £100,000. The defendants, therefore, have a counterclaim for breach of contract far over-topping the claim on the bill of exchange and are entitled to set-off a sufficient amount thereof to extinguish the claim. There was no affidavit in reply to this before the master, who, as has been seen, gave liberty to sign judgment on the bill of exchange subject to a stay of execution.

Before LYNSKEY, J., on appeal, there was an affidavit in reply sworn by one Raeside, secretary of the plaintiff company, which is completely at variance with the case set up in the defendants' affidavit. This deponent denies the successive sums of £15,000, £40,000 and £50,000 alleged as successive contractual maxima in that affidavit and alleges a contract to do the work contracted for, subject to the approval of the Ministry of Transport, on the plaintiffs' usual terms, that is to say, cost plus certain specified percentages. He denies that it was a condition of the contract that the ship should be ready to reach Palermo by Dec. 1, 1948. He says that Lane on Oct. 4, 1948, had said he had £200,000 worth of stores at Malta, much of which had been stolen, and requested that, to save further loss, the ship might be ready by Oct. 20. The plaintiffs never promised this, but had said they would do their best; and the ship would, so far as their part was concerned, in fact have been at Palermo before Dec. 1, 1948, but for circumstances such as running aground on Oct. 21 and losing her stern anchor in trials in early November—circumstances for which the plaintiffs were in no degree responsible. He says that Mr. Lane gave him the bill for £20,000, dated Nov. 1, on Nov. 5 or 6 as a payment on account. (No doubt part of the consideration was also release of the ship from the plaintiffs' lien as repairers).

The position in law arising on these affidavits is, therefore, shortly, that the plaintiffs sue on a bill of exchange and the defendants seek to prevent the plaintiffs from having liberty to sign immediate judgment without a stay by alleging that the bill was given in pursuance of a contract which the plaintiffs have broken and for which the defendants claim unliquidated damages in excess of the amount of the bill. On these materials the judge has given liberty to sign judgment for the amount of the bill with interest and without any stay. This court has recently decided in Morgan & Son, Ltd. v. S. Martin Johnson & Co., Ltd. (1) that where the matters relied on by the defendant, although not strictly matters of defence, would before the Judicature Acts have been regarded by a court of equity as ground for relief by way of equitable set-off, the proper order to make under Ord. 14 procedure as a general rule is that the defendant have unconditional leave to defend and not that the plaintiff recover judgment with execution stayed until the trial of the counterclaim.

The question raised in the present appeal is whether this rule applies to an action between immediate parties to a bill of exchange, where the matters relied on by the defendant afford no defence under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. In such cases, although it is not easy wholly to reconcile the authorities, a rule more favourable to the plaintiff has in general prevailed, the court treating the execution of a bill of exchange either as analogous to a payment of cash, or as amounting to an independent contract within the wider contract in pursuance of which it was executed, and not dependent as regards its enforcement on due performance of the latter. Counsel for the plaintiffs cited in particular three cases which illustrate this rule or tendency. Some of them are pre-Judicature Act and pre-Ord. 14 cases.

The first in order of time is Glennie v. Imri (2), a case decided on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer in 1839, long before the days of Ord. 14. The plaintiff sued on a bill of exchange given for goods sold and delivered. The defendant, using the language of that day, set up that he had been “... fraudulently deceived in his contract, the goods delivered being inferior both in quality and quantity to what he had ordered: Held, that he could not maintain a bill for an account and for an injunction to restrain the action, inasmuch as his object was to reduce the amount of the bill of exchange by the damages which he claimed for the alleged breach of contract,” and that, as this was not the subject of set-off in law, it could not be the subject of an account in equity. “Courts of equity will not take an account of debts one way and damages the other.” A court of law would say you must pay the bill first and then bring an action for the fraud, and, apparently, where a bill of exchange was concerned, equity in this matter followed the law.

The second case cited to us under this head was Warwick v. Nairn (3). The plaintiff supplied the defendant with goods under a contract and drew a bill of exchange for £313 odd of which all but £108 odd was in respect of their price. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff promised that the goods should be of a certain quality and that he accepted the bill of exchange on the faith of that promise, which, he alleged, had been broken. On demurrer this was held a bad plea. During the argument POLLOCK, C.B., said (10 Exch. 764):

"The payment by a bill of exchange is to be taken as the payment of so much cash; the defendant ought to satisfy the bill and proceed upon the remedy for the breach of warranty."

Counsel arguing in support of the demurrer contended that such a partial failure of consideration cannot be pleaded to a bill of exchange or promissory note. PARKE, B., intervened and stopped him with the observation (ibid.):

"The subject-matter of the plea [the alleged inferior quality of the goods] has been held on several occasions to afford no defence to an action on a bill of exchange: Morgan v. Richardson (4) and Trickey v. Larne (5) are direct authorities against the plea."

There might, it appears, have been a defence if it had been alleged that the goods tendered had not been of the contract description and had been rejected, for then there would have been no consideration and this is a defence to an action on a bill of exchange, but in the actual case the "inferior" goods were retained by the deliverer, and the failure of consideration, therefore, partial only. So also in the present case. The same principle was applied in Jackson v. Murphy (6). In Court v. Sheen (7), a different result was reached on similar facts, and the plaintiff was refused liberty to sign immediate judgment. But the case is even more shortly reported than Jackson v. Murphy (6), and it is difficult or impossible to say on what grounds it proceeded.

Lastly, among the bill of exchange cases is that of Anglo-Italian Bank v. Wells (8). The plaintiffs, by specially endorsed writ, sued the defendants on certain promissory notes and took out a summons under Ord. 14. The defendants resisted on the ground that they had a good defence and a good counterclaim. THESIGER, L.J., said (38 L.T. 201):

"If the appellants had disclosed by their affidavits facts sufficient to establish a good ground of counterclaim, I think the counterclaim would have been sufficiently connected with the cause of action in the present case to justify its being set up as a defence even to a liquidated claim on a bill of exchange."

In the result, however, leave to defend on the bills was refused. And SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., anticipating the possibility envisaged by THESIGER, L.J., strikes rather a different note. He said (ibid., 199):

"... I must say, speaking for myself, that I should hesitate long before I allowed a defendant in an action on a bill of exchange to set up a case for damages by reason of the breach by the plaintiff of some other contract or the commission of some tort."

Pausing there, it would seem that the learned Master of the Rolls means by "some other contract" some contract other than that constituted by the bill of exchange itself. He goes on:

"I do not say that there cannot be a case where the two transactions may not be so connected, but at present I cannot even imagine the existence of such a special case."

Having regard to the tenor of the authorities summarised above in cases where the action is on a bill of exchange, it is impossible to say that in giving liberty to sign immediate judgment without a stay the learned judge in chambers was guilty of an improper exercise of the discretion vested in him. In our view, the appeal fails.

ACKROYDS AIR TRAVEL, LTD. v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Jones, JJ.), March 28, 1950.]

Aerial Traffic—Reservation of air services—Scheduled journey—Company prohibited from landing aircraft—Feeder service arranged by travel agency and operated by “non-corporation” aircraft companies—Liability of travel agency—Aiding and abetting—Civil Aviation Act, 1946 (c. 70), s. 23 (1) (2).

Before September, 1948, M. Ltd., a company registered in South Africa, maintained an air service for passengers between Cape Town and London. In September, 1948, M. Ltd. were prohibited by Order in Council from landing their aircraft in the United Kingdom, and thereafter they terminated their flights at Paris. On or about Sept. 26, 1948, M. Ltd. entered into an oral agreement with A. Ltd., that A. Ltd., would, at the request of M. Ltd., arrange for the conveyance from London to Paris of passengers of M. Ltd. who desired to be in Paris in readiness for the flight on which they were booked to proceed to South Africa. From time to time thereafter until Nov. 20, 1948, A. Ltd., at the request of M. Ltd., chartered aircraft for the conveyance of such passengers to Paris from three aircraft companies other than the three corporations under the Civil Aviation Act, 1946. A. Ltd. were convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction of aiding and abetting the unlawful carrying of passengers for hire or reward on a scheduled journey, contrary to the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, s. 23 (1). On appeal, HELD: there was evidence on which the magistrate could properly find that scheduled journeys were undertaken contrary to s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1946, and that A. Ltd., who arranged for the aircraft companies to make the journeys, knew all the circumstances, and were, therefore, rightly convicted under s. 5 of the Act of 1848 of aiding and abetting.

CASE STATED by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate.

On Feb. 17, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction at Bow Street, an information was preferred by the respondent, the Director of Public Prosecutions, against the appellants, who were travel agents, charging them that they did unlawfully carry passengers by air for reward on a scheduled journey between Croydon Airport and Le Bourget, contrary to the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, s. 23 (1). It was proved or admitted that the appellants were a limited company, carrying on business in London, and that it was their business, inter alia, to make bookings for passengers travelling by air. They did not themselves own either aircraft or land-transport in which to carry passengers by air or otherwise. A limited company registered in South Africa called Mercury Airways, Ltd., had, until September, 1948, operated an airline between the United Kingdom and South Africa, but, following an Order in Council made in that month prohibiting the carriage of passengers by the company from the United Kingdom, they had ceased to operate between the United Kingdom and South Africa, and had operated from Paris, providing a regular service between Paris and South Africa. Mercury Airways, Ltd., from its London office and by means of divers agents, of whom the appellants were one, booked reservations for passengers on aircraft operated between Paris and South Africa. The appellants, having booked such passengers, remitted the bookings to the said company. On Sept. 26, 1948, an agreement was made orally between the managing director of the appellants and a representative of Mercury Airways, Ltd., that the appellants should, if and when required, by Mercury Airways, Ltd., arrange for the conveyance from London to Paris of such of the passengers of Mercury Airways, Ltd., as desired to be in Paris in readiness for the flight on which they were booked to proceed thence to South Africa. From time to time between Sept. 26 and Nov. 20, 1948, Mercury Airways, Ltd., requested the appellants to arrange for the charter of aircraft for the conveyance to Le Bourget airport of such passengers and to hire a coach to transport such passengers from London to Croydon and to arrange for the necessary catering and baggage-handling facilities. As a result, on fourteen different days between the dates mentioned the appellants chartered aircraft from three aircraft companies other than the three corporations under the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, and in this period a total of thirty-one flights took place. On other occasions Mercury Airways, Ltd., chartered aircraft direct from the same aircraft companies, and not through the agency of the appellants, the cost of the charter being paid by the appellants to the aircraft company concerned. No charge was made to the passengers for the journey. Each of the aircraft operated by an aircraft company was manned and flown by the employees of that aircraft company. No specific aircraft was ever held at the disposal of the appellants. Only such passengers were carried as had been accepted by Mercury Airways, Ltd., as passengers for a flight between Paris and South Africa.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that (i) the appellants were not carriers of passengers by air for hire or reward within the meaning of s. 23 (1) of the Civil Aviation Act, 1946; (ii) none of the journeys was a scheduled journey within the meaning of s. 23 (2) of the Act; (iii) none of the said journeys was operated in such a manner that the benefit thereof was available to members of the public; (iv) the appellants did not aid or abet any of the offences alleged in the information because there was no principal offender. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that (i) the appellants had carried passengers by air within the meaning of s. 23 (1) and (2) because (a) each of the journeys undertaken had been arranged and organised by the appellants pursuant to an oral agreement between the appellants and Mercury Airways, Ltd.; (b) the appellants had included a profit to themselves in the charges made by them to Mercury Airways, Ltd., in respect of such journeys; (c) each of such journeys was one of a series of journeys undertaken between the same two places which together amounted to a systematic service within the meaning of s. 23 (2); (ii) alternatively, if the appellants had not themselves carried the passengers, they had nevertheless aided and abetted the carriage of them on a scheduled journey by the aircraft companies concerned, and so were properly charged and could be considered as principal offenders by virtue of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, s. 5.

The magistrate, being of the opinion that (a) the appellants were not themselves carriers of passengers, but had aided and abetted the carriage by air of passengers by the three aircraft companies; (b) the appellants did so for reward; (c) the aircraft companies, although not acting in concert, were together operating a series of journeys which amounted in the aggregate to a schedule; (d) the appellants were aiding and abetting, although no one of the three aircraft companies was necessarily by itself operating a scheduled series of journeys, found the appellants guilty of the charges.

Vaughan, K.C., and G. D. Lane for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and S. G. Howard for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by the Chief Magistrate sitting at Bow Street Magistrate's Court, before whom the appellants were summoned for unlawfully carrying passengers for hire or reward on a scheduled journey between two places, one of which was in the United Kingdom (namely, Croydon Airport), and Le Bourget. The learned magistrate found that, although the appellants were not themselves carriers of passengers by air, they had aided and abetted the commission of an offence against the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, s. 23 (1), and, relying on the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5, he convicted them. Section 5 of the Act of 1848 provides:

"... Every person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any offence which is or hereafter shall be punishable on summary conviction shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted for the same, either together with the principal offender, or before or after his conviction, and shall be liable on conviction to the same forfeiture and punishment as such principal offender . . ."

So, if the magistrate was right in holding that the appellants had aided and abetted an offence, he was right in convicting them as he did.

The proceedings were taken under the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, s. 23, which provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, it shall not be lawful for any person, other than the three corporations [i.e., the British European Airways Corporation, the British South American Airways Corporation, and the British Overseas Airways Corporation], their associates, and the servants and agents of the three corporations and their associates, to carry passengers or goods by air for hire or reward upon any scheduled journey between two places of which at least one is in the United Kingdom. (2) In this Act the expression 'scheduled journey' means one of a series of journeys which are undertaken between the same two places and which together amount to a systematic service operated in such a manner that the benefits thereof are available to members of the public from time to time seeking to take advantage of it."

Mercury Airways, Ltd., a company registered in South Africa, ran a service for air passengers between Cape Town and this country. For reasons which are not stated, and which are immaterial, an Order in Council was made which prohibited Mercury Airways, Ltd., from landing their aircraft in this country. Accordingly, they terminated their flights at Paris. Then they arranged with the appellants to have transported to Paris passengers in the United Kingdom who wished to travel by the Mercury Airways, Ltd., and who changed at Paris into aeroplanes belonging to Mercury Airways, Ltd. Mercury Airways, Ltd., were thereby enabled to run a service between this country and South Africa, although they were prohibited from themselves landing their aeroplanes at an airport in this country.

The Case finds that Mercury Airways, Ltd., from its office, which was in London, and

"by means of divers agents, of whom the appellants were one, booked reservations for passengers on aircraft operating . . . between Paris and South Africa," and that the appellants, having booked such passengers, remitted the bookings to the company at their office. It is found that on or about Sept. 26, 1948, an agreement was made verbally between the managing director of the appellant company and a representative of Mercury Airways, Ltd., that the appellants

"should, if and when required by the said company to do so, arrange for the conveyance from London to Paris of such of the company's passengers as desired to be in Paris in readiness for the flight upon which they were booked to proceed thence to South Africa. From time to time thereafter between Sept. 26 and Nov. 20, 1948, the company requested the appellants to arrange for the charter of aircraft for the conveyance to Le Bourget airport of such passengers and to hire a coach to transport such passengers from London to Croydon and to arrange for the necessary catering and baggage-handling facilities."

The Case then sets out the various flights which were undertaken by three aircraft companies, which shows that whenever anyone wanted to go by a Mercury aircraft to South Africa there was an aeroplane at his disposal in this country to take him to Le Bourget where he would board the South African aeroplane. A

It is enough for this court to say that they are satisfied that there was evidence on which the magistrate could properly find that there were in this case scheduled journeys undertaken by persons other than the three corporations which are named in the statute. The journeys, in the opinion of the court, were enough to justify the magistrate in holding that there was a systematic service operated in such a manner that the benefits thereof were available to members of the public or such members of the public as desired to fly to South Africa. It is true that the magistrate has found that the offence was committed by the aircraft companies, and that the three aircraft companies had been aided and abetted by the appellants. It is sufficient that there was evidence on which the magistrate could find that an offence had been committed against s. 23, and that, whoever committed the offence, whether it was Mercury Airways, Ltd., or whether it was the aircraft companies, the appellants had aided and abetted the commission of that offence, because it is quite clear that they knew about it. B C

In Wessel v. Carter Paterson and Pickfords Carriers, Ltd. (1), this court said that a person could only be convicted—apart from some special exceptions—as an aider and abettor if he knew all the circumstances which constituted the offence. Whether he realised that those circumstances constituted an offence was immaterial. If he knew all the circumstances and those circumstances constituted an offence and he helped in the actions which constituted the offence, that was enough to convict him of being an aider and abettor. In this case, there cannot be any doubt that the appellants, who themselves made all these arrangements, knew all the necessary circumstances. The circumstances point to the fact that there was here a system, and a system which amounted to scheduled journeys. Therefore, as the appellants knew all the circumstances relating to it, in our opinion, there was ample evidence on which the magistrate could convict of aiding and abetting. For these reasons, this appeal must be dismissed. D E F

HUMPHREYS, J.: I agree. I think it is probable that the framers of s. 23 did not envisage a case being brought against travel agents. In my opinion, however, the words of the section are wide enough to cover the facts of this case. I also agree that, in order that a person may be convicted as an aider and abettor of an offence punishable by summary conviction, it must be shown that the unlawful act has been committed, and, therefore, that the offence has been committed, and, further, that the person charged as an aider and abettor was aware of the facts sufficiently to enable him to know that the act was unlawful. An assessment committee held that premises of the respondents which were used to clean and cool milk to prepare it for transport to London was an industrial hereditament within the meaning of s. 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, because such premises were "occupied and used . . . as a factory." CASE STATED by quarter sessions under the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, s. 11.

Premises belonging to the respondents at Bulkington, Wiltshire, were used by them to collect milk and treat it so that it might be freed from impurities and cooled before being sent to London for pasteurization. It was contended by the respondents that the premises were a "factory" within the meaning of the Factories and Workshops Acts, 1901 to 1920, and, as such, free, as an industrial hereditament, from being rated, under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (1). The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

F Percy Lamb, K.C., and Widgery for the appellants.
Charles E. Scholefield for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated under s. 11 of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, on an appeal to quarter sessions against a decision of the Trowbridge Assessment Committee, and it raises the question whether certain premises belonging to the respondents, the London Co-operative Society, Ltd., are a "factory" within the meaning of the Factories and Workshops Acts, 1901 to 1920, and thereby entitled to the benefit of the de-rating provisions of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. A second point submitted by counsel for the appellants, on which the court does not think it necessary to express any opinion, is whether or not the premises were also used for the purposes of a distributive wholesale business.

The premises, according to the Case Stated, are used as a milk collecting depot from which milk is despatched to London, which is about a hundred miles away, where it is pasteurized. Prior to its despatch the milk is prepared for bulk transport to ensure that it is received in London in good condition and at a proper standard in any weather. It would not, it is stated, be possible to ensure this at all seasons if the milk were sent direct from the farms in churns on rail. The milk is collected by lorries from farms and is then brought to these premises at Bulkington to be put into tankers for transport to London for pasteurization at the respondents' premises there. It is also found that the pasteurization is rendered commercially necessary because people desire to buy pasteurized milk. "For milk to be pasteurizable, as that term is understood commercially," it is stated in the Case, "the deterioration of the milk must not have proceeded below a certain point at the time when it reaches the pasteurization plant. Except for cleanliness and temperature, no change in the characteristics of the milk takes place as a result of the processes applied at the Bulkington premises." It is also found: "After testing, the churns of milk are received in the milk reception bank and are carried by conveyor belt up to a tipping point, and the milk is there weighed and passed by means of power milk pumps through clarifying machinery to remove extraneous dirt and is cooled by chilled water to a temperature of about 40 deg. From the cooling point the milk is pumped into glass-lined insulating tanks and from these tanks is transferred to stainless steel road tankers owned by the respondents and despatched to London."

The only question on which this court proposes to give a decision is whether or not the process which has been described can fairly be held to be an adapting for sale of an article, because, if there has been an adapting for sale of an article, the premises become a factory within the meaning of the Factories and Workshops Acts, 1901 to 1920, and are entitled to be de-rated. This is a matter of first impression. A decision must be taken as to the meaning of the words "adapting for sale of any article" in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 149 (1) (c) (iii). Here the only process which is gone through at the premises in question—and is relied upon by counsel for the respondents as showing that the milk is being adapted for sale—is that the milk passes through a filter so that any dirt which may have got into it is taken out, and the milk is then cooled. When milk comes from the cow it is of a certain temperature, and the farmer cools it before he puts it into the churns. The milk taken to these premises is subjected to a further cooling process. Is that "adapting for sale"?

The case from which this court has derived considerable assistance is Sedgwick v. Watney, Combe, Reid & Co., Ltd. (1), where VISCOUNT DUNEDIN, giving the decision of the House of Lords, said ([1931] A.C. 463):

"But the point is whether the treatment that the beer undergoes in these premises is a mere prelude to distribution. I am clearly of opinion that it is not. The finished article that is being prepared for distribution is bottled beer. The beer does not enter the premises as bottled beer. It undergoes treatment, a treatment which changes its quality and makes it from an unpotable and unmarketable article into a potable and marketable one. It is true that the treatment requires the use of a bottle, and that, when the treatment is finished, the bottle and its contents are ready for distribution. But what is really done on the premises is the turning of what I may call an unfinished liquid into a finished one."

LORD DUNEDIN was dealing with beer which was to be sold as bottled beer and as a different article from draught beer. The beer brought into the premises was liquid which was not to be sold as draught beer, but was to be subjected to a process of carbonisation so that it could be bottled and sold as bottled beer. The important words, as it seems to me, in the opinion are:

"The beer does not enter the premises as bottled beer. It undergoes treatment, a treatment which changes its quality and makes it from an unpotable and unmarketable article into a potable and marketable one."

The liquid which enters this factory is milk, and it leaves the factory as milk. The only difference is that it is milk which has been passed through a filter and has been cooled. I cannot myself see that the mere cooling of the milk turns the milk from one article into another. It is true that the reason why it is cooled is because it will travel better cold than it would if it had not been subjected to some cooling process, but I cannot see that what happens is turning an unfinished liquid into a finished one or into anything analogous thereto. Many commodities which are used for food and drink—for instance, fruit—will deteriorate more rapidly while travelling if some provision is not taken to see that the goods are despatched to their destination at a low temperature, but the goods which are despatched and the goods which arrive are the same thing, though, if they had not been cooled, they would have arrived in a changed condition. In my view, it cannot properly be said that the process of cooling the milk changes it from one article into another. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and that the question submitted to the court, which is whether the Bulkington premises are a factory and so within the meaning of the expression “industrial hereditament” in s. 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, should be answered in the negative.

Rates—Agricultural land—Field used for grazing and turf cutting—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 2 (2)—Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1).

The respondent, a farmer, finding that one of his fields was infested with parasites which were dangerous to young cattle, decided that the infestation could best be cured by his removing the turf and re-sowing grass. He entered into an agreement with a contractor to buy the turf at a price of £80 per acre and to remove it. The contractor did not remove all the turf at once and meantime the respondent used the field as pasture for fully grown cattle. The rating authority assessed the field for rates on the basis that it was not “agricultural land” within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2), and the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 67 (1).

HELD: the field was not “agricultural land” within the sub-sections, and, therefore, the respondent was liable to pay rates.

CASE STATED by the rating appeals committee of Warwickshire Quarter Sessions.

Quarter sessions allowed an appeal by the respondent from a decision of the second appellants, the Meriden and Solihull Assessment Committee, on a proposal by the respondent for the amendment of the valuation list in respect of a hereditament described as “land used for turf cutting” of which the respondent was the occupier. The hereditament was a field of about ten acres which had for many years before 1948 been used as permanent pasture. In or about 1940 the field became infested with parasites which had caused the death of young cattle, though the land was suitable for grazing fully grown cattle. To remove the infestation the respondent decided to cut the existing turf and re-sow the grass, and to secure the removal of the infested turf he entered into an agreement with a contractor for its purchase at a price of £80 per acre and its removal. During the period of the removal of the turf and throughout the months during which cattle are usually turned out to graze the respondent used the field to graze fully grown cattle. The method adopted by the respondent to clear the field and improve the pasture was not in accordance with customary or approved agricultural practice.

The first appellants, Meriden and Solihull Rating Authority, objected to the respondent's proposal and the assessment committee upheld the objection. On an appeal by the respondent, quarter sessions were of opinion that the field was used for agricultural purposes on the ground that an attempt by an occupier of land to improve its condition, quality, or utility as agricultural land or permanent pasture by unorthodox methods did not disentitle the land from its statutory exemption as agricultural land from liability for rates whether the method did or did not result in a profit or a loss to the occupier. The rating authority and the assessment committee appealed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the rating appeals committee of Warwickshire Quarter Sessions. It raises a very short point. The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, provides, among other things, that agricultural land shall be "de-rated." It is provided in the Act (s. 2 (2) ) that:

" . . . 'agricultural land' means any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only . . . "

There have been several attempts to get round that wording, but "only" is the governing word. To obtain the exemption the land must be arable meadow or pasture ground only. Quarter sessions have found that the respondent found that one of his fields was infested with parasites. To rid the field of the parasites he decided to cut and remove the turf and then re-sow the field with grass. He proceeded to do this and to sell the turf for £80 an acre to a contractor who also agreed to take it away. Eventually, the contractor did take away some of the turf, and then the respondent re-sowed the land. In the meantime full-grown cattle were allowed to come on the land and feed on such of the turf as had not been taken away. Apparently, the parasites on this land only attacked the young, and not the grown-up cattle. The respondent was selling his turf to the contractor who came in and cut it and took it away as he felt disposed, and the respondent's cattle came in and grazed on so much of the turf as had not been taken away. How it can be said in those circumstances that the respondent was using the land as "arable meadow or pasture ground only" it is difficult to understand. That he was using it as pasture one would concede, but he was not using it as pasture only. He was using it partly as pasture and partly as a source of supply of the turf which he had sold to somebody else. This appeal must be allowed and the case must go back to quarter sessions with an intimation that this land is rateable.

Public Health—Statutory nuisance—Abatement notice specifying manner in which nuisance to be abated—Validity—Power of justices to make nuisance order in terms other than those of abatement notice—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 93, s. 94 (1) (2), s. 95 (1). A

The respondent was the occupier of premises where he kept pigs in such a manner as to be a statutory nuisance. The local authority served on him an abatement notice under s. 93 of the Public Health Act, 1936, requiring him to abate the nuisance and "for that purpose to remove the whole of the pigs from the premises, clean up the effect of their past presence, and cease for the future to allow the premises to be used for pig keeping at all." The respondent, failing to comply with the notice, was summoned under s. 94 (1) in terms of the notice. The justices dismissed the summons on the ground that (a) the abatement notice was bad, because it required the respondent to abate the nuisance in a specific manner, by discontinuing the use of the premises as a piggery, and (b) because the summons was in the terms of the notice and required the justices to prohibit the premises from being so used, which they had no power to do. On appeal, B

HELD: (1) the abatement notice was a good notice, since its operative part was the request to abate the nuisance and the steps indicated whereby the abatement might be effected could be regarded as mere surplusage. C

(ii) the justices, in making the nuisance order, were not bound to direct the respondent to do exactly what the abatement notice required, but had a complete discretion, if they found that a nuisance existed, to make such order as they saw fit, and, therefore, the case must be remitted to the justices for that purpose. CASE STATED by South Shields justices.

On Sept. 28, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Jarrow, a complaint preferred by the appellant, the clerk to the Boldon Urban District Council, against the respondent for non-compliance with an abatement notice

A under s. 93 of the Public Health Act, 1936, was dismissed. The justices were of the opinion that, although a prima facie case against the respondent was made out, the notice was bad in that it specified the manner in which the respondent should abate the nuisance, namely, by discontinuing the use of premises as a piggery, and gave no alternative, so that if he abated the nuisance by any other means he might still be said not to have complied with the notice, and, further, that the summons was in the same terms as the notice and required the justices to prohibit the use of the premises as a piggery, which they had no power to do.

Simes, K.C., and Norman Harper for the appellant.

Ashe Lincoln, K.C., and Hurwitz for the respondent.

B LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for South Shields in the county of Durham on a complaint by the appellant, who is the clerk of the Boldon Urban District Council. The complaint was made under the Public Health Act, 1936, and was

C " . . . for that on July 14, 1949, a notice under s. 93 of the Public Health Act, 1936, was served on the respondent as the person by whose act default or sufferance the nuisance arose requiring him to abate a nuisance, namely, foul smells caused by the improper keeping of pigs, and for that purpose to remove the whole of the pigs from the premises, clean up the effect of their past presence, and cease for the future to allow the premises to be used for pig keeping at all, and that the respondent had made default in complying with the requirement of the said notice, and D calling upon the respondent to show cause why an order should not be made requiring him to comply with the requirements of the said notice or otherwise to abate the said nuisance and to execute any works necessary for the purpose and prohibiting a recurrence of the said nuisance and requiring him to execute any works necessary to prevent a recurrence."

E The respondent was the occupier of a large property part of which was occupied by 264 pigs. In the dry weather the neighbours complained because the stench arising from the pigs was offensive. Accordingly, the sanitary inspector visited the place, came to the conclusion that a nuisance was caused by this extensive pig keeping, and served a notice on the respondent in the terms which I have read. As nothing was done, the respondent was brought F before the justices who dismissed the complaint. They stated the reason for their decision as follows:

G " . . . the appellant had established a prima facie case that a statutory nuisance had existed and that there was a case for the respondent to answer, but we considered (a) that the abatement notice was bad on the grounds that it required the respondent to abate the nuisance in a specific manner, namely, by discontinuing the use of the premises for a piggery, and gave him no alternative, so that, if he had abated the nuisance by any other means, he might still be said not to have complied with the abatement notice; (b) that the summons issued was in the terms of the abatement notice and required the justices to prohibit the premises from being used as a piggery, and that, under s. 93 of the Act, the justices H considered that they had no power to make such a prohibition and that the remedy sought by the appellant should have been taken under s. 100 of the Act."

If the scheme of the Act is studied, it is clear that every step taken in this case was perfectly regular and that the justices had a complete discretion, if they found a nuisance existed, to make such order as they thought fit. By s. 92 (1) a statutory nuisance is defined. For the purpose of this case it is enough to say that a statutory nuisance is of the class specified in the Act which can be dealt with by a court of summary jurisdiction. Section 93 provides:

"Where a local authority are satisfied of the existence of a statutory nuisance, they shall serve a notice (hereinafter in this Act referred to as 'an abatement notice') on the person by whose act, default or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues . . . requiring him to abate the nuisance and to execute such works and take such steps as may be necessary for that purpose."

There is no doubt that the abatement notice in this case complied with the requirements of that section. "As may be necessary," of course, means as the local authority think necessary, because they are the people serving the notice. They told the respondent what steps they thought were necessary to abate the nuisance, although in their notice they need not call on him to execute any particular works. It is enough if they tell him to abate the nuisance. Section 94 provides:

"(1) If the person on whom an abatement notice has been served makes default in complying with any of the requirements of the notice, or if the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice, is, in the opinion of the local authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the authority shall cause a complaint to be made to a justice of the peace, and the justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom the notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction. (2) If on the hearing of the complaint it is proved that the alleged nuisance exists, or that although abated it is likely to recur on the same premises, then, subject to the provisions of sub-sections (4) and (5) of this section the court shall make an order (hereinafter in this Act referred to as 'a nuisance order') for either, or both, of the following purposes—(a) requiring the defendant to comply with all or any of the requirements of the abatement notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance, within a time specified in the order, and to execute any works necessary for that purpose; (b) prohibiting a recurrence of the nuisance, and requiring the defendant, within a time specified in the order, to execute any works necessary to prevent a recurrence; and may also impose on the defendant a fine not exceeding five pounds."

By s. 95 (1) it is provided that, if a person neglects to obey the order of the justices, he is liable to a penalty of £5 and £2 a day as long as the nuisance continues.

Where, in my view, the justices have erred is in considering that when the respondent is brought before them they must, if they find a nuisance, follow the words of the abatement notice and order him to do exactly what that notice has directed him to do, and, therefore, if they think, as they seem to have considered in this case, that the abatement notice went too far, they could not make an order at all. That is an entire misapprehension of the situation. It is entirely contrary to what several cases to which our attention has been called have laid down. It is for the justices to say what is to be done. They must first order the respondent to abate the nuisance. They can then go on to order him to do such things as they consider necessary to effect the abatement. No doubt, they would pay great attention to what the local authority consider should be done, because they would want evidence as to the best way that the nuisance could be abated, but the decision is the decision of the justices. It is clearly laid down in the Act that it is for them to consider whether or not the nuisance exists, whether or not it has been abated, and whether it still exists, and, if it does, it is for them to consider which of the requirements of the abatement notice are to be carried out or how otherwise the nuisance is to be abated. They have full jurisdiction to say: "We are satisfied that there is a nuisance here, but we are not going to order you to do what the local authority say you are to do because we think it can be done in another and cheaper way or in a more effective way." Alternatively they may say: "We think the best way to do it is to follow what the local authority have said you are to do."

A The other objection to which the justices have given effect is that the notice requires that the respondent should cease keeping pigs. I agree that they have no power to issue an injunction against keeping pigs, but what they can say is: "You have to stop this nuisance, and, if the only way is to stop keeping pigs, you will have to do so because if you do not you will be fined £2 a day for every day the nuisance continues."

B The Case must, therefore, go back to the justices with an intimation that they did not come to a correct determination and decision in point of law, that the notice was a good notice, that it was for them to order the nuisance to be abated and to lay down any particular steps which in their opinion were required for the abatement of the nuisance and to prohibit its recurrence, and, if to comply with the order abating the nuisance the respondent has to cease keeping pigs, that is a matter for him. Therefore, this appeal is allowed with costs.

C HUMPHREYS, J.: I agree. There seems to have been, as my Lord has said, a confusion in the minds of the justices between the requirements of the notice which is served by the local authority and the order which can be made only by the justices themselves. R. v. Wheatley (1) is authority for the proposition that, if, in the opinion of the local authority, the abatement of a statutory
D nuisance necessitates certain works being done, the authority must specify by their notice what those works are to be. There is equally the authority of a Divisional Court in Millard v. Wastall (2) to the effect that where no specific works are required, it is a perfectly good notice if it calls on the recipient "to abate the nuisance and for that purpose to abstain at all times from doing or suffering to be done anything which will cause a recurrence of that nuisance."
E In that case the nuisance was black smoke issuing from a chimney, and, in the view of the local authority, it was not necessary to execute any particular works to prevent black smoke issuing. There the justices made very much the same mistake as has been made by the justices in the present case, in thinking that it was necessary that the works to be executed should be stated. DAY, J., however, said ([1898] 1 Q.B. 343):

F "Where any works are necessary to the abatement of a particular nuisance, and the notice calls upon the person responsible for the nuisance to do the necessary works, the notice must specify what those works are. But here the notice did not call upon the appellant to do any works at all; it simply required him to abstain from permitting black smoke to issue from his chimney."

G He and LAWRENCE, J., held that that was a good notice under the terms of the statute.

In the present case the nuisance consisted of foul smells caused by the improper keeping of pigs and the notice required that that nuisance should be abated. That is the important term of the notice. It goes on to say:

H "... and for that purpose you are required to remove the whole of the pigs from the premises, clean up the effect of their past presence, and cease for the future to allow the premises to be used for pig keeping at all."

It is clear, as my Lord has pointed out, that that part of the notice did not compel the justices, if they were going to order the nuisance to be abated, to follow those words and to order that the keeping of pigs should cease, and the view I take is that those words are mere surplusage.

This case would have been unarguable if it had not been for a decision of a Divisional Court in Whatling v. Rees (3). That, however, was a peculiar case very unlikely to recur, and AVORY, J., in particular, based his judgment almost entirely on the special facts that the nuisance consisted of water in a cellar. It turned out that there was a spring under that cellar and that it would have been useless to carry out the work which it was thought the notice intended to require, which was to drain the cellar, because, as AVORY, J., said (84 L.J.K.B. 1124), the water would immediately have risen again. There was an argument whether or not the terms of the notice meant, not only that the cellar should be drained, but that something should be done to prevent the water getting there, and that, said the court, was an ambiguous notice. On those lines the case would be easy enough to follow, but, if it were not for the peculiar facts, I confess I should have difficulty in understanding the judgment of the court. In general, I entirely agree with everything said by my Lord regarding the present case and with the judgment he proposed.

JONES, J.: I agree.

R. v. BRIGHTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL. Ex parte MARINE PARADE ESTATES (1936), LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Jones, JJ.),
March 28, 29, 1950.]

Rent Control—Rent tribunal—Procedure—Need to hear parties or evidence—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (1)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1096), regs. 4, 5, 8 (1).

Tenants of service flats (the services including central heating, constant hot water, porters and lifts) which had first been let after Sept. 1, 1939, applied to a rent tribunal under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) to determine what rents were reasonable for the flats in question. At the hearing, counsel on their behalf made statements which were accepted as accurate, but called no evidence. The landlords called witnesses who were not cross-examined and the figures submitted by one of whom, showing that, on the existing rents the landlords were already making a loss on the flats, the tribunal did not examine. The tribunal made reductions in rents averaging £50. On motions for certiorari to quash the proceedings and for mandamus to direct the tribunal to hear and determine according to law,

HELD: the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, did not require that proceedings of a rent tribunal under the Act should necessarily involve a hearing like that of a court, but contemplated that the tribunal might act on its own knowledge and information, without evidence, unless submitted, and without a hearing except on notice from a party, and as the tribunal had observed all the formalities of the Act, had offended against none of its provisions or against the regulations made under it, there was no ground for holding that the tribunal's determination was not in accordance with law, and, therefore, the motions for certiorari and mandamus should be refused.

Per curiam: the fact that a loss was already being made by the landlords on the flats was not conclusive as to the reasonableness of the rents being charged.

B MOTION by the landlords for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash orders made by a rent tribunal on Sept. 21, 1949, under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), whereby, on applications made to the tribunal by tenants to fix reasonable rents of flats owned by the landlords, they reduced the rents of the flats. The landlords also moved for orders of mandamus ordering the tribunal to hear and determine the applications according to law. The landlords contended that the tribunal's order was contrary to the evidence and that the tribunal had failed to act in accordance with the principles of natural justice.

Gardiner, K.C., and Alan Campbell for the landlords.

D The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and J. P. Ashworth for the rent tribunal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the landlords moves for orders of certiorari and mandamus addressed to the Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal to bring up and quash orders made by them in respect of the rents of certain flats, Nos. A5, C4, D4 and D5, Marine Gate, Brighton, or to hear and determine those applications according to law. The flats in question are contained in a large building in Brighton and are dwellings in which professional men and persons in that station of life live. These flats were all let for the first time after Sept. 1, 1939. Prima facie, therefore, the rents at which they were first let, which were substantial, became, by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I, the standard rents, and, on application being made, were subject to review by a tribunal in accordance with s. 1 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1949. Certain of the tenants considered that they were paying too much in rent and sought to obtain a reduction under the Act of 1949. Accordingly, they submitted to the tribunal the statutory forms, showing the position and giving a description of the premises, indicating who the landlords were, the rents at which the premises were held, whether the tenant or landlord bore the rates, what services the landlord undertook to provide, and the rateable value. In addition to accommodation, the tenants were provided with central heating, constant hot water, the services of porters, and the use of lifts, and other amenities were going to be provided. The amenities and accommodation were those usually offered in a block of modern flats.

H When the matter came before the tribunal, the tenants called no evidence, but counsel who appeared for them made certain statements which were accepted as accurate. Several witnesses were called on behalf of the landlords, and they gave evidence at length and do not seem to have been cross-examined. One of the witnesses proffered to the tribunal certain schedules showing figures, but the tribunal did not examine them. That must be a matter entirely for the discretion of the tribunal. The tribunal reserved their judgment, and subsequently they gave a decision in each case, making a substantial reduction in the rent, the average reduction being about £50.

The landlords complain that they showed on the figures produced that with the existing rents they were getting no return, but were, in fact, making a loss on the building, and that with the reduced rents they would make a still further loss and might have to go into liquidation. How far that should be taken into account is a matter which the tribunal must decide for itself, but it certainly cannot be conclusive. A speculator—I am not using that expression offensively—who goes in for buying and selling properties, might well buy a house at a time when prices were high. He might divide it into tenements or flats and let them at rents which would show a profit to him, but the tribunal could not, in my opinion, be debarred from saying in any particular case: “The rent which you are charging is excessive for the accommodation which you are offering. The tenant ought to be required to pay, not £x, but only £x-y.” If that is the fair price for the accommodation it would be no answer for the landlord to say: “If he only pays that, I must go out of business.” It may be a hardship, but we cannot see that that of itself is a reason for saying that a rent which has been fixed by a landlord is necessarily fair.

The real complaint is that the tribunal disregarded the principles of natural justice, and it is said that in such a case certiorari will lie to bring up their decision, or that, alternatively, mandamus will lie directing the tribunal to hear and determine according to law. We have had argument on either side, with the citation of many cases, as to whether certiorari will lie where this court finds that an inferior court or tribunal has acted contrary to natural justice. It is not necessary to decide which of the two orders would have been appropriate if we had come to the conclusion that one or other should issue because the court has formed the opinion, in one sense reluctantly, that they cannot interfere in this case or issue either mandamus or certiorari in respect of these decisions.

The object of the Act of 1949, as is conceded on both sides, was to deal with rents which became standard rents after Sept. 1, 1939, because the premises were first let then. Accommodation was not so scarce at the beginning of the war as it subsequently became. In great cities, especially those exposed to enemy action, accommodation became severely limited by the amount of destruction which took place. Rents tended to rise to such a height that Parliament thought it was necessary to say, in effect: “Although in September, 1939, it was provided that the standard rents of these premises were to be the rents at which they were first let after Sept. 1, that must now be modified because those rents may be excessive.” Accordingly, it was enacted that the standard rents should be open to review by tribunals which were already in existence, having been set up to deal with furnished lettings under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946.

The Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1, provides:

“(1) Where apart from this section the standard rent of a dwelling-house would be—(a) the rent at which it was let on a letting beginning after Sept. 1, 1939, or (b) an amount ascertainable by apportionment of the rent at which a property of which it formed part was let on such a letting as aforesaid (whether such an apportionment has been made or not), then, subject to the provisions of this section, the landlord or the tenant may make application to the tribunal to determine what rent is reasonable for that dwelling-house, and on any such application the tribunal shall determine that rent and shall notify the parties of their determination: Provided that an application shall not be made in respect of a dwelling-house if a previous application in respect thereof has been made under this sub-section.”

That proviso is very sweeping because it does not allow a landlord who may be put to great expense—especially in the case of flats by reason of rising wages, increases in the price of coal, and so forth—to go later to the rent tribunal and ask that a rent which has been lowered should be increased. It is, however, not for us to express an opinion on the policy of the Act.

By the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1096), reg. 3, the Minister of Health, pursuant to powers conferred on him by s. 5 (2) (b) and s. 6 (5) of the Act of 1949, provided:

A "All applications under the Act to a tribunal shall be made in writing, and shall specify the address of the dwelling-house to which the application relates, the names of the landlord and tenant and the address of the landlord."

By reg. 4:

B "Where an application is made to a tribunal, the tribunal shall give notice in writing to each party to the tenancy of the dwelling-house in respect of which the application is made informing him that he may within such time as the tribunal may allow (not being less than seven days from the date of the notice) give notice to the clerk of the tribunal that he desires to be heard by them, or may send to the clerk of the tribunal representations in writing."

C The tenant, having made his application on the prescribed form, may—not "must"—apply to be heard in person, or he may make representations in writing. If he makes such representations, the tribunal must consider them, but there is no provision that the landlord may call on the tenant to be produced for cross-examination on that statement.

By reg. 5:

D "If either party to the tenancy informs the clerk of the tribunal that he desires to be heard the tribunal shall give to each party not less than seven clear days notice in writing of the time and place at which the parties will be heard."

E That, again, is significant. It is only if the parties give notice that they desire to be heard that they are to have notice of the time when and place at which the tribunal will consider the matter. The tribunal must consider the matter once the statutory form has been sent in. Therefore, it is clearly the intention of the Act and of these regulations that the tribunal may proceed and give a decision without hearing either party unless a party states that he wishes to be heard. Obviously, therefore, Parliament intended the procedure of these tribunals to be of the most informal nature. No court can proceed to hear a case without having some evidence before it, nor can it give any judgment affecting a person's rights to property unless that person not only is before the court, but also has an opportunity of cross-examining the other party. Parliament, however, has said that the ordinary procedure to which lawyers are accustomed shall not apply to these cases. The reason is probably, as the Attorney-General has stated, that it was supposed that the great majority of cases to be dealt with under the Act would concern small working-class properties, unfurnished lodgings, or separate rooms in houses. It is provided, however, by reg. 7:

H "At any hearing before a tribunal any interested party may appear in person or by counsel or a solicitor or by any other representative or may be accompanied by any person whom he may wish to assist him at the hearing."

By reg. 8:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of these regulations the procedure at a hearing shall be such as the tribunal may determine, and the tribunal may, if they think fit, and at the request of either party shall, unless for some special reason they consider it undesirable, allow the hearing to be held in public. (2) The tribunal may postpone or adjourn the hearing from time to time as they think fit."

The procedure which I have indicated can only work if the tribunal can act on their own knowledge and on their own inspection. If the evidence of witnesses is tendered I have no doubt it is the duty of the tribunal to hear them, and, if cross-examination of such witnesses is desired, it is the duty of the tribunal to allow that cross-examination. If the other side wish to call evidence in reply, it is, again, their duty to allow it, but these tribunals can act without having any evidence before them. Neither party need appear or file any statement in writing unless he wishes. A tenant can merely ask the tribunal to fix a proper rent, and if he does so the landlord can appear, or submit a statement, or call any evidence he likes. How, therefore, can it be said that the tribunal in the present case have offended against the rules of justice according to the statute and the regulations? These proceedings have not been conducted in a way which would be tolerated in an ordinary court, but the ordinary courts do not have statutes which permit them to act on their own knowledge and without any evidence. Here the formalities prescribed by the Act were observed. The tenants instructed counsel, but they did not think fit to give evidence themselves—a matter which might have weighed very strongly with the tribunal, but, apparently, it did not. Counsel for the tenants made statements. It would be very odd if we had to quash these proceedings because, although those statements might have been put into writing, they were made by counsel instead. If counsel had made a statement of fact which was not accepted or which turned out to be incorrect, different considerations might have arisen, but no one disputes that the statements were absolutely accurate. The tribunal heard all the evidence which was submitted to them by the landlords, and, having done so, they were not bound to accept the figures which were put before them. That is clear from R. v. Westminster Assessment Committee, Ex parte Grosvenor House (Park Lane), Ltd. (1), to which we have been referred. They gave their decision after they had heard all that evidence, and, by so doing, they did not offend against any provision of the statute or of the regulations.

While it would be improper for us in any way to question the policy of the Act, I feel that possibly it might be a more satisfactory state of affairs if there were some method of appeal to a central tribunal, such as has so often been provided for where these ad hoc tribunals have been set up. Though one recognises to the full the virtue and value of these tribunals and of their inquiries being held in an informal manner, it is unfortunate if conflicting decisions are given by different tribunals in different parts of the country without there being any method through some appellate tribunal of co-ordinating and correcting the decisions. That, however, is a matter for the legislature and not for this court to take into account. For the reasons given these applications fail and must be dismissed.

HUMPHREYS, J.: As far as I am concerned, the judgment which my Lord has given is the judgment of the court.

Application of “statutory hypothesis”—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 43 (1), (2), s. 56 (1), (2).*

Under a re-settlement dated Apr. 26, 1879, and a deed poll dated Jan. 9, 1905, certain freehold estates, investments representing capital moneys, and equitable interests were held on such trusts as the deceased and P. should by deed or deeds jointly appoint, and, in default and pending such appointment, in trust for the deceased for life with remainders over. On Mar. 21, 1927, a company limited by shares was registered with a nominal capital of £200,000 divided into two hundred thousand shares of £1 each, and each of the seven subscribers to the memorandum took one ordinary share as nominee for the trustees of the re-settlement. By a deed poll dated Mar. 23, 1927, the deceased and P., in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, varied the provisions of the re-settlement in such a way as to authorise the sale of the settled property to the company in consideration wholly or partly of a capital sum of money payable by instalments or of debentures or other securities, shares or stock of the company. On Mar. 24, 1927, an agreement was made between the deceased, P. and the company whereby it was agreed that the whole of the settled property should be sold to the company in consideration of (a) £950,000 to be paid in cash by the company to the trustees on completion of the sale, and (b) £750,000 to be paid by the company to the trustees by forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each without interest (unless default were made in payment of instalments). The sale was completed accordingly, the deceased, as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925, conveying the legal estate in the freehold land and the trustees of the re-settlement conveying the equitable interests and the investments (the deceased joining in the conveyance of equitable interests and directing the transaction as tenant for life), and the company paying £950,000 to the trustees by means of a cheque drawn by the company against an advance made by its bankers for the purpose. Out of the money so obtained, the trustees expended £849,993 in subscribing for ordinary shares of the company, and this, with the seven shares already held by the subscribers to the memorandum as nominees for the trustees, made the trustees the holders of fifty thousand ordinary shares of the company. The trustees advanced a sum of £100,000 to the deceased (apparently in anticipation of the forthcoming enlargement of his life interest in that amount into an absolute interest), thus absorbing the £950,000 paid to them by the company, and with the money so advanced the deceased subscribed for one hundred thousand preference shares of £1 each of the company at par. By a deed poll dated Mar. 28, 1927, the deceased and P., in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, directed and appointed that the said sum of £100,000 advanced by the trustees to the deceased and the said sum of £750,000 payable by the company to the trustees by forty half-yearly instalments as aforesaid (and any interest thereon) should be held in trust for the deceased absolutely instead of for his life only. On Mar. 29, 1927, by a further deed poll, the deceased and P., in further exercise of their joint general power of appointment, extinguished the deceased's life interest in the property remaining subject to the trusts of the re-settlement and declared other trusts which excluded the deceased from all benefit.

The result of all the above transactions was that the property remaining settled consisted of fifty thousand ordinary shares of the company, in which the deceased had no interest, and that £100,000 (used by the deceased for the purchase of one hundred thousand preference shares of £1 each of the company) and the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750, had become the absolute property of the deceased. All the property which was previously comprised in the settlement had been vested in the company. On Nov. 10, 1940, the deceased died, and it was admitted that estate duty was payable in respect of his one hundred thousand preference shares and of the remaining instalments of the sum of £750,000 then due, which were the deceased's absolute property. The Crown also claimed duty in respect of the fifty thousand ordinary shares of the company, and this claim was the subject of the present litigation. It was admitted that the company was one to which s. 56 (2) of the Finance Act, 1940, applied.

HELD: on the application of the "statutory hypothesis" imposed by s. 56 (1) of the Act of 1940, "the property in which the interest subsisted" within the meaning of s. 43 (2) (a) of that Act must be taken as being the settled property as it stood before the sale to the company, and, therefore, it was clear that the determination of the deceased's life interest did not take effect "to the entire exclusion" of the deceased "and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise" as required by s. 43 (2), inasmuch as he retained the right to receive the forty instalments of £18,750 each, which benefit continued down to the date of his death. Even if, however, "the property in which the interest subsisted" must be considered as consisting only of the residue of the settled property after provision for the forty instalments and the capital sum of £100,000, the benefit taken by the deceased (the right to receive the forty instalments), though not taking effect out of the "property in which the interest subsisted," was so clearly referable to and connected with the determination of the deceased's life interest in that property as to exclude exemption under s. 43 (2).

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated May 20, 1949, made on an English information laid by the Attorney-General.

The Crown claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, by virtue of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, if and so far as necessary supplemented by s. 56 (2) of that Act, or, alternatively, by virtue of s. 46 of that Act. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., rejected the arguments of the Crown, and gave judgment for the taxpayers with costs.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), Upjohn, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and N. C. Armitage for the taxpayers.

Apr. 5. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. In this case estate duty is claimed by the Crown to have become payable on the death, on Nov. 10, 1940, of John Townshend, second Baron St. Levan (whom we will call "the deceased"), either (i) under s. 43, if and so far as necessary supplemented by s. 56 (2), of the Finance Act, 1940, on the principal value (ascertained in accordance with s. 55 (2) of the same Act) of the ordinary shares of the defendant company; or, alternatively, (ii) under s. 46 of that Act on a proportion of the assets of the defendant company valued in accordance with s. 50 and subject to the provisions against duplication of charge contained in s. 51 (2). The Solicitor-General, on behalf of the Crown, while not admitting that the two claims are not capable in principle of cumulative application, concedes that they should be treated as alternatives for the purposes of the present case. By his judgment, dated May 20, 1949, CROOM-JOHNSON, J., rejected both claims and dismissed the information, and from that judgment the Crown now appeals. We will deal first with the claim under s. 43 and s. 56 (2) of the Act.

It is unnecessary to repeat what was said in the judgment of this court in A.-G. v. St. Aubyn (1) about the history of this legislation. It will, however, be convenient to begin by setting out the relevant provisions of the two sections. Section 43, so far as material for the present purpose, provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where an interest limited to cease on a death has been disposed of or has determined, whether by surrender, assurance, divesting, forfeiture or in any other manner (except by the expiration of a fixed period at the expiration of which the interest was limited to cease), whether wholly or partly, and whether for value or not, after becoming an interest in possession,—(a) if apart from the disposition or determination the property in which the interest subsisted would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, that property shall be deemed by virtue of this section to be included as to the whole thereof in the property passing on the death . . . (2) Where the relevant disposition or determination was bona fide effected or suffered three years before the death (or, if it was effected or suffered for public or charitable purposes, one year before the death), the preceding sub-section shall not have effect—(a) if bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property in which the interest subsisted was assumed immediately thereafter by the person becoming entitled by virtue of or upon the disposition or determination and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise; or (b) in the case of a partial determination, if the conditions specified in the preceding paragraph were not satisfied by reason only of the retention or enjoyment by the deceased of possession of some part of the property, or of some benefit, by virtue of the provisions of the instrument under which he had the interest: Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as affecting any charge of estate duty arising otherwise than by virtue of the provisions of the preceding sub-section . . . (6) This section shall have effect only in relation to a person dying after the commencement of this Act, and s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900, and ss. 35 and 39 of the Finance Act, 1930, shall not have effect in relation to such a person."

Section 56 provides:

"(2) Where a company to which this section applies was concerned in the disposition or determination of an interest limited to cease on a death effected or suffered as mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 43 of this Act, or in a surrender made as mentioned in sub-s. (3) of s. 48 of this Act, or was concerned in any one or more of associated operations of which the disposition or determination or surrender formed one, the conditions as to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest or of the deceased, and of any benefit to him, specified in the said sub-s. (2) or in the said sub-s. (3) as the case may be, shall be treated as having been satisfied if and only if they would have been so treated in the circumstances aforesaid."

The "circumstances aforesaid" referred to in s. 56 (2) are defined in sub-s. (1) of the same section as

"the following circumstances, namely, if the assets of the company had been held by it on trust for the members thereof and any other person to whom it is under any liability incurred otherwise than for the purposes of the business of the company wholly and exclusively, in accordance with the rights attaching to the shares in and debentures of the company and the terms on which any such liability was incurred, and if the company had acted in the capacity of a trustee only with power to carry on the business of the company and to employ the assets of the company therein."

Reference should also be made to the definitions of the terms "associated operations" and "disposition" contained in s. 59 which are in these terms:

" 'Associated operations' means any two or more operations of any kind being,—(a) operations which affect the same property or one of which affects some property and the other or others of which affect property which represents, whether directly or indirectly, that property, or income arising from that property, or any property representing accumulations of any such income; or (b) any two operations of which one is effected with reference to the other, or with a view to enabling it to be effected or to facilitating its being effected, and any third operation having a like relation to either of those two, and any fourth operation having a like relation to any of those three, and so on; whether those operations are effected by the same person or by different persons, whether they are connected otherwise than as aforesaid or not, and whether they are contemporaneous or any of them precedes or follows any other; . . . 'Disposition' includes any trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement, whether made by a single operation or by associated operations, and also, in relation to shares in or debentures of a company, the extinguishment or any alteration of rights attaching thereto, whether effected by a single operation or by associated operations."

The claims for duty arise in the following circumstances. At the date of the registration of the defendant company, to which we are about to refer, certain freehold estates in the counties of Devon and Cornwall together with certain investments representing capital moneys and certain equitable interests representing former undivided shares in land were, by the joint effect of a re-settlement dated Apr. 26, 1879, and a deed poll dated Jan. 9, 1905, and in the events which had happened, held (so far as is material for the present purpose) on such trusts as the deceased and one Sydney Alexander Ponsonby (whom we will call "Mr. Ponsonby") should by any deed or deeds, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, from time to time jointly appoint, and in default of and until and subject to any such joint appointment in trust for the deceased for life with remainders over. The deceased had had no male issue (and, in fact, never afterwards had any) and the position under the re-settlement was that, subject to any exercise of the above-mentioned joint power of appointment and in default of male issue of the deceased, the settled property would pass on his death to his nephew, Francis Cecil St. Aubyn, as next tenant for life, with remainder to such nephew's eldest son, John Francis Arthur St. Aubyn, subject to a charge for portions contingently payable to such nephew's four younger children. The legal estate in fee simple in the settled freeholds was vested in the deceased as tenant for life under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of that Act were one Francis Dudley Williams Drummond and Mr. Ponsonby (to whom we will refer as "the trustees"). On Mar. 21, 1927, the defendant company was registered under the Companies Acts, 1908-1917, as a company limited by shares with a nominal capital of £200,000 divided into two hundred thousand shares of £1 each, and with a provision in its memorandum of association to the effect that any of its capital might be issued with (inter alia) such preferential rights as might be thought expedient. The seven subscribers to such memorandum (who included the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby) each agreed to take one share, and these seven shares were admittedly taken by them as nominees for the trustees. By a deed poll dated Mar. 23, 1927, the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby, in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, varied the provisions of the re-settlement (in effect) so as to authorise the investment of capital moneys in any debentures, debenture stock or other securities, or any shares or stock of or in the defendant company, and so that any of the same might be subscribed for at such premium as the defendant company might require, and, further (in effect), so as to authorise the sale of equitable interests representing former undivided shares in the land comprised in the re-settlement for any such debentures, debenture stock or shares as aforesaid (with a like provision as to subscription at a premium), and, further, so as to confer on the deceased as tenant for life certain extended powers in addition to those conferred on him by the re-settlement and the Settled Land Act, 1925, consisting (in effect, of (a) power to sell the whole or any part of the settled land to any purchaser (including a company) in consideration wholly or partially of a capital sum of money payable by instalments, the whole of which should be capital money and should not carry interest in respect of any part thereof for the time being unpaid, except that any instalment not paid within twenty-one days after becoming due might be made to carry interest at any rate as from the date on which it became due, and (b) power to effect any such sale to the defendant company for a consideration consisting wholly or partially of fully paid debentures or debenture stock or other securities or of shares or stock of the defendant company.

By an agreement dated Mar. 24, 1927, and made between the deceased, of the first part, the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby, of the second part, and the defendant company, of the third part, it was (so far as is material for the present purpose) agreed:—(i) that the deceased in exercise of his statutory and additional powers as tenant for life should sell and the defendant company should purchase all the freehold property then subject to the re-settlement; (ii) that the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby in exercise of their joint general power of appointment should direct the sale to the defendant company of the investments therein mentioned (being investments representing capital moneys arising under the re-settlement) and also all the equitable interests then subsisting in respect of former undivided shares in land comprised in the re-settlement, the sale of such investments and interests to be carried into effect by the trustees of the re-settlement pursuant to such direction by way of investment or variation of investment of capital money; (iii) that the consideration for the sale of the freehold property should be the sum of £1,117,000 to be paid and satisfied as to £367,000 by payment to the trustees in cash on completion of the sale, and as to £750,000 by the payment thereof to the trustees in cash by forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each payable on June 24 and Dec. 25 in each year the first payment to be made on June 24, 1927. No interest was to be payable on the part of the £750,000 for the time being unpaid, except that any instalment not paid within twenty-one days of becoming due was to carry interest at five per cent. per annum from the day on which it ought to be paid until actual payment thereof; (iv) that the consideration for the sale of the investments should be £573,000 and of the equitable interests £10,000, both these sums to be paid to the trustees in cash on completion of the sale; (v) that completion should take place on Mar. 26, 1927. The total consideration for the sale to the defendant company was thus to be £1,700,000, of which £950,000 was to be paid to the trustees in cash on completion of the sale, and the balance of £750,000 was to be paid to the trustees by forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 on the dates and in the manner above stated. On the same date (that is, Mar. 24, 1927) the defendant company allotted one hundred thousand seven per cent. cumulative preference shares to the deceased at par, and 49,993 ordinary shares (making, with the seven shares allotted to the subscribers to the memorandum of association, total of fifty thousand issued ordinary shares) to the trustees at a premium of £16 per share. By a deed dated Mar. 25, 1927 (so far as material for the present purpose) the deceased, as tenant for life, directed, and the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby, in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, by way of ratification of such direction appointed and directed, that all capital money or investments representing capital money then subject to the re-settlement should forthwith be invested in or exchanged for ordinary shares of the defendant company which might be subscribed for or taken at the premium required by the defendant company for the same.

The sale to the defendant company was completed on Mar. 26, 1927, (a) as regards the freehold properties by a conveyance of that date made between the deceased (who conveyed under his statutory and additional powers as tenant for life), of the first part, the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby (who ratified and confirmed such conveyance in exercise of their joint general power of appointment), of the second part, the trustees (who acknowledged receipt of the £367,000 immediately payable by the defendant company and took a covenant from the defendant company for payment of the balance of £750,000 by the instalments and in the manner mentioned above), of the third part, and the defendant company (as purchaser), of the fourth part; and (b) as regards the equitable interests, by a conveyance of the same date between the trustees (as vendors for the sum of £10,000 of which they thereby acknowledged receipt), of the first part, the deceased (directing the transaction as tenant for life), of the second part, the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby (confirming the transaction in exercise of their joint general power), of the third part, and the defendant company (as purchaser), of the fourth part. It is to be assumed that the investments representing capital moneys (sold to the defendant company for the aggregate consideration of £573,000) were, on or about the same date, transferred to the defendant company by appropriate separate instruments. Between Mar. 24 and 29, 1927, the total cash consideration of £950,000 immediately payable by the defendant company to the trustees was paid by means of a cheque drawn by the defendant company in favour of the trustees against an advance made by its bankers for the purpose, and the trustees paid to the defendant company by cheque the sum of £849,993 for the 49,993 ordinary shares of the defendant company allotted to them, making, with the seven subscribers' shares taken for cash at par, a total of £850,000 paid to the defendant company by the trustees for fifty thousand ordinary shares at an overall premium of £16 per share, and the deceased paid the defendant company by cheque the sum of £100,000 for the one hundred thousand preference shares of the defendant company allotted to him at par, having been put in funds for this purpose by means of a cheque for the like amount drawn in his favour by the trustees. It is not clear whether the last-mentioned cheque represented moneys due to the deceased on income account or was drawn in his favour in anticipation of the appointment of Mar. 28, 1927, mentioned below. At all events, the £100,000 paid by the deceased for the preference shares, if and so far as it represented an advance by the trustees was offset, and if and so far as it represented moneys to which he was already entitled, A was recouped to him by means of that appointment.

The net result of the transactions so far described was that the freehold property, equitable interests, and investments of capital money formerly subject to the re-settlement had been converted into fifty thousand fully paid ordinary shares of the defendant company, the right to receive from the defendant company a capital sum of £750,000 by forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 B each payable on the half-yearly dates above mentioned and carrying no interest unless and until twenty-one days or more in arrear, and a sum of £100,000 to be regarded either as being in the hands of the trustees or else as outstanding on a temporary loan made by them to the deceased to enable him to pay for his one hundred thousand preference shares.

By a deed poll dated Mar. 28, 1927, the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby jointly C directed and appointed that the said sum of £100,000 and the said sum of £750,000 payable by the defendant company by the instalments aforesaid, and the successive instalments thereof and any interest which might become payable in respect of any instalment, should be in trust for the deceased absolutely and he should be entitled thereto for his own sole use instead of D for his life only. By a further deed poll dated Mar. 29, 1927, after recitals, including a recital to the effect that all the lands and hereditaments subject to the re-settlement had been sold and that the property then subject thereto consisted of 49,993 fully paid ordinary shares of £1 each in the defendant company (no specific mention being made of the seven shares taken by the subscribers to the memorandum of association though these did, in fact, clearly form part of the settled property), the deceased E and Mr. Ponsonby, in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, appointed new trusts of (in effect) the whole of the property then remaining subject to the re-settlement (that is, in view of the appointment of the previous day, the fifty thousand issued ordinary shares of the defendant company) and released their joint general power of appointment. It is unnecessary for the present purpose to state in detail the somewhat complicated terms of the new trusts so declared, which admittedly had F the effect of extinguishing the life interest of the deceased in the fifty thousand ordinary shares and of excluding him from all benefit so far as those shares and the income thereof was concerned. In brief outline, the trusts in question included:—(i) a trust for payment to the deceased's nephew, Francis Cecil St. Aubyn, of an immediate life annuity of £5, and, subject thereto, (ii) a trust G for the accumulation of the income of the settled property for a period of twenty years (determinable as therein mentioned) for providing the portions contingently charged thereon for the younger children of such nephew, and (iii) provisions to the effect that no beneficiary was to be entitled to possession of the settled property during such period, and that on its expiration or sooner determination the property was to be held in trust for such issue of the H deceased's father, the first Baron St. Levan (other than the deceased himself) as the deceased should appoint, and, in default of and subject to any such appointment, on the trusts which, on the expiration or sooner determination of such period, would be subsisting under the re-settlement if the deed poll now in statement had never been executed and the deceased had died immediately before such execution.

Notwithstanding the provision under which no beneficiary was to be entitled to possession of the settled property during the period of accumulation, it was conceded on behalf of the Crown that the trustees should be regarded for the purposes of s. 43 (2) (a) as having assumed possession and enjoyment of the fifty thousand shares on the determination by the deed poll of Mar. 29, 1927, of the deceased's life interest therein. This point being thus disposed of, it follows that, as the deceased survived the execution of the last-mentioned deed by more than three years, all the conditions of the exemption from liability to duty under s. 43 (1) afforded by sub-s. (2) (a) of the same section would be satisfied if the appointment thereby made was the only disposition to be considered and the fifty thousand ordinary shares were the only property to be taken into account. It is, however, contended on the part of the Crown that although the deceased received no benefit out of the ordinary shares or the income thereof, he nevertheless was not excluded from "any benefit to him by contract or otherwise" as required by s. 43 (2) (a) inasmuch as he did receive a benefit in the shape of the right to receive the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each which had been vested in him absolutely by the deed of Mar. 28, 1927. In support of this contention, reference was made to A.-G. v. Worrall (2) ([1895] 1 Q.B. 104), as authority for the proposition (which we fully accept) that the benefit relied on as a bar to exemption need not necessarily be carved out of the property in which the determined life interest subsisted. The Solicitor-General argued that the Crown was entitled to succeed on this ground even under s. 43 alone and unaided by s. 56 (2). We are by no means satisfied that this is so. It is, no doubt, true that each of the steps taken in March, 1927, formed part of one pre-arranged scheme and was taken with a view to the carrying out of that scheme. Counsel for the taxpayers very properly admitted this perfectly obvious fact. It is also hardly open to doubt that the scheme was framed in the form it took with a view to avoiding the liability to duty on the death of the deceased which would (even as the law then stood) have been likely to arise if, without the preliminary expedient of a sale to a company formed for the purpose, a substantially similar provision had been made for the deceased directly out of the settled property, and subject thereto his life interest in such property had been extinguished. Nevertheless, there is nothing unlawful in a scheme designed to minimise the incidence of duty by legal means, and its success or failure must be judged by reference to the true legal effect of what has been done: see Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Duke of Westminster (3). Thus, in the present case the sale to the defendant company must, apart from s. 56 (2), be given its true legal effect, and, so considered, the result of it in conjunction with the trustees' subscription for ordinary shares was to convert the settled property into fifty thousand ordinary shares of the defendant company, a capital sum of £750,000 payable by the defendant company to the trustees by instalments, and a further capital sum of £100,000. Thenceforward, these assets, and these alone, constituted the settled fund. Under the deeds of Mar. 28 and 29, 1927, the deceased took absolutely the £750,000 and the £100,000, and his interest in the fifty thousand ordinary shares was absolutely extinguished. The deceased having survived the transactions by more than three years, it is difficult to see how, under s. 43 alone, the enlargement of his life interest in the £750,000 and the £100,000 (part of the capital of the settled fund) constituted a reservation of a benefit to him so as to prevent the exemption afforded by sub-s. (2) (a) from applying. If the £750,000 had been payable in a lump sum and not by instalments, the case would have been equivalent to the simple one of the assignment by a remainderman to a tenant for life of the reversion in part of a settled fund in consideration of the surrender by the tenant for life to the remainderman of his life interest in the remaining part of the fund. It is not contended by the Crown that the simple transaction I have instanced would attract duty, given survival by the life tenant for the prescribed statutory period, and, indeed, it would otherwise be hard to see how any surrender of a life interest for value could escape duty at any distance of time, though the section clearly contemplates that a surrender for value is capable of qualifying for exemption under sub-s. (2). The only difference in the present case is that the capital assets taken absolutely by the tenant for life consisted chiefly of a debt payable by instalments. We find it difficult to see how this can alter the character of the transaction or affect the result unless the legal effect of the sale to the defendant company can be disregarded, which there is no warrant for doing independently of s. 56 (2).

However, it is unnecessary to take up time in considering what the position might be if s. 56 (2) did not apply, as the taxpayers admit that s. 56 (2) is, in fact, applicable, the defendant company being, under the definition provided by s. 58, a company to which s. 56 applies, and having been concerned in an "associated operation" in the shape of the sale and transfer to it of the settled property. Section 56 (2), which we have already quoted at length, requires the assumption of certain circumstances set out in sub-s. (1) and also fully quoted above. The circumstances thus required to be assumed have been conveniently termed "the statutory hypothesis." The effect of the application of the statutory hypothesis in the present case is, as we understand it, to eliminate completely the element of sale from the transfer to the defendant company and the consequent conversion of the settled property, and to make the case stand for the purposes of s. 43 (2) as it would have stood if the settled property had been transferred to the company as a trustee on the following trusts:—(i) to pay thereout to the trustees of the settlement £750,000 by the instalments and on the dates hereinbefore mentioned to be held by them as capital moneys on trust for the deceased for life with remainders over as in the re-settlement provided; (ii) subject as aforesaid to raise and pay thereout to the deceased, on whatever future event should be taken as corresponding for the purposes of the hypothetical trusts to the winding-up of the company, £100,000, and in the meantime to pay him interest on that sum at the rate of seven per cent. per annum out of the net income of the property; (iii) subject as aforesaid, on trust both as to income and (on the event taken as corresponding to such winding-up) capital for the trustees of the settlement absolutely on the trusts for the deceased for life with remainders over applicable to income and capital respectively under the re-settlement. It will thus be seen that the application of the statutory hypothesis results in the conversion of the right to receive the instalments of the £750,000 into an equitable interest charged by way of primary trust on the entire capital and income of the settled property as it stood before the sale to the defendant company. It follows that the appointment to the deceased absolutely of the right to receive the forty half-yearly instalments of the £750,000 effected by the deed of Mar. 28, 1927, must, by virtue of the statutory hypothesis, be regarded for the purposes of s. 43 (2) as an appointment to him absolutely of an equitable interest of the nature above described in the settled property as it stood before the sale to the defendant company, and not of a separate and distinct capital asset consisting of the right to receive the instalments from the defendant company. It also follows that the appointment of Mar. 29, 1927, by which the deceased's life interest in the fifty thousand ordinary shares of the defendant company was extinguished must be considered as an appointment extinguishing his life interest, not in the fifty thousand ordinary shares as a separate and distinct capital asset, but in the equitable interest in the settled property as it stood before the sale to the defendant company which the statutory hypothesis imputes to the trustees of the settlement as holders of the ordinary shares, that is to say, the entire equitable interest in the settled property as it stood before the sale to the defendant company subject to (i) the primary trust for payment thereout of the instalments of the £750,000, and (ii) the trust for payment to the deceased of the £100,000 with interest in the meantime payable out of income at the rate of seven per cent. per annum substituted by the statutory hypothesis for his holding of preference shares.

Counsel for the taxpayers admits that the statutory hypothesis is applicable, and also, we think, substantially accepts the effect of its application as above described, except that he divides the interests to be imputed to the deceased in respect of the one-hundred thousand preference shares and to the trustees in respect of the fifty thousand ordinary shares into trusts of income pending the winding-up of the defendant company and of capital on the defendant company being wound-up. On the footing that the company is to be considered as a trustee of the property, we find difficulty in regarding its winding-up, as such, as an event having any relevance to the terms of the hypothetical trusts. Looking, however, at the voting rights attached to the shares, we find that under art. 48 of the defendant company's articles of association a poll may be demanded by any member present in person or by proxy, and that under art. 52, on a show of hands, every member present in person has one vote and on a poll every member has one vote for each share of which he is the holder, the voting rights attached to the preference shares being restricted to certain specified matters which, however, include a resolution for the winding-up of the company. It follows that, as the trustees and their nominees held fifty thousand ordinary shares carrying on a poll a like number of votes, while the deceased held one hundred thousand shares carrying on a poll a like number of votes with respect to a resolution for winding-up the defendant company, a resolution for that purpose could have been carried if, but not unless, it was concurred in by the trustees and the deceased. Translating this into the nearest equivalent we can suggest for the purposes of the hypothetical trust, we think the capital sum of £100,000 corresponding to the deceased's capital rights in respect of the one-hundred thousand preference shares should be considered as payable to him at the joint request of the trustees and the deceased and that the interest corresponding to the trustees' capital rights in respect of the fifty thousand ordinary shares—that is to say, the residue of the corpus of the settled property remaining after provision for the half-yearly instalments of the £750,000 and for the deceased's equitable interest corresponding to the one-hundred thousand preference shares—should be considered as transferable to them on the like joint request. We do not, however, regard the precise event on which the corpus of the settled property remaining after provision for the instalments of the £750,000 is to be considered as payable or transferable to the trustees and the deceased according to their respective interests under the hypothetical trusts as having any material bearing on the result.

The substantial effect of applying the statutory hypothesis is to impute to the deceased the following equitable interests in the property immediately before the execution of the deed of Mar. 28, 1927, namely, (i) a life interest in the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each charged by way of trust on the whole of the settled property; (ii) an absolute interest in £100,000 raisable thereout with interest in the meantime at the rate of seven per cent. per annum (that is, £7,000 per annum) payable out of income, and (iii) a life interest in the residue of the settled property. Counsel for the taxpayers has forcibly argued that, even so, the claim under s. 43 and s. 56 (2) must fail. His contention is to the effect that, even when the statutory hypothesis is applied, all it does is to create three separate and distinct interests in the settled property, namely, (i) the trust to raise and pay to the trustees the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each to be held by them on trust for the deceased or life with remainders over; (ii) the trust to raise and pay to the deceased a capital sum of £100,000 and in the meantime to pay him £7,000 per annum out of income; and (iii) the trust of the residue of the property for the trustees in trust for the deceased for life with remainders over, all these three interests being subject to the overriding joint general power of appointment.

By the deed of Mar. 28, 1927, the joint general power was exercised so as to enlarge the deceased's life interest in the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each into an absolute interest. He already had an absolute interest in the £100,000 when raised and the £7,000 per annum payable out of income until it was raised, though the cost of such interest was ultimately provided by means of the appointment to him absolutely of the sum of £100,000 effected by the same deed. There remained the third separate and distinct interest, that is to say, the residue of the settled property remaining after provision for the other two, which, after the execution of the deed of Mar. 28, was the only property remaining subject to the trusts of the re-settlement. This residue alone (so it is argued) was the subject of the deed of Mar. 29, 1927, and the relevant disposition for the present purpose was the determination of the deceased's life interest in such residue effected by the deed. Quoad such residue, says counsel for the taxpayers in effect, the determination of the deceased's life interest was complete, and the deceased was wholly excluded from all benefit out of or in respect of it. The absolute interest taken by the deceased in the forty half-yearly instalments under the deed of Mar. 28, 1927, and the interest imputed to him by virtue of his holding of preference shares are (so proceeds the argument) irrelevant for this purpose. These, it is said, were separate and distinct interests forming no part of the subject-matter of the relevant disposition, or in other words of "the property in which the interest subsisted" within the meaning of s. 43 (2), and the deceased held them as separate and distinct items of property, his title to which was complete before the date of, and in no way referable to, the relevant disposition, that is, the deed of Mar. 29, which simply determined his life interest in a third separate and distinct item of property.

We find it impossible to accept the argument of the taxpayers. We propose for simplicity's sake to ignore the interest imputed to the deceased under the statutory hypothesis by virtue of his ownership of the one hundred thousand preference shares, in view of the unsatisfactory state of the evidence as to the precise manner in which the £100,000 paid for these shares was originally provided, and to deal with the matter on the footing that the only interest taken by the deceased to be regarded as relevant to the question of exemption under s. 43 (2) is the right to receive the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each, converted by the application of the statutory hypothesis into a trust for payment of those instalments out of the settled property as it stood before the sale to the defendant company. This interest, as so converted, was, in its very nature, essentially an interest taking effect out of, and as it were permeating every part of, the settled property. It was, moreover, admittedly created in order that it might be vested in the deceased as a preliminary to the determination of the deceased's interest in the residue of the settled property, which must for this purpose be treated, by virtue of the statutory hypothesis, as substituted for the fifty thousand ordinary shares of the company. Furthermore, the deceased's interest in it was enlarged into an absolute interest the very day before his life interest in the residue of the settled property was determined, admittedly in order that after such determination the deceased might nevertheless be entitled to receive half-yearly out of the settled property the sum of £18,750 for a period of twenty years. Once the statutory hypothesis is applied, we see no escape for the taxpayers from the conclusion that the determination of the deceased's life interest did not take effect "to the entire exclusion" of the deceased "and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise" as required by s. 43 (2), inasmuch as he did retain a benefit in the shape of the right to receive the forty half-yearly instalments of £18,750 each, which benefit continued down to the date of his death, and was even then not exhausted. We think that for this purpose "the property in which the interest subsisted" within the meaning of s. 43 (2) (a) must be taken as being the settled property as it stood before the sale to the company, the subsequent creation of the different equitable interests which the statutory hypothesis supposes being merely in the nature of a preliminary carving up of the property into the appropriate beneficial interests with a view to securing the desired benefit to the deceased out of it on the intended determination of his life interest. But, even if we are wrong in this, and "the property in which the interest subsisted" must, as counsel for the taxpayers contended, be considered as consisting only of the residue of the property remaining after provision for the other interests, we are satisfied that the benefit taken by the deceased in the shape of the creation and vesting in him of the right to receive the half-yearly instalments, though on this view not taking effect out of the "property in which the interest subsisted," was on the facts so clearly referable to and connected with the determination of the deceased's life interest in that property as to constitute a fatal objection to exemption under s. 43 (2).

Counsel for the taxpayers placed some reliance on the Irish case of Re Cochrane (4) and on the Privy Council cases of Munro v. Stamp Duties Comr. (5) and New South Wales Stamp Duties Comr. v. Perpetual Trustee Co., Ltd. (6) in support of his argument to the effect that the mere retention of a previously existing interest in property outside the subject-matter of the relevant gift or disposition does not constitute a relevant benefit for the purposes of provisions such as those of s. 43. None of these cases seems to us to have the faintest resemblance to the present case, and we can derive no assistance from any of them. It is one thing to hold (for instance) that a man who settles property on trusts which confer no benefit on himself, but do not or may not exhaust the whole beneficial interest in the property settled, and thus retains, subject to those trusts, some residual vested or contingent resulting or reversionary interest in the property, has nevertheless—to the extent of the beneficial interests taking effect under those trusts—made a complete disposition to the entire exclusion of himself and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise. It is quite another thing to hold, and we decline to agree, that a similar entire exclusion is achieved if (for instance) a man who has a general overriding power of appointment over property settled on himself for life with remainders over creates, in exercise of the power, an annuity payable to himself in priority to his life interest for a term of twenty years certain, and then releases the power and surrenders his life interest subject to the annuity, or (which comes to the same thing) appoints by way of final exercise of the power that subject to the annuity the property shall be held on trusts which have the effect of extinguishing his life interest.

Counsel for the taxpayers also placed some reliance on A.-G. v. Secombe (7). That is the well known case in which it was held that for the purposes of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1), (relating to gifts inter vivos) as applied to estate duty by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), the words "or otherwise" in the phrase "or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise" must be read as meaning some arrangement ejusdem generis with contract, that is to say, an enforceable arrangement. Counsel sought to apply that decision to the present case in this way. There was (he said in effect) no contractual nexus between the various steps here carried out. Thus, the execution of the deed of Mar. 28, 1927, which gave the deceased the absolute interest in the instalments, imposed no obligation on the appointors to execute the deed of Mar. 29, 1927, which determined the deceased's life interest in the ordinary shares of the defendant company, or the corresponding interest in the settled property substituted by the statutory hypothesis for those ordinary shares. Thus, he argued, there was no legally enforceable arrangement under which the deceased took the instalments in exchange for the determination of the life interest. We think that this places on the decision in A.-G. v. Secombe (7) a construction which it will not well bear. The decision, as we understand it, goes no further than to hold that the benefit must be secured by some legally enforceable arrangement as opposed to being merely casual or eleemosynary. That may be so, but it does not follow that the right to the benefit must be contractually connected with the disposition. In our judgment, it is quite enough if it appears on the facts that the benefit is conferred or reserved with a view to, or on account of, the gift or disposition, or, in other words, that the one is referable to the other.

For the reasons above stated we are, therefore, of opinion that the claim for duty under s. 43 in conjunction with s. 56 (2) of the Finance Act, 1940, should succeed. The learned judge held that the claim under s. 43 could not succeed without the aid of s. 56 (2), and so far we are not disposed to differ from him, though we have not found it necessary to express any concluded opinion on the position as it might have been if s. 56 (2) had not been enacted. But he also found himself able to hold, for reasons which we have found a little difficult to follow, that, even with the aid of s. 56 (2), the claim could not be made out. In so holding we think that the learned judge was in error. The terms of s. 56 (2) are far from being a model of clarity, and they demand a feat of imagination by no means easy to perform, but it is admitted that s. 56 (2) does apply in this case, and effect must, therefore, be given to the hypothesis which it enjoins, however unreal and remote from the actual facts of the case the process may appear. Having done, to the best of our ability, that which the sub-section requires, we think there is really no doubt as to the validity of the claim.

It remains to consider the claim under s. 46 of the Finance Act, 1940. Liability under that section (in the form in which it stood at the death of the deceased) arises where a person dying after the commencement of the Act

“ . . . has made to a company to which this section applies a transfer of any property (other than an interest limited to cease on his death or property which he transferred in a fiduciary capacity), and any benefits accruing to the deceased from the company accrued to him in the three years ending with his death . . . ”

Where these conditions are satisfied, the assets of the company are to be deemed for the purposes of estate duty to be included in the property passing on his death to an extent determined in accordance with the somewhat complicated provisions of sub-section (2) by reference to the proportion that the aggregate amount of the benefits accruing to the deceased from the company bore to the net income of the company. Section 47 defines in very wide terms the matters to be treated as benefits to the deceased from the company, including—s. 47 (1) (a)—

“ Any income of the company, and any periodical payment out of the resources or at the expense of the company, which the deceased received for his own benefit whether directly or indirectly . . . ”

By sub-s. (2) the expression “ periodical payment ” means

“ . . . a payment by way of dividend or interest, a payment by way of remuneration . . . and any other payment being one of a series of payments, whether interconnected or not, whether of the same or of varying amounts, and whether payable at regular intervals or otherwise.”

The defendant company in the present case being admittedly a company to which s. 46 applied, by virtue of the definition contained in s. 58, it remained for the Crown to establish (a) that the deceased had made a transfer or transfers of property to the defendant company (other than an interest limited to cease on his death or property which he transferred in a fiduciary capacity), and (b) that benefits (within the meaning of s. 46 as explained by s. 47) had accrued to the deceased from the defendant company in the three years ended with his death; and, of course, given proof of such transfer or transfers, the greater the benefits so accruing could be shown to have been, the larger the dutiable proportion of the assets of the company would become.

Elaborate arguments were presented to us on both points. Counsel for the taxpayers relied on the exception from s. 46 of property transferred by the deceased in a fiduciary capacity, and contended that all the transfers here made to the company of the settled lands, equitable interests, and investments, so far as made by or by the direction of the deceased, were made or directed by him in the fiduciary capacity imposed on a tenant for life by the Settled Land Act, 1925. The payment by the deceased to the defendant company of the sum of £100,000 by way of subscription for the one hundred thousand preference shares allotted to him was admittedly not made in a fiduciary capacity, but counsel contended that this was not a transfer within the meaning of s. 46. The Solicitor-General relied on s. 58 which provides that:

“(4) References in this Part of this Act to a disposition's being made by any person . . . include references to its being made . . . by him and another jointly or by another at his direction,” and also on s. 58, sub-s. (5), which provides that references

“to a person . . . doing any act in an fiduciary capacity shall be construed as references to his . . . doing that act in a fiduciary capacity imposed on him otherwise than by a disposition made by him and in such a capacity only.”

Applying these definitions to the present case, the Solicitor-General contended that the settled lands, equitable interests, and investments must be regarded as having been transferred by the deceased to the defendant company in a fiduciary capacity imposed on him by a disposition made by himself, that is, by the deed poll of Mar. 23, 1927, whereby the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby, in exercise of their joint general power of appointment, extended the deceased's powers as tenant for life for the purpose of enabling the sale to the defendant company to be carried out. He also relied on the concurrence in the two conveyances dated Mar. 26, 1927, of the settled land and equitable interests of the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby to confirm those assurances in exercise of the joint general power, contending that, as this was admittedly not a fiduciary power, the deceased could not be said to have transferred in a fiduciary capacity “only.” As regards the investments, he pointed out that the sale agreement of Mar. 24, 1927, expressly provided that these were to be sold by the direction of the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby in exercise of the joint general power, which direction they in fact gave by the deed of Mar. 25, 1927. He also referred to the wide terms of s. 58 (2) which provides that:

“A person shall be deemed . . . to have made a transfer of property to a company if the property came to be included in the resources of the company by the effect of a disposition made by him or with his consent or of any associated operations of which such a disposition formed one.”

As to the payment by the deceased to the defendant company of the £100,000 subscribed by him for the preference shares, the Solicitor-General claimed that a payment of cash was clearly a transfer of property according to the plain literal meaning of the words, and did not cease to be such because it was made in consideration of an allotment of shares.

Counsel for the taxpayers argued that the deed poll of Mar. 23, 1927, merely enlarged the deceased's powers as tenant for life and did not alter the capacity in which he made or directed the transfers to the company which was simply the fiduciary capacity imposed on him by the Settled Land Act, 1925, as tenant for life under that Act. He further argued that the concurrence of the deceased and Mr. Ponsonby as holders of the joint general power should be disregarded as otiose and superfluous, and that the only necessary and effective dispositions or directions made or given by the deceased were made or given by him simply in his fiduciary capacity as tenant for life. As to the payment by the deceased of £100,000 for the preference shares, counsel, while conceding that such payment might literally be described as a transfer of property to the defendant company, contended that it was not a transfer of property to the defendant company

A within the meaning of s. 46 and s. 47, as this would, he forcibly argued, give an impossibly wide scope and effect to the provisions in question and to the stringent ancillary provisions as to disclosure and so forth. He pointed out that s. 59 defines "payment" as including a transfer of property, and not unnaturally relied on this as showing that the converse could not have been intended. As to the receipt of benefits by the deceased from the defendant company, counsel

B admitted that the dividends received by the deceased on the preference shares and the half-yearly instalments of £18,750 paid to him were benefits within the meaning of s. 46 and s. 47. There was, however, considerable argument on the question whether certain annual loans made by the defendant company to the deceased were benefits for this purpose. The loans in question were secured by two mortgages dated respectively Jan. 30, 1933, and Aug. 4, 1936. By the

C mortgage of Jan. 30, 1933, the company covenanted to advance to the deceased quarterly during the joint lives of the deceased and his nephew, Francis Cecil St. Aubyn, at four per cent. interest the sum of £500 (making a total of £2,000 per annum) with a stipulation that payment of the sums so advanced and the interest thereon should not be required by the defendant company until two years after the death of the deceased, and that in the meantime the interest

D should be added to the principal, and carry interest accordingly. The same deed provided for the deduction of the debt by instalments from any instalments of the £750,000 remaining outstanding at the expiration of two years from the death of the deceased and for charging the debt upon such instalments. The mortgage of Aug. 4, 1936, provided for the advance to the deceased of additional half-yearly instalments of £500 each (making an additional £1,000 per annum) on the same

E terms. The deceased received the full aggregate advance of £3,000 from the defendant company under these mortgages during each of the three years preceding his death. The Solicitor-General contended that these yearly advances were "benefits" for the purposes of s. 46 as being "periodical payments" within s. 47 (1) (a) and (2). He also argued that in view of the special terms of repayment these advances should be regarded as being (in effect) accelerated

F payments on account of future instalments of the £750,000 which increased the yearly total of the instalments received during each of the three years preceding the death of the deceased from £37,500 to £40,500. The latter argument appears to us to be one which should, to say the least of it, be accepted with reserve in view of the case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Wesleyan and General Assurance Society (8). Counsel for the taxpayers, while conceding that a loan might for

G some purposes and to some extent be described as a benefit, contended with force that a loan could not be a benefit for the purposes of s. 46 owing to the impossibility of assessing the value of the benefit represented by a loan, and the necessity for placing a money value on any benefit before the provisions of the section could be applied to it. He also forcibly argued that if the intention had been to treat a loan as constituting per se a benefit to be taken at its full amount

H for the purposes of s. 46, s. 47 (2) would inevitably have included an express reference to loans. We have sufficiently summarised the issues and arguments on the claim under s. 46 to indicate the difficulty and complexity of this aspect of the matter. As the claim under s. 46 is, for the purposes of the present case at all events, to be treated as an alternative to the claim under s. 43 and s. 56 (2) on which we have held the Crown entitled to succeed, we will refrain from expressing any concluded opinion on it. The claim under s. 46 was decided adversely to the Crown by the learned judge, and we should, therefore, make it clear that we are not to be taken as expressing or implying any view one way or the other as to the correctness of his decision in this respect.

In the result, we hold that the order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., should be discharged, and that estate duty should be declared to have become payable under s. 43, read in conjunction with s. 56 (2), of the Finance Act, 1940, on the death of the deceased on the principal value, ascertained in accordance with s. 55 (2) of the same Act, of the fifty thousand ordinary shares of the defendant company. Duty having already been paid on the principal value of the instalments of the £750,000 which remained outstanding at the death of the deceased and of the preference shares, no smaller value should be placed on those instalments or on the preference shares for the purpose of valuing the ordinary shares by reference to the net assets of the company under s. 55 (2), except on the footing of an appropriate adjustment in favour of the respondents of the duty already paid.

THOMAS v. LINDOP.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Finemore, JJ.), April 19, 1950.]

Intoxicating Liquor—Consumption during prohibited hours—Consumption by customers—Licensee unaware of offence—Aiding and abetting—Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (b).

Customers in licensed premises had been served with intoxicating liquor before closing time and were still consuming it, or about to consume it, in the bar room of the premises nearly half an hour afterwards, contrary to the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (b). The licensee had no knowledge that there were any drinks in the room or that they were being consumed.

Held: as the licensee did not know that the customers were consuming intoxicating liquor, she did not know the facts which must be proved to show that they had committed an offence, and, therefore, she was not guilty of aiding and abetting the commission of that offence.

CASE STATED by justices for the county of Chester.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sandbach on Sept. 20, 1949, two informations were preferred by the respondent, a police officer, charging the appellant with having at 10.25 p.m. on July 29, 1949, being a time not during the permitted hours, contrary to s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, aided, abetted, counselled and procured two persons to consume on licensed premises intoxicating liquor, contrary to the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (b). For the appellant it was contended that, as she was unaware that the persons were consuming intoxicating liquor at a time not during permitted hours she was not guilty of the offences. The respondent contended that the appellant was under an obligation to see that the law was observed, and that, by abstaining from performing, or neglecting to perform, that duty, she was guilty of the offences charged. The justices held that the appellant was under a duty to see that the law was observed and was guilty of aiding and abetting the customers in committing the offence of which they were convicted. They, therefore, convicted the appellant and fined her £5 for each offence.

Horner for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Chester before whom the appellant, who is the licensee of certain licensed premises, was charged that

- B “at the hour of 10.25 p.m., that being a time not during the permitted hours, unlawfully did aid abet counsel and procure Philip Thomas Broster and Elizabeth Mason to consume on the licensed premises certain intoxicating liquor.”

It is curious that the exact point has never arisen before, but I must emphasise that we are deciding this case simply on the special facts found by the justices.

- C What they find is that the police entered the premises at 10.25 p.m. and found Broster and Mason sitting at a table on which there was intoxicating liquor. Broster had not then drunk the liquor before him, but he would have drunk it if he had known it was there, and so the justices regarded it as liquor which was about to be consumed. Mason had consumed some of the stout which she had ordered. Then the justices find:

- D “The appellant, who is the licensee of the Crown Inn, was at the time the respondent entered the premises in the bar at the front of the premises where there were several people. She was cleaning and washing glasses assisted by one Ethel Allcock, a servant of the appellant. The drinks which were on the table had been served by Ethel Allcock before 10 p.m. The appellant did not know when the drinks were served and the respondent was satisfied that the appellant had no knowledge that there were any drinks in the room or that [the persons named] were consuming intoxicating liquor. ‘Time’ had been called by the appellant at 10 p.m. and the above-mentioned persons had heard her.”
- E

So the justices find that the liquor had been supplied before 10 p.m. and that the appellant had no knowledge that these people were consuming intoxicating liquor.

- F By the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4:

- G “Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, no person shall, except during the permitted hours—(a) either by himself, or by any servant or agent, sell or supply to any person in any licensed premises or club any intoxicating liquor to be consumed either on or off the premises; or (b) consume in or take from any such premises or club any intoxicating liquor.”

- Paragraph (a), therefore, creates an offence which can be committed by the licensee in selling or supplying for consumption outside permitted hours. Paragraph (b) creates an offence by the customer. It is curious that the Act does not make it an offence for a licensee to permit the consumption of any intoxicating liquor after hours, but, so far as the licensee is concerned, the substantive offence is confined to the selling or supplying of liquor except during permitted hours, and in this case it is found that the sale or supply took place within the permitted hours. So there is clearly no offence there. If the statute had made it a substantive offence for the licensee to permit the consumption, no question would have arisen. The appellant would clearly have permitted it by allowing the people to be in the premises, though, perhaps, she did not know they were there. They were customers, and, if it had been an offence to permit the consumption, it might well be said that there was a duty on her to see that people did not remain there after those hours.

It is said, however, that, as the customers were consuming liquor after the permitted hours, the licensee must be taken to have aided and abetted that offence. More than once this court has pointed out that it is impossible to convict persons of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence unless they know the facts which must be proved to show that an offence has been committed. We pointed that out in Ackroyd's Air Travel, Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions (2), and AVORY, J., and SHEARMAN, J., said it in no uncertain terms in Bowker v. Premier Drug Co. (1). It is, of course, not necessary to show that the person knew that it was an offence, because he cannot plead ignorance of the law, but where anyone is charged with aiding and abetting a person to commit an offence, it must, at least, be shown that he knew what that person was doing. A person who does not know of the acts which another person is doing cannot be charged with aiding and abetting him because he does not know that he is doing acts which amount to an offence.

The justices have found that the appellant did not know that anyone was consuming drink on these premises, and, therefore, it cannot be said that she aided and abetted those persons to consume the liquor. The case is not unlike that of Bosley v. Davies (3) to which counsel for the appellant has directed our attention. That was a case under the Licensing Act, 1872, where it was held (1 Q.B.D. 84):

"In order to support a conviction under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 17,—by which if any person licensed under the Act 'suffers any gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on on his premises' he is made liable to certain penalties—it is necessary to give some evidence of actual or constructive knowledge on the part of the person charged that gaming was carried on on his premises."

In that case, the court, consisting of COCKBURN, C.J., and MELLOR and QUAIN, J.J., said (ibid., 88):

"The case must be sent back to the justices with an intimation of the opinion of the court that actual knowledge in the sense of seeing or hearing by the party charged is not necessary, but that there must be some circumstances from which it may be inferred that he or his servants had connived at what was going on."

There must, therefore, be actual knowledge or connivance. It seems to me that considerations applying to a section which deals with the suffering of some act to be done apply with equal force to a charge of aiding and abetting a person to do an act, because that is suffering the person to do the act. Therefore it is necessary to show either that the licensee in a case of this sort knew what was being done or connived at what was being done, and, in view of the findings of the justices in the present case, they ought to have dismissed the informations. If the justices had found in the present case that the appellant had shut her eyes to the fact that there were people on the premises or that she had in any way connived at their being on the premises, it would be an entirely different matter, but that is not so. For these reasons the appeal succeeds.

O'MAHONEY & CO., LTD. SAME v. SAME.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Singleton, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), March 20, April 4, 1950.]

Excess Profits Tax—Deductions against profits—Deduction of Eire taxes against English profits—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a)—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 14 (1).

A
B A company resident in Eire carried on business at two branches in England. The whole of its profits, including those arising from the businesses in England, were subject in Eire to income tax, corporation profits tax (corresponding to the United Kingdom national defence contribution), and excess profits tax, and its profits from the businesses in England were subject to United Kingdom income tax and excess profits tax. The company sought to deduct the proportion of the Eire taxes corresponding to its income from the businesses in England in computing the profits of those businesses for assessment to excess profits tax in the United Kingdom.

C HELD: (i) the Irish taxes could and should be regarded as a disbursement laid out for the purposes of the company's trade in England within the exception in r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and were, therefore, having regard to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 14 (1), deductible for the purposes of computing the profits of the company liable to excess profits tax.

D (ii) even if r. 3 (a) did not apply so as to admit the deduction, looking at the excess profits tax code as a whole it was clearly the intention of Parliament that the taxes in question should be deducted, and, as the contrary view would lead to injustice, the court ought to give effect to that intention.

APPEAL by the taxpayer, Dowdell O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd., and cross-appeal by the Crown from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated Oct. 25, 1949.

H The taxpayer had appealed to the Special Commissioners against the refusal of the Crown to allow the deduction of an appropriate proportion of Eire taxes in computing the taxpayer's profits from its English branches for assessment to excess profits tax, and the Special Commissioners had allowed the appeal. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., remitted to the Special Commissioners a Case stated for the opinion of the High Court for them to state the evidence on which their finding was based, and to state, in summary form, the nature, effect, and incidence of the three Irish taxes referred to. From this order the company appealed and the Crown cross-appealed, both parties agreeing that the Case set out all the evidence called and desiring the Court of Appeal to dispose finally of the matter. They further agreed in summary form a statement as to the Irish taxes. The appeal was placed in the interlocutory list for hearing, but the Court of Appeal decided that it had jurisdiction to dispose finally of the substantive issue, and indicated that the appeal should have been placed in the final list. The transfer of the appeal to the final list was ordered, the order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., for remitting the Case to the Special Commissioners was set aside, and the Court of Appeal proceeded to hear the appeal as a final appeal.

Apr. 4. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant taxpayer is a company incorporated in Eire with its head office in Cork. It has two branches in England. It is assessable to excess profits tax here in respect of the profits of its trade here and the case is concerned with assessments for that tax. In Eire, during the years covered by the assessments—1940 to 1946, the whole of the profits of the taxpayer, including those made here, were subject to income tax, corporation profits tax, and excess profits tax, which have been paid. It is agreed that these taxes are similar to income tax, national defence contribution, and excess profits tax as imposed under our statutes. The question is whether the proportion of the taxes paid by it in Eire in respect of the two branches in England were deductible in arriving at its profits assessable to excess profits tax here. The Special Commissioners held that it was. The Crown appealed. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., remitted the case for them to state the evidence on which their finding was based and to state in summary form the nature, effect and incidence of the three Irish taxes referred to. The learned judge proceeded on the basis that there must have been evidence before the commissioners which had not been set out in the Case. The taxpayer appealed, and the Crown cross-appealed. Before us counsel for the taxpayer and counsel for the Crown agreed that the Case set out all the evidence called. They had agreed in summary form a statement as to the Irish taxes, and both sides desired this court to dispose finally of the Case.

The appeal had been placed in the interlocutory list, and we were at first doubtful whether we could dispose finally of the substantive issue. Our attention was drawn to Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Sansom (1) in which an appeal was brought to this court in a case in which ROWLATT, J., had made an order similar to that made by CROOM-JOHNSON, J., here. This court decided that the case ought not to be remitted, and upheld the decision of the commissioners. This is clear authority for the jurisdiction of this court to decide an appeal finally when the learned judge has ordered that the case be remitted. In our opinion, the appeal should have been entered in the final, and not in the interlocutory, list. We transferred it to that list, and proceeded to hear argument on the substantive issue. We have come to the conclusion, in the first place, in the light of what has been set out above as stated and agreed by counsel, that the order for remission should be set aside.

It is unnecessary to set out the general scheme of the excess profits tax. The tax applies to profits arising from a trade or business. The profits so arising are, under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 14 (1), to be computed on the income tax principles on which profits of a trade or business are computed, i.e., under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, as adapted in accordance with the provisions of Part I of sched. VII to the Act of 1939. The commissioners' finding is as follows:

"The respondent company is resident in Eire. The assessments under appeal are made upon it in respect of the trading carried on by the two English branches. For the purpose of taxation in Eire, the results of the whole of its trading, including those of the two English branches, have to be brought into the computation. In our opinion, it was a necessary expense for the respondent company, in carrying on part of its trade at branches in England, to incur Irish taxes. We hold that the appropriate part of the taxes paid in Eire by the respondent company, applicable to the English branches, constitutes money wholly and exclusively laid out and expended for the purpose of its trade as a whole and is deductible in computing its profits or gains for excess profits tax. We consider that Stevens v. Durban-Roodepoort Gold Mining Co. (2) supports this view."

Two points were argued before us—first, that, applying the Case I rules irrespective of any special provisions in the excess profits tax code, the finding of the commissioners was correct, and, secondly, that, assuming the result on that basis led to the prohibition of the deductions, there were provisions in the excess profits tax code which, though not expressly modifying the relevant Case I rules, showed plainly the intention of Parliament that such deductions were to be allowed for excess profits tax, and that the court should, on recognised principles that have been laid down for the construction of statutes, give effect to that intention.

Before considering the authorities, we will refer briefly to the nature of the argument. It is said that a tax on profits cannot be a disbursement for the purposes of the trade within r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. The trader trades, makes his profit, and then in a different capacity, that of taxpayer, has to hand over a share of those profits to the Crown. Does, however, this broad principle apply when, as here, one is dealing with a claim to deduct taxes imposed by a different, in this case a Dominion, government in respect of profits which are assessable here because made here? One may consider a Dominion trader contemplating opening a branch here, the Dominion law imposing a tax on all his profits wherever made. He realises he is taxed here on the profits referable to his branch here. There is, we think, a good deal to be said for the view that the Dominion tax which he will have to pay is a sum laid out for the purposes of his trade here. We are fortified in this provisional view by the fact that it was, so far as we can see, the view taken by the Crown's advisers in Stevens v. Durban-Roodepoort Gold Mining Co., Ltd. (2). There the taxpayer was an English company which carried on a gold mining business in the Transvaal. In the Transvaal it was subject to a profits tax. The tax, according to the Case, was imposed on the net produce of the individual year.

The ordinance is not set out in the report, but the Attorney-General, in his reply, said (5 Tax Cas. 406): "It is true that both the profits tax and the income tax are taxes on profits." It was, therefore, regarded as a tax on profits. The Crown did not contest the right of the taxpayer to deduct the amount of the Transvaal tax on profits for the purpose of assessing the taxpayer's liability here. The dispute was whether the amount of the Transvaal tax payable in the year in which it was first imposed should be spread over that and the two preceding years for the purpose of arriving at the three years' average or should be charged against the profits of the year in which it was imposed. The Attorney-General, in opening, stated that it was rightly dealt with as a deduction from the profits of the year in which it falls. In reply he emphasised the point we have indicated. Following on the phrase we have already quoted as to the two taxes being taxes on profits, he says (ibid.):

"... but they are different taxes, applying to different areas, assessed on different principles, collected by different machinery, appropriated to different purposes. In one sense the company suffers double assessment, because it lives in England and is subject to English taxes, and it works in the Transvaal and is subject to Transvaal taxes... The amount paid in profits tax is not taxed twice. It is not taxed to income tax at all, for it is taken out of the profits before the sum assessable to income tax is arrived at."

We have quoted this because it analyses the position in very clear language. The Crown regarded the taxpayer's claim to deduct the Transvaal tax as a disbursement laid out for the purposes of the trade here as plainly right. In that case the court were dealing with the assessment on the head office and here we are having to consider an assessment in respect of a branch, but the view taken by the Crown's advisers establishes, at any rate, that the proposition that a tax on profits paid in a country outside the United Kingdom may be a disbursement deductible within the rules is not plainly wrong.

Counsel for the Crown referred us to Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Von Glehn (3). That was an excess profits duty case. The company, who were general merchants, had committed breaches of certain regulations, no "moral obloquy" being suggested. Proceedings were taken and a compromise penalty accepted. The company sought to deduct the penalty and their legal expenses. We do not think that case assists for the reason stated by LORD STERNDALE, M.R. He says ([1920] 2 K.B. 565):

"This business could perfectly well be carried on without any infraction of the law."

No one here suggests that the trade in the English branches could have been carried on without paying the Irish taxes. The argument for the taxpayers, as summarised by LORD STERNDALE, was that all you had to look at was the "actual sum that the taxpayers put in their pocket." That, of course, is plainly wrong. We were also referred to Smiths Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland (4). In that case the taxpayers sought to deduct under r. 3 (a) and (e) of Cases I and II a sum incurred as legal costs in successfully appealing against a decision of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that only £3,500 out of a salary of £6,486 14s. paid to a manager should be allowed in the computation for excess profits tax. The taxpayers contended that there were business reasons, which it is unnecessary to specify, as well as purely financial ones, for their action. The House of Lords held by a majority that the sum could not be deducted. The fact that two of their Lordships, VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD OAKSEY, dissented shows that the borderland is debatable, which has some relevance to the second point if it arises. We think the difficulty of the present case is exemplified by quoting the issue as formulated by LORD PORTER ([1948] 2 All E.R. 372):

"... what your Lordships have to determine is whether the expense is incurred in order to earn gain or is the application or distribution of that gain when earned."

Going back to the Dominion trader contemplating opening a branch here and considering the gain to be earned by that branch which will be the subject-matter of his United Kingdom assessment, he will take into account that he will have to hand over part of what he gains to the Dominion government. Having regard to our code under which all profits made are taxed here, it is in one sense a precedent liability from his point of view. In the present case we are told the Irish profits tax was fifty per cent. Ours started at sixty per cent. and rose to one-hundred per cent. There is a certain artificiality in saying that the payment of ten per cent. or fifty per cent. over and above his total gains by trading here are an application or distribution of that gain when earned. This again brings out the relevance so clearly emphasised by the Attorney-General in Stevens' case (2) of the tax on profits sought to be deducted being a different tax payable to a different government. If one is considering one tax system only, the tax could plainly not exceed one hundred per cent.

We do not think the case is covered by authority. In one sense, of course, the Irish taxes are taxes on profits when earned, but it is on the profits made by an Irish company trading through a branch in this country. Before that company opened a branch in England it had made itself chargeable to tax in Ireland, and when it opened a branch in England the profits of that branch were chargeable in Ireland. Looking at the matter, as has to be done under our code, as profits of a "trade exercised within the United Kingdom" by a person "not resident in the United Kingdom," we should have come to the conclusion that the Irish taxes could and should be regarded as a disbursement laid out for the purposes of his trade here within the rule.

As, however, we think the point is one of difficulty we will assume we may be wrong and consider the second argument. It is submitted by the taxpayer that the excess profits tax statutes show a clear intention that the taxes such as those in question should be deducted. The statutes were drafted, it is said, on the assumption that such taxes were deductible for income tax purposes under the rules applicable to Case I. The correctness of the assumption is now challenged by the Crown. The taxpayer submits that effect ought to be given in dealing with excess profits tax to the intention of Parliament if, as they submit, it is sufficiently plain. The principle invoked by the taxpayer is stated by ALDERSON, B., in A.-G. v. Lockwood (5) (9 M. & W. 398):

"The rule of law, I take it, upon the construction of all statutes . . . is, whether they be penal or remedial, to construe them according to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the words in which they are expressed, unless that construction leads to a plain and clear contradiction of the apparent purpose of the Act, or to some palpable and evident absurdity."

(See also Salmon v. Duncombe (6)). The words, it is said here, in their literal application provide that the issue is to be decided in accordance with the rules applicable to Case I. Ought they, however, to be given this construction if it would lead to a plain and clear contradiction of the apparent purpose of the Act?

The actual-provisions relied on in the excess profits tax code will be more intelligible if we trace, first, the history of the legislation relating to the deduction of foreign or Dominion taxes. Cases IV and V of sched. D deal with tax in respect of income arising from securities or possessions abroad. Rule I of the Rules Applicable to Case IV, which is made applicable in certain circumstances to Case V, provides:

"The tax in respect of income arising from securities in any place out of the United Kingdom shall be computed on the full amount thereof arising in the year of assessment, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not, subject in the case of income not received in the United Kingdom, to the same deductions and allowances as if it had been so received, and to the deduction, where such a deduction cannot be made under any other provision of this Act, of any sum which has been paid in respect of income tax in the place where the income has arisen, and to a deduction on account of any annual interest or any annuity or other annual payment payable out of the income to a person not resident in the United Kingdom, and the provisions of this Act (including those relating to the delivery of statements) shall apply accordingly."

If one assumes £100 of income arising abroad subject to foreign income tax of £10, the United Kingdom income tax is levied on £90. It is suggested, we think probably rightly, that the words "where such a deduction cannot be made under any other provision of this Act" suggest or assume that such deductions could be made under the general provisions of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. It would seem illogical to allow the deduction under Case IV if it was not to be allowed under Cases I and II. By the Finance Act, 1920, s. 27, a more generous form of relief was granted in respect of income liable to tax here in respect of which Dominion income tax had been paid. The form of relief was to reduce the rate of the United Kingdom tax as applied to the full amount of the income before deduction of the Dominion tax, to the following extent: (a) if the Dominion rate of tax does not exceed one-half of the appropriate rate of United Kingdom income tax, the rate at which relief is to be given shall be the Dominion rate of tax; (b) in any other case the rate at which relief is to be given shall be one-half of the appropriate rate of United Kingdom income tax. This scheme obviously could not stand with r. 1 of Case IV. This is dealt with in the opening words of s. 27 (4) of the Finance Act, 1920:

"Notwithstanding anything in the Rules Applicable to Case IV or Case V of sched. D or in any other provision of the Income Tax Acts, no deduction shall be made on account of the payment of Dominion income tax in estimating income for the purposes of United Kingdom income tax . . ."

The later words of the section do not concern us. Their complexity is, we were told, due to the fact that in certain Dominions a shareholder is affected by two taxes, one a general tax on the profits of the company, and a further tax on any dividend declared.

We now turn to the provisions dealing with excess profits tax which are relied on. Paragraph 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (which contains, as we have said, the adaptations of income tax principles) provides:

"The provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 27 of the Finance Act, 1920 (which disallows deductions on account of the payment of Dominion income tax) shall not apply."

Now if the rules of Case I disallow the deduction of Dominion income tax in all cases, this was meaningless, misleading and not an "adaptation" of any principle. The words in italics are, of course, of crucial importance. Counsel for the Crown, as we understood him, agreed that, if the deduction was inadmissible under the rules of Case I, it must be inadmissible in all cases. It was argued for the Crown that full effect could be given to the intention of the paragraph by construing it in this way. If, but for s. 27 (4), the taxpayer would be entitled to deduct under Case I, the deductions may be made, leaving open the argument whether such deductions were or were not admissible. There are, in our opinion, two conclusive arguments against this as the "intention." In the first place, it would have been worded differently on the following lines: "Nothing in s. 27 (4) shall prohibit deduction on account of payment of Dominion tax which but for that section would be admissible." That form would have at once raised the second point. The excess profits tax was sixty per cent. at its inception, and, as we know, rose later to one hundred per cent. The question whether income tax and other similar taxes were deductible was a vital factor in considering the whole scheme. Taking the rate as eighty per cent., if a trader had in respect of the same income to pay Dominion income tax at, say, thirty per cent., he was in effect being fined for activities which were presumably regarded as useful as they were permitted to continue during the war. If, on the other hand, one assumes that income tax and other taxes of a similar kind are deductible under the rules of Case I, the paragraph is logical and self-explanatory. It removes the one statutory bar to the deduction of any of such taxes, namely, Dominion income tax, the reason for the existence of which we have given.

Counsel for the taxpayer also relied on the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30. Section 30 (1), which we need not set out in detail, gave power to His Majesty by Order in Council to put into force arrangements, if made, with the government of a Dominion which levied an excess profits tax for relief against double taxation on the basis of a formula set out in s. 30 (1) (b). Sub-section (2) provides:

"Where any such Order in Council is made, then, if the commissioners are satisfied that any case is one which falls within the arrangements to which the Order relates, they shall, in lieu of allowing, in computing profits for the purpose of excess profits tax or the national defence contribution, any deduction in respect of excess profits tax charged in the part of His Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom to which the Order relates, make such adjustment of the excess profits tax payable in the United Kingdom or the national defence contribution as may be necessary to give effect to the arrangements, and allow any necessary relief accordingly by repayment or otherwise, so, however, that the effect of the adjustment shall not be less favourable to the taxpayer than the effect of allowing the deduction."

Again this makes it, we think, clear beyond argument that Parliament has passed this legislation on the basis that the taxpayer is entitled to make deduction for his tax here of excess profits tax charged in the Dominions in respect of the same income. The relief under any arrangements to be made is in lieu of this right. The effect of the adjustment is not to be less favourable than the effect of allowing the deduction. Those negotiating any arrangements are, in effect, instructed to proceed on this basis. If the arrangements for any reason do not put the taxpayer here in a better position than he is in on the basis of deducting, they will plainly not be worth pursuing.

The argument can be put in two ways. First, r. 3 (a) falls to be construed for excess profits tax in the context of the provisions to which we have referred. If a provision is capable of two meanings, other provisions dealing with the subject-matter may be looked at to decide the question as to the meaning or application of the ambiguous words. If r. 3 (a) had appeared for the first time in the excess profits tax code, we would have had no difficulty in construing or applying it in the way contended for by the taxpayer. It may be said that the position here is different. Income tax principles are to be applied except in so far as they are adapted or modified. Parliament has not sought to adapt or modify them quoad this issue, because it assumed a construction or application which has turned out to be erroneous. If there were no such principle of construction as that laid down by ALDERSON, B., and applied in many cases (see MAXWELL ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 9th ed., chap. 9), that would be an end of the matter. That principle being a principle that in proper cases has to be applied, the present case, is, we think, well within it. In the first place, we hold that the intention of Parliament that the taxes in question here should be deducted for excess profits tax is plainly established. In the second place, having regard to the high level of excess profits tax, the construction contended for by the Crown would in this, and, no doubt, in many other cases, lead to the manifest injustice that traders affected would be called on to pay in respect of their trade here more than the total profits they earned. Put in another way, the form of this legislation would lead any trader to believe that he could deduct such sums. On this basis he continues to trade, and, as he was allowed to do so during the war, presumably his activities were useful to us. It is said, now that it is all over, the basis is much more onerous.

We, therefore, come to the conclusion that, if we are wrong in our conclusion on the first point, the court ought to give effect to the plain intention of Parliament and hold that these taxes are deductible for the computations in question.

SHEARMAN v. FOLLAND.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), January 24, 25, April 5, 1950.]

Damages—Measure of damages—Special damages—Personal injuries—Fees paid to nursing home—Deduction of hotel expenses not incurred by plaintiff.

In a claim for personal injuries in which liability was conceded the trial judge awarded £5,234 17s. 10d., being as to £4,500 general damages and as to £734 17s. 10d. special damages. In an appeal against the award as insufficient, the plaintiff contended that it was wrong to deduct from her claim for special damages for nursing home fees a sum representing hotel expenses which she would have incurred for her board and lodging had she not been injured.

HELD: (i) the defendant could not set-off the money which the plaintiff would, or would probably, have spent on living at hotels if she had not been injured, because the precise style in which she might have lived was a collateral matter not to be taken into consideration in mitigation of damages and the two payments were not in pari materia.

(ii) had evidence been adduced to show what part of the nursing home fees was attributable to board and lodging it would have been open to the judge to make a deduction in respect thereof, but, in the absence of such evidence, it was impossible to do so. Nevertheless, as part of the fees was obviously referable to the provision of food, it was proper to deduct the sum of £55 (or £1 a week) in respect of the time spent in the nursing home.

APPEAL against a decision of SLADE, J., awarding the plaintiff £5,234 17s. 10d. damages for personal injuries. There was no issue as to liability and the plaintiff appealed solely on the insufficiency of the award. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by ASQUITH, L.J.

Apr. 5. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of SLADE, J., awarding the plaintiff £5,234 17s. 10d., being as to £4,500 general damages and as to £734 17s. 10d. special damages in respect of personal injuries admitted to be caused by the negligence of the defendant's servant. There is no issue as to liability. The appeal is by the plaintiff against the alleged insufficiency of the award. The plaintiff was at the material time a woman of sixty-seven, healthy, active, and young for her years.

In the period preceding the accident she had been in the habit of residing at hotels in London—in particular, immediately before the accident, at the Montana Hotel, where she paid seven guineas a week for board and lodging. She was shockingly injured. One leg had to be amputated at the thigh; the other became permanently unstable, and in practice largely useless. She cannot now walk more than 150 yards, and that only on a perfectly even surface. She cannot
A without assistance go up or downstairs, or get into or out of a bath or a motor car. She spent fifty-five weeks in nursing homes and part of the special damage in respect of which she claimed consisted of the fees charged by these homes. These fees did not include operations, theatre fees, and other special expenses (which are claimed separately), but did include maintenance and general nursing. The charge was not apportioned between these two constituent elements, so
B as to show how much was attributable to the one and how much to the other. It was a composite “global” sum, and, although it differed from one nursing home to another, a typical charge would be about twelve guineas a week.

The plaintiff complains of the inadequacy of the award on two grounds. The first concerns the special damages. She had claimed as part of her special damages fees which she had to pay to nursing homes during the fifty-five weeks she had
C to spend in them after the accident. SLADE, J., has deducted from these fees the amount which the plaintiff would have had, during that period or most of it, to pay to her hotel at the rate of seven guineas a week if there had been no accident and she had continued to live at such hotels in her normal style. These hotel bills he treats as having been saved in consequence of the accident, and gives credit in respect of them to the defendant. The second ground on which
D the award is impugned is that SLADE, J., has also made an unjustifiable deduction from that part of the general damages which is represented by the necessity resulting to the plaintiff from the accident of having a competent attendant. Under this head she claimed an expense of £10 10s. a week, a figure based on a salary of £3 3s. a week and a bedroom and board in the same hotel and of the same quality as her own, at £7 7s. a week, for a period equal to her expectation of E life, namely, eight or nine years. This sum of ten guineas a week alone worked out at a sum exceeding that at which SLADE, J., has assessed the whole of the general damages, viz., £4,500. Hence he drastically reduced it. We are forced to assume so, since otherwise there is no room left in his figure for general damages for pain and suffering and loss of “amenities.” He expressed the view in his judgment that ten guineas was unreasonable and exorbitant. By how much
F precisely he reduced it must remain conjectural.

We will deal first with the deduction from the special damages of hotel living expenses treated as saved during the plaintiff’s sojourn in the various nursing homes. The defendant argues that in the absence of the accident she would presumably have had to board and lodge somewhere, and that probably she would have continued residing at the Montana or some similar hotel, paying
G seven guineas a week or some similar sum. This expenditure the accident has obviated. The actual loss caused by the accident is all that can be recovered as special damages, and that actual loss (so the argument runs) is, not the gross nursing home fees, but the difference between those fees and the hotel bills which she would otherwise have incurred. That is to say, not, to take the figures above, twelve guineas a week, but twelve minus seven guineas. This contention
H SLADE, J., accepted, and he reduced the special damages accordingly, with this qualification, very reasonably conceded by counsel for the defendant, that it was right to spread the set-off, not over the whole fifty-five weeks, but over forty-five, since some margin of time must reasonably be allowed to the plaintiff to make up her mind whether to release herself from her contract with the Montana Hotel after the accident and to make arrangements for re-engaging her rooms there on her recovery.

The contrary argument for the plaintiff may be introduced by a quotation from MAYNE ON DAMAGES, 11th ed., p. 151, in a passage where the learned editor is considering what evidence is allowed in mitigation of damages to arrive at the actual damage directly resulting from the defendant's act:

"Matter completely collateral, and merely res inter alios acta, cannot be used in mitigation of damages."

The plaintiff contends that the hypothetical hotel expenses are matters "completely collateral." It is easier to formulate this maxim than to apply it. What in a given case is, and what is not, "collateral"? Insurance affords the classic example of something which is treated in law as collateral. Where X is insured by Y against injury which comes to be wrongly inflicted on him by Z, Z cannot set up in mitigation or extinction of his own liability X's right to be recouped by Y or the fact that X has been recouped by Y: Bradburn v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1) and Simpson v. Thomson (2). There are special reasons for this. If the wrongdoer were entitled to set-off what the plaintiff was entitled to recoup or had recouped under his policy, he would, in effect, be depriving the plaintiff of all benefit from the premiums paid by the latter and appropriating that benefit to himself.

The plaintiff might have invoked in support of her contentions the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Co. (3). In that case the plaintiffs, owners of ship "A", claimed damages from the defendants for delaying its departure in breach of contract, whereby passengers had cancelled their passages and the shipowners suffered loss. As the result, however, of the defendant's breach another ship—ship "B"—in which some of the plaintiffs owned shares was benefited by getting an increase of passengers consisting of some persons who had had to cancel their passage by the first-named ship. This was held to be no ground for reducing the damages. The case was somewhat complicated by the fact that the persons who lost on ship "A" were not exactly coincident with the persons who gained on ship "B", and by other circumstances, but it is clear that the court would have reached the same conclusion if there had been a single plaintiff owning both ships. Another case in which accidental de facto recoupment of part of the loss caused by the wrongdoer was ignored was Liffen v. Watson (4). It is a case of some interest in the present connection since the expenses involved were those of board and lodging. The plaintiff, a domestic servant before the accident, had been paid by her employer £1 a week wages and furnished with board and lodging free. After the accident had precluded her from remaining in service she went to live with her father, to whom she paid nothing in respect of the board and lodging which he supplied. It was held she had none the less lost, owing to the defendant's tort, the free board and lodging previously supplied by her employer, because she had acquired its equivalent aliunde, and that she could claim for it without deduction or set-off. The case resembles Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Co. (3).

Strange results might certainly follow if it were possible in every case for the defendant to mitigate damages by proving what course of conduct the plaintiff would probably have followed or what his expenses would probably have been if the act complained of had never been committed. A millionaire accustomed to live at a palatial hotel, where his weekly expenses far exceed the charges of the nursing home to which, after being injured by the defendant's negligence, he is transplanted, would recover nothing by way of special damages. Can it really lie in the mouth of the wrongdoer in such a case to say: "I am entitled to go scot-free. I have, by my negligent act, not merely inflicted no loss, but conferred a net financial benefit on the defendant by saving him from the consequences of his habitual extravagance"? Apart from such an anomaly it is clear that the court will not pursue beyond certain limits a speculation as to what would have been the position or conduct of the plaintiff if his rights had not been invaded. For instance, in the recent case of Billingham v. Hughes and Another (5), a doctor was negligently run down and claimed as part of his special damages loss of what he would probably have earned but for the injuries he received. He was awarded a lump sum based on estimated earnings without any deduction in respect of income tax or surtax. Although a year after receiving the income he would, in fact, have had to pay income tax, and two years after receiving it, surtax, on or measured by such income, the court regarded those facts as collateral to the damage. What he would have done in respect of his earnings if he had realised them was no concern of the wrongdoer who had prevented him from realising them, although the effect of ignoring the factor might be, and was, to give the plaintiff more than an indemnity. Another illustration of the same tendency is that given by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in his speech in The Mediana (6) ([1900] A.C. 117):

“What right has a wrongdoer to consider what use you are going to make of your vessel [a vessel injured in a collision]? More than one case has been put to illustrate this: for example, the owner of a horse, or of a chair. Supposing a person took away a chair out of my room and kept it for twelve months, could anybody say you had a right to diminish the damages by showing that I did not usually sit in that chair, or that there were plenty of other chairs in the room? The proposition so nakedly stated appears to me absurd.”

Again, it is argued for the plaintiff that the payments to the nursing home are not in pari materia with the saving sought to be set-off against them. If it were a clear case of a tort directly causing an increase of living expenses to the plaintiff and no other sort of damage, that, it is argued, is one thing. It is quite another when the payments against which the set-off of maintenance saved is claimed consist (as in this case) of composite sums attributable in unascertained proportions to maintenance and nursing fees. Finally, there appears to be no case of personal injuries in which the claim to a set-off such as that put forward in this appeal has ever been advanced, let alone succeeded. In this connection the observations of the court in Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Co. (3) are pertinent ((1875) L.R. 10 C.P. 304):

“The absence of authority for a claim by defendants like this, which yet if well founded must have arisen in many cases, affords a strong presumption against its having any legal foundation. It is true that there must be a first instance in every claim, and that ingenuity often for the first time suggests a point which has escaped observation, and which yet, when brought to the test of argument, is found to be a sound one. But this is a point which must have arisen so frequently that it is to us incredible that, if sound, it never should have been taken.”

What are the arguments the other way? First, it is contended that the novel character of the claim is no evidence of its invalidity, if its novelty can be accounted for by factors which are consistent with its validity, and that such factors exist. The normal plaintiff in a personal injuries case is not a migratory hotel dweller. He is a member of a household. He may himself be a householder or a lodger, a person in either case defraying his own keep and that of his family, if any, or he may be a child or dependant, supported by others. If he is a dependant, he does not save any living expenses because he incurs none. If he is a householder or lodger, many of his expenses, e.g., rent, rates, and similar expenses are fixed charges which continue while he is in hospital, while those which do not so continue and are in fact saved (e.g., those for food attributable entirely to the plaintiff's consumption) are exceedingly difficult for the defendant (who may be wholly unacquainted with the plaintiff's household arrangements) to disengage from the total and may be too trifling to make their ascertainment worth while. This may, no doubt, account for the invariable omission on the part of defendants to attempt a set-off of these items in cases of personal injury. On the other hand, in the same class of case plaintiffs do often claim for "extra nourishment" necessitated by the accident, a claim which by implication concedes that the plaintiff is claiming, not a gross sum, but a margin or differential, and is giving credit for the nourishment—ordinary in quantity and quality—for which he would have to pay, accident or no accident.

So much for the absence of precedent for the plaintiff's claim. When the stigma of novelty is removed and the claim can be considered on its merits and (in the absence of authority) in the dry light of principle, how does it emerge from this scrutiny? The governing principle is that the special damages recoverable (providing some damage is foreseeable) is that directly attributable to the tort, and no more. The plaintiff may in certain circumstances receive less than an indemnity, but (subject to the insurance cases) he should not in general receive more. The question is: What difference did the commission of the act complained of make to the plaintiff? The difference (answers the defendant) between having to pay a hotel seven guineas a week and having to pay a nursing home on the average twelve guineas a week over a period of fifty-five weeks or thereabouts. If she had not been injured, the plaintiff would not have escaped the liability to pay something for board and lodging and would probably have continued to provide for these on the scale and in the manner which she had adopted for many years past. Unless these potential payments are brought into account she makes a profit by being run down. A complicating element is, indeed, introduced by the fact that, while her hotel bills were for board and lodging only, her nursing home fees are for these items plus nursing. Let us, for the sake of argument, think this difference away and take a simpler case in which no expenses are involved except those of maintenance. X is living in town A where bed and breakfast can be had for 10s. a night. He takes the train for town A, and in breach of its contract the railway company carries him beyond his destination to town B, where bed and breakfast cannot be had for less than £1. Clearly his damages would be, not £1, but the difference between £1 and 10s.; nor presumably would it make any difference if, not a breach of contract, but a tortious act had been responsible for such additional expenses. It would be the same if he had been kidnapped in town A and "dumped" in town B, but for the possibility of exemplary damages which is not here in question. On reflection it is not clear why the composite character of the payments made to the nursing home should preclude the defendant altogether from setting-off living expenses of some amount from such payments. It can, of course, be urged with force—and this is really a different point—that life in a hospital or nursing home attended with pain and punctuated by operations is a very different thing from a padded and painless existence in a hotel. For this difference the plaintiff surely falls to be compensated under a different head—general damages (a) for pain and suffering, and (b) for loss of "amenities,"—and, no doubt, she has been.

On this part of the case we have reached the conclusion: (i) That the defendant cannot set-off the seven guineas a week which the plaintiff would, or would probably, have spent on hotels if not injured. The precise style in which she would probably or might well have lived is, in our view, a collateral matter and the two payments are not in pari materia. (ii) If evidence had been adduced to show what proportion of the twelve guineas a week was attributable to board or lodging, we think that it would have been open to the judge to make a deduction in respect thereof. In the absence of such evidence it seems to us impossible to estimate the proportion attributable to lodging—in fact, we doubt whether an expert analysis of the accounts of a nursing home would assist the court in this respect since the charges of such an institution are not arrived at by taking into account considerations which would be reflected in the charges of a hotel or boarding house. With regard to food the position is different. A jury would, we think, be quite entitled in such a case as this to say: "These fees must be referable to some extent to the provision of food. We think, in the absence of evidence as to actual cost, that at least £1 a week should be deducted under this head." We think that we are entitled to act in this matter as a jury would have done, and we, accordingly, propose to deduct the sum of £55 from the amount of the special damages claimed in respect of nursing home fees.

- A The second point taken by the plaintiff covers the item (labelled "special damage") attributable to the necessity, consequent on the accident, that the plaintiff should for the future have an attendant. The claim under this head is not merely that she should have an attendant, but that that attendant should live in the same hotel as the plaintiff, in a room costing the same weekly sum as the plaintiff's (namely, seven guineas), and at a minimum salary of three guineas a week (ten guineas a week in all). SLADE, J., has held that, while an attendant was necessary, (i) the ten guineas claimed in respect of her were excessive, (ii) the claim, relating as it did to attendance expenses not already incurred but prospective, was a claim for general and not special damages. On the second point he was unquestionably right. All damages which up to the time of the hearing have not yet crystallised in actual disbursement, but are still prospective, are general damages. SLADE, J., has awarded £4,500 as general damages. Somewhere embedded in this figure is the prospective damages represented by the need for an attendant, along with other elements such as damages for pain and suffering and for loss of amenities. However, the fact that the plaintiff claims over £4,000 for attendance alone, and has recovered only £4,500 for this plus the two other and considerable items indicated, makes it quite clear that SLADE, J., has very materially reduced the attendance item. Indeed, he announced his intention to scale it down in the following passage in his judgment:

"She is entitled to reasonable assistance . . . I am not satisfied that £7 7s. a week for accommodation at the same hotel as the plaintiff plus £3 3s. a week for wages, which makes £10 10s. a week, is a reasonable claim against the defendant. Indeed, I think it is entirely unreasonable, but, on the other hand, I am satisfied . . . that Mrs. Shearman is entitled to recover for the period based on her expectation of life a sum of money which will enable her to receive assistance of the kind indicated, in the evidence."

- E The learned judge, accordingly, incorporated in his global figure of £4,500 for general damages a sum the precise magnitude of which we cannot gauge, beyond saying that it must fall very considerably short of £10 10s. a week, since on the ten guineas basis this single item is £4,680, leaving nothing for pain and suffering, loss of amenities, etc. We think that SLADE, J., in drastically reducing this item, must have been much influenced by the evidence as to what happened at a guest house called Westbrook House, Bampton, Devon, when at one period after her accident (Sept. 17, 1948—Nov. 24, 1948) she was looked after by Mrs. Cannon (the attendant whom she still has and wishes to retain) at a cost, not of ten guineas, but of five pounds, a week, Mrs. Cannon paying for her own accommodation. It is quite true that the very moderate outlay during this period of ten weeks was in part due to the fortunate accident that Mrs. Cannon had a cottage in Bampton, but we cannot say that the learned judge was wrong if, in view of this evidence, he made a substantial though unascertained reduction in the figure of ten guineas a week claimed by the plaintiff. In the result, the appeal succeeds to the extent that only £1 a week should be deducted from the nursing home fees instead of seven guineas.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 3, 1950.]

Income Tax — Exemption — Superannuation contribution — “Ordinary annual contribution” — Payment of back contributions by annual instalments — Finance Act, 1921 (c. 32), s. 32 (1) — Regulations dated Nov. 10, 1921 (S.R. & O., 1921, No. 1699), reg. 5.

By s. 32 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1921, any sum paid by an employed person by way of contribution towards a superannuation fund shall, for the purpose of assessment to income tax, be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in the year in which the sum is paid, provided that no such allowance shall be made in respect of any contribution which is not an “ordinary annual contribution.” By reg. 5 of regulations made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue dated Nov. 10, 1921: “ordinary annual contribution” is defined as “an annual contribution of a fixed amount or . . . calculated on some definite basis by reference to the earnings, contributions, or numbers of the members of the fund.”

In 1946 the taxpayer, who was employed by a railway company, became eligible as a salaried officer of the company to be a contributing member of a superannuation fund association. In accordance with the rules of the association, he was permitted to begin his membership from an earlier date subject to the payment by him of back contributions which amounted in his case to some £200, and it was agreed that this total should be paid off by six annual payments of £33 16s.

HELD: the payments, being merely a convenient way in which to pay off what was, in its true nature, the purchase price for the right to be deemed a member of the association for longer than was, in fact, the case, were not “ordinary annual contributions” within the meaning of s. 32 (1) (a) and reg. 5, and, therefore, could not be allowed to be deducted as expenses.

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1921, s. 32 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 229.]

CASE STATED by the General Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayer, who was a member of a superannuation fund association, claimed to be allowed to deduct as an expense under s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1921, back contributions paid by him to the association in order that his membership might be deemed to begin at a date earlier than that of his admission. The taxpayer contended that the payments in question were “ordinary annual contributions” within the meaning of s. 32 (1) (a).

R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The taxpayer appeared in person.

ROXBURGH, J.: At a meeting of general commissioners of income tax held on Oct. 21, 1948, the taxpayer, Frederick Arthur Ashton, appealed against certain assessments which were made on him under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. E. He claimed that, in arriving at the amount of the assessment for the year ended Apr. 5, 1947, he should be allowed to deduct as an expense under s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1921, four-fifths (being the approved proportion, as explained in the Case Stated) “of the full amount which he paid in that year to the Superannuation Fund Association of the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Company.” This payment included back contributions. Alternatively, the taxpayer claimed that, for the years ended Apr. 5, 1945, and Apr. 5, 1946, he should be “allowed to deduct as an expense under the said s. 32 (1) four-fifths of the ‘back contribution’ attributable to each year respectively.” The taxpayer had been allowed as an expense for the year ending Apr. 5, 1947, four-fifths of the amount of his current contribution to the association. There is no dispute that four-fifths was the correct amount of the allowance. The sole question for determination is whether the back contributions were deductible.

A Before 1941 the taxpayer was employed by the railway company at weekly wages as a shunter, class 1. During 1941 he was appointed temporary inspector, class 4. On Apr. 15, 1946, he was promoted to be an inspector on the establishment at St. Pancras Station, and on that date he became a member of the superannuation scheme. He was then forty-eight years of age. Rule 7 of the scheme provides:

“Every person on the wages staff of the company who becomes a salaried officer under fifty years of age shall be entitled, if he desires, to become a contributing member.”

B The taxpayer, therefore, had the right to become a contributing member, but only as from the date of his admission. Rules 10 and 11 of the scheme, however, provide as follows:

C “10. The committee with the assent of the directors shall have power to impose whatever special conditions they think fit in admitting salaried officers over forty years of age to membership of the fund. 11. The committee may, at the time of admission of a member over forty years of age, with the assent of the directors, permit the membership to commence as from an earlier date subject to back contributions from such earlier date being paid by such member and by the company at the rate for the age at such earlier date with the addition of compound interest at the rate credited by the company to the fund on the fund account in the year previous to the year of admission of such member, subject to the following limitations:—(a) D No member over forty and under fifty years of age at the date of admission shall be permitted to join as from an earlier age than forty . . . Back contributions paid as so provided shall be based on the member’s salary at the time of actual admission.”

E Rule 18 provides for the calculation of the contributions to be paid by the contributing members and concludes with sub-rule (3):

“Back contributions of persons becoming members on or after Aug. 1, 1941, shall be calculated on the scale set forth in column III of the table.”

F The commissioners found that, acting under para. 11 of the scheme, the committee of the association permitted the taxpayer to commence contributory membership as from the date when he became forty years of age, subject to the payment by him, of back contributions to the fund from that earlier date. The back contributions to be paid by the taxpayer were fixed in accordance with para. 18 of the scheme and amounted in all to £146 6s. Interest thereon in accordance with para. 11 of the scheme amounted to £56 10s., making a total amount due from the taxpayer in respect of back contributions of £202 G 16s. The committee agreed (as is usual in such cases) to this total amount being spread forward equally over the six succeeding years, resulting in an annual payment being due for each of those years of £33 16s. in addition to the current contributions. There is no provision in the scheme for payment of such contributions by instalments, but I do not understand the commissioners to mean that the committee had no power to make such an arrangement. If they H did mean that, as at present advised, I do not think that that would be correct. The commissioners further state that for the year ended Apr. 5, 1947, there was deducted from the salary of the taxpayer, in addition to the current contribution for the year of £25 10s. 2d., the first instalment of back contributions of £33 16s., making a total of £59 6s. 2d. It was not disputed that the taxpayer was entitled to, and had been allowed, a deduction for the year ended Apr. 5, 1947, of four-fifths of the contribution of £25 10s. 2d., but the inspector of taxes had disallowed altogether the first instalment of the back contribution amounting to £33 16s. The commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayer. Hence this appeal.

Section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1921, provides as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of this section and to any regulations made thereunder ... any sum paid by ... an employed person by way of contribution towards a superannuation fund shall, in computing profits or gains for the purpose of an assessment to income tax under ... sched. E, be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in the year in which the sum is paid: Provided that—(a) no allowance shall be made under the foregoing provision in respect of any contribution by an employed person which is not an ordinary annual contribution ..."

A

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue made regulations (S.R. & O., 1921, No. 1699) dated Nov. 10, 1921, under s. 32 (4) of the Finance Act, 1921, reg. 5 of which provides:

B

"The expression 'ordinary annual contribution' shall mean an annual contribution of a fixed amount or an annual contribution calculated on some definite basis by reference to the earnings, contributions or numbers of the members of the fund."

C

The form of that regulation does introduce some doubt into a question which would otherwise have seemed to me to be free from all doubt. This payment called "back contributions" seems to me to be the purchase price of the right to be deemed to have been a member of the association for a longer number of years than was in fact the case—which is, undoubtedly, a valuable right. It seems to me, prima facie, to be a lump sum, once for all, payment. There is no express suggestion in the scheme that it should be paid otherwise than once and for all, but, for the convenience of persons faced with a liability to pay a comparatively large sum all at once, it has been the practice of the committee to allow it to be paid by annual instalments. I do not wish to suggest that the committee has exceeded its powers under the scheme in making such arrangements, but, nevertheless, such arrangements cannot change the essential nature of the payment. But for the superannuation funds regulation, I should have no doubt on the matter because s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1921, uses the phrase "ordinary annual contribution." While I can understand the argument that this back payment was an annual contribution, I cannot see how it can be regarded as an ordinary annual contribution. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, however, have thought fit, as they were entitled to do, to define the expression "ordinary annual contribution" in such a way as to cut out the word "ordinary." That raises the only difficulty in this case. On the whole, however, I think that, even with the word "ordinary" omitted it is impossible to say that these yearly instalments of the purchase price of these valuable rights were "annual contributions" within the meaning of the phrase in reg. 5.

NOEMIJULIA STEAMSHIP CO., LTD. v. MINISTER OF FOOD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), March 21, 22, April 5, 1950.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Loading—"Ready to load"—Stowage space occupied by bunkers—Mainmast and after derricks not in position.

A Under her voyage charter a ship was required to be ready to load a cargo of grain in bags or bulk by 6 p.m. on Dec. 27, 1948, the time specified in the cancelling clause (cl. 12). By cl. 6 of the charter the charterer was "to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and/or stores)." By cl. 17 it was provided that the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at the charterer's expense and risk. At the time specified in cl. 12 the No. 3 lower deck hold (which was designed as reserve bunker space, but was capable of carrying cargo) contained bunker coal and the ship had no mainmast or after derricks, the absence of which might have interfered with the loading of certain of the holds. In these circumstances the charterer claimed to be entitled to cancel the charterparty on the ground that the ship was not ready to load. The charterparty did not give the charterer the right to use any part of the ship's gear, or prescribe or permit the charterer to select the method of loading.

B HELD: (i) as No. 3 lower deck hold was being used for its primary purpose, the proviso to cl. 6 was probably enough to exclude that hold from cargo space to which the charterer was entitled, but, even if the hold was to be treated as ordinary cargo space, the charterer had to establish that it could not reasonably be required for bunkers required for the whole voyage, and he had not done so.

D (ii) on the construction of the charterparty, the charterer was entitled to the reasonable co-operation of the owner in selecting and working the most convenient method of loading, but this did not mean, for instance, that, in anticipation of loading the grain in bulk by elevator (when support would be required for its tube), the owner must have erected the mainmast or a jury-rig to supply the necessary support, for that method might not be adopted, nor was it certain that the after derricks would be required if the grain were loaded in bag; the evidence was not sufficient to show that the ship would probably be unready to play her part in the agreed method of loading or in giving co-operation in any reasonable method which might be employed; and, therefore, the charterer was not entitled to cancel the charterparty.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an umpire.

The charterer, the Minister of Food, claimed to be entitled to cancel the charterparty on the ground that the ship was not ready to load at the time for loading specified in the cancelling clause in the charterparty by reason of the presence of coal bunkers in No. 3 lower deck hold, and the absence of mainmast and after derricks. The shipowners contended that there was a right to use No. 3 lower deck hold for bunkers under the charterparty when reasonably necessary to carry sufficient coal for the whole voyage (and the charterer had not shown it was not necessary), and that readiness to load did not involve the presence of a mainmast to provide support for loading which might only possibly be required and which could be provided by erecting a jury rig in case of need, or of gear which could only be required at a subsequent port below the bar in a special eventuality. The facts appear in the judgment.

Sir Robert Aske, K.C., and E. W. Roskill for the shipowners.
Mocatta for the charterer.

Apr. 5. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The question which the court has to determine is whether on the facts set out in this case the charterer was entitled to cancel the charterparty. He claimed to do so on the ground that the ship, which was required under her voyage charter to load a cargo of grain in bags or bulk, beginning at San Lorenzo as the first loading port, was not ready to load by 6 p.m. on Dec. 27, 1948, the time specified in the cancelling clause (cl. 12). The umpire has held that she was not then ready to load in two respects. First, her No. 3 'tween deck and No. 3 lower hold contained bunker coal, there being about ten tons in the latter. Secondly, she had no mainmast or after derricks. There is not much direct authority on either point, but I have had the advantage, which the umpire, apparently, did not have, of legal argument on the principles involved.

On the first point, counsel for the shipowners accepts as a general proposition the statement of principle which is taken from the judgment of LOPES, J., in Groves, Maclean & Co. v. Volkart Bros. (1) and set out in SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES, 15th ed., p. 141, that the ship

"must be completely ready in all her holds so as to afford the charterer complete control of every portion of the ship available for cargo."

His first point is that No. 3 lower hold was not a part of the ship available for cargo, nor a part in which the charterer had the right under the charterparty to load cargo. The umpire finds that both No. 3 'tween deck and No. 3 lower hold were designed as a reserve bunker space, and adds that, if not used as reserve bunkers, they are capable of carrying cargo. The argument has not been much concerned with the 'tween deck, since it appears that on any view it would be needed for bunkers. The charterer's rights under the charterparty are contained in cl. 6, which provides that he is "to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and/or stores)."

These words are not intended to include anything that is not cargo space in the ordinary acceptation of that term: see Sociedad, etc. (Dreyfus & Co.) v. National S.S. Co. (2) ([1935] 2 K.B. 319). Counsel for the shipowners argues that, even if the reserve bunker space in No. 3 lower hold is properly described as cargo space, it is excluded by the proviso to this clause, since it was, in fact, occupied by bunker coals. Counsel for the charterer argues that No. 3 lower hold is within the full reach and burthen of the steamer, and that the proviso does not apply since on its true construction it is restricted to 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc., which items do not include No. 3 lower hold. I do not agree with this construction of the proviso and I think that in any event it is rendered ineffective by the presence of the word "etc.". That word must bring in at the least other parts of the ship similar to 'tween and shelter decks, bridges and poop. The only general description which can be given of these spaces is that given by BRANSON, J., in Sociedad, etc. (Dreyfus & Co.) v. National S.S. Co. (2) (ibid.), namely, that they are "spaces which might in the ordinary course be used for bunker coals and/or stores."

A reserve bunker space certainly comes under that description. It would, indeed, be curious if the proviso applied to all the 'tween decks and to such places as bridges and poop, while excluding a space specially designed as a reserve bunker space.

I am inclined to think that it is sufficient to sustain the point of counsel for the shipowners that the primary use of No. 3 lower hold was for bunkers and that bunkers were in fact in it, but, if No. 3 lower hold is treated as ordinary cargo space, then counsel concedes that the proviso must be read with an implied limitation to bunkers and stores reasonably required for the voyage. It would not be permissible for the owners to rob the charterer of ordinary cargo space by taking an unlimited supply of bunkers: see Darling v. Raeburn (3). The umpire has found that in order to get to the nearest bunkering station with a safe margin, the vessel would require 130 tons over her permanent bunker capacity, but that this could be carried in the No. 3 'tween deck, leaving No. 3 lower hold free for grain. Counsel for the shipowners contends, and I did not understand counsel for the charterer to dispute, that the nearest bunkering station is not for this purpose the test, and that under Darling v. Raeburn (3) the ship can properly carry the bunkers required for the whole voyage. There is no evidence of what this quantity would be.

I hold that under cl. 6 a charterer who contends that a reserve bunker space should be made available to him for cargo is bound to establish at least that the space could not reasonably be required for bunkers to be used on the voyage. On the facts in this case, therefore, I hold that No. 3 lower hold was not a part of the ship which the owner had to make ready for loading. I should not, however, leave this point without referring to cl. 19, which says:

"Owners undertake that the steamer shall not load more than 7,350 tons, and not less than 6,650 tons."

This type of clause was considered by HAMILTON, J., in Jardine, Matheson & Co. v. Clyde Shipping Co. (4) ([1910] 1 K.B. 630). It is, I think, a warranty by the owners that they will not ask for more than 7,350 tons and that the ship can take at least 6,650 tons, but it neither enlarges nor curtails the charterer's rights under cl. 6. If the space available under cl. 6 is not sufficient to take 6,650 tons, the owner will be liable for whatever may be the appropriate consequences of his breach of undertaking, but the cargo could not overflow into spaces of which the charter did not grant the use. Although these clauses are thus distinct, every clause must be construed with reference to its fellows. If cl. 6 is clear, there is no more to be said, even though it be established as a fact that without the use of No. 3 lower hold 6,650 tons could not be loaded, but, if the meaning of cl. 6 is doubtful and that fact was established, it would, I think, be a material fact to be considered in the construction of cl. 6. The umpire has found in para. 5 (iv) of the Case that the ship might not be able to take 6,650 tons without the use of No. 3 lower hold. It would depend on the stowage factor, i.e., the number of cubic feet to the ton. Counsel for the shipowners suggests that there is a miscalculation in this paragraph, and that the capacity plan, which is attached to the award, shows that, even at the highest stowage factor, the minimum cargo could be loaded without the use of No. 3 lower hold. Counsel for the charterer agrees that there appears to be a discrepancy between the calculation and the capacity plan. I cannot amend or disregard the calculation except by consent. There may have been matters known to the umpire which would justify it. Neither side asked for the Case to be remitted, and I am not myself of the opinion that the point is of sufficient importance to be remitted. If the calculation was confirmed, the effect of it would still be uncertain because the stowage factor is unknown, and there would not, therefore, be forthcoming any clear fact to aid in the construction of cl. 6.

The second point I find much more difficult. The lack of mainmast and after derricks meant a deficiency in the ship's gear which might have interfered with the loading of Nos. 4 and 5 holds. The extent of the possible interference is dependent on the method of loading and it is detailed in para. 5 (ii) (a) of the Case. The authorities on readiness to load mostly deal with the condition of the holds, but it was not disputed that the principle in some form must be applied to the ship's gear where it has to be used, for it would be pointless to insist on the space being available if the ship were in no condition to play her part in filling it. But it does not follow that the principle is to be applied with the same stringency. It is obvious that sooner or later all the space in which cargo is to be loaded must be emptied and made fit to receive the cargo, and so there is good business sense in saying that it should be done sooner rather than later. It would be unsatisfactory if the work of making ready had to be chased by the work of loading. The shipper wants to know that all is in readiness before he begins, and it is best to make a firm rule. The ship's gear is different. Some of it may not be required at all; some of it may not be needed until an advanced stage of the loading and the keeping of it in constant readiness from the first moment to the last may involve labour and expense unnecessarily. Vaughan v. Campbell, Heatley & Co. (5), Grampian S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Carver & Co. (6) and Armement Adolf Deppe v. John Robinson & Co., Ltd. (7) have been cited to me; and, though none is directly in point, each in its own way shows, I think, that outside the clear rule about the condition of the holds some elasticity is permissible. In particular, in the last-mentioned case SWINFEN EADY, L.J., lays down the test of readiness in a business and mercantile sense and deprecates the idle formality of incurring useless expense ([1917] 2 K.B. 208). Apart from useless expense, I find it hard to believe that if, for example, a winch which would not be needed for some days after the loading began, required an hour or two's overhaul, the cancellation of the charter would be justified. Examples of this sort could be multiplied and would serve to show that a test which produces a sensible result in the case of the holds may not work equally well in respect to gear. It must always be remembered that this a forfeiture clause, and so not to be applied lightly. It would be a misfortune, I think, if defects of no real significance in the adventure were to be used as a means of throwing up a charter at the last moment.

I have not here to deal with a charterparty which expressly gives to the charterer the right to use any part of the ship's gear. In such a case it might well be argued that all such gear must be in readiness. Nor have I to deal with a charterparty which prescribes any particular method of loading or allows the charterer to select a method. In such a case it might be argued that any ship's gear required for such method must be in readiness. All that the charterparty says in cl. 17 is that the cargo is to be brought to and taken from alongside at charterer's expense and risk. It is, therefore, the duty of the ship to remove the cargo from alongside and load it. Counsel for the shipowners argues that the way in which it is loaded from alongside and the sort of gear that is used for the loading are no concern of the charterer, provided, presumably, that it is done expeditiously. It is difficult to fit into the conception of "alongside" the methods of loading grain in bulk that are described in the Case—by chute, belt conveyor or elevator. There was no evidence which of these methods would have been used, nor does the Case state who would have been responsible for operating them. There is nothing to show that the charterer is entitled to impose any one of these methods on the owner. I think that the highest the charterer can put his case is to say that he is entitled to the reasonable co-operation of the owner in selecting and working the most convenient method.

- A What that involves in relation to the ship's gear can best be illustrated by the loading of bulk grain. Of the three methods I have mentioned none required the use of the ship's gear, but, if the elevator had been used, its tube would have required support normally afforded by the mainmast. That does not mean, in my judgment, that the charterer is entitled as of right to an easement of support. It means at the highest that, if he notifies the master that he wants to
- B load by that particular method, he is entitled to the reasonable co-operation of the master in getting the necessary support. In the absence of the mainmast, a jury-rig could have been erected. I do not think that a state of readiness requires that a jury-rig should have been permanently erected from Dec. 27 onwards on the chance that one of several possible methods of loading at one of several possible loading ports might have required it. That would, I think, be an idle formality and a useless expense. I have dealt with the loading of grain in bulk.
- C As it was the charterer's option to load either in bulk or in bags I think that the ship should be ready for either. For the loading of bags the ship's gear would not be required at all, except at a subsequent port below the bar when it might have been needed as an alternative to a shore crane if the cargo was loaded from lighters, and I suppose that this might have involved Nos. 4 and 5 holds. I do not think that the ship is proved to be unready in the business sense because
- D of the possibility of her not being able to meet this somewhat remote contingency.

In my judgment, a charterer who cancels on the ground that the ship's gear is defective must (in the absence of express or implied provisions about the gear) show that the defects were such that the ship would probably be unready when the time came to play her part in the agreed method of loading, if any, or in giving the necessary co-operation in any reasonable method that might be employed. I do not think that the Case discloses sufficient evidence of unreadiness in this sense. Accordingly, I answer in the negative the question in para. 7 and I uphold the alternative award for £19,607 6s. 1d. in para. 9. I should add that I have not found it necessary to deal, except incidentally, with an interesting submission made by counsel for the shipowners that where there is more than one loading port readiness to load means readiness to carry out the work at the place where the notice of readiness is given and does not involve readiness for work at any subsequent port.

WEST MERSEA URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. FRASER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Finnemore, J.J.), April 18, 1950.]

Water Supply—Domestic purposes—Right of owner of premises to demand supply— —“Premises”—House-boat—Water Act, 1945 (c. 42), sched. III, s. 30 (1).

The respondent, who was the owner of a house-boat which had been moored in a particular place in a creek since 1944, demanded from the appellants, the water undertakers for the district, a supply of water for domestic purposes. The respondent had complied with all the requirements of s. 40 of sched. III to the Water Act, 1945, but the appellants refused the demand on the ground that the house-boat did not constitute “premises” within the meaning of s. 30 (1) of sched. III to that Act.

HELD: “premises” within the meaning of s. 30 (1), meant property which had a sufficient degree of permanency in the site it occupied; in the present circumstances, this element existed; and, therefore, the respondent was entitled to a supply of water.

[FOR THE WATER ACT, 1945, sched. III, s. 30 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 38, p. 554.]

CASE STATED by Essex justices.

On Sept. 29, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Colchester, the appellants, who were the water undertakers for the district, were convicted of making default in furnishing a supply of water for domestic purposes to certain premises, namely, a house-boat, contrary to s. 120 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as amended by the Water Act, 1945, sched. IV. The justices rejected the appellants' contention that the house-boat did not constitute “premises” within the meaning of s. 30 (1) of sched. III to the Act of 1945.

Hines for the appellants.

H. G. Garland for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the Essex justices before whom the appellants, the West Mersea Urban District Council, were charged with making default

“in furnishing a supply of water for domestic purposes to certain premises, namely, a house-boat called the ‘Sea Horse,’ Coast Road, West Mersea, . . . the respondent being entitled to demand and having demanded such a supply, contrary to s. 120 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as amended by sched. IV to the Water Act, 1945.”

The justices convicted the appellants and ordered them to pay a fine of £1 and costs.

In my opinion, this appeal fails. By s. 29 (1) of sched. III to the Water Act, 1945, it is provided:

“The undertakers shall lay any necessary mains and bring water to any area within the limits of supply if they are required to do so by such number of owners and occupiers of premises in that area who require a supply of water for domestic purposes [as provides that the resulting water rates are sufficient] . . .”

By s. 30 (1) of the schedule it is provided:

“An owner or occupier of any premises within the limits of supply who has complied in respect of those premises with the provisions of Part X of this schedule with respect to the laying of a supply pipe and payment or tender of the water rate shall be entitled to demand and receive from the undertakers a supply of water sufficient for domestic purposes for those premises . . .”

Section 30 (2) provides for the imposition of a penalty if the undertakers fail to supply the water.

Section 40 of the schedule provides:

A “An owner or occupier of any premises within the limits of supply who desires to have a supply of water for his domestic purposes from the water-works of the undertakers, shall, subject as hereinafter provided, comply with the following requirements:—(a) he shall give to the undertakers fourteen days’ notice of his intention to lay the necessary supply pipe and at, or before, the time of giving such notice shall pay or tender to them such sum as may be payable in advance by way of water rate in respect of his premises; and (b) he shall lay the supply pipe at his own expense, having first obtained, as respects any land not forming part of a street, the consent

B of the owners and occupiers thereof.”

By s. 17 of the Act of 1945 it is provided:

C “(1) Statutory water undertakers may make byelaws for preventing waste, undue consumption, misuse, or contamination of water supplied by them. (2) Byelaws under this section may include provisions—(a) prescribing the size, nature, materials, strength . . . of the water fittings to be used; and (b) forbidding the use of any water fittings which are of such a nature . . . as to cause or permit . . . waste [etc.]”

The respondent had laid a supply pipe which connected with the undertakers’ main and which in all respects complied with the requirements of Part X of sched. III, and there is no suggestion that it did not comply with the byelaws.

D She had also tendered the water rate and had asked for a supply of water. By para. 4 of the Case it is found:

E “(e) that the said house-boat had at all material times lain in a mud berth at Coast Road, West Mersea aforesaid; (f) that the respondent was at all material times the owner of the said house-boat and paid to one, Wyatt, the yearly sum of £20 under an oral arrangement for permission to keep the said house-boat berthed on saltings the property of the said Wyatt; (g) that the said house-boat was formerly a yacht . . . that the said house-boat normally floated at high tide and had in a recent gale moved some twenty yards inland up the creek in which it lay and that the arrangement between the respondent and the said Wyatt merely permitted the said

F house-boat to remain upon the mud in the said creek without prescribing any precise site for it; (i) that the site of the said house-boat had been assessed for purposes of general rate; (j) that the said house-boat was rated as premises for the purposes of a water rate from 1944 to February, 1949, and a water rate was demanded by the appellants and paid during that period.”

G That last finding would not be conclusive against the appellants, though it may throw some light on the subject because, if, in fact, they were not under an obligation to supply water, they could discontinue the supply and defend any proceedings brought against them for not having given a supply. The justices found that the house-boat in those circumstances could fairly be described as “premises” within the meaning of the Act.

H There is no definition of the word “premises” in the Act. Section 59 (1) states that it “includes land,” but the word is not, as used in this Act, a term of art. It means some form of property used as domestic premises, but before the undertakers can be required to provide water to any particular premises there must be some degree of permanency. Here, we find that this house-boat has lain since 1944 at least in this creek. The fact that the respondent did not stipulate with Mr. Wyatt as to the precise site it was to occupy does not seem to me to be conclusive. There must have been mooring in such a way that the house-boat could rise and fall with the tide, but the fact that it was sometimes so many feet higher and sometimes so many feet lower again is not conclusive. The fact is that it occupied a site where it was moored, and the respondent showed that she intended it to remain in that position because at her own expense she put a supply pipe there, so as to connect the house-boat with the main, and brought it to the point where she wanted it to supply the boat.

I think some stress should be laid on the fact that the respondent is rated in respect of the house-boat, because it shows that the rating authority regards it as a hereditament occupying this particular position. It is true there has to be a flexibility in the water pipe to allow for the rise or fall of the boat, but that fact, again, is inconclusive. It would seem that before this house-boat can be described in law as "premises" within s. 30 (1) of sched. III there must be an element of permanency in the site it occupies. That having been found, and it being also found that the house-boat is used for domestic premises, I think the justices were entitled to hold as they did. The point that seems to have been urged to show that these were not permanent premises was that once, in a recent gale, the house-boat was moved some twenty yards upstream. I do not see that that destroys the element of permanency any more than, if I have a toolshed standing in my garden which is blown into the next field by a heavy gale, it can be said that it is not to be treated as a permanent structure because an act of God has for a time removed it from the position it formerly occupied. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that this appeal fails.

MORRIS, J.: I am of the same opinion. I agree with my Lord that in order that the house-boat should be regarded as coming within the word "premises" it must be shown that there was an element of permanency in the site it occupies. The Case shows that the owner of the house-boat had a right to have the boat remain on the mud in the creek without any precise site being prescribed for it, but, by para. 4 (e) of the Case, it is further shown that the house-boat appears to have occupied a particular site. One other matter has also influenced my mind. It seems to me that the provision in s. 40 of sched. III to the Water Act, 1945, relating to the laying of a supply pipe contemplates that there should be a joinder between "premises", having some degree of permanency and some element of fixation of site, and the water mains of the undertakers who are to deliver the water. The finding in the Case that the provisions of s. 40 had been complied with by the respondent shows that the water suppliers considered that there had been a proper laying of the supply pipe, and to that fact must be added the very significant additional circumstance that between 1944 and February, 1949, the house-boat was rated as "premises" and a water rate was demanded and paid. That, in my judgment, only adds confirmation to the view that there was a compliance with the Act with regard to the laying of a supply pipe, and the very fact that a supply pipe could, and was, adequately laid, in my judgment, itself denotes that there was a degree of permanency and a sufficient element of fixation of site of the "premises."

FINNEMORE, J.: I also agree. Under the Water Act, 1945, an owner or occupier of premises within the limits of supply of the water undertaking can, on complying with s. 40 of sched. III to the Act, demand a water supply for domestic purposes. The words which are used are: "An owner or occupier of any premises within the limits of supply," and the argument has turned on the meaning of the word "premises." That word, as I understand it, is not a term of art, and it must be considered in each case according to the subject-matter which is being dealt with. It is to be noted that there is no definition of the word in the Act, but it does say in s. 59 (1) that "premises includes land." It is further provided:

"'land' includes any interest in land and any easement or right in, to or over land."

Those are indications that "premises" in this Act is to be construed in a wide and liberal sense. The purpose of the Act, among other things, is to ensure, to people who need water for domestic purposes, a proper supply. It is not disputed here that the respondent had carried out her duties under s. 40. The only question is whether this house-boat, in the circumstances of this case, is to be included within the term "premises." It seems to me that the three tests which counsel for the appellants indicated may be the proper ones that ought to be considered. First, the premises must be a place where water for domestic purposes is required. That does not arise. Secondly, there must be a reasonable degree of certitude of position. The justices have found that this house-boat at all material times had lain in a mud berth at Coast Road, West Mersea, and it does not seem to me that its up and down movement with the tide is enough to destroy that certitude of position. The third point is whether there is a reasonable degree of permanency. There would appear to be no right to demand a supply of water through a pipe to a yacht which goes out to sea and from time to time comes up the river and berths at a particular place, but the finding here is that for a number of years this house-boat had been in this position on the mud flat, subject only to the fact that it rose and fell with the tide. It seems to me that the finding of the justices that it has lain at this mud berth indicates that for practical purposes it has been permanently moored in a particular place. Our attention was called to the finding in para. (h) of the Case that "Wyatt merely permitted the said house-boat to remain upon the mud in the said creek without prescribing any precise site for it." That may well be, as between the respondent and Wyatt, but in fact, for a number of years, at all material times the boat was moored in a particular place. The only exception is that on one occasion there was a gale which caused the boat to move some twenty yards along the creek. That is an incident which might happen not only to a boat but to any kind of property, and it does not, in my opinion, in any way destroy the view to which I have come—that this boat, moored in this particular way at this particular place, is properly described as "premises." If, therefore, the person who owns or occupies that boat requires water for domestic purposes, she is entitled to have it supplied. I agree that the appeal fails.

Friendly Society—Accounts of officers—Neglect to deliver—Order by justices to deliver—Decision of justices "final and conclusive"—No appeal by Case Stated—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (c. 25), s. 55 (2).

The appellant, an officer of a friendly society, was ordered by justices to deliver money and other property to the respondents, trustees of a branch of the society. On the appellant's application, the justices stated a Case for the opinion of the High Court.

HELD: a Case stated by justices for the opinion of the High Court was in the nature of an appeal, and, as the decision of the justices was final and conclusive by virtue of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 55 (2), the High Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the matter.

CASE STATED by Surrey justices.

On June 3, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sutton, an order was made against the appellant, an officer of the Independent Order of Rechabites, for the payment of money and delivery up of property of the society within seven days, pursuant to s. 55 (2) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. On the application of the appellant, however, the justices stated a Case for the opinion of the High Court whether their decision was right. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

W. Gumbel for the appellant.

Curtis-Raleigh for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: A complaint was preferred under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, by the trustees of a branch of the Independent Order of Rechabites against the appellant, Martha Ellis Hall

"for that she on and since June 6, 1949, at Sutton, Surrey, being the secretary of the 'Good Shepherd' Tent No. 69 of the South London District No. 53 Branch of the Independent Order of Rechabites, Salford Unity Friendly Society, and being an officer thereof having receipt or charge of money, had refused to pay over all sums of money and deliver all property of the said society in her hands or custody pursuant to a notice in writing dated June 3, 1949, in that behalf, contrary to s. 55 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896."

That complaint was heard by the Sutton justices who made an order against the appellant

"for payment of the sums of money referred to in the said information and complaint and for delivery of the property referred to in the said information and complaint, such payment and delivery to be made within seven days."

They were asked to state a Case because the appellant maintained that she, being an officer of a tent, or sub-branch of a district, was obliged only to render account or deliver documents to the officers of the tent and not to the officers of the district. We have not gone into that matter. The justices stated a Case, and counsel for the respondents has taken the objection that the Case does not lie and that the justices had no power to state it by reason of the provisions of s. 55 (2) under which the proceedings were taken.

Section 55 (2) provides:

"In case of any neglect or refusal to deliver the account, or to pay over the sums of money or to deliver the property in manner aforesaid, the trustees or authorised officers of the society or branch may sue upon the bond or security before mentioned, or may apply to the county court or to a court of summary jurisdiction, and the order of either such court shall be final and conclusive."

Counsel for the respondents says that, the justices having given a decision, that decision is final. The question is whether or not the justices have power to state a Case.

The power of justices to state a Case is given by s. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and s. 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. Those two sections must be read together because there is no question that s. 2 of the Act of 1857 treats a Special Case as an appeal. The word "appeal" is not used in the Act of 1879, but where justices state a Case the proceeding is always called an appeal by way of Special Case, and that seems to be right in view of the terms of s. 2 of the Act of 1857. If the present proceeding is an appeal, it would seem that this court cannot entertain it because the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 55 (2), makes the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction final and conclusive. There is an option given because trustees can go to the county court. If the county court judge makes an order, that order can only be questioned by an appeal to the Court of Appeal. That, I think, again, tends to show that this proceeding is an appeal against the decision of the justices.

The court has received assistance from Westminster Corpn. v. Gordon Hotels, Ltd. (1). Proceedings had been taken with regard to the disposal of trade refuse under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which contains a provision that the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction shall be final. That case was taken to the House of Lords in an effort to get a decision whether, the Special Case having been stated, the courts had jurisdiction to entertain it. LORD LOREBURN, L.C., gave a very short judgment affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, in which he said ([1908] A.C. 143):

"The Act of 1891 declared that the decision of the magistrate should be final, and I do not think that can be qualified by the earlier Act of 1879 providing for the stating of a Case. If the order of the dates had been inverted, the matter might have borne a different aspect."

In other words, if the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, had preceded the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, it might have been said that the general words of the later Act overrode the limiting words in the earlier Act. Counsel for the appellant has argued that, as the earlier Friendly Societies Act, 1875, which contained these words, was followed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, on the reasoning of LORD LOREBURN, L.C., in the House of Lords and also that of COZENS-HARDY, M.R., when the Westminster Corpn. case (1) was in the Court of Appeal, it would follow that in 1879 an appeal was given by way of Special Case to a person in the position of the appellant, the words of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, being overridden, but the Act of 1875 was repealed by the Act of 1896, in which Parliament enacted by s. 55 (2) that the decision of the justices should be final and conclusive.

Accordingly, we feel that we are bound to give effect to the objection that has been taken and to hold that the justices had no power to state a Special Case in this matter and that this court has no power to entertain a Special Case. This appeal must be dismissed.

ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. RIVER THAMES CONSERVATORS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), April 18, 19, 1950.]

Land Drainage—Catchment board—Commutation of obligation to repair—Contractual obligation to keep ditch clean—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 9 (1).

The Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 9, provides: “(1) It shall be the duty of every catchment board to take steps for the commutation of all obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise, to do any work (whether by way of repairing of banks, maintaining of watercourses or otherwise) in connection with the main river.”

By an agreement dated Aug. 25, 1908, made between the plaintiffs, of the one part, and the trustees of the will of W., of the other part, the plaintiffs covenanted to keep clean, open and free from obstructions a certain ditch therein described and also every ditch and watercourse connecting that ditch with the River Thames, so that the land bordering the ditch should not become flooded by water which was conveyed by a pipe into the ditch from the plaintiffs' land. It was not disputed that the ditch formed part of the “main river” within the meaning of the Act of 1930 for which the defendants were responsible as the catchment board concerned. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the defendants were under a duty under s. 9 (1) to take steps for the commutation of the plaintiffs' obligation under the agreement of 1908.

HELD: section 9 (1) dealt only with obligations arising out of or attaching to land and did not extend to the purely contractual obligation existing under the agreement of 1908.

ACTION by the Eton Rural District Council claiming a declaration that the defendants, the River Thames Conservators were under a duty imposed by the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 9 (1), to take steps for the commutation of the council's obligation, placed on them by an agreement dated Aug. 25, 1908, to keep clean, open and free from obstructions certain ditches and watercourses.

VAISEY, J.: The point which arises for consideration is one of construction, and depends on the true meaning of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 9. I have to decide whether a certain agreement dated Aug. 25, 1908, comes within its provisions or not. The defendants are a catchment board within the meaning of the Act, and are subject to the duty imposed on every catchment board by the section in question. If the agreement to which I refer is within the section, there is an absolute duty on the defendants to carry out the statutory direction; if the agreement is not within the section, not only are the defendants under no such duty, but they have no power to carry out the operation which the section indicates.

The agreement is made between the plaintiffs, of the one part, and certain persons, who were the trustees of the will of one Robert Augustus Arthur Wright, of the other part, and, so far as is material for the present purpose, the plaintiffs thereby covenanted to keep clean, open and free from obstructions a certain ditch specified in the agreement and also every ditch or watercourse connecting that ditch with the River Thames so that the land bordering the ditch should not become flooded by reason of the flow of water from a pipe which conveyed water from certain land vested in the plaintiffs into the ditch. The object of the agreement was to facilitate the disposal by the plaintiffs of effluent from their sewage works, and also the natural surface water from their land. There can, I think, be no doubt that the benefit of, and right to enforce, that covenant is vested in the successors-in-title to the trustees of the will, who are, I believe, a limited company known as Harry and Charles Rochford, Ltd. It is not disputed that the ditch in question forms part of the main river (that is, of the River Thames) within the meaning of the Act, for which the defendants are responsible as the catchment board concerned.

I turn now to s. 9. By sub-s. (1) of that section, a duty is imposed on every catchment board

“ to take steps for the commutation of all obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise, to do any work (whether by way of repairing of banks, maintaining of watercourses or otherwise) in connection with the main river.”

The question, in brief, is whether the obligation imposed by the agreement of Aug. 25, 1908, is one of the obligations covered by that sub-section. It is, of course, an easy way of handling the matter to say that the words “ or otherwise ” in the first of the two contexts in which those words appear in the sub-section are of general application and mean exactly what they say. If that be the proper way of construing the section, there is an end of the matter, and the obligation by way of covenant which rests on the plaintiffs is one which the defendants are bound under the sub-section to commute. But, looking for the moment at that sub-section alone, I have to inquire for what reason the words “ by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise ” come into its language, because if “ all obligations ” meant all obligations without qualification, the section would, I should have thought, have contained a reference to all obligations imposed on persons by any means to do such work as is there mentioned. I think that as a matter of construction I am bound to give some weight to the insertion of those words “ by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise,” and to afford some explanation why those words appear in the sub-section.

It seems to me (and I do not think it can be denied) that the words “ or otherwise ” in that first context ought, to some extent and in some measure, to be construed according to the ejusdem generis rule. The problem is to decide what significance I ought to attach to those two words in that context. It is, I think, to be observed that the three words “ tenure,” “ custom,” “ prescription,” all seem to indicate an obligation which attaches to and exists by reference to some particular land, and I am inclined to think that those words exclude by implication merely personal obligations. When the sub-section talks of “ obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise,” I have a strong suspicion that the meaning may well be that the obligations have to be so imposed for those particular reasons, or on those particular grounds, and not generally. It is curious that the same two words “ or otherwise ” appear, as I have already indicated, twice in this sub-section. In the second context in which they appear it is obvious that the ejusdem generis principle of construction must apply, for by the words “ whether by way of repairing of banks, maintaining of watercourses or otherwise ” as words descriptive of work in the main river, the sub-section clearly limits the work to structural works and excludes other operations such as I suggested during the course of the argument—for example, the running of a line of steamers between two or more points on the river.

The matter does not, however, rest there, because the sub-section is only one of eight sub-sections in s. 9 to which the marginal note is: “ Commutation of obligations to repair by reason of tenure, &c. ” Sub-section (2) imposes a consequential duty on the defendants to give notice of proposals to commute any obligation to which the section applies, and I do not think that there is really much relevance in that sub-section, which, however, enables the Minister of Agriculture to decide whether or not a commutation shall be made. Sub-section (3) is of great importance, and I think it should be read as though sub-s. (2) did not intervene between it and sub-s. 1. Sub-section (3) provides:

"Any capital sum or terminable annuity fixed under this section shall, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary between the owner and any lessee of the land, be payable by the owner."

A

The draftsmanship of this sub-section does not seem to me to be above criticism. What is meant, I ask, by "the land"? What is meant by "the owner"? But I, at least, get this out of the sub-section, that I am fortified in the preliminary view which I took of sub-s. (1), for I find in it reference to an obligation imposed on land as being at any rate the main subject of the section. It corroborates, I think, the impression which I suggested is given by these somewhat strange words "tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise" which appear in sub-s. (1), and as all three of them are words which are proper to be used in connection with obligations imposed on land, I think that when you come to sub-s. (3) you find that your suspicions were not without foundation. Sub-section (5) in the same way provides:

C

"The sum to be paid in respect of the commutation of any such obligation . . . shall be charged on the land in respect of which the obligation existed, and shall have priority over any other incumbrances charged on that land by the owner thereof, whether before or after the passing of this Act . . ."

D

There again there is no hint that the sum to be paid in respect of the commutation is not a sum which can be charged on some land, for sub-s. (5) directs that the amount "shall be charged on the land in respect of which the obligation existed," indicating to me that the draftsman of the whole section contemplated that he was dealing with obligations which were in fact obligations affecting particular land; and both sub-s. (3) and sub-s. (5) seem to me quite inappropriate to, and, indeed, inconsistent with, the application of the section to a merely contractual obligation such as we have in this agreement of Aug. 25, 1908.

E

There are other indications in the section which, I think, point the same way, and, indeed, I can find nothing in the other sub-sections which leads to the opposite conclusion, namely, the conclusion that "obligations" in sub-s. (1) means all obligations without qualification. It appears to me that both on the wording of sub-s. (1) as it stands alone, and on the reading of that sub-section in conjunction with the other sub-sections to which I have referred, I am bound to take the view which has been taken by the defendants—that this obligation, which is a purely contractual obligation existing under the agreement of Aug. 25, 1908, is not an obligation for the commutation of which it is their duty to take steps, and, therefore, it is an obligation which they have no right to commute even if they desired to do so. My attention was drawn to a corresponding section (s. 15) in the Sewers Act, 1833, where, in a similar context, instead of the words "by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise," we find the words "by reason of tenure, frontage, prescription, custom, covenant, or grant." Although I do not think one can properly construe the Act of 1930 by reference to the Act of 1833, it is not without significance that of the words used in the earlier section, only those words which, in my judgment, point to obligations imposed on or created by reference to and as a burden on particular land have been included in the later section, and there is a noticeable omission of the words "covenant or grant." I agree that the section is obscure, but, on the whole, I think that it is reasonably clear that (for what reason I do not pause to inquire) s. 9 of the Act of 1930 deals with obligations referable to, charged on, or arising out of, some land. Although that may not have been the intention of the legislature, I can only assume such an intention from the words which I find in the section itself. The section seems to me to point to ancient obligations attaching to land. "Tenure," "prescription," "custom," are all words which are appropriate for those ancient incidents of land tenure the origin of which is frequently lost in the obscurity of history. Those three words "tenure," "custom," "prescription," in my judgment, were not selected arbitrarily or without intentional significance, and, while, if sub-s. (1) stood alone, it would have been very difficult to limit the generality of the words "or otherwise"—although I am not saying that it would have been impossible—I think that the matter is really concluded by the later sub-sections, and the result is that this action fails.

F

G

H

After discussion, the learned judge directed that the action be dismissed with costs, but that if no notice of appeal is served and the judgment stands without appeal, there would be no order as to costs.

LOWNDES v. LOWNDES.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), March 31, April 5, 1950.]

Divorce—Collusion—Negotiations as to maintenance during pendency of petition—Deposit of £2,000 with stakeholder before trial—Wife to receive money only if she proceeded with petition—Need to disclose to court negotiations for maintenance during pendency of proceedings—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 178 (2) (iii) (as substituted by Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 4).

Divorce—Practice—Application for decree absolute by respondent—Suspicion of collusion—Representation of the King's Proctor—Hearing of evidence in open court.

A petition for divorce based on the ground of cruelty was filed by the wife, and the husband put in an answer denying the charges and making counter-charges with a cross-prayer for relief. Before the trial the husband, having met another woman whom he desired to marry, withdrew his answer to allow the wife's petition to go through undefended. A decree nisi was pronounced, but the wife did not apply for the decree absolute. The husband then applied under r. 40, sub-r. 3, of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, for a decree absolute, and that application was referred by the registrar to WILLMER, J., who directed a hearing in open court with evidence on oath and requested the King's Proctor to be represented. It was proved that some days before the hearing of the petition, to proceed with which the wife had shown some reluctance, a brother of the husband, acting with his authority as his agent, had deposited £2,000 with a stakeholder and drawn up a written declaration of trust under which the stakeholder was to pay the money to the wife if the divorce went through, and a decree nisi was pronounced, but that she was to repay it to the brother if she abandoned the proceedings. After the hearing the stakeholder paid the money to the wife. The husband repaid his brother the £2,000, and he threatened to sue his wife for the return of the money when she declined to apply for a decree absolute.

HELD: (i) the arrangement between the husband's brother and the stakeholder was intended and calculated to induce the wife to continue the suit, and, therefore, the petition had been prosecuted in collusion with the husband and the decree nisi must be rescinded.

(ii) if negotiations for maintenance have taken place during the pendency of divorce proceedings they must be disclosed to the court.

No provision having been made in the Matrimonial Causes Rules for intervention by the King's Proctor in cases where application is made for the decree absolute by the party against whom the decree nisi was pronounced, the court, to ensure that all relevant evidence was brought before it, directed the parties to call the relevant witnesses on each side and requested the King's Proctor to attend by counsel and call such evidence as was thought necessary.

APPLICATION to make absolute a decree nisi.

The wife, after obtaining a decree nisi in an undefended petition based on cruelty, did not apply for the decree to be made absolute, but gave information to the King's Proctor regarding a sum of £2,000 which had been deposited with a neutral stakeholder before the trial on trust to be paid to her on the grant of the decree absolute. The husband applied for the decree absolute, and, as no provision exists in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, regarding the procedure to be followed when a party against whom a decree nisi has been pronounced seeks to obtain a decree absolute, WILLMER, J., adjourned the summons into court, heard witnesses, and requested that the King's Proctor should be represented by counsel and should call any relevant evidence. The facts appear in the judgment.

WILLMER, J., read the following judgment. This is an application for decree absolute made under the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 183 (3), by the husband against whom the decree nisi was pronounced. The matter came before the registrar in pursuance of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 40, sub-r. (3), and was referred by him to me in chambers, and it then appeared that a situation had arisen which was not covered by the rules. The King's Proctor attended the summons by counsel, and I was informed that the wife, who had obtained the decree nisi had disclosed certain information to the King's Proctor which prompted suspicion of collusion. Had it been an ordinary case in which the application for decree absolute was being made by the party in whose favour the decree nisi was pronounced, the King's Proctor would, I was informed, have wished to intervene and show cause against the decree being made absolute. Unfortunately, when s. 183 (3) of the Act was added by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 9, no consequential alteration was made in the rules, and no provision was made for intervention by the King's Proctor in a case such as this, where the application for decree absolute is made by the party against whom a decree nisi has been pronounced. In the circumstances, I was invited to give

- A directions, and I adjourned the matter into court and directed that the evidence of the relevant witnesses be taken viva voce in court. I also requested the King's Proctor to attend and afford me the benefit of his assistance. In the events which have happened, there is no procedure laid down by the rules, and we had to invent our procedure as we went along. Under my direction counsel for each party called his own witnesses and counsel for the King's Proctor at my request called certain others, whose evidence it was thought should be before the court. In the result, I feel satisfied that all the relevant evidence has been satisfactorily placed before the court.

- The petition was by the wife who alleged cruelty, and it was filed on Oct. 25, 1948. The parties were married in 1920, and they finally separated in August, 1948. The husband appeared and filed an answer dated Dec. 30, 1948, in which he denied the charges of cruelty, made cross-charges of cruelty, and, on that ground, put in a cross-prayer for relief. About the same time, however, it chanced that he met another woman whom he desired to marry. He was, therefore, additionally anxious that, as the result of the proceedings in this case, he would obtain his freedom so that he could re-marry, and during the spring of 1949 he decided to withdraw his answer and allow the wife's petition to go undefended. In fact, the answer was struck out by order of the court on May 31, 1949. On July 27, 1949, the case came on for hearing as an undefended cause, and a decree nisi in favour of the wife was pronounced. After the lapse of the statutory period the wife did not make any application for decree absolute. Instead, in October, 1949, she went to the King's Proctor and disclosed certain information. It is from that that the present application arises.

- The facts brought to the notice of the King's Proctor which have given rise to suspicion of collusion, arose out of the events of the few days immediately preceding the hearing of the cause. At that period the husband was residing in the matrimonial home, and the wife was residing at an hotel a few miles away which was kept by a Mr. and Mrs. Haydock who have given evidence.
- F There is a large measure of agreement between the witnesses with regard to material facts, many of which are undisputed, and I will deal with so much of the case as is common ground first. The husband told me that it was always his intention to make provision for his wife by his will had the marriage continued. He said that he intended to leave her, first, a legacy of £2,000 or thereabouts, to cover the expense of providing and furnishing a new home, and, secondly, an income of £2,000 a year. When the divorce was pending, he said, he wished to make the same provision for the wife who was divorcing him as he would have done had she been his widow. The yearly income was intended to be secured on debentures issued by a company which he was in process of forming to take over his business as an insurance broker. In fact, in the spring of 1949 he so instructed his solicitor, and proposals to this effect were
- H put forward by his solicitor to the wife's solicitors. The wife developed a consuming jealousy of the woman who had supplanted her in the affections of the husband. She was also extremely distrustful of the husband and of his intentions in the matter of financial provision for her, and for these reasons, as the date of the trial approached, she adopted the attitude that she was not going to go on with the case. This came to the ears of the husband, who was much alarmed at the prospect, for he had in a sense burned his boats. His own allegations against the wife had been struck out, and the one thing which he desired was that his wife's petition should succeed and that the divorce should take place so that he might be free to marry the other woman. He refused to see the wife himself, but during July and in the period shortly before the hearing his brother, Mr. Roy Lowndes, went on two, or, possibly, three, occasions to interview the wife on his behalf. There is no question but that Mr. Roy Lowndes went to see the wife with the knowledge and approval of the husband, and I infer that he went with the husband's general authority to act as his representative. When Mr. Roy Lowndes saw the wife he did his best to explain to her what were the husband's intentions as to financial provision for her, but, apparently, she was by no means satisfied. She was suspicious of these debentures on which the annual income was to be secured, and she wanted to see the lump sum of £2,000 in cash. A

In due course, Mr. Roy Lowndes suggested to her that the £2,000 might be held by a stakeholder. I think it is important to observe, in the light of what subsequently happened, that, according to Mr. Roy Lowndes's evidence, it was he who first suggested the idea of a stakeholder. Finally, on his last visit, on July 22, five days before the hearing, Mr. Roy Lowndes gave the wife a post-dated cheque for £2,000, payable on July 29, and drawn on his own account. Even that did not satisfy the wife, and the possibility of the cheque being stopped before its due date was considered. On July 24, Mr. and Mrs. Haydock went over to the husband's house and saw him. In the circumstances I infer that they went to see him with the general authority of the wife to act as her agents. Later there was a telephone conversation between Mr. Haydock and the husband. There is some discrepancy as to what was said at the interview and during the telephone conversation, but it is admitted that the husband agreed to a suggestion put forward by Mr. Haydock that an independent accountant should examine the books of the husband's company to satisfy himself about the debentures, and it is agreed that an appointment was made for the accountant to examine the books on July 26. During the interview the husband reiterated, for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Haydock, his intention as to financial provision for the wife if the divorce went through. He said substantially that, if she elected not to proceed with the case, he would make no provision for her, but would leave her to pursue such remedies as she might have, and, to make it more difficult for her, he threatened to go abroad and leave her high and dry. That was the actual expression he used in his evidence. It is agreed that it was contemplated by the husband that all this would be communicated by Mr. and Mrs. Haydock to the wife, and they did communicate it to her when they returned home that evening. B C D E F

On July 26, the interview with the accountant took place. After examining the books he expressed himself as satisfied with regard to the debentures. On that occasion there was a separate conversation between Mr. Roy Lowndes and Mr. Haydock in the course of which Mr. Roy Lowndes produced a document, prepared by himself, which was described as a declaration of trust. This document was executed there and then by Mr. Roy Lowndes, on the one side, and Mr. Haydock, on the other. Its effect was that a sum of £2,000 was to be deposited by Mr. Roy Lowndes with Mr. Haydock, in trust to pay it over to the wife if the divorce went through, but that it should be repaid to Mr. Roy Lowndes if the divorce was not proceeded with. At the same interview Mr. Roy Lowndes handed to Mr. Haydock a banker's draft for £2,000, and with that in his pocket Mr. Haydock went home. Even so, it appears to have remained in doubt whether the wife would actually appear in court the next day. It is in evidence that on the morning of July 27, the day of the trial, Mrs. Haydock telephoned the husband to give him the news that the wife had left for London, but she added: "Whether or not she will get to court God only knows." The wife did go to court, the case was heard, and a decree nisi was pronounced in her favour. On July 28 Mr. Haydock, in accordance with the provisions of the declaration G H of trust, handed the banker's draft to the wife and it was paid into her bank account. Shortly afterwards the husband repaid his brother, Mr. Roy Lowndes, the £2,000 which the latter had furnished.

A There are two other admitted facts which I must mention to complete the agreed background of the case. The first is this. In October, as I have described, the wife was threatening to go to the King's Proctor. This came to the ears of the husband and there was an interview between him and Mrs. Haydock in the course of which he told Mrs. Haydock that he contemplated suing the wife for the return of the £2,000 on the ground that by not applying for the decree absolute she had not fulfilled the conditions under which the money was given to her. The other fact which I think is of some importance is that the husband, in answer to some questions put by me at the conclusion of his evidence, said B that he did not at all agree with the wife's allegations of cruelty. He said that there was an element of truth in what she said in her petition, but that it was badly twisted.

To my mind those facts immediately prompt the suspicion that this petition was proceeded with, not on its own merits, but as the result of a collusive bargain made between the parties or their agents, whereby the husband was to pay C £2,000 in consideration of the wife giving him his freedom. That is the suspicion which clearly emerges from the mere statement of the facts. Before, however, I deal with that, I should deal with another matter as to which the facts were in issue. Both the husband and Mr. Roy Lowndes have told me that the declaration of trust and, indeed, the whole plan to deposit £2,000 with Mr. Haydock as stakeholder, were entirely Mr. Roy Lowndes's own idea and that the husband D knew nothing about it. Indeed, it was said that afterwards, when he found out about it, he was extremely angry. Mr. and Mrs. Haydock, however, have told me that this plan for Mr. Haydock to act as stakeholder was actually discussed between Mr. Haydock and the husband during the telephone conversation on July 24, and they say that the husband personally agreed to the suggestion. I doubt whether it is necessary for me to resolve this issue of fact. E I infer that the husband entrusted his brother, Roy, with general authority to act as his agent in making financial arrangements with the wife in furtherance of the contemplated divorce. In making the arrangements which he did, it appears to me that Mr. Roy Lowndes was acting within the scope of the general authority conferred on him, and that in accordance with the ordinary rules the husband would be bound thereby, whether or not he actually knew all the details F of what Mr. Roy Lowndes did, and whether or not he actually assented to everything that was done. This view is, I think, consistent with that expressed by BUCKNILL, J., in Poulden v. Poulden (1). That was a case raising a question of connivance, but I do not think there is any distinction between connivance and collusion so far as the responsibility for the acts of an agent are concerned. As I see the facts, the husband recognised that he was bound by his brother's G acts, first, when he himself repaid to his brother the £2,000, and, secondly, when he threatened to sue the wife for the return of the money. Having heard the evidence, I am satisfied that the husband knew and approved of the plan to hand over this money to a stakeholder. That finding of fact goes to increase the suspicion that this was a case in which collusion was present.

H By the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 178 (2) (iii) (as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4), a decree is only to be pronounced if the court is satisfied that "the petition is not presented or prosecuted in collusion with the respondent." As was pointed out by DENNING, J., in Emanuel v. Emanuel (2) there is a presumption of innocence, but that is only a provisional presumption which is counter-balanced by circumstances which lead to suspicion, as there certainly were in this case. In such cases a party in the position of the husband, who is seeking to have the decree made absolute, is left, as he began, with the legal burden of negating collusion.

He has got to satisfy the court. It is true that he does not have to do so beyond a reasonable doubt, but, at least, he must do so on balance of probabilities, and, if he leaves the matter evenly balanced on the evidence, the legal burden comes into play and requires the court to say that it is not satisfied. I have been referred to a number of authorities on the meaning of collusion. In RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 136, para. 11, it is defined as follows:

"Collusion means an agreement or bargain between the parties to a suit, or their agents, whereby the initiation of the suit is procured or its conduct provided for."

On the next page, para. 12, is equally important. It is headed: "Agreements as to maintenance and costs," and it states:

"It is immaterial that the wife has an ultimate right to maintenance or costs; if a promise to pay costs or maintenance is the consideration for a promise relating to the initiation or conduct of proceedings, the suit is collusive."

In support of that proposition Churchward v. Churchward and Holliday (3), Laidler v. Laidler (4) and Beattie v. Beattie (5) are cited. In the last-named case there is a passage in the judgment of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in which he says ([1938] 2 All E.R. 76):

"In passing, I ought to say that I share the view which McCARDIE, J., took of the decision in Malley v. Malley (6) where BIGHAM, P., had said in effect that, if the arrangement related to something—costs, for example, or maintenance—with regard to which the wife had rights which she could enforce, the arrangement was not collusive. I agree with the comments of McCARDIE, J., on that decision in Laidler v. Laidler (4). It may or may not be an important factor in deciding whether the arrangement is collusive, but it cannot be decisive that the bargain, if there is a bargain, is one which relates to something which the wife could otherwise get by some process of law . . ."

That statement of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., is of importance in regard to part of the argument addressed to me by counsel for the husband who contended that the definition in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE and the passage which I have read are insufficient and incomplete, and that to constitute collusion there must in addition be present an element of corruption or perversion of justice. Counsel for the husband argued that, on any view of the facts of the present case, what was done was in no sense corrupt and did not in any way tend to pervert the course of justice. He referred to the fact that since the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 10 (1), it has been legitimate to present claims for maintenance on behalf of the wife at any time after presentation of the petition, and in those circumstances he contended that there can now be nothing improper in conducting negotiations regarding maintenance at any stage of the proceedings. If that is so, he says, the mere fact of an arrangement made between the parties to re-assure the wife as to her financial position, whereby the husband agrees to pay something in respect of maintenance which the wife would be legally entitled to recover, cannot be regarded as tending to pervert the course of justice, and, consequently, to have been collusive.

I do not think it is necessary for me in this case to express any opinion on the question of conducting negotiations for maintenance during the pendency of the proceedings, except to say that, in my view, any such negotiations, if they have taken place, ought clearly to be brought out into the light of day and must be disclosed to the court. It is not suggested that that was done in the present case when the hearing took place, nor, indeed, until the wife herself gave information to the King's Proctor. It is, I think, also important to remember, in connection with the argument for the husband, that the court could not make any order for maintenance, whether the amount was agreed or not, until after a decree nisi has been pronounced. In those circumstances, the question may be asked: What, then, is the purpose of making a payment before decree nisi, unless it is meant to be an inducement to the other party to do something which she would not, or might not, otherwise do? Let it be assumed that it is proper, pending trial, to enter on negotiations with regard to maintenance. It remains true, however, in my judgment, that a promise to pay maintenance in consideration of a promise relating to the initiation or conduct of the case makes the suit collusive. A fortiori, it seems to me, if an actual payment is made in consideration of the case being proceeded with.

Am I to infer that this payment was made in consideration of the case being proceeded with? It is true that the wife, when she was asked the direct question, did say that, even without the payment of the £2,000, she supposed she would have gone on with the case, and, if I accept that, it goes to negative the suggestion that the payment was intended, or did act, as an inducement. The wife has now changed her mind, and, although she, apparently, did not any longer desire a decree in October, 1949, I am told that she now desires to have one equally with the husband. So, to some extent, her evidence is that of a witness who has an interest in the result of the case. Moreover, having seen her and heard her evidence and having considered her behaviour over a not inconsiderable period, I am extremely doubtful whether she is the sort of woman who at this distance of time would be capable of saying how she would have acted, bearing in mind the way her intentions were fluctuating at the material time. It is clear that both Mr. and Mrs. Haydock, who lived with her and were concerned to see that her interests were protected, certainly thought that she would not go on with the case but for a provision such as this, and equally the husband and his brother were confident that she would not go on with it unless something were done, and they were seriously alarmed about the prospect.

In the circumstances I feel that the only inference I can draw is that the arrangement arrived at between Mr. Roy Lowndes and Mr. Haydock was intended as an inducement to the wife to go on with the case. It was calculated to induce her to go on, and I am unable to say on the evidence that the wife was not, to some extent at least, induced thereby to go on with her petition. In other words, in my judgment, the deposit of £2,000 was intended, and was treated, as being given in consideration of the wife going on with the case. To my mind, such conduct clearly falls within the definition of collusion which I have read and which I accept. I would add this. I have already referred to the argument of counsel for the husband that to constitute collusion there must be present some element tending to pervert the course of justice. I think it is right to add that, in my judgment, that is precisely what we have got in this case. A husband, desirous of obtaining his freedom, induces his wife by a money payment, or more correctly by a deposit of money, to prosecute a petition which he himself describes as badly twisted, if not actually false. That appears to me to amount to no more and no less than an attempt to obtain the judgment of this court, not on the merits of the case, but rather by way of arrangement between the two parties—and an arrangement whereby the husband is to obtain his freedom irrespective of the merits of the case strikes me as being clearly something which tends to pervert the course of justice. In these circumstances I find myself unable to say I am satisfied that this petition was not presented in collusion with the respondent, and my duty, therefore, is to dismiss this summons and to rescind the decree nisi.

The respondent was charged under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4 (as amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7), with being a suspected person loitering with intent to commit a felony. It was proved that on Oct. 31, 1949, at about 12.5 a.m. the respondent was seen looking with apparent interest at the rear of certain business premises, and shortly afterwards he was found on some scaffolding which had been erected in the front of the premises to effect repairs. On arrest he admitted that he had intended to break into the premises. The justices found that the acts of the respondent when he was first observed at the back of the premises were not sufficiently antecedent to those which led immediately to his arrest and were not of such a nature as to place him in the category of a suspected person and bring him within the scope of the section.

HELD: the justices had properly directed their minds to the question whether the respondent had become a suspected person before he committed the act which led to his arrest; there was sufficient evidence to support that conclusion; and, therefore, the justices' findings of fact could not be disturbed.

CASE STATED by Sunderland justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sunderland on Oct. 31, 1949, an information was preferred by the appellant, a police constable, under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4 (as amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7) against the respondent, charging him, as a suspected person, with having on Oct. 31, unlawfully loitered in High Street West, Sunderland, with intent to commit a felony. The justices held that the events which took place when the respondent was first under observation were not sufficiently antecedent to the events which led to his arrest to bring him within the scope of s. 4 of the Act, and that, as the whole of the events took place within the space of a few minutes and formed part of the same set of circumstances, it could not be said that the acts of the respondent at the rear of the premises were of sufficient duration to bring him within the category of a suspected person. They, therefore, dismissed the information.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county borough of Sunderland. It raises a question which has often caused difficulty, namely, the application of the provisions of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (as amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7), relating to the arrest of suspected persons loitering with intent to commit a felony. If I had been sitting as a justice I am not sure that I should necessarily have come to the same conclusion as the justices did, but it seems to me that they took great care and trouble with the case. They received perfectly proper advice from their clerk, and they have evidently applied their minds to the right point. Where justices do that, it is not for this court to upset their findings of fact.

A At five minutes past midnight a police constable observed the respondent looking, apparently with interest, at the back of a place called Jopling's Stores. The appellant, a police constable, saw the respondent going round to the back of the premises, and followed him, but he lost sight of him. Shortly afterwards he found the respondent, whom he obviously suspected of being up to no good, up some scaffolding which would have enabled him (the respondent) to break into the place which thitherto he had been observing from the back. The appellant thereupon arrested him. At the time he was arrested, the respondent was only a trespasser on the scaffolding; he had not attempted to break in. B So he was charged with being a suspected person loitering with intent to commit a felony. The respondent admitted that he intended to commit a felony, and said that the reason why he was on the scaffolding was that he was going to break in if he could.

C The true construction and application of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, has given rise to a series of cases. One especially, Ledwith v. Roberts (1), has caused a good deal of difficulty to the police and will, I hope, some day be dealt with by legislation. That case laid down that to come within s. 4 of the Act a person must be within the category of suspected persons before he does the act which immediately causes his arrest. I should be sorry to attempt to lay down that the acts which cause him to be a suspected person and the act which causes him to be arrested must be separated by any particular length of time. There have D been many cases in which police have watched men who have gone round visiting car parks or cars left unattended in the street with the object either of driving away a car without the consent of the owner or of helping themselves to property in the cars. If they have acted thus for a length of time, or in such a way that the court thinks that they have by their conduct brought themselves within the category of suspected persons, it matters not whether their acts E have been done a quarter of an hour, or half an hour, or, I would say, even five minutes before another act takes place which causes the constable to arrest them. But there must be some act bringing a man within the category of a suspected person, and that act must have occurred before he commits the act which causes his arrest. That seems to be the effect of Ledwith v. Roberts (1), although that case is sometimes believed to have gone beyond that which this F court has laid down it has decided.

G In this case it would be arguable, and the justices might have found, that the interest which the respondent was displaying at five minutes past midnight in the back of Jopling's Stores was enough to bring him within the category of suspected persons, that is to say, that a reasonable person, seeing him doing that, would think that he was there for a suspicious purpose, and that, as he was not arrested until he had climbed up the scaffolding and was found thereon, the offence was complete. The justices, however, have found that the fact that the respondent was taking an interest in the back of these premises at the time mentioned was not enough to bring him within the category of suspected person. I cannot say that the justices were necessarily wrong in that. They may have H said: "Here is a young fellow going home at night, and the fact that he looks up at the back of Jopling's Stores—perhaps in the hope that he may one day have enough money to buy his girl a present, is not enough to make him a suspected person. It is true he was a suspected person as soon as he was found swarming up the scaffolding with the idea of getting in. True, he would have been guilty of attempted felony if he had started to open the window, but we cannot say that at the time he got up the scaffolding he was a suspected person." It is a question of degree. The justices, who obviously applied their minds carefully to the facts of the case and show by their findings that they have appreciated what it was necessary for them to find, have stated that "the act of the respondent at the rear of the premises was not of such a nature as to bring him within the category of a suspected person." The justices may not have been prepared to say that that in itself was a suspicious act. I think we can find no fault with the conclusion to which the justices have come, and this appeal must be dismissed.

MORRIS, J.: I agree.

FINNEMORE, J.: I agree that the justices appear to have applied their minds with considerable care to the matter which they had to decide. It was conceded by counsel for the appellant that the legal position was accurately stated to them. They were advised that "the suspicion which made the respondent a suspected person must be a suspicion arising from acts antecedent to the act occasioning the arrest." That is because the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4 (as amended), deals, not with any person who loiters with intent to commit a felony, but with "every suspected person or reputed thief," and it has been held that before the act is committed which causes the person to be arrested he must have made himself a suspected person.

In Rawlings v. Smith (2) LORD HEWART, C.J., said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 15):

"... there must be the necessary ingredient of antecedent facts giving rise to suspicion which brings the offender, or the alleged offender, into the category of suspected persons. He may not be put into the category of suspected persons solely by the act which causes him, upon arrest, to be charged with loitering as a suspected person with intent to commit a felony."

In dealing with that question, the justices said that, in their view, having heard the evidence, the events "were not sufficiently antecedent to the events which led to the arrest of the respondent to bring him within the scope of the said section." As my Lord has pointed out, it is impossible and undesirable to lay down any sort of time or duration for these antecedent acts, but they must be antecedent. I think that also is a question of fact, and I think that on the facts stated here the justices were entitled to come to the conclusion to which they came.

The second point on which, again, they were properly directed was "that the antecedent acts must be of a character that brought the respondent into the category of a suspected person." Applying their minds to that, they found that "the act of the respondent at the rear of the premises was not of such a nature as to bring him within the category of a suspected person." That seems to me to be a finding of fact, and there was evidence on which the justices could come to it. They directed themselves properly with regard to the law, and, therefore, it is not open to this court to set aside their finding.

HODSON, J.: By the Probate Non-Contentious Rules, r. 4:

F “If there be no attestation clause to a will or codicil presented for probate, or if the attestation clause thereto be insufficient, the registrars must require an affidavit from at least one of the subscribing witnesses, if they or either of them be living, to prove that the provisions of 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9, and 15 Vict. c. 24, in reference to the execution were in fact complied with.”

G In this case, the codicil was lodged in the registry in common form, and was not rejected, but was held back under r. 4, on the ground that the attestation clause was insufficient, for the production of an affidavit from at least one of the subscribing witnesses. The clause reads as follows: “Signed by the testatrix in our presence and attested by us in the presence of her and of each other.” The matter is one which is not without importance, because it appears from an affidavit which has been sworn by two partners of the firm of solicitors engaged in this case that this particular form of attestation clause has been in continuous use in their office for at least fifty-seven years, and that there are many hundreds of wills outstanding—probably about eight hundred in their office alone—in which the same form of words appears. It would obviously be a matter of considerable difficulty and inconvenience, and, possibly, expense, if steps had to be taken to regularise all the wills in the office by expanding their attestation clauses. Therefore, in this case the court has been asked to declare that this clause is sufficient.

Section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, provides:

"No will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing, and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say), it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary."

It is common knowledge that in the matter of the execution of wills, as in the matter of the execution of other documents, reliance can be placed on the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta, but the safeguard in the matter of wills where there is no contest but where merely common form grants are concerned is provided by r. 4. Therefore, it is necessary carefully to consider whether that rule has been satisfied.

The point taken by the official who dealt with the matter was that there was no reference to subscription in the attestation clause, and it was not sufficient merely to rely on the use of the word "attest," the argument being that "attest" and "subscribe" are different words and that "attest" does not include "subscribe," so that, although the presumption might apply in the last resort, yet the attestation clause could not be regarded as sufficient since it did not cover the ground envisaged by the section in spite of the words "no form of attestation shall be necessary." It is clear that it is unnecessary to cover, by the attestation clause, the whole process envisaged by s. 9. That has been recognised for a very long time, and no book of precedents gives an attestation clause which covers every word of the section. I have had read to me the form in the ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF FORMS AND PRECEDENTS, 3rd ed., vol. 18, p. 589, and I have also seen the forms which are in KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 14th ed. There are two forms in the latter work (vol. 2, p. 953). The longer form reads as follows:

"Signed by the above-named testator as . . . his last will in the presence of us, both present at the same time, who, in his presence at his request and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses"; and the shorter form reads:

"Signed by the above-named testator in the joint presence of us who in his presence and that of each other have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses."

It is to be observed that the word "attest" is not used in either of those forms, the effect of the section being reproduced by the language "subscribed our names as witnesses," and no one has, so far as I know, contended that language of that kind is not sufficient to constitute an attestation clause which will pass r. 4.

It is difficult to recollect the exact form of words which is used by practitioners in particular cases, and naturally, in order to save labour and for the sake of neatness, every skilful practitioner desires to reduce the number of words to the minimum. The solicitors in the present case have, in their view, achieved that object and are anxious to maintain that position. It is true that, if the contention of the applicants is correct that the word "attest" by itself, without the addition of the word "subscribe," is sufficient, it would appear that the word "subscribe" in the statute is otiose. Counsel on their behalf pointed out to me that, although one expects to give effect to every word in a statute, yet in this case, in any event, part of the section is otiose because it is provided that the signature is to be made "by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses," and the section goes on to provide that "such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe," so the word "attest" is unnecessary. But recognising the necessity, if possible, to give effect to, or, at any rate, to cover, every word that is in the statute, he seeks to get over the difficulty by tracing the history of the word "subscribe" as far back as he can, and he traces it back to the Statute of Frauds. He also referred me to BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 260:

"The last requisite to the validity of a deed is the attestation, or execution of it in the presence of witnesses; though this is necessary, rather for preserving the evidence, than for constituting the essence of the deed."

A BLACKSTONE goes on to describe the history of modern deeds. At the end of the paragraph, beginning with a reference to the reign of Henry VIII, he adds (ibid., 261):

"... which was also the era of discontinuing it [i.e., the particular form] in the deeds of subjects, learning being then revived, and the faculty of writing more general; and therefore ever since that time the witnesses have usually subscribed their attestation, either at the bottom, or on the back of the deed."

"Attestation" in its primary meaning, as the dictionaries show, involves witnessing, and witnessing only, but when it is applied to documents the dictionaries show, and the authorities also, that it involves writing. I need not refer to many of the dictionaries, which appear to be quite consistent on the topic. The first one I was referred to was SWEET'S LAW DICTIONARY, published in 1882, where (p. 73) the heading "Attest—Attestation" is followed by this definition:

"To attest is literally to witness any act or event, but the term is now exclusively applied to the signature or execution of a document. When A executes a deed in the presence of B, and B signs his name on the document as a token of his having witnessed A's execution, B is said to attest the execution. The term is even more commonly applied to wills than to deeds. A clause called an attestation clause is generally written at the foot of the instrument as a declaration by the attesting witness that the instrument was signed or executed in his presence."

It is to be observed that in the dictionary, it is stated categorically that "the term is now exclusively applied to the signature or execution of a document." The dictionaries of the English language, in contrast with legal dictionaries, give the more general meaning of the word "attest" first. The NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY gives the meaning first, "To bear witness to, affirm the truth or genuineness of; to testify, certify"; and there is added this: "formally (a) by signature, (b) by oath." So that, on the face of it, at any rate, there seems to be nothing against the proposition that a reasonable construction of the word "attest," when applied to a document, necessarily involves, or, at any rate, includes, a reference to writing. I do not propose to refer to any other of the dictionaries.

I have been referred by counsel for the applicants to two statutes. One is the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, s. 10, which provides:

"The execution of every bill of sale by the grantor shall be attested by one or more credible witness or witnesses, not being a party or parties thereto ..."

The form of a bill of sale is set out in the schedule to the Act, at the foot of which appears the words

"In witness, &c. Signed and sealed by the said A.B. in the presence of me E.F. [add witness' name, address, and description]."

It is clear that in that Act, at any rate, the word "attest" is used as including the act of writing. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 694, leads one to the same conclusion.

In the third place, having referred me to dictionaries and Acts of Parliament, the applicants referred me to occasions when judicial reference has been made to "attestation." Examples were given of the use of the word by judges as showing quite clearly that they were using the word "attestation" as including writing. One case to which I was referred was Burdett v. Spilsbury (1), which was heard in the House of Lords in 1843. I need not refer to the facts of the particular case, but the language of LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.; and also that of LORD CAMPBELL, I think, supports the applicants' argument. Referring to some old cases which were under review, LORD CAMPBELL said (10 Cl. & Fin. 416):

"But in those cases there is not a mere simple attestation by witnesses, that is, the subscription of their names, but there is an imperfect history of the transaction."

He is there using the words "attestation" and "subscription" as if they were synonymous. He also said (ibid., 417):

"The very common expression we have, of 'attesting witness' to a deed, explains this. What is the meaning of an attesting witness to a deed? Why it is a witness who has seen the deed executed, and who signs it as a witness. He is a good attesting witness, although there should not be upon the deed itself, a memorandum saying that it is signed, sealed, and delivered in his presence."

After the conclusion of the speeches, LORD LYNTHURST added a few more words (ibid.):

"The party who sees the will executed is in fact a witness to it; if he subscribes as a witness, he is then an attesting witness."

Turning to a case very slightly later in date, In the Goods of Thomson (2), one finds SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST using parallel language. He said (4 Notes of Cases 644):

"... when a paper is produced by a testator to witnesses with his name signed thereto, and they have an opportunity of seeing his name, and they attest the same by subscribing the paper, they being present at the same time, this is a sufficient acknowledgment of his signature ..."

SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST cannot be accused of using language loosely, and he refers to attestation by subscription. Similar language was used by SIR JAMES HANNEN in In the Goods of Maddock (3) and LORD PENZANCE in In the Goods of Sharman (4). I have been referred to several instances, but I do not think it necessary to make any reference to the judgments.

Counsel who has assisted the court on behalf of the Attorney-General has been unable to find any case which supports the contrary view, and, so far as I am aware, there is none. If the word "attest" in its ordinary meaning is sufficiently wide in connection with a document such as a will to include the word "subscribe," this attestation clause is sufficient, and I base my conclusion that it is so sufficient on that, and I think it is unnecessary to go further. It has been argued that the attestation clause, coupled with the position of the names on the document, is sufficient of itself to produce the required effect, so that the presumption can be called into play having regard to the language of the rule. I prefer to base my opinion on the first ground. It has also been said that the argument for the applicants ought to be accepted because there is a long-standing practice which supports the validity or sufficiency of this particular clause. There again, I prefer not to rest my judgment on that ground, because, although there may be such a practice, there is no evidence before me except that of the solicitors, which, of course, I treat with respect, but which only applies to their particular firm, and naturally does not extend over a wider field. On the first ground put by the applicants, namely, that the word "attest" is wide enough to cover the word "subscribe," I think that this attestation clause is sufficient, and I make the declaration asked for.

Gaming—Deed executed for illegal consideration—Betting debt secured by deed of charge—Covenant to repay—Claim to repayment under bare covenant—Gaming Act, 1835 (c. 41), s. 1—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A.

A By a deed of charge, dated July 16, 1948, the defendant, described therein as “the borrower,” covenanted with the plaintiffs, a firm of bookmakers, described therein as “the lender,” to pay on June 30, 1949, the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d., which represented the amount of the defendant’s losses to the plaintiffs as a result of betting transactions. On Nov. 10, 1949, the plaintiffs took out an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, claiming the payment of all moneys due to them under the deed of charge. The defence being raised that the document in question was a security given for money won by gaming and, under the Gaming Act, 1835, s. 1, was to be deemed to have been executed for an illegal consideration, the plaintiffs sought to maintain that the covenant to repay was severable from the charge and that they were entitled to recover as bare covenantees.

C HELD: (i) it was not open to a party seeking, under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, to recover payment of moneys secured by a mortgage or charge, to claim at the hearing that the moneys were payable only under a bare covenant.

D (ii) it was open to the court to look behind the false recitals in the deed, and the document, which must be treated as a single whole, was executed for an illegal consideration and was void.

F ORIGINATING SUMMONS issued under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, for the payment of all moneys due to the plaintiffs under a deed of charge, dated July 16, 1948, and made between the defendant, of the one part, and the plaintiffs, of the other part.

G The deed recited, inter alia, that the defendant was justly and truly indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. for value received as the defendant thereby acknowledged and admitted, and the defendant covenanted with the plaintiffs that he would, on June 30, 1949, pay to the plaintiffs the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. An affidavit, sworn by the defendant on Jan. 7, 1950, contained the following statements:

H “(i) The plaintiffs are bookmakers. By July 16, 1948, as the result of bets with the plaintiffs on horse-racing my losses amounted to £7,451 19s. 1d., and on that date, in response to pressure from the plaintiffs, I signed the document dated July 16, 1948 . . . . . Clauses 1 and 2 of such deed read: ‘1. The borrower hereby covenants with the lender that the borrower will, on June 30, 1949, pay to the lender the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. 2. As security for the payment hereinbefore covenanted to be made the borrower hereby charges with payment to the lender of the said sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. the shares specified in the schedule hereto.’ (ii) Accordingly, the document in question is a security given for money won by gaming and by reason of the Gaming Acts, 1710, 1835, and 1845, was executed for an illegal consideration, alternatively for no consideration. (iii) I am advised and verily believe that I am entitled in the circumstances to an order that the said document and shares be delivered up to me forthwith and I claim accordingly such relief and any further relief which to this Honourable Court may seem fit and the costs of these proceedings."

The facts and the relevant section of the Gaming Act, 1835, are set out in the judgment.

ROXBURGH, J. : By a deed dated July 16, 1948, and made between Charles Gustavus Hofman, of the one part, and William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., of the other part, it is recited:

"Whereas (1) the borrower is justly and truly indebted to the lender in the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. for value received as the borrower hereby acknowledges and admits (2) the borrower has deposited with the lender the shares in the company known as the Hofman Tool and Engineering Co., Ltd., more particularly specified in the schedule hereto as security for the payment of the said sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. and has agreed to enter into these presents in the manner hereinafter appearing Now this deed witnesseth as follows:—1. The borrower hereby covenants with the lender that the borrower will on June 30, 1949, pay to the lender the sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. 2. As security for the payment hereinbefore covenanted to be made the borrower hereby charges with payment to the lender of the said sum of £7,451 19s. 1d. the shares specified in the schedule hereto."

On Nov. 10, 1949, William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., took out this summons:

D

"Let Charles Gustavus Hofman (the borrower under the charge hereinafter mentioned) within eight days . . . cause an appearance to be entered for him to this summons which is issued upon the application of William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., whose registered office is situate at 225/30 Piccadilly (the lender under the charge hereinafter mentioned), for the following relief: payment of all moneys due to the plaintiff company under a deed of charge dated July 16, 1948, and made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff company of the other part."

E

That summons was admittedly issued in reliance on R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, which provides:

"Any mortgagee or mortgagor, whether legal or equitable or any person entitled to or having property subject to a legal or equitable charge, or any person having the right to foreclose or redeem any mortgage, whether legal or equitable, may take out as of course an originating summons, returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division, for such relief of the nature or kind following as may by the summons be specified, and as the circumstances of the case may require; that is to say—Payment of moneys secured by the mortgage or charge . . ."

F

G

Pausing there, it is plain to my mind that this application was intended to be an application by a mortgagee or chargee for payment of moneys secured by a mortgage or charge, and plainly the defendant so understood it because, on Jan. 7, 1950, he swore an affidavit to this effect and the facts in this affidavit are not in dispute. The word "pressure" in the affidavit is to be treated as referring to lawful pressure. The affidavit states:

H

"(i) The plaintiffs are bookmakers. By July 16, 1948, as the result of bets with the plaintiffs on horse-racing my losses amounted to £7,451 19s. 1d. and on that date, in response to pressure from the plaintiffs, I signed the document dated July 16, 1948."

The defendant then sets out portions of the deed and continues:

"(ii) Accordingly, the document in question is a security given for money won by gaming and by reason of the Gaming Acts, 1710, 1835, and 1845, was executed for an illegal consideration, alternatively for no consideration. (iii) I am advised and verily believe that I am entitled in the circumstances to an order that the said document and shares be delivered up to me forthwith and I claim accordingly . . . relief . . ."

A There is no power to counterclaim under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, and, in so far as the defendant claims delivery up of the document, he is not entitled to that relief in these proceedings.

The nature of the defence, however, is made very clear by the affidavit. By s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1835:

B "... every note, bill, or mortgage which, if this Act had not been passed, would, by virtue of the said several lastly hereinbefore mentioned Acts or any of them, have been absolutely void shall be deemed . . . to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration . . ."

C I interpose to say that one of the Acts thereinbefore mentioned was the Gaming Act, 1710, and there can be no doubt that the document in question would have been absolutely void under s. 1 of that Act. The section continues:

D "... and the said several Acts shall have the same force and effect which they would respectively have had, if, instead of enacting that any such note, bill, or mortgage should be absolutely void, such Acts had respectively provided that every such note, bill, or mortgage should be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration . . ."

E Faced with that serious defence, counsel for the plaintiffs argues that, although it is said in the summons that the plaintiffs are the lenders under a deed of charge and although the proceedings are brought under a rule which is not available unless the plaintiffs claim to be mortgagees or chargees or persons akin to mortgagees or chargees, there is a covenant to pay this sum. The covenant, he says, is severable from the charge and the plaintiffs are really claiming as bare covenantees payment of the sum of money secured by a bare covenant. It seems to me that there are two answers to that argument. In the first place, it is not, I think, open to a person who elects to bring proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, on the footing that he is claiming payment of moneys secured by a mortgage or charge, to turn round at the hearing and say that he is claiming payment of moneys which are not secured by a mortgage or charge but are only payable under a naked covenant. That seems to me to be a fatal objection to this proceeding by originating summons.

G H I was minded at one time to stop there and say that that was enough to dispose of the case, but counsel for the plaintiffs pressed me to decide the further question. I am told, no doubt rightly, by counsel for the defendant that, notwithstanding that the Gaming Act, 1835, was passed one hundred and fifteen years ago, there is no authority on the point. In my judgment, when the Act of 1835 says: "every note, bill, or mortgage . . . shall be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed," it is referring to the instrument and not merely to one or other provision contained in the instrument. When it says "every note" it means, in my judgment, a document properly described as a note; when it says "every bill" it means, in my judgment, a document properly described as a bill; and when it says "every mortgage given or executed" it means, in my judgment, every instrument properly described as a mortgage which is given or executed. Therefore, in my view, this document, which is properly described as a mortgage, must be treated as a whole and must be deemed to have been executed for an illegal consideration.

It is open to me to look behind the false recital contained in the document and take note of what is admittedly the truth. I have done so, and it seems to me plain that the instrument was executed for an illegal consideration, and is, therefore, void. On that ground also this proceeding fails. I, accordingly, dismiss the summons with costs.

EATON v. COBB.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Jones, JJ.), March 31, 1950.]

Highway—Interruption of free passage—Cyclist struck by driver opening door of stationary motor car—"Wilful obstruction"—Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50), s. 72.

The appellant, who was the driver of a motor car opened the door on the off-side of the car while it was stationary and struck a cyclist who was passing. He was charged under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 72, which makes it an offence "in any way wilfully" to "obstruct the free passage of any . . . highway." The justices found that the appellant, before he opened the door, looked in the internal mirror reflecting the view through the rear window of the car, but did not see the cyclist who was hidden from his view by the car.

HELD: the essence of the offence charged was that the obstruction of the highway must be intentional; on the evidence the appellant had not "wilfully" obstructed the free passage of the highway; and, therefore, he was not liable to conviction.

[FOR THE HIGHWAY ACT, 1835, s. 72, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 77-81.]

CASE STATED by Ipswich justices.

The appellant, the driver of a motor car, was charged at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Ipswich on Sept. 26, 1949, with having obstructed "the free passage of a certain highway . . . by opening the off-side door of a motor car standing thereon, thereby impeding the progress of a motor cycle." For the appellant it was contended that as, before opening the door, he had looked in an internal mirror reflecting the view through the rear window and had not seen any vehicle approaching, and had thus been unaware that the cyclist was about to pass, he was not guilty of wilful obstruction. The appellant was convicted and fined £1.

Skelhorn for the appellant.

Boreham for the respondent.

HUMPHREYS, J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county borough of Ipswich who convicted the appellant of an offence which was charged in these terms,

" . . . for that he on Sept. 3, 1949, at Ipswich, in the county borough first aforesaid, wilfully did obstruct the free passage of a certain highway, there called Eagle Street, by opening the off-side door of a motor car standing thereon, thereby impeding the progress of a pedal cycle . . . "

The justices were of opinion that the appellant did wilfully obstruct the free passage of the highway. The facts which they found show that the appellant's motor car was

“ . . . on its correct side of the road when the appellant opened the off-side door very slowly and to an extent of not more than twelve inches; that when the appellant commenced to open the door of his car a passing cyclist . . . was by the off-side rear of and passing the stationary car and while doing so was struck by the edge of the opening door, was knocked down, and received injury to his lip; that the [cyclist] was riding a racing type of bicycle with his head down . . . ”

Since the cyclist had his head down, he did not see, as soon as he might have done otherwise, that the door was being opened. The justices also found “ . . . that prior to commencing to open the door of his car, the appellant looked in an internal mirror reflecting the view through the rear window, but did not see any vehicle approaching, and was not at any time prior to the door hitting the said cyclist aware that the cyclist was either about to pass or in the course of passing the said motor car.”

As I understand that finding, the justices intended to say that the appellant acted reasonably in looking in his mirror to see if there was anybody passing the motor car, and through no fault of his failed to see the person who was about to pass the car, but who was hidden by it. In other words, the justices found every possible fact indicating that there was nothing wilful, using the word in its ordinary sense, in the act of obstruction.

The question of law raised in this case is whether such an act amounts to wilful obstruction. In my opinion, “wilfully obstruct” in a statute which makes such obstruction a criminal offence means wilfully to obstruct. On the facts of this case there was no evidence on which the justices could come to the conclusion that the appellant wilfully obstructed the free passage of the highway. It is true that he wilfully opened the door, and, if it were an offence to open the off-side door of a motor car, he would have committed it, but the offence here is wilfully obstructing the free passage of a highway. That is made an offence by s. 72 of the Highway Act, 1835, a very long section in which a number of things is prohibited, all indicating that the test whether or not a person can be convicted of the offence of which the appellant has been convicted is whether or not the obstruction was intentional. In my view, there was no evidence on which the justices could say that the appellant wilfully obstructed the highway, and, therefore, the conviction ought to be quashed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree, and would only add that the offence does not depend on whether or not an accident takes place. If the justices were right, everybody who gets out on the off-side of his car would be committing an offence under s. 72 of the Act of 1835, and that cannot have been the intention of the section.

JONES, J.: I agree.

ASHER v. SEAFORD COURT ESTATE <sup>Applied.</sup> BECK v. NEWBO [1952] 2 All E.R. 412.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), February 15, 16, 20 and 21, April 27, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Permitted increase—Transfer of burden—Covenant by landlord to provide service previously supplied voluntarily—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3).

In 1935 a flat, which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, was let at a rent of £175 a year. The tenant undertook to pay the charges for electricity and gas and to keep the premises in repair, and the landlords undertook to pay the rates and taxes. In fact, the landlords kept the exterior of the premises in repair, maintained the supply of hot water for the flat, and kept clean and lighted the stairs to the flat which the tenant shared with the tenants of the other flats in the building. The flat was vacated by the tenant in 1939. On Sept. 29, 1943, the flat was let to the present tenant at a rent of £250 a year. The tenant undertook to keep the interior of the flat and the fittings in repair, and the landlords undertook to pay all outgoing, including gas and electricity, to keep the exterior in repair, to keep the common stairway of the building clean and light, and to provide the flat with hot water. At the time when the parties agreed to the terms of the lease of 1943, neither was aware of the terms of the earlier lease. In proceedings by the landlords to recover arrears of rent, the tenant contended that they were not entitled to claim more than the standard rent of the flat, viz., £175 a year, since between 1935 and 1939 they had voluntarily undertaken the services for which they were now legally responsible, and, therefore, there had been no transfer to them of a "burden or liability previously borne by the tenant" within the meaning of s. 2 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

HELD: (i) "liability" in s. 2 (3) meant legal liability; although, between 1935 and 1939 the landlords had effected the external repairs, the tenant was liable under his covenant to do those repairs; and so, under the agreement of 1943, the liability previously borne by him was transferred to the landlords within the meaning of the sub-section.

(ii) (LORD MACDERMOTT, dissenting), although, under the agreement of 1935, the tenant was not liable to provide hot water, he was under the practical necessity of doing so, and, therefore, the "burden" (which had a wider meaning than "liability") of doing so was one which had been "previously borne by the tenant" and had been transferred to the landlords under the agreement of 1943.

(iii) notwithstanding that the respondents had not consciously related the increase of rent to the assumption by them of a specific burden, nevertheless, the increase could properly be said to be "in respect of" the transfer of the burden within the meaning of s. 2 (3), and, therefore, the respondents were entitled to increase the rent by the value of the transferred burden.

(iv) accordingly, the landlords were entitled to increase the rent of the premises, and the case must be remitted to the county court to value the transferred burden and liability.

The provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts which require notice to be given of an increase of rent do not apply to increases under s. 2 (3).

C APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., ASQUITH and DENNING, L.JJ.), dated June 1, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 155, allowing the appeal of the respondents from an order of His Honour JUDGE DALE, made at Bloomsbury County Court on Dec. 14, 1948.

D By a lease, dated Sept. 29, 1943, the respondents let a flat to the appellant at a rent of £250. In proceedings by the respondents to recover £62 10s., being one quarter's rent payable on June 24, 1948, the appellant contended that the respondents were only entitled to rent at the rate of £175 a year, which was the standard rent of the flat, and he counterclaimed £68 15s. as rent overpaid. The respondents contended that by the lease of 1943 there was a transfer to them of burden or liabilities previously borne by the appellant, within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), and that, therefore, they were entitled to the extra rent. The county court judge held that the respondents were not entitled to increase the rent above the standard rent and that the appellant was entitled to recover the excess rent which he had paid. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and sent the case back for the county court judge to determine how much of the excess over the standard rent was fairly attributable to a transferred burden or liability.

E Heathcote-Williams, K.C., John Stephenson and Corley for the appellant.
Charles Henderson, K.C., James MacMillan and Michael Hoare for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.
 April 27. The following opinions were read.

G LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated June 1, 1949, setting aside a judgment of the learned county court judge in the Bloomsbury County Court, dated Dec. 14, 1948, and remitting the action to him. That judgment was given in favour of the appellant on the claim and for the sum of £68 15s. 0d. on a counterclaim for rent alleged to have been overpaid and to be recoverable under the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939.

H The respondents are the owners of a block of flats known as Seaford Court, No. 222, Great Portland Street, W.1., in the county of London, and the appellant is the statutory tenant of Flat No. 2 in that block. The flat was originally let by an agreement in writing of Sept. 23, 1935, made between the respondents' predecessors in title and one William Griffith Edwards, for a period of three years from Sept. 29, 1935, at a rent of £175 payable in advance quarterly. Its terms, so far as they are relevant to the matter now in dispute, may be tabulated as follows: (1) The tenant agreed (a) to pay the rent and to pay for all electricity and gas supplied to the premises; (b) to keep the premises in proper and sufficient and complete tenantable and decorative repair and condition (fair wear and tear and damage by fire excepted) and at the expiration or determination of the tenancy to deliver up the premises to the landlords in such repair and condition as aforesaid (except as aforesaid). (2) The landlords, by cl. 14, agreed to pay all rates and taxes in respect of the said premises except charges for electric light and gas. The tenant under this agreement held over after the expiry of the term of the lease until December, 1939, when he vacated the premises and the flat was then vacant until September, 1943. By a lease in writing made on Sept. 29, 1943, between the respondents and the appellant, the respondents let the flat to the appellant from Sept. 1, 1943, for the term of five years and twenty-eight days at a rent of £250 inclusive reducible to £175 per annum until three months after the cessation of hostilities between England and Germany, to be paid without any deduction (except for landlords' property tax) by equal quarterly payments in advance. Under this lease (1) the appellant covenanted: (a) by cl. 2 to keep the interior of the flat in good tenantable repair and condition together with all fixtures and fittings in and about the same and to deliver up the same at the end or sooner determination of the term in such good tenantable repair and condition (fair wear and tear and damage by accidental fire excepted); (b) by cl. 3 to abide by and conform to the general regulations contained in the schedule, i.e., to provide bins for the removal of the ordinary refuse of the flat, and to deposit the bins on the lift not later than 9 a.m. every day (except Sunday). (2) The respondents covenanted: (a) by cl. 1 during the said term to pay all existing and future rates, taxes, assessments, impositions and outgoings whatsoever for the time being payable in respect of the flat; (b) by cl. 2 at all times during the said term to keep the main walls and timbers, roof, drains, pipes and exterior of the said messuage and premises and the staircase, hall, lifts, passages and such other internal parts thereof as should from time to time be used by the landlords in common with the other tenants of the landlords in good and substantial repair and in clean and proper order and condition and properly lighted, and also will arrange for the removal of the ordinary domestic refuse of the flat in bins on every day except Sundays; (c) to provide and maintain a proper supply of hot water for the use of the flat, but not to be liable to the tenant for any failure in the supply of hot water that should happen from any cause not under their control. It is common ground (i) that the rateable value of the flat is and at all material times was £62 a year; (ii) that the flat is a dwelling house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, apply; (iii) that the standard rent of the flat is £175 a year; (iv) that while Mr. Edwards occupied the flat the respondents or their predecessors in title repaired the exterior of the flat, supplied hot water free of charge, and provided the other amenities now undertaken by the landlords under the terms of the later lease; (v) that the respondents either did not know of or had forgotten the existence of the lease of Sept. 23, 1935, when they entered into the lease of Sept. 29, 1943.

From this statement of facts it is apparent that the rent has been increased from the standard figure of £175 to £250 per annum, and the question for your Lordships' decision is whether the landlords were entitled to exact this or some other increase provided it leaves the terms on which the flat is held not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms. The question is governed by the provisions of s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920:

"Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased, and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act: Provided that, for the purposes of this section, the rent shall not be deemed to be increased where the liability for rates is transferred from the landlord to the tenant, if a corresponding reduction is made in the rent."

A

The learned county court judge held that the respondents were not entitled to make the increased demand, or, indeed, any increase. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and sent the case back in order that it might be determined what, if any, increase was justified.

B

The provisions of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 are plainly intended to keep the balance even between landlord and tenant. On the one hand, the landlord cannot increase the rent beyond the standard rent. If, however, that were the only limitation of his powers which the Act imposed he might increase the burden on the tenant by stipulating for terms more onerous than had been agreed in the tenancy by which the standard rent is calculated, provided he did not increase the rent. The earlier provisions of the sub-section are inserted to meet this danger. On the other hand, if the landlord and the original or any future tenant agree that the landlord shall undertake liabilities greater than those imposed by the former tenancy, the Act provides that the landlord shall be entitled to recoup himself for the additional amenities granted to the tenant by charging a higher rent without being deemed to increase it. If this statement of the purpose of s. 2 (3) of the Act is correct, as I think it is, it appears that a comparison must be made between the letting under which the standard rent is fixed and the letting which adds to or diminishes the rent to the tenant. The Court of Appeal so decided in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1), and, in my view, were right in so deciding. The question, therefore, for your Lordships' determination in the present case is whether the admitted increase of rent has been made in respect of a transfer to the respondents of any burden or liability previously borne by the appellant. If the terms of the two lettings are alone to be looked at, the landlord has manifestly undertaken certain liabilities or burdens for which he was not responsible under the earlier lease. Under that lease the tenant had been liable to keep the premises in proper and sufficient and complete tenantable and decorative repair, and to pay for all electricity and gas. Under the later lease the respondents became liable for the payment of the charges for electricity and gas, to do all external repairs, and to supply hot water. Some additional liability seems also to have been imposed on the landlord with regard to the removal of refuse and the cleaning and lighting of the portion of the premises used by the tenants of the flats in common. Nevertheless, it is said on behalf of the appellant that, though certain additional liabilities have been placed on the landlord, yet they have not been transferred from the tenant nor were they previously borne by him or his predecessor.

C

D

E

F

So far as the two main problems are concerned, namely, the outside repairs and provision of hot water, it is said on behalf of the appellant that the landlord, in fact, previously undertook these tasks and, therefore, they were not previously borne by the tenant. If the only question was what, in fact, had been done, there would be truth in this contention, but, in my view, the question is not who, in fact, executed the work, but who was liable to do it even though someone else actually performed it. Under the earlier lease the tenant was liable at least for the outside repairs of his own flat. Although the landlord may in the past have fulfilled that obligation it has to be borne in mind that at any moment he might have called on the tenant to perform his contractual duty, and it follows that the liability was always on the tenant though its performance was never, in fact, demanded. In these circumstances the burden was throughout his burden, and, in my opinion, previously borne by him, and so borne none the less though the landlord gratuitously performed it and had not insisted on the tenant carrying out his contractual obligations. To my mind, it stands very much in the same position as the right of a landlord, who has been charging a statutory tenant less than the standard rent, to increase it at any time and thereafter to recover the standard rent in full. The rights of the parties are not altered by a gratuitous forbearance on the part of the landlord. A

With regard to the hot water, however, the appellant has a further argument. Under the earlier lease the landlord, it is true, was under no liability to provide hot water, whereas under the new tenancy that provision is imposed on him, but it is maintained on the part of the appellant that no liability or burden was imposed on the tenant by either lease in this respect. A tenant, it is said, might under the earlier letting have provided hot water for himself, or, if he wished, have done without it. No doubt, the landlord had undertaken a fresh burden, but that burden had not been transferred from the tenant or previously borne by him. If the section has reference only to legal obligations, the argument presented on behalf of the tenant is a formidable one, but I suggest to your Lordships that the Court of Appeal were right in thinking that it was not so confined. In truth and in fact, in the case of premises of the character of those now under discussion a tenant would normally and naturally supply hot water himself if it were not supplied to him by his landlord. Indeed, the very fact that it is stipulated for in the lease is an indication of its practical requirement. Under the earlier tenancy, as the learned county court judge has determined, there was no obligation on the landlord to provide hot water. Now he is obliged to do so. I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that this is not accurately described as a transfer of a liability. Liability, in my opinion, has reference to legal obligations and legal obligations only, but the word "burden" has been super-added to "liability" and, as I think, embraces a wider meaning. The practical necessity of providing hot water, in my view, was a burden which the tenant had to bear under the old lease, and under the new his burden has been transferred to the landlord. Such an interpretation of the section, to my mind, follows both the wording and intention of the Act. It enables the landlord to add something to the standard rent without that addition being deemed to be an increase, just as the tenant on his part would be entitled to have the amount of his rent reduced if the landlord, after contracting under an earlier lease to supply hot water, were to be freed from that obligation by a later one. In such a case it could not, I think, be said that a fresh burden had not been imposed on the tenant because it was his choice whether he would supply himself with hot water or be content to do without it. B C D E F

One further argument was presented on behalf of the appellant. It was said that, as the respondents had forgotten or were ignorant of the earlier lease, the increase of rent was not made in respect of the transfer of any burden to them but was so made without consideration of the fact that any fresh burdens had been undertaken by them. My Lords, I do not think that this argument can prevail. In my view, the question is not what the landlord knew or intended, but what he was justified in doing by the terms of the Act. The rent, in my opinion, is increased by the landlord "in respect of" the transfer of a burden or liability where a greater burden or liability has been imposed on the landlord by the terms of a particular letting than was imposed on him by the terms of the letting under which the standard rent is ascertained. It is that change by which the increase of rent is justified and in respect of which it is rightly made. G H

For these reasons I think that the Court of Appeal were right in determining to send back the case for re-consideration by the learned county court judge. In so doing I do not attempt to determine what increase of rent is justified by the additional liabilities and burdens undertaken by the landlord. That is a

A question of fact which must be determined in the county court, presumably by a reference before the registrar. When that reference is held it will be for the court to determine what the monetary value is of the additional obligations of the landlord in respect of (i) repairs, (ii) amenities, and (iii) hot water. So far as your Lordships are concerned, I suggest that the proper order is that with these expressions of opinion in view the appeal be dismissed with costs and the action be remitted to the county court judge.

B LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and I shall say no more on any of the questions debated except that related to the supply of hot water to the appellant's flat. No recapitulation of the facts need be attempted, but in order that the limits of the issue should be defined, I would remind your Lordships that the appellant accepted without reserve the finding of the learned county court judge that there was under the old lease of Sept. 23, 1935, no contractual obligation binding the then landlord to supply hot water to the then tenant's flat and that it was not argued that the rent paid by the tenant under that lease covered a charge for the supply of the hot water.

C The issue turns on s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which has been read to your Lordships. ASQUITH, L.J., has stated the general effect of the sub-section in four propositions which were not challenged by either party and which are, in my respectful opinion, accurate. He says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 159):

D "In order to bring the increase of rent within the relevant part of the sub-section so that it can be 'deemed' not to be an unpermitted increase, the landlords must establish four propositions: (i) that 'the terms on which [the] dwelling-house is held, though changed, are 'not less favourable to the tenant'' than they were before the increase of rent; (ii) that the change in the terms is the 'result' of a 'transfer to [the] landlord of [a] burden or liability'; (iii) that this 'burden or liability' was before the transfer 'borne by the tenant'; (iv) that the increase in the rent is an increase 'in respect of [the] transfer' in question."

E The word "terms" gave rise to some discussion. I think that it means the legal rights and obligations of parties as determined by the provisions of the contract or by law. Among the terms are, I think, the rent. What the courts have to do is to weigh the whole terms of the old lease of Sept. 23, 1935, against F the whole terms of the new lease of Sept. 29, 1943. No increase of rent can be recovered unless on balance the terms of the new lease "are not less favourable to the tenant" than terms of the old lease, but the effect is not that, if the landlord has undertaken in the new lease a burden or liability borne by the tenant under the old lease but has added too much to the rent in respect of G the transferred burden or liability, he cannot recover any increase of rent. He can recover so much of the increase as represents the annual value of the transferred burden or liability. There are two stages in this procedure. First, the stage now reached where it has to be determined whether, apart from the rent, the conditions for some increase of rent are, apparently, satisfied, and, secondly, the stage where it has to be determined whether the increase of rent or any part of the increase is a fair assessment of the annual value of the transferred H burden or liability. If the increase is too large, the landlord cannot recover the excess, but he can recover the rest. So, at this stage, the rent in each lease can for the purpose of the comparison be ignored, and, if the landlord establishes that, on a comparison of the terms of the two leases (excluding the rents) the present lease is not less favourable to the appellant than was the lease of 1935 to the then tenant, and if he also establishes the other three propositions enunciated by ASQUITH, L.J., the case must go back to the county court which will then have the duty of valuing the transferred burden or liability and of determining whether the whole or what part, if any, of the increase of rent is unpermitted. In the present instance it is plain that the terms of the present lease (apart from the rent) are not less favourable to the appellant than were the terms of the 1935 lease (apart from the rent) to the then tenant, for no additional liability or burden except the increase of rent has been placed on the shoulders of the appellant. The real question is whether the respondents have established the remaining three propositions to which I now turn.

It is certain that the respondents have assumed under the new lease a legal liability to provide hot water which did not rest on the landlord under the old lease. It is also certain that there was no legal liability on the tenant under the old lease to provide himself with hot water. There was, therefore, no transfer to the landlord of a legal liability which was before the transfer borne by the tenant, but that does not end the matter. For, though I think that the word "liability" in the sub-section means "legal liability," I also think that the word "burden" is not pleonastic and that it has a looser meaning and a wider denotation than "liability." A liability is a burden, but a burden is not necessarily a liability. As soon, however, as one departs from strictly legal rights and obligations, it becomes difficult to define what "burden" connotes. To say that it must include some de facto inconvenience or disadvantage as well as legal liabilities is true, but inadequate. The Court of Appeal has held that "burden" may include "a thing which the tenant as such reasonably desires to have provided for his benefit and for the provision of which he has no legal right of recourse against anyone else": per LORD GREENE, M.R., ([1949] 2 All E.R. 157); or "the practical necessity . . . of providing a service for himself": per ASQUITH, L.J. (ibid., 160); or the burden "as a matter of practice" of providing something for himself: per DENNING, L.J. (ibid., 164). I do not reject any of these paraphrases of "burden," but I would with respect qualify them. There is a difference between what may be called the amenities which go with different dwelling-houses. This was a flat equipped for the supply of hot water. No landlord in 1935 could expect to find a tenant willing to occupy such a flat without the use of hot water, and the supply of hot water was a practical necessity. The landlord had control of the furnace, and it was necessarily he who must fuel and stoke it and carry out the required service. The only practical question was whether the landlord or the tenant was to pay for this. It is the cost of supplying the hot water which was the "burden," because it was a cost which both the landlord and the tenant of such a flat must have contemplated would as a matter of practical necessity be incurred, but the landlord, in fact, bore this cost during the currency of the old lease, and, therefore, it is said, it was not de facto a burden borne by the tenant under the old lease, nor was it de facto transferred to the landlord under the current lease, nor did the change in the terms result from a de facto transfer of burden since there was no de facto burden to transfer. This argument fails to satisfy me. The cost of supplying hot water was under the old lease a burden which lay on the tenant and was borne by him because he could call on no one else to bear it. The fact that the landlord bore it for him did not make it any the less the tenant's burden. On any day the landlord by his own volition could have ceased from heating the water unless the tenant agreed to pay the cost. I, therefore, demur to the description of the burden as a contingent burden, which describes, or, at any rate, suggests, a burden dependent on a casual event. The burden existed as a tenant's burden throughout the period when the landlord was, in fact, supplying the hot water and it was not merely a burden which would have come into existence if the landlord had stopped the supply. Counsel for the appellant said that, if a landlord, not being under liability to supply hot water, does so at his own cost, and then stops the supply for a day and insists on an increase of rent before renewing it and the tenant agrees, there might be a transfer of a burden, but, if the landlord, before stopping the supply, demands an increase of rent for the continuance of the supply and the tenant agrees, there is no transfer of the burden. That is the logical consequence of treating the burden as a burden arising only on the occurrence of a contingency, but it appears to me to result in a reductio ad absurdum. I would prefer to express no opinion about a burden contingent on the occurrence of a casual event, as in a case in which the landlord agrees to pay the cost of supplying hot water until the price of coal reaches a certain figure and in a subsequent lease agrees to supply hot water unconditionally.

A In such a case the substitution at the date of the new lease of a more economical system of heating than by coal, or even a continuous downward trend of the price of coal from the date of the old lease, might or might not be relevant to the question whether there was a transfer of burden. No question of that sort arises here and it is enough to say that a practically necessary service of the

B kind I have tried to describe, which the tenant cannot compel the landlord to bear, is still the tenant's burden though the landlord or a third party ex voluntate bears it for him. That burden was transferred to the landlord by the current lease, and the change in the terms on which the flat is held is the result of the transfer of that burden.

C It remains to ask whether the increase of rent is "in respect of" the transfer. The appellant's contention is that, since the parties were at the time when they entered into the new lease unaware of the terms of the old lease, the words "in respect of" are not satisfied. To this contention I respectfully adopt the answer of ASQUITH, L.J., which is, to my mind, conclusive. The conclusion that each of the four propositions laid down by ASQUITH, L.J., has been

D satisfied seems to me in accordance with good sense, and to preserve that equilibrium which SCOTT, L.J., in a case to be mentioned presently held was the purpose of the sub-section. The appellant's argument would have the inequitable result that a statutory tenant in the like position with the appellant's would pay no more than the rent due under the old lease and yet he would be entitled to hold the landlord to his obligation to supply the hot water.

E This is the effect of s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920 where the words "original contract of tenancy" refer to the contract by which the statutory tenant was holding before he became a statutory tenant, as was held by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Regional Properties, Ltd. v. Oxley (2). This construction was accepted when that case came before this House on appeal. Consistently with this construction, the Court of Appeal decided that when a tenancy agreement provides that the F landlord shall supply hot water to the tenant of a flat, the tenant on becoming a statutory tenant is entitled to the benefit of the obligation. Engvall v. Ideal Flats, Ltd. (3).

The view which I have formed is, I think, supported by Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1), and is, at least, not inconsistent with Property Holding Co. v. Clark (4). In Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1) the terms of the first

G lease included a full repairing covenant by the tenant. The terms of the contrasting and later lease included a tenant's undertaking to do repairs, fair wear and tear excepted. The Court of Appeal held that though there was no undertaking by the landlord in the later lease to carry out fair wear and tear repairs, there was, nevertheless, a transfer of a burden from tenant to landlord, for if a tenant ceases to be liable for repairs the property will lose value unless

H the landlord does the repairs. SCOTT, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 109):

"I think the sub-section creates certain rights for redressing an unfair alteration of the equilibrium which underlies the legislative perpetuation of the standard rent. The language of the sub-section is pointedly free from limiting restrictions. 'Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability . . . shall be treated as an alteration of rent' and the increase of burden is treated as a forbidden increase of the standard rent, and made recoverable from the landlord. So, on the other hand, an increase of rent to counterbalance a transfer of burden from the tenant to the landlord is made recoverable from the tenant. The language of the sub-section which contains this statutory recognition of the fundamental principle of equilibrium ought, in my opinion, to be liberally construed so as to give effect to that principle, if its words permit that construction, and I think they do. For these reasons I would construe the word 'transfer' as a synonym for 'shifting,' because the emphasis of the section is on the fact of a change in the equilibrium; it is the shifting of the burden that matters, not how or by whom it is brought about."

It was said by counsel for the appellant that there was no need in that case to apply a liberal construction of the sub-section because the express provisions of sub-s. (5), properly understood, fitted the case and made the argument for a liberal construction unnecessary. I think that the argument for the preservation of equilibrium between the landlord and the tenant by a reasonable construction of s. 2 (3) is none the less cogent and that it justifies a liberal construction of "burden" as well as of "transfer." The proper limits of construction are not exceeded where the words are ambiguous by giving them a meaning, if they are capable of bearing it, which, without creating the mischief of a new injustice, effects the intent of the statute as gathered from the other provisions and from the mischief which they purport to remedy. On this principle it is legitimate to construe "burden" and "transfer" so as to preserve the "equilibrium" which SCOTT, L.J., has described as the fundamental principle of the enactment.

In Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (4) the question whether a burden had been transferred arose under the first branch of s. 2 (3). I find no inconsistency between it and Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1). SCOTT, L.J., was a party to the decision and made no comment on Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1), though it was cited. It is referred to only by EVERSHED, L.J., and he cites it for the proposition that the words of the sub-section are to be generously construed. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of the case and all that need be said is that it is impossible to suppose that it was intended to question either the decision or the reasoning of SCOTT, L.J., in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1). The two cases have been reconciled by ASQUITH, L.J., in the present case and he was himself a party to the decision of Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (4).

In First National Housing Trust, Ltd. v. Chesterfield R.D.C. (5), the owner of a house appealed against a notice served on him by the local authority under s. 75 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, requiring him to provide for a house let by him a covered dustbin of a certain size, weight and construction. The court of summary jurisdiction held that the requirement was unreasonable and allowed the appeal. An appeal was then taken to the Divisional Court where it was argued for the local authority that the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction contravened s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, by transferring to the tenant a burden previously borne by the landlord. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held ([1948] 2 All E.R. 661) that that was not so because "burden" in the sub-section meant a contractual burden. DENNING, J., agreed and said (ibid.):

"In my opinion, the words 'burden or liability' in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), refer to a burden or liability imposed by a contractual term or a term imported by statute, such as in s. 2 (5). They do not refer at all to, or affect, the landlord's power to discontinue a privilege, a facility or a benefit which the tenant has previously enjoyed so long as it is not part of the terms on which the tenant holds."

These observations are contradictory of the construction of "burden" by the Court of Appeal in the present case. Neither Miller's case (1) nor Clark's case (4) were cited. In my opinion, the observations of LORD GODDARD, C.J., and DENNING, J., should be disapproved. It is not a necessary consequence that First National Housing Trust, Ltd v. Chesterfield R.D.C. (5) should be held to have been wrongly decided, for there was an alternative ground of judgment that the court of summary jurisdiction had not placed any burden on the tenant because, in fact, it had not decided that the tenant must bear the expense of providing the bin.

I think that this appeal must be dismissed subject to a modification of the order of the Court of Appeal so that the county court judge may clearly understand what matters he is directed to consider.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, the second limb of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 provides as follows:

“ . . . and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act.”

In this sub-section I think the words “in respect of” must be read as equivalent to “attributable to” and not as signifying that the landlord has consciously related the increase of rent, or some part of it, to the assumption by him of a specific burden or liability. To hold otherwise would, in effect, be to restrict the operation of the sub-section to cases where the landlord is aware of the terms of the tenancy with reference to which the standard rent is fixed, and I cannot read the sub-section as thus limited. As ASQUITH, L.J., observes ([1949] 2 All E.R. 163) “‘in respect of’ is a very comprehensive expression” and I do not think this construction does violence to the language of the enactment. As for the word “transfer” I agree with the view expressed by SCOTT, L.J., in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (1) when he says ([1944] 2 All E.R. 109):

“I would construe the word ‘transfer’ as a synonym for ‘shifting,’ because the emphasis of the section is on the fact of a change in the equilibrium; it is the shifting of the burden that matters, not how or by whom it is brought about.”

The expression “burden or liability,” as used in the sub-section, is apt to embrace more than the word “liability.” It, I think, must connote a legal liability, an obligation enforceable by someone other than the person subject to it. “Burden,” on the other hand, is a word of broader meaning, capable, indeed, of describing various liabilities, but extending beyond this to include what has to be done or provided voluntarily by the landlord or tenant himself for the reasonable protection or enjoyment of his interest in the premises. There is, however, one qualification of this meaning of “burden” which, in my opinion, the context necessitates. The word “terms” in the sub-section must, I think, mean—as in s. 15 (1)—the terms of the contract of tenancy, either expressed or implied, but if a burden which never becomes a liability shifts from tenant to landlord, or from landlord to tenant, the terms of the tenancies which fall to be compared will not be affected “as the result of such transfer” and the sub-section will not apply thereto. It, therefore, seems that a “burden” within the sub-section must be one which in the course of transfer either starts or ends as a liability. This is not to say that “burden” and “liability” come to the same thing for the purposes of this enactment. For example, if the tenant of the first tenancy supplies his own hot water, there being no duty on either him or his landlord to do so, and the landlord of the second tenancy covenants to perform this service, then, as I understand the sub-section, there has been the transfer of a burden but not of a liability.

These considerations suffice to dispose of the appeal in so far as it relates to the repair or maintenance of the flat. By cl. 2 of the lease of 1935 the tenant agreed to keep the demised premises "in proper sufficient and complete tenable and decorative repair and condition." By the lease of 1943 the appellant, as tenant, agreed to keep the interior of the premises "in good tenable repair and condition together with all fixtures and fittings in or about the same" and the respondents, as landlords, agreed to keep "the main walls and timbers roof drains pipes and exterior of the said messuage and premises . . . in good and substantial repair . . ." This last covenant relates to the building of which the flat in question forms a part, but it seems necessarily to place on the landlords a liability in respect of the external or structural maintenance of the demised premises which under the earlier lease was on the tenant. Was this, then, a "liability previously borne by the tenant" if, as would appear to be the fact, the previous tenant did not do these repairs? I think it was as, in speaking of a liability in respect of a past period, the person who was subject to it may well be said to have borne it irrespective of whether he had to do or pay anything because of it. There has thus been a transfer within the meaning of the sub-section to the respondents of a certain liability in respect of repairs. The county court judge will have to put a value on this and determine how much of the excess of £75 over the standard rent may fairly be attributed to it.

By cl. 14 of the 1935 lease the then landlords agreed to pay "all rates and taxes" in respect of the demised premises except charges for electric light and gas. By their first covenant in the 1943 lease the respondents, as landlords, agreed to pay, in respect of the same premises "all existing and future rates taxes charges assessments impositions and outgoings whatsoever." In terms this is a wider obligation, but there is nothing in the case to show what charges, assessments, impositions, and outgoings other than "rates and taxes" the tenant was in law liable to pay during the period of the earlier lease. If he was under any liability in this respect, then there has been a transfer of that liability within the meaning of the sub-section and the county court judge will have to determine how much of the excess of £75 ought to be attributed thereto, but an increase of rent cannot be justified under the sub-section by mere verbiage, and I think the first step for the county court judge to take in regard to this item will be to ascertain whether any liability of this nature previously rested on the tenant.

The matters remaining for consideration relate to the respondents' obligations under the 1943 lease to provide (a) for a supply of hot water, and (b) for the removal of refuse. I need not refer in any detail to the latter. The facts regarding it are extremely scant and counsel for the respondents conceded that he could not bring (b) within the sub-section unless he was entitled to apply it to (a). The facts relating to the provision of a supply of hot water for the demised premises are as follows. During the earlier tenancy the landlords supplied the flat with hot water. The 1935 lease makes no mention of this service and the county court judge has found that the landlords were under no contractual liability regarding it. Then, as now, the flat was let as a private residence and I think it must be assumed that this service was of value to the tenant. In the 1943 lease the respondents, as landlords, covenanted in these terms:

" . . . and also will provide and maintain a proper supply of hot water for the use of the flat but the landlords shall not be liable to the tenant for any failure in the supply of hot water that may happen from any cause not under their control."

The respondents have thus assumed an obligation which rested on neither of the parties to the earlier lease. There has not, therefore, been any transfer of a liability, and the question which arises and must now be determined is whether there has been a transfer of a burden within the meaning of the sub-section.

My Lords, had the tenant himself supplied this service during the earlier tenancy I think the sub-section would, undoubtedly, apply if the views I have already expressed regarding its construction are correct. In such case, a burden previously borne by the tenant would have shifted from him so as to fall on the landlord as a liability and make the terms of the respective tenancies different in a material respect, and, in my opinion, the same result would follow if the tenant, being left to perform the service for himself, had chosen to do without it, for in the case of a burden which is not a liability and which connotes what a tenant would need to do for the reasonable enjoyment of his premises, I think the words "any burden . . . previously borne by the tenant" must be applied on an assumption of normal habit, otherwise the eccentric who, for example, prefers cold water for all domestic purposes, might gain a privileged position under the sub-section for himself and his successors by reason only of his eccentricity. These considerations, however, do not touch the present position. The problem here is whether the words just quoted can be said to apply where the landlord, and not the tenant, has, in fact, previously borne the day to day burden of performing the service in question. The difficulty, as I see it, lies not so much in what the word "burden" may import when regarded alone, as in the scope to be ascribed to the crucial phrase in which it occurs and, in particular, the degree of significance to be attached to the word "borne." Can it be said that the tenant under the earlier lease bore the burden of supplying hot water which the respondents have now assumed as a contractual obligation? I do not think it can unless the words "previously borne by the tenant" are to be read in a special sense which is certainly not their natural meaning. The view taken by the Court of Appeal was that, as the landlords in the 1935 lease were under no obligation to continue the supply of hot water, the tenant might at any time have had to supply it for himself, and was, therefore, bearing what was called a contingent burden in respect of that service, and that, it was held, had been transferred to the respondents by the 1943 lease. On this construction of the sub-section the result in this case would be the same whether it was the previous tenant or the previous landlords who in point of fact had provided a supply of hot water, for in either case a "burden . . . previously borne by the tenant" would have shifted to the respondents. I think an interpretation which makes these words do this double duty and apply to two so completely different situations cannot be accepted as the intention of the legislature, unless for some very compelling reason to be derived from the nature and content of the whole legislation. The primary objection to this construction, however, remains the difficulty of reconciling it with the language of the sub-section, which seems to demand an inquiry as to how transferred burdens which were not liabilities have actually been borne in the past. In the common usage of language a contingent burden in this sense cannot well be borne until the contingency happens. It is contingent because it is not, and may never have to be, borne. DENNING, L.J., indeed, recognises the difficulty for he says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 164):

"I confess that, according to the ordinary meaning of the word 'burden,' the tenant was under no burden previously to provide hot water."

Later he adds:

"I cannot help feeling that the legislature had not specifically in mind a contingent burden such as we have here. If it had, would it not have put it on the same footing as an actual burden? I think it would."

My Lords, I cannot but think that the principles applicable to the interpretation of statutes as enunciated in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., and followed by him in reaching this conclusion are stated rather widely. If, however, I were satisfied that this legislation, when considered in its entirety, manifested an intention which necessitated reading "burden . . . borne" as including a burden which would have had to be borne had an event occurred which in fact never took place, then I would be prepared to agree in the result, but I am unable to discover such an intention. It cannot be found merely in the undoubted increase in the cost of providing services, for the policy of the legislature was, I think, clearly to stabilise rents, within certain limits, at the expense of landlords faced with mounting charges. Nor, with the word "burden" appearing in both limbs of the sub-section as well as "liability," can it be assumed that Parliament was only concerned with the legal responsibilities of those who were landlords and tenants when the rents, later to become the standard rents, were agreed. It is, no doubt, true that, if the appellant is correct in his submissions, he will have obtained without additional payment the right to demand a service costing the respondents more than it cost the previous landlords. On the other hand, the intention to base the permitted rent on what had been negotiated in a free market is plain, and the legislature may well have assumed that a landlord who was content, in the absence of restrictions, to render his tenant a particular service voluntarily and at his own cost had calculated the rent on that basis and with his own expenditure in mind. Such an assumption would, I think, reflect the reality of the situation in instances such as the present, for it can hardly be doubted that residential flats in a building equipped for the supply of hot water on a communal system and owned by a landlord who in practice supplied hot water would command better rents in a free market than they would if not so equipped, or if the landlord was not in fact ready and willing to use the equipment for the benefit of his tenants.

There is, therefore, some degree of hardship involved whichever of the rival contentions prevails. In one case the appellant gets a new right for nothing. In the other the respondents get an increase of rent on the basis of providing a service as though it had not been provided before, whereas, in fact, it was previously enjoyed by the tenant at the landlords' expense and may be taken as allowed for to some extent in the original rent. The legislature has provided no middle course applicable to this case, such as an increase of rent to cover increased charges, and there is no choice of construction open which will avoid all difficulty or maintain an exact equilibrium. On the whole, and judging from the language of the legislation, it seems to me the better view that the legislature attached importance to the de facto position respecting the previous tenancy and was not prepared to allow a landlord who had then been willing to shoulder a burden without obligation to improve his position by contracting to bear the same burden and thus gain an advantage over other property owners who had been content to bind themselves contractually throughout, but, however that may be, there is no greater certainty about the contrary view and the proper course in such circumstances is, in my opinion, to give effect to the natural meaning of the relevant words and to hold that the burden which was previously borne in fact by the landlords was not a "burden . . . previously borne by the tenant."

For these reasons I would affirm the order of the Court of Appeal, but subject to the exclusion therefrom of any reference back in respect of the respondents' obligations as to the supply of hot water and the removal of refuse.

LORD REID: My Lords, the respondents own a block of flats in Great Portland Street, London. One of these flats is occupied by the appellant. It is a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts. This flat was not subject to rent control immediately before the passing of the Act of 1939, but, as its rateable value did not exceed £100, s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1939 applied to it. It was then let for a rent of £175 which is, therefore, the standard rent. After standing empty for some years the flat was let to the appellant for five years from Sept. 29, 1943, for a rent of £250. There are also other terms of the lease to the appellant which do not correspond with those of the earlier lease. The respondents' obligations are more onerous and the appellant's less onerous than were the landlords' and tenant's obligations in the lease current in 1939. This appeal turns on the question whether and to what extent the respondents are entitled on that account to charge more than the standard rent.

The Rent Acts do not prevent a landlord who lets his house to a new tenant from undertaking different obligations from those undertaken by him in the lease which determined the standard rent. This lease may have imposed onerous obligations on the landlord with the result that the rent was high.

Apart from s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 there is nothing in the Acts to prevent the landlord from making a valid bargain with a new tenant under which the tenant pays the full standard rent but does not get the favourable conditions contained in the last tenant's lease. Conversely, the lease which determined the standard rent may have imposed onerous obligations on the tenant with the result that the rent was low. The landlord could, of course, give a new tenant more favourable conditions, but, apart from s. 2 (3), he would not on that account be entitled to raise the rent. An agreement by the tenant to pay more in return for the alteration of terms would be unenforceable and money paid under such an agreement would be recoverable. Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 goes some way to remove these difficulties. It does not apply to every case where the terms of a new lease are more favourable or are less favourable to the tenant than were the old terms, but it does provide for those cases where the tenant is in a more or a less favourable position as a result of the transfer to the landlord or tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant or landlord. In the former case an increase of rent in respect of such transfer is permitted. In the latter case the rent must be reduced.

The most important question in this case arises out of the supply of hot water. There was in 1939, and there still is, in the block of flats a system of hot water pipes fed from a central boiler. Throughout the tenancy of the previous tenant of the appellant's flat the landlord maintained that system and supplied hot water to the flat, but he was under no obligation to do so. It is not disputed that the landlord would have been entitled at any time he chose to stop the supply. In fact, he chose to continue the supply and he made no charge for it. Under the appellant's lease the landlord is now bound to provide and maintain a proper supply of hot water. In this respect the terms on which the flat is now held are undoubtedly more favourable to the tenant than they were before, and that by reason of a new obligation now borne by the landlord. So far, the requirements of s. 2 (3) are satisfied, but that is not enough. There can be no increase of rent unless the benefit to the tenant is the result of a transfer of a burden or liability previously borne by him. There was in 1939 no liability or legal obligation on the tenant to provide hot water for himself. There could not be as a man cannot be under a legal obligation to himself, but it is admitted that, in a flat of this character, a supply of hot water was a practical necessity. Someone had to incur the trouble and expense necessary to provide it. So, if burden is synonymous with liability there was neither burden nor liability on anyone in 1939, but, if burden is an apt word to denote the cost of supplying a practical necessity, then there certainly was a burden on someone. It is generally to be assumed that if the legislature adds one word to another it does not intend both to mean the same thing. There may, of course, be some reason for holding that the two words are synonymous, but here I think that everything points to the word "burden" being intended to have a wider meaning than "liability." It is not readily to be assumed that the legislature meant that a landlord could charge for undertaking to do something which the tenant was previously bound by law to do, but could not charge for undertaking to do something which the tenant was previously bound by necessity to do. I think that the meaning of "burden" is such that the landlord is entitled to charge in the one case as he is in the other, and that the supply of hot water was a burden on someone.

The more difficult question is to determine by whom the burden was borne during the previous tenancy. It was the tenant's burden in the sense that he had to shoulder it except in so far as someone else was kind enough to bear it for him, but, in fact, someone else did bear it for him throughout the tenancy. The statute requires that there shall be a "burden or liability previously borne by the tenant." If someone else were gratuitously to discharge a continuing liability which legally fell on the tenant, it might not be so difficult to hold that, nevertheless, the liability continued to be borne by the tenant. It is, I think, more difficult to reach that result if the word "burden" is taken by itself, but, taking the whole phrase, I have come to the conclusion, not without some hesitation, that a burden which someone else gratuitously bore for the tenant can be regarded as having been borne by the tenant if there is good reason for adopting that interpretation rather than the more natural and literal meaning. I think that there is good reason here because the literal meaning would lead to some strange results. To take one example, suppose that this landlord had decided during the last tenancy that he could no longer afford to carry the tenant's burden. If he had been high handed he could have cut off the hot water, allowed the tenant to carry the burden for a short time, and then agreed to resume the supply on payment of extra rent. There could then be no doubt that the burden was borne by the tenant before the extra rent was charged, and, therefore, to charge extra rent would be permissible. A reasonable landlord, however, would not have done that. He would have told the tenant that, unless he was paid for the hot water, he would have to cut it off. An agreement to pay extra rent would then be reached without the burden having, in fact, been transferred to the tenant's shoulders. On the literal interpretation of the words "previously borne by the tenant" that agreement would not comply with the requirements of s. 2 (3) and would not be valid. I do not think that one is driven to that result. I have come to the conclusion that the burden of supplying hot water can properly be regarded in this case as having been previously borne by the tenant. I have not discussed the authorities which were cited in argument as I do not think that the conclusion which I have reached is inconsistent with any of these decisions. I should add that there are two other matters of less importance with regard to which the terms of the appellant's lease also place him in a more favourable position than that of the previous tenant—obligations to repair and as to the disposal of refuse. I agree that they must also be taken into account.

There is one other argument that I should notice. The statute requires that the increase of rent shall be "in respect of" the transfer of burdens. In this case when the parties agreed to the terms of the appellant's lease, neither of them realised that there was a standard rent or know what were the terms of the previous lease. It is said that an increase of rent can only be "in respect of a transfer" if the parties when negotiating know the amount of the increase and what burdens are being transferred and accept the one as the counterpart of the other. It would be most unusual that the validity of an agreement should depend on what took place when it was being negotiated and I do not think that that is the meaning of this phrase. "In respect of" is not a phrase of very precise meaning and I do not think that it need have the meaning sought to be attributed to it. It was also argued that a notice giving particulars of the increase had to be given before the increase could take effect. It is true that ordinarily an increase of rent under the Acts must be preceded by such a notice, but s. 2 (3) enacts that an increase of rent in respect of a transfer of a burden or liability shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of the Act. Accordingly, those provisions of the Acts which require notice of increases of rent have no application to increases under s. 2 (3). I, therefore, think that if there has been a transfer of burdens and if the increase of rent is now found to be not more than the equivalent of this transfer, then the statute is satisfied and the increase is recoverable. In this case it has not yet been decided whether the increase of £75 is justifiable or is excessive.

A I agree that inquiry into this is necessary and that if it is found that the increase is excessive only that part of it which is justified is payable by the appellant.

E In October, 1946, H., an export and shipping merchant, agreed to sell goods to a Persian buyer. The price agreed on was not inclusive of insurance and freight, and the total amount shown on the invoice, which was ultimately rendered, set out the cost of packing, insurance and freight separately. On Nov. 8, 1946, H., without entering into a contract of carriage, registered cargo space for them through his forwarding agents in a ship in a dock in Manchester port and received a permit from the shipowners' loading brokers, F S. Ltd., to send the goods to the dock. On Nov. 19, 1946, having received shipping instructions from his forwarding agents, H. instructed C.E. Ltd., the company warehousing the goods, to pack them and despatch them to the ship. C.E. Ltd. negligently failed to despatch them or to inform H. of their failure. In ignorance of this failure, H. applied through his forwarding agents for, and received from S. Ltd., a bill of lading which G was negligently issued, the goods never having been received. On Jan. 2, 1947, H. forwarded it to the Persian buyer, and received payment. On Feb. 23, 1948, C.E. Ltd. wrote to H. notifying their failure to despatch the goods, and in November, 1949, H. paid £1,319 damages to the Persian buyer, covering loss of profit resulting from non-delivery. The fall in value of the goods from December, 1946, to February, 1948, the date of their ultimate delivery to H., with other small amounts, was £175. H. claimed H damages from S. Ltd. and C.E. Ltd.

HELD: (i) whether or not the contract with the Persian buyer could properly be called c.i.f., it was an essential term thereof that H. should procure the shipment of the goods to Teheran.

(ii) H. could not recover from S. Ltd. (a) for breach of a contractual duty because neither in issuing the bill of lading nor in notifying the reservation of shipping space were S. Ltd. acting or offering to act in contractual relationship with H. so as to give rise to any particular duty owing to him; (b) for breach of any duty owed to the public because the issue of the bill of lading seemed to amount to no more than a negligent misstatement, and, in any event, such issue was not itself the subject of any general duty (Le Lievre v. Gould ([1893] 1 Q.B. 491) and Scholfield v. Londesborough (Earl) ([1896] A.C. 514), applied); (c) for breach of warranty of authority because in the absence of a contract of carriage the bill of lading was a nullity, and the fact that it was issued without the authority of the shipowners robbed it of no virtue.

(iii) the instructions to C.E. Ltd. to despatch the goods were not a demand for delivery up of the goods, and, therefore, a claim in detinue against C.E. Ltd. could not be maintained.

(iv) the detention of the goods by C.E. Ltd. and their failure to inform H. of the whereabouts of the goods was a continuing breach of duty by C.E. Ltd., and while it was true that the issue of the bill of lading was a cause contributing equally to H.'s loss up to the time of the final delivery to him, the breach of contract by C.E. Ltd. was sufficient to carry judgment for damages in respect of the loss in that period.

Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Minister of War Transport ([1942] 2 All E.R. 6), considered.

(v) although a carrier should recognise the serious possibility of sub-sales by a consignor or consignee, in order to recover from C.E. Ltd. more than the value of the goods at the place of delivery, H. must show that C.E. Ltd. had knowledge, actual or imputed, of something that made the ordinary measure of damages inadequate, and, as H. had not shown such knowledge, it was unnecessary to consider whether the fact that the claim for additional damages was in respect of damages paid to a sub-buyer and not loss of profit would affect the question of the liability of C.E. Ltd.

G ACTION for damages for breach of contract against the first defendants, and for breach of contract, negligence and breach of warranty of authority against the second defendants.

The plaintiff was an export and shipping merchant who had become liable to a Persian firm for damages through his failure to ship goods to Teheran under a contract of sale and had paid £1,319 in settlement of the claim. He sought to make liable the first defendants, Continental Express, Ltd., who had warehoused the goods and had failed to carry out his instructions to despatch them to S.S. Mount Orford Park at No. 9 shed, No. 9 dock, port of Manchester, and had not notified him of their failure, and the second defendants, Frank C. Strick & Co., Ltd., the loading brokers of the shipowners, who had negligently prepared and issued a bill of lading in respect of the goods although they had never been received. The second defendants admitted negligence, but denied owing any duty to the plaintiff. The plaintiff contended that there was a contractual relationship between himself and the second defendants who, as loading brokers, had been guilty of a breach of duty under it; that the second defendants were also in breach of a duty owed to the public at large not to put into circulation false and worthless documents of title such as the bill of lading; and that they had been guilty of a breach of warranty of authority in issuing the bill of lading in reliance on which the plaintiff had acted to his detriment. The first defendants admitted the breach of contract, but pleaded that there had been no foreseeable loss consequential thereon, since the long delay in discovering the failure to ship the goods was due to novus actus interveniens in the issue of the bill of lading up to the date of which there had been no fall in the value of the goods. The plaintiff contended that the liability to the Persian buyer was foreseeable because the mere shipping of the goods to Teheran was sufficient to inform the company instructed to despatch them that they were for re-sale, and the failure to despatch was a sufficient cause of the loss. Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 3. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. In November, 1946, the plaintiff, an export and shipping merchant, wanted to ship from Manchester to the Persian Gulf three bales of poplin which he had sold to a Persian firm called Mishan. On Nov. 19, he instructed the first defendants, whom I shall refer to as Continental Express, in whose warehouse at Manchester the goods then were, to despatch them to S.S. Mount Orford Park at No. 9 shed, No. 9 dock, in the port of Manchester. Continental Express through their admitted negligence overlooked these instructions and the goods were not sent down to the dock. The Mount Orford Park was chartered to Strick Line, Ltd. The second defendants, whom I shall call "Strick," are an associated company of Strick Line, Ltd., and act as their managers and, at Manchester, as their loading brokers. They had allocated to the plaintiff cargo space for the three bales. By their admitted carelessness they issued, on Dec. 5, 1946, a bill of lading in respect of the bales notwithstanding that they were never received at the dock and were not shipped. The ship arrived in the Persian Gulf without the goods. Because of the bill of lading it was naturally assumed they had been shipped and either lost or misdelivered, and it was not until after prolonged search had been made that in March, 1948, it was discovered that they had never left the warehouse. Mishan then claimed a substantial sum from the plaintiff covering mainly the loss of profit he would have made on a re-sale of the goods; and the plaintiff paid him £1,319 to settle. He now claims against one or both of the two defendants. Continental Express admit liability for breach of contract and the main question so far as these defendants are concerned is the quantum of damage. Strick admit carelessness in the issue of the bill of lading, but deny that they owed any duty to the plaintiff, either in contract or in tort. Strick Line, Ltd., the shipowners, have not been sued because of the ordinary rule that the master or broker cannot bind the owner or principal by signing bills of lading for goods which were never shipped at all. Alternatively, therefore, Strick are sued for breach of warranty of authority. The main answer to this is that the breach of warranty has caused no damage, since, it is said, if the owner were liable on the bill of lading as warranted, the plaintiff would still have recovered nothing. D E F G H

The case against Strick has taken up the larger part of the trial and involves questions of principle and practice of some importance. I shall, therefore, take it first and begin by stating the general principles that are applicable and also the effect of the evidence I have received about the functions and duties of loading brokers.

A A contract of carriage is rarely made with any formality. Sometimes it is done by means of the engagement of shipping space, but in many cases the shipper, having learned from an advertisement or otherwise of a date and place of sailing, sends forward his goods and no contract is concluded until the goods are loaded or accepted for loading. The bill of lading is a receipt for the goods and document of title to them. It is not the contract, for that has already been made, but it usually—I suppose almost always when there is no charterparty—contains its terms. When a shipment is made, as in this case, by a regular line, there are usually agents on each side intervening between the shipper and the shipowner. The shipper frequently employs a forwarding agent and the shipowner a loading broker. The forwarding agent's normal duties are to ascertain the date and place of sailing, obtain a space allocation if that is required, and prepare the bill of lading. The different shipping lines have their own forms of bill of lading which can be obtained from stationers in the city, and it is the duty of the forwarding agent to put in the necessary particulars and to send the draft stamped to the loading broker. His duties include also arranging for the goods to be brought alongside, making the customs entry and paying any dues on the cargo. After shipment he collects the completed bill of lading and sends it to the shipper. All the regular shipping lines operating from the United Kingdom appear to entrust the business of arranging for cargo to a loading broker. He advertises the date of sailings in shipping papers or elsewhere, and generally prepares and circulates to his customers a sailing card. It is his business to supervise the arrangements for loading, though the actual stowage is decided on by the cargo superintendent, who is in the direct service of the shipowner. It is the broker's business also to sign the bill of lading, and issue it to the shipper or his agent in exchange for the freight. His remuneration is by way of commission on freight, and that is doubtless an inducement to him to carry out his primary function, at any rate when shipping is plentiful, of securing enough cargo to fill the ship. Under ordinary conditions shippers may send cargo to the quay without notifying the broker, though the broker much prefers to know of it, but during the war and in the post-war period this was impossible. The docks would have become cluttered up with cargo for which no room could be found. Therefore, there was introduced a registration system, which was still in force in 1946. The cargo could not be sent down to the docks unless the loading broker had been notified and his permission obtained in the appropriate form. The form is in two parts which are detachable. They have been called respectively the black form and the red form. The shipper or his agent sends both parts to the loading broker. After space has been allocated, the red form is sent back to the shipper with instructions about sending the cargo forward. The shipper then returns the red form to the loading broker accompanied by the draft bill of lading. The loading broker and the forwarding agent thus appear to discharge well-defined and separate functions, but in practice the same firm is often both the loading broker and the forwarding agent, though the two sets of dealings may be kept in separate compartments of the business. The firm generally acts as loading broker only for one line and does all that line's business, so that it is free in respect of other business to act as it will, but, even in the case of the same transaction, it appears to be customary for the firm to act both as loading broker and as forwarding agent. Strick did both, and that the practice is general is shown by the form of freight account that Strick use and which is similar to those of other firms. Items for preparing bills of lading, canal tolls, agency, customs clearance charges, etc., which all fall within the scope of forwarding agency, are added to the freight and collected as one sum.

I shall now set out the particular facts of this case. On Sept. 26, 1946, the plaintiff obtained a sample of poplin from Sasha & Co., Manchester merchants, which early in October he showed to a Mr. Senehi, a partner in the firm of Mishan, with whom the plaintiff had frequently done business before. The result was that a contract was made orally in Manchester early in October between the plaintiff and Mishan, whereby Mishan bought 6,105½ yards at 3s. 6d. per yard, making a total price of about £1,068. It was arranged that, in accordance with the usual course of business, the plaintiff should see to the packing and shipment of the goods to Teheran, make the necessary disbursements, insure the goods for a sum which was to be specified by Mishan when the amount of freight was ascertained, and charge for the whole on the invoice. He was then to receive payment against documents. The plaintiff says that this was a c.i.f. contract. Counsel for Strick contends that the contract was complete and that the property passed on the appropriation of the goods in Continental Express's warehouse, and that the shipment formed no part of it, but was a collateral arrangement. It is true that the price agreed on was not inclusive of insurance and freight, and that the total amount of £1,157 on the invoice that was ultimately rendered by the plaintiff sets out the cost of packing, insurance and freight separately. But I do not think that the transaction can fairly be split up into separate parts. The plaintiff received no separate remuneration as agent or otherwise for arranging the shipment. No demand for payment in respect of the goods themselves was made in October or November when, on counsel's view, the property passed. No invoice was rendered until Jan. 9, 1947, when it was sent with the bill of lading and other documents and payment was made against it. The fact that payment was made against documents, and not earlier or otherwise, is, in my judgment, an important factor. It is worth noting that the plaintiff took out the bill of lading in his own name. It would be unusual for a seller to part with property before he got payment; and unusual also for an importer into another country to make his bargain independently of shipment. I should expect both these parties to want a form of contract in which the plaintiff would be protected against the risk of parting with his property without payment and Mishan against the risk of having to pay for goods which he could not ship. Whether it can properly be labelled c.i.f. or not, I am satisfied that it was an essential term of this contract that the plaintiff should procure the shipment of the goods. A B C D E

On Oct. 22, the plaintiff bought from Sasha & Co. at the price of 3s. 2d. per yard the necessary quantity of poplin to fulfil his contract with Mishan and on Nov. 6 Sasha & Co. instructed Continental Express, in whose warehouse the goods were, to accept all instructions for the disposal of the goods from the plaintiff. On Nov. 7, the plaintiff wrote to Continental Express giving packing instructions and saying that he hoped to be able to give definite shipping instructions in a very short time, and also that the bales had been registered with his shipping agents for Teheran. On Nov. 8, the plaintiff addressed to his forwarding agents, Boyd Boyd, Ltd., of London, a consignment note requesting them to register for shipping space to Teheran three bales of cotton poplin. It will be observed that Boyd Boyd, Ltd.'s consignment note provides in the ordinary way for instructions to them to collect or receive the goods. It was presumably because the plaintiff intended to give shipping instructions to Continental Express direct that his instructions to Boyd Boyd, Ltd., were confined to registration for shipping space. This division of functions proved disastrous; if the same person had been made responsible both for delivering the goods alongside and for obtaining the bill of lading, the singular misfortune which overtook the venture could not have occurred. On Nov. 8, 1946, Boyd Boyd, Ltd., filled in the red and black forms. The red form used in this case has been lost. It must have been returned to Boyd Boyd, Ltd., probably about Nov. 18. It would have contained instructions to forward the cargo to S.S. Mount Orford Park loading at No. 9 shed, No. 9 dock, Salford, Manchester; and also instructions to see that all customs papers were in order, that bills F G H of lading should be lodged with the loading brokers and that "this permit" (that is the red form) should be attached to the bills of lading. Boyd Boyd, Ltd., accordingly, sent back the red form with the draft bill of lading. On Nov. 18, Boyd Boyd, Ltd., sent to the plaintiff shipping instructions, telling him to despatch the goods to No. 9 shed. Boyd Boyd, Ltd., had not at that time an office in Manchester, and so they arranged for Strick to pay certain canal tolls which had to be paid by the cargo owner and also to lodge the customs entry for them. On Nov. 19, the plaintiff wrote to Continental Express saying that he had obtained shipping space and instructing Continental Express to pack the goods and to despatch the poplin as soon as possible to S.S. Mount Orford Park at No. 9 shed. He gave similar instructions in respect of four cases of poplin which he had also bought. The instructions were carried out in relation to the cases, but in relation to the bales they were overlooked.

The way in which the bill of lading came to be issued was this. No. 9 shed is the property of the Manchester port authority, the Manchester Ship Canal Co. This company, whom I will call the dock-owners, are employed by the loading brokers to receive the cargo and check it, and their stevedores do the loading into the ship. In so employing them, Strick are acting for the ship, and the charge that is made by the dock-owners for loading, storing and receiving is a disbursement that is debited to the shipowner. The loading brokers have ready prepared in their office a cargo book, in which are entered all the consignments for which space on the ship has been allocated. As the cargo arrives at No. 9 shed the dock-owners' checker records the receipt of the goods on a receiving pad. The sheets are torn off and sent to the loading brokers and a circle is made round the number of each consignment in the cargo book that is noted as received. Bills of lading are then prepared in respect of these consignments, and as each bill of lading is passed a stroke in addition to the circle is made through the number. The bill of lading is then passed out for the freight to be calculated and for it to be signed by the responsible official as opportunity arises. It is then retained in the office until the ship has completed its loading. When the loading is finished there is prepared from the cargo left on the quay a list of goods shut out or shipment of which has been stopped. The bills of lading relating to the consignments on this list are taken out of the pile of signed bills, and the remainder are issued. There is also prepared by comparison between the receiving sheets and the cargo book a list of goods advised and not received: this is doubtless intended as a further check. The relevant entry in the cargo book in this case has been produced, and it shows that the plaintiff's consignment, numbered 44, has got no circle but has got a stroke. This means that someone prepared a bill of lading before he ought to have done, that is, before there was any notification that the goods had been received. This was the first error. The second error was that the bill of lading for consignment 44 was issued notwithstanding that consignment 44 was on the list of goods not received. On Dec. 30, 1946, Strick rendered a freight account to Boyd Boyd, Ltd., which included the small charges for the canal tolls and the customs clearance. Boyd Boyd, Ltd., paid it and got the bill of lading, which they sent with their account to the plaintiff on Jan. 2, 1947. On Jan. 9, 1947, the plaintiff sent the bill of lading and other documents to Mishan's bank and received payment. On Feb. 28, 1947, Mishan re-sold the poplin to Meir & Morteza, merchants in Teheran, at about 10s. 9d. a yard. Freight and insurance had added comparatively little to the cost and Mishan's profit was very high indeed. This was because there was at that time a great scarcity of these goods and a high demand in Teheran. The plaintiff was apparently exhorted by the British government not to attempt to make large profits on goods sold for export, so the profit fell to be made by Mishan. By the beginning of April, Mishan was already writing to the plaintiff inquiring about the non-delivery of the goods and asking that a claim should be made on underwriters. The plaintiff claimed on underwriters, but, as he notified Mishan on June 13, they refused to entertain the claim unless there was a letter from the ship stating that the goods were short-landed. On July 10, Strick & Co. (Bazra) Ltd., who were then handling the matter, confirmed that the bales were short-landed and said they were issuing tracers to all the ports where the ship had called. On Aug. 30, they said they could not issue a short-landed certificate until they had received replies. It was not until Nov. 5, 1947, that they confirmed that the bales could not be traced, and they then issued a short-landed certificate to Mishan. The underwriters to whom the claim had been presented then claimed on Strick who, on Feb. 6, 1948, said that they could find no record of the bales having been placed on board the steamer or even received at the docks. They asked for the receipt for their acceptance. Accordingly the plaintiff wrote on Feb. 17, 1948, to Continental Express asking for the receipt; and Continental Express wrote on Feb. 23, regretting that the instructions had been overlooked. The plaintiff endeavoured to get Mishan to take the poplin up, and made other unsuccessful attempts to dispose of it for export. Eventually, in 1949, he sold it in the home market at 3s. 4d. per yard. In November 1949, he settled Mishan's claim for loss of profit at £1,319.

I am now in a position to consider the legal issues raised by the claim against Strick, and I shall begin with the claim that they owed a duty to the plaintiff not to issue to him a bill of lading for unshipped goods. As I have said, this claim is put both in contract and in tort—that is to say, the duty is said to arise out of a contractual relationship existing between the plaintiff and Strick as loading brokers, and also to be a duty owed by Strick to the public at large not to put into circulation false and worthless documents of title. I shall consider first the alleged contractual relationship.

A firm which acts both as loading broker and forwarding agent in relation to the same transaction will, of course, owe duties to both sides, but it is not suggested that I need concern myself here with those small duties normally appertaining to forwarding agency which Strick in this case discharged, I suppose as sub-agents for Boyd Boyd, Ltd. What is suggested is that Strick in their capacity as loading brokers owed a duty to the plaintiff. Some sorts of brokers are, no doubt, middlemen who owe duties to both sides, but the duties of a loading broker, as I have set them out earlier in this judgment, seem to me of their nature to be undertaken solely for the shipowner. Evidence was called before me to establish that, by trade custom, a loading broker was regarded as acting solely for the shipowner. I do not think I need decide whether there is a trade usage in this matter. It is sufficient that the evidence affords strong confirmation of the inference that I am in any event prepared to draw from the nature of the duties as they have been described to me. In particular, I think that, in matters connected with the issue of a bill of lading, the broker is acting on behalf of the owner, for it is as the owner's agent and under his instructions and authority that he must issue or withhold the bill. It is said that the draft bill is the shipper's property and that he is entitled to have it back if the goods are not shipped; and that this leads to the conclusion that the broker must be the shipper's agent to return the bill if the goods are not shipped and under a duty to the shipper to do so. I do not think that this follows. The draft bill is, I think, sent to the broker as agent for the shipowner, so that the broker may, if the necessary conditions are fulfilled, complete and sign it on behalf of the shipowner. No doubt, anyone who sends a draft contract to the other side is entitled to have his draft back if the contract is not concluded, but that does not make the person to whom he sent it his agent. The point may be tested by leaving out intermediaries and assuming that the draft was sent direct by the shipper to the shipowner. I do not think it could be suggested that the shipowner would hold the document as the shipper's agent, or that the duty to return it if the contract was not concluded would be a duty arising out of agency, or that if, for example, the shipowner handed it to his clerk for custody, the clerk would become the agent of the shipper for any purpose. I think that the duty, whatever it may be, to return a draft bill of lading is a duty owed by the shipowner to the shipper and that he alone is responsible for the acts or omissions of the broker in relation to it.

The plaintiff relies on the return of the red form as fulfilling a double function.

- A It is, he says, a notification of shipping space, and as such is made by Strick as agents; it is also an offer to act as loading brokers, and as such, when accepted, brings the shipper into contractual relationship with the brokers as independent contractors. There is certainly not in the form any express offer to the shipper to act as loading brokers, and since the whole form is subscribed by Strick "as agents," I can see no justification for reading into it an offer to act in some
- B other capacity. Moreover, an offer to act as loading brokers is meaningless, unless there is some evidence (which in this case there is not) of some duty which by the nature of his calling a loading broker undertakes for a shipper. My attention was drawn to the clause on the back of the red form which provides that: "In the event of the goods being shut out or the steamer withdrawn, no liability whatsoever is accepted by Frank C. Strick & Co., Ltd.,
- C steamer, and/or agents": and it was argued that this was inconsistent with agency. If it were necessary for me to decide it, I should treat the signature "as agents" as being the dominant feature; and put the presence of the clause down to a layman's fears about the limits of an agent's liability rather than to an intention to alter the signatory's character. But in any event the clause would, I think, on the argument of counsel for the plaintiff relate to that part
- D of the form which is a notification of shipping space, and that is admittedly sent as agent.

A further way of putting the point makes it necessary to consider at what stage a contract of carriage would have been made in this case if events had taken their ordinary course. It has not been suggested that the red and black forms created any contract with the shipowner. As I have already noted, the

E contractual relationship suggested by the plaintiff is one between himself and the broker. Counsel for Strick, while submitting that it was unnecessary to determine the exact moment, said that in the ordinary course the contract would not have been made until the goods were received by the ship or put under her tackle. On this, the plaintiff submitted that since the handling from No. 9 shed was under the supervision of the loading brokers, they must owe a

- F duty to the shipper to see that the goods tendered were put on board, and correlative to that, to see that no bill of lading was issued until the goods were on board. In my view, the dock-owner who actually received the goods for shipment at No. 9 shed was the servant or agent of the shipowners to receive and handle them. He was paid for his services by the shipowners through their loading brokers, and, no doubt, the shipowners recouped themselves by
- G means of the freight. Accordingly, in the circumstances of this case, and assuming the engagement of cargo space to be non-contractual, I think that the contract of carriage would normally be made when the goods were delivered at No. 9 shed and accepted there by the ships' agents, and that there would be no need for the shipper to take any further steps: see British Columbia Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship (1), per BOVILL, C.J., and BYLES, J. (L.R. 3 C.P. 500, 502).
- H There is, therefore, no need to assume that in supervising the handling and loading of the goods the loading brokers were discharging any duty towards the shipper.

In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff has not established any contractual relationship with Strick giving rise to any particular duty owing to him. In putting forward the wider proposition that Strick owed a duty to the public not carelessly to circulate a document of title knowing it would be used as such, counsel for the plaintiff acknowledged the difficulty he encountered because of

Le Lievre v. Gould (2), and other similar decisions which make it plain that negligent mis-statement can never give rise to a cause of action. An attempt to have the rule reversed in the light of Donoghue v. Stevenson (3) failed in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Toplis & Harding & Russell (4). The rule has not earned the admiration of jurists. Counsel for the plaintiff submits that it ought to be applied sparingly, and not extended to the issuing of a document of title which is the doing of an act rather than the making of a statement. A bill of lading, which is in the popular sense a negotiable instrument, is a document on the accuracy of which much commerce may depend, and carelessness with regard to it is surely something, counsel argues, for which the law can find a remedy. On the commercial aspects of this argument, I shall say a word later. On the legal issues, my views are confined by the authorities. The reason why a bill of lading is a document of title is because it contains a statement by the master of a ship that he is in possession of cargo, and an undertaking to deliver it. It is not easy to see why carelessness in making this sort of statement should be distinguished from negligent mis-statement generally. In any event, I think that the authorities show that the issuing of a document of title or negotiable instrument is not of itself the subject of any general duty. Carelessness in the drawing of a bill of exchange has frequently been considered by the courts. A customer of a bank owes a duty to his bank in this respect, but it is a duty based on contract: see London Joint Stock Bank v. MacMillan and Arthur (5). The drawer or acceptor of a bill owes no such duty to the public at large: see Scholfield v. Londesborough (Earl) (6). In the latter case, LORD MACNAGHTEN described the proposition which the House negatived in the following terms ([1896] A.C. 543):

"My Lords, CHARLES, J., and LOPES, L.J., are both of opinion that a person who accepts a bill of exchange intending that it should be put into circulation owes to everyone who may become the holder a duty which they define or describe as the duty 'not to be negligent with regard to the form of the instrument'."

I turn now to the claim for breach of warranty. Having regard to the well-known rule that a broker has no implied authority to sign a bill of lading for unshipped goods, the case was opened and conducted on the assumption that the lack of Strick's authority would not be disputed. At the conclusion of all the evidence, counsel for Strick submitted that the plaintiff had not proved that in the circumstances of this particular case, and having regard to the indemnity clause in the time charterparty, Strick had no authority. The existence of authority is fundamentally a question of fact. There was evidence that it is well known in the trade that a broker has no authority to sign for unshipped goods. I think that that constitutes a prima facie case; and in the absence of any evidence on the point from the shipowners, the captain, or the brokers themselves, I am not prepared to draw any inference to the contrary from the terms of the charterparty. There was some discussion about the extent of the rule which makes an agent liable for breach of warranty of authority. The plaintiff's case is that, believing the issue of the bill of lading to be authorised, and that, therefore, it was a good document of title, he tendered it to his customer with results leading to the subsequent damage of which he complains, whereas, if he had known it to be unauthorised, he would presumably have had the goods sent by the next ship and procured another bill of lading which, I suppose, might have satisfied the contract. For Strick it is contended that in order to make them liable, they must purport to have authority either to contract with the plaintiff, as in Collen v. Wright (7), or to make a request or demand which the plaintiff is under a statutory duty to fulfil, as in Oliver v. Bank of England (8). It is argued that, since the bill of lading is not itself a contract, Strick were not by issuing it purporting to contract with anyone; nor were they requesting or demanding that anyone should act on it. I think that the rule is wider than this argument would allow. I take it from the following statement of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Oliver v. Bank of England (8) ([1902] 1 Ch. 627):

"The rule, as I have stated, in Collen v. Wright (7) is merely that, if a man professes to be an agent and gets another to act in matters of business upon that profession, and that acting is to the detriment of the person who is so induced to act, the law raises an implied warranty of the averred authority of the agent."

A

I think that Strick in this case must have appreciated, when they issued the bill of lading, that it would result in the plaintiff acting as a matter of business on the authority that they professed to have and that he might thereby act to his detriment by transmitting it to third parties as a document of title. Whether in this particular case the plaintiff did act to his detriment depends on whether, if he had known the true position, he could have procured another shipment and tendered another bill of lading within the contract, or whether he was not in any event irretrievably in breach. This topic is, I think, more conveniently examined when I come to consider what damage, if any, flowed from the breach of warranty. As I have said, the main argument advanced on behalf of Strick was that no damage had been caused.

For the breach of warranty of authority, the damage will be what the plaintiff has suffered from not being able to sue the shipowner: see Richardson v. Williamson & Lawson (9), per BLACKBURN, J. (L.R. 6 Q.B. 279). Counsel for Strick contends that, as the plaintiff never delivered the goods to the ship, he could not have recovered anything from the shipowner: in the hands of the shipper the bill is no more than prima facie evidence of shipment, and it would be open to the owner to prove that he never in fact received the goods. The plaintiff replies that the assumption of the shipowner's liability involves the assumption of shipment. The shipowner will not be liable on the bill unless the broker has authority to sign it, and, counsel argues, if you are assuming that the broker had authority, you must also assume the existence of the condition, namely, shipment, which conferred that authority on him. This is, I think, fallacious.

E

An agent who warrants that he has authority need warrant no more than the bare fact. In the absence of special circumstances, he makes no warranty or representation about how he got his authority, whether it is express or implied, specific or general. Still less does he warrant that an event, on which the proper exercise of a general authority may depend, has in fact taken place. The bill of lading, of course, contains a representation that the goods have been shipped, and I shall consider in a moment to what extent that assists the plaintiff, but it is quite distinct from the representation or warrant of authority. So far as the latter is concerned, there is no more reason for assuming that the goods have been shipped than there is for assuming that the owner gave specific instructions to the broker that he was to issue bills of lading for all the cargo in the cargo book, whether it was shipped or not. The right way of testing the matter is, I think, to treat the bill of lading as if it had been signed personally by the owner and issued personally by him.

F

G

On that supposition how does the matter stand? In considering this, it seems to me of the first importance to remember that the bill of lading is not itself a contract of carriage and that it is not contended that any contract of carriage was ever made. The carelessness of Strick played no part in this.

H

Whether they had acted with or without authority, there would still have been no contract of carriage. The reason why it was not made was because of a fault or breakdown on the plaintiff's side. He did not assume himself nor did he entrust to his forwarding agents the general duty of superintendence and of seeing that no hitch in tendering the goods occurred and as between himself and Strick the failure was his. On this basis, therefore, that there was no contract of affreightment, what would be the nature of the plaintiff's claim against the shipowner if the owner had himself personally signed and issued the bill of lading? In order to save the constant repetition of this hypothesis, in the next paragraph of this judgment I deal with this case as if it were a claim against the shipowner on a bill signed by him.

The bill of lading in the hands of Mishan gave him a choice of remedies. He could sue the shipowner for non-delivery, and the owner would be prevented from alleging non-shipment by the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, s. 3. Alternatively, he could sue the plaintiff on the contract of sale. Under this contract, the plaintiff undertook to put the goods on board the ship, and to procure a contract of affreightment and a bill of lading as evidence of it; and he clearly broke this contract. With these two remedies open to him, Mishan chose the latter and the plaintiff had, I think, no alternative but to pay whatever sum Mishan could properly claim as damages. When the plaintiff discharged his liability to Mishan he might, I suppose, have taken the benefit of Mishan's right of action against the shipowner. But I am concerned only with the claim made by the plaintiff in his own right and in his own name. To sustain that claim, he must show, first, that some wrong was done to him by the shipowner, and, secondly, that his liability to Mishan arose as a consequence of that wrong. As I have said, the reason why the plaintiff had to pay damages was because he failed to make a contract of carriage. It was not because the ship did not deliver the goods: he never undertook that she would. It is difficult to see how the plaintiff can contend that his own failure to make a contract flowed from anything that the shipowner did or omitted to do. But the plaintiff's difficulties begin earlier than that, as soon as he tries to formulate his cause of action against the shipowner. It does not help him to say that the bill of lading contains a representation that the goods had been shipped. Even if he could rely on that as an estoppel, it would not give him a cause of action. To get that, the plaintiff must show some breach of duty. I have already held that there is no general duty not to issue a bill of lading for unshipped goods. If a contract of affreightment had been made, whereby the owner undertook to load the goods, and if the circumstances showed that the shipper had no means of knowing whether the goods were actually shipped or not, it might well be an implied term of the contract that the owner would not issue a bill of lading unless and until the goods were shipped. But I need not consider this, since here there was in fact no contract of carriage. Is it open to the plaintiff to contend that the bill of lading estops the shipowner from denying that there was a contract of carriage? This would, on any view, be a difficult contention, since a person must usually be taken to know with whom he contracts. It is said, however, that the only person who had knowledge that the goods had not been delivered to the ship was Continental Express, and, as they were independent contractors, their knowledge was not the knowledge of the plaintiff. Further, it is said that in estoppel it is actual knowledge, and not constructive knowledge, that is relevant; and that if the plaintiff believed and acted on the representation, it is immaterial that by inquiry he might have found it to be untrue: see Bloomenthal v. Ford (10) ([1897] A.C. 168). I think it unnecessary to go into this point because I think that, on a broader ground, the case presented in this way must fail. A man cannot in one breath invoke both the truth and an estoppel; he must make his choice: see Scarf v. Jardine (11), per LORD SELBORNE, L.C., (7 App. Cas. 350). He cannot, in presenting a case against a defendant, mix fact and fiction in the proportions which suit him best. So, in this case, the plaintiff cannot say against the shipowner:—"By issuing a bill of lading you represented that you had shipped the goods and so are estopped from denying a contract of carriage: but by issuing a bill of lading when in fact you had not shipped the goods you broke the contract you are estopped from denying." The whole truth of this matter is that, in the absence of a contract of carriage, the bill of lading is a nullity, and it would have been none the less so even if it had been issued at a board meeting of Strick Line,

Ltd., or passed by a resolution of the company in general meeting. The fact that it was issued without authority robbed it of no virtue. It could never have been more than a bit of paper purporting to record a bargain that had never been made. The plaintiff's liability to Mishan arose because he failed to make a contract of carriage. He cannot allege that that failure was a consequence of any breach of duty which the shipowner committed. Accordingly, he would
 A have no claim against the shipowner, and so can recover no damages against the broker.

I cannot leave the case against Strick without commenting on some of the more general aspects of it to which counsel for the plaintiff drew attention. He said it would be a very grave matter, as, indeed, it would, if brokers could issue with impunity worthless bills of lading which would thereafter circulate
 B as documents of title and be relied on as such in the mercantile world. And he contended, as I have already recorded, that the rule in Le Lievre v. Gould (2) was a defect in our jurisprudence which ought not to be extended. I do not think that this case affords an illustration of any defect in our system relating to the law of negligent mis-statement. A bill of lading contains not only or primarily a statement of fact, but a promise to deliver goods. The issue of a
 C cheque may imply a representation that the drawer has funds in the bank wherewith it may be met, but the drawer's immunity from suit for a negligent mis-statement to that effect causes no inconvenience. The cheque is an order to pay, and non-compliance with it gives a right of action irrespective of negligent representation. Just as a man does not lightly draw cheques containing promises to pay, so a shipowner or broker will not lightly issue bills of
 D lading containing promises to deliver. It is true that if the shipowner can prove that the goods have not been shipped, his promise may not bind him as against the shipper; but that is hardly saying more than that the drawer of a cheque will not be liable to the drawee if he can prove no consideration. In both cases the makers of the document will be liable to indorsees. It is also
 E a peculiar feature of this case that no contract of carriage was ever made with the shipowner. I have not had to decide what the shipowner's liability would be if there had been such a contract.

The causes of action alleged against Continental Express are detainue and breach of contract. The former, in my judgment, is not made out. There was no demand. The instructions to despatch, which are relied on for this purpose, are not a demand for delivery up of the goods. Continental Express did in F fact accept them, but they were not obliged to do so; and they could have ignored them without thereby failing or refusing to deliver up on demand. In short, Continental Express never set up any adverse title. I need not go into this point in any detail, for counsel for the plaintiff has said that before me he cannot contend that the damages obtainable for detainue would be any higher than those obtainable for breach of contract, and the breach is admitted.
 G It is, however, important to determine at the outset what sort of a breach of contract has been committed. I do not think that it is strictly right to say that the failure to deliver as instructed is a continuing breach. Continental Express were required to deliver within a reasonable time, which expired certainly not later than Dec. 5, 1946. When they failed to deliver by that time, the breach was complete: thus a covenant to build by a certain date
 H can be broken only once: see Stephens v. Junior Army & Navy Stores (12) ([1914] 2 Ch. 523). Continental Express were not after December 5 still under a duty to deliver the goods at No. 9 shed,—indeed it would have been absurd if they had done so without fresh instructions; and without a continuing duty there cannot be a continuing breach. But this is not to say that their wrongdoing ceased on Dec. 5. They were then continuing to hold the goods in breach of the instructions which they had received. In this respect they were like bailees who, in breach of their mandate, hold the goods in some place other than that which the contract or bailment requires. They were therefore guilty of detention of the goods, which, while it may not have been adverse so as to constitute the tort of detinue, was wrongful in that it was in breach of the contract of bailment. Furthermore, they were, I think, under a continuing duty to seek fresh instructions for the disposal of the goods, or at the least to report to the plaintiff their failure to deliver. It could hardly be contended that, if some accident had prevented delivery and excused Continental Express from any fault in the matter, they could have left the plaintiff in ignorance of what had happened to his goods: the duty of a bailee to notify his bailor of such circumstances would be in accordance with the principle laid down in Ranson v. Platt (13) and Coldman v. Hill (14). I cannot think that the duty can be less if delivery has been prevented by the bailee's own negligence or that he could rely on his own culpable ignorance of his own fault as an excuse for not informing the bailor of it. In my judgment, the detention of the goods by Continental Express and their failure to inform the plaintiff of their whereabouts was a continuing breach of duty.

The plaintiff claims to include in the damages he can recover the sum which he has become liable to pay to Mishan. This was strongly contested, and it is convenient, therefore, to consider how the matter stands if that element of loss is disregarded. Subject to the defence advanced by their counsel and conveniently described as novus actus interveniens, Continental Express are liable for the ordinary measure of damage for delay in delivery, namely, the fall in the market value of the goods between December, 1946, and February or March, 1948, when the detention ceased. I think that during that period the value fell from 3s. 6d. a yard to about 3s. 1d. or 3s. 2d. The plaintiff did not in fact sell the goods until November, 1949, and then he obtained 3s. 4d. a yard; the higher price was obtainable because he had then got a licence to sell in the home market. I accept the contention of counsel for the plaintiff that that should be disregarded; and that the appreciation or depreciation of the goods after February, 1948, was his own affair. I accept also the contention that something should be added as compensation in respect of the period for which the plaintiff was out of his money or lost the commercial use of the goods, whichever way one likes to put it. I think also that the plaintiff is entitled to be paid the sum of £10 which he expended in an endeavour to trace the goods, since that loss flows from the failure of the first defendants to tell him where they were. I assess the whole of what may be called the first head of damage at £175.

The defence of novus actus interveniens is based on the issue of the bill of lading. In the ordinary course, it is said, the non-delivery would have been discovered by Dec. 5. But the false bill of lading of that date stifled inquiry or rather directed it into the wrong channels, and so was the cause of the loss after Dec. 5. If this is sound, it eliminates the first head of damage, for it is not suggested that there was any fall in market value by Dec. 5. Its effect on the second head (the claim for £1,319 paid to Mishan) is problematical, for the breach at any rate prevented the shipment in the Mount Orford Park. I shall consider in the first place whether the defence affords an answer on the first head of the claim. Counsel for Continental Express puts the point in two ways. First, he says that delay beyond Dec. 5 was not a foreseeable consequence of the first defendants' breach, since foresight would have said that the non-delivery would be discovered by Dec. 5, as it would have been if Strick had not been careless as well. Secondly, he says that whatever might have been foreseen, the issue of the bill of lading intervened and was in fact the dominant cause of the delay after Dec. 5. The answer to both ways of putting the point is, I think, rooted in the conclusion I have already reached that Continental Express were guilty of a continuing breach of duty. The foreseeable consequences of an omission to deliver by a particular date may well be limited, but the consequence of continuing detention is obviously continuing delay, and it is not disputed that the foreseeable consequences of continuing delay include a drop in value during the period of delay. That really disposes of the first way of putting the point. The second is more formidable. It is not enough that loss or damage should be a foreseeable consequence; it must also be actually caused by the breach. There are many cases where a loss is foreseeable but does not in fact occur because some act intervenes, as a piece of good fortune for the wrongdoer, to prevent the natural and probable consequences of his wrong from operating. Likewise, the intervening act, while not destroying the wrong as a causative event, may contribute to the damage that occurs; the damage is then caused both by the wrong and by the intervening act. That is, I think, what happened here. The issue of the bill of lading could not extinguish the first defendants' breach of duty as a causative event; the breach being continuing is a continuous source of damage. But the two were equally operative causes in that if either had ceased the damage would have ceased. If Continental Express had done their duty by informing the plaintiff that they had the goods and by releasing them the falsity of the bill of lading would have been discovered. Similarly, if it had not been for the false bill of lading and its continuing power of misleading those in whose hands it was, the non-delivery by Continental Express would at once have been discovered.

Where the wrong is a tort, it is clearly settled that the wrongdoer cannot excuse himself by pointing to another cause. It is enough that the tort should be a cause and it is unnecessary to evaluate competing causes and ascertain which of them is dominant: see Minister of Pensions v. Chennell (15) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 721) per DENNING, J. In the case of breach of contract the position is not so clear. In Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (16), the defendant gas company, in breach of their contract, supplied a defective pipe, gas escaped, and a third party went negligently to investigate with a lighted candle. The defendant gas company was held liable. In the Exchequer Chamber, the decision went on the ground that there was a breach of contract and that the damage was the direct consequence of the breach. In the court below, there was some difference of view as to whether the action was in contract or in tort. Those who took the latter view, such as KELLY, C.B., were content to find that the wrong was a concurring or co-operating cause; while those who took the former view, put the breach as the dominant or direct cause. FIGOTT, B. (L.R. 5 Exch. 73), expressed some doubt about the position if it had to be decided in contract. In Smith, Hogg & Co., Ltd. v. Black Sea & Baltic General Insurance Co. (17) this sort of point was discussed by LORD WRIGHT ([1940] 3 All E.R. 409) where he gave his opinion that if unseaworthiness (which was the breach of contract alleged) was a cause of the damage, that was sufficient, whether it was the dominant cause or not. LORD ATKIN agreed with this opinion. LORD PORTER and LORD ROMER held (ibid., 415) that unseaworthiness was the cause of the loss and thought it unnecessary to decide what the position would have been if the loss were attributable partly to unseaworthiness and partly to some other cause and both were substantial causes. VISCOUNT MAUGHAM agreed (ibid., 406) with the opinions both of LORD WRIGHT and of LORD PORTER, and did not make it clear which view he preferred on this particular point.

It would be easy to solve the problem by saying, of course, that, a breach of contract and a tort both being wrongs, the principles of causation applicable to them should be the same. Smith, Hogg & Co., Ltd. v. Black Sea & Baltic General Insurance Co., Ltd. (17) shows that the point cannot be settled in that easy way. LORD WRIGHT clearly regarded the principle which he was enunciating as being applicable, if not because of the character of unseaworthiness as a breach, at any rate because he was there dealing with a fundamental breach. He discusses the matter again in Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. A/B Karlshamnns Oljefabriker (18) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 15-17). It may be that his view of unseaworthiness is that, where it is present, it must of its nature always be the dominant cause. But I do not think that I have to deal here with a breach of contract which by the operation of some other cause is reduced to a cause of lower efficacy. It may be that the term "a cause" is, whether in tort or in contract, not rightly used as a term of legal significance unless it denotes a cause of equal efficacy with one or more other causes. Whatever the true rule of causation may be I am satisfied that if a breach of contract is one of two causes, both co-operating and both of equal efficacy, as I find in this case, it is sufficient to carry judgment for damages. Reischer v. Borwick (19) establishes that for the purposes of a contract of insurance it is sufficient if an insured event is, in this sense, a co-operating cause of the loss. I do not think that Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Minister of War Transport (20) with its insistence on the ascertainment of "the cause," disapproved this principle. The case decided that the cause of a loss has to be ascertained by the standard of common sense of the ordinary man. Common sense is a blunt instrument not suited for probing into minute points, and I cannot believe that if the ordinary man thinks that two causes are of approximately equal efficacy, he cannot say so without being interrogated on fine distinctions. I note also that since Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Minister of War Transport (20) was decided, SCOTT, L.J., in Ocean Steamship Co. v. Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, Ltd. (21) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 363) treated the rule laid down in Reischer v. Borwick (19) as still effective. I think, therefore, that Continental Express are responsible in law for the damage which the plaintiff sustained by the fall in value of the goods over the whole period from November, 1946, to March, 1948.

I turn now to the second head of damages. I was naturally referred to the recent cases of Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. A/B Karlshamns Oljefabriker (18) and Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (22). It is suggested that these two cases, the former by its insistence, particularly by LORD WRIGHT ([1949] 1 All E.R. 13) on the necessity for judging each state of facts in its own light, and the latter with its clear and comprehensive re-statement of fundamental principles, have liberated judges of first instance from the bondage of the earlier authorities. This is, perhaps, putting the argument of counsel for the plaintiff more rhetorically than he put it himself, but he must, if he is to succeed, point to an avenue of escape from the position that among the cases cited to me there is none in which the liability of a carrier has been assessed by reference to the contractual obligations of the consignor or consignee. Continental Express knew that the goods were to be shipped to Teheran, but they had no actual knowledge of the purpose for which they were being sent. It is argued that everyone should be taken to know that it is "on the cards" (to use the colloquialism ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1003) suggested by ASQUITH, L.J., in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (22)) that goods intended for shipment will be or will become subject to a contract of sale and that the time of shipment will be of the essence of such a contract. I think that a distinction may fairly be drawn, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, between carriage by land and carriage by sea. In the former case, the movement of goods for purposes unconnected with sale, perhaps for stocking or some similar purpose, or even unconnected with business at all, is not uncommon. In the latter case, export and import is generally conducted by means of a sale; and the type of contract generally used, c.i.f. or f.o.b., usually requires shipment by a particular ship or at a particular time. Accordingly, counsel for the plaintiff invites me to hold that Continental Express should have known that the process of exporting or importing would probably involve a contract of this type, and to say that, if Continental Express knew that, it would follow that they must appreciate that a failure on their part to carry out their delivery instructions might well result in the plaintiff becoming liable to a third party. LORD MACNAGHTEN in Stroms v. Hutchison (23) ([1905] A.C. 524) seems to think that this degree of knowledge should be imputed to the carrier as an ordinary business man. I think that the decision in The Arpad (24) and the earlier authorities referred to in it, preclude me from taking this view of a carrier's liability. I am, for my part, willing to hold that a carrier should recognise sub-sales by a consignor or consignee as a serious possibility, but that is not enough, as the leading case of Horne v. Midland Rly. Co. (25) shows. In The Arpad (24) MAUGHAM, L.J., said ([1934] P. 230):

"I suppose most vendors of goods and most carriers might be taken to know that if the purchaser or consignee is a trader the goods will probably be sold, or are bought for sub-sale, but the authorities seem to show conclusively that something more than that is necessary to enable the damages to be assessed by reference to a contract of sub-sale entered into before the date of delivery."

B

Under the ordinary rule the carrier is taken to know that the consignor will lose by non-delivery the value of the goods at the place of delivery, and I suppose that under ordinary market conditions that would compensate the consignee for any loss he incurs by purchases made at the place of delivery in order to fulfil any sale he may have made. To make the carrier liable for any higher measure of damages it seems to me to be necessary that he should have knowledge, actual or imputed, of something that makes the ordinary measure inadequate. Such knowledge may be derivable from the terms of the sub-contract, or, possibly, from the market conditions at the place of delivery. The reason why, as noted by ASQUITH, L.J., in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (22) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1001) the law is more ready to allow loss of profit as an item of damage against a vendor than against a carrier is because of the nature of the vendor's business. This is more likely to give him knowledge of the probable terms of a sub-contract or of the market conditions. I do not think that either this authority or Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. A/B Karlshamns Oljefabriker (18) can be regarded as criticising the soundness of the principles on which the liability of a carrier for damages in relation to contracts of sub-sale has hitherto been assessed. In the latter case LORD PORTER said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 8) that, if the claim had been for loss of profit in the respondents' business, he would have thought that it ought to have been disallowed; and LORD WRIGHT said (ibid., 13) that, if the respondents had been claiming special and peculiar loss due to interference with their business, such damage might prima facie be too remote.

F

I have dealt with the plaintiff's claim in this case as if it were a claim for loss of profit under a sub-sale, as that is the topic on which most of the relevant authorities are to be found, but had I held the claim to be within the principle of these authorities, I should have had to direct my mind to the point that it is, in fact, a claim for damages paid to a sub-buyer. SALTER, J., in Patrick v. Russo-British Grain Export Co., Ltd. (26) ([1927] 2 K.B. 540), after holding that the finding of the arbitrator that the parties contemplated that the wheat would probably be re-sold was sufficient to support the claim for loss of profit on re-sale, added:

G

"It might well have been insufficient to support a claim for costs incurred in litigation with a sub-buyer or for penalties or damages paid to him."

H

Finally on this point, it would not follow, even if the plaintiff had been successful in principle, that he could have recovered the whole loss of profit which his sub-buyer actually sustained. This was due, as I have said, to temporary and abnormal conditions in Persia, and was unusually high. Horne v. Midland Rly. Co. (25) is again here in point.

There remains a final point taken by the plaintiff on the assumption that the correct measure of damage is based on market value at the place of delivery. It is said that Continental Express knew that the goods were for shipment to Teheran and knew that the result of non-delivery or delay on their part would be that the ship would be missed, and, accordingly, that the place of delivery for the purpose of assessing the damage should be taken to be, not Manchester, but Teheran at the end of the voyage. This is an attractive argument, but I need not examine it in principle because on the facts I do not think that it helps the plaintiff. I have not sufficient evidence of the relevant market value at Teheran at the material time. What has been tendered as the only evidence of it is the price at which Mishan re-sold the goods in February, 1947. I accept that, on the authority of The Arpad (24), a sub-sale can in a proper case be used in this way; but I do not think that this particular sub-sale is of any value in determining the market price which I have to consider. A market for this purpose means more than a particular place. It means also a particular level of trade. Retail prices differ largely from wholesale prices, and in wholesale prices there are differences at different ends of the chain. In times of scarcity these differences may be very great indeed. There may be ultimate buyers who are willing to pay fanciful sums for a particular class of goods, and the middleman who is in a position to enter and exploit such a market may be able to make enormous profits. The price at which he re-sold would then be no evidence of the scale of prices operating between himself and the person from whom he bought. In this case I am concerned with the market price as between an exporter and an importer at Teheran. There is no evidence that that price changed at all during the voyage of the Mount Orford Park or for any appreciable time thereafter. The far larger price obtainable in Teheran is no evidence of it, since exporters in England were apparently not at any time attempting to demand any share in the large profits that were then to be made in the Persian markets. Accordingly, I can award to the plaintiff no more than the sum which I have assessed above. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff against Continental Express for £175, and judgment for Strick against the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff against the first defendant for £175, with costs (not including the second defendants' costs). Judgment for the second defendants (Frank C. Strick & Co., Ltd.) with costs.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. FOX AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), April 25, 1950.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Transfer of property and endowment—“Held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital”—Power of trustees to divert property and endowment to other charitable purposes—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (1), s. 7 (4).

The National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6, provides : “ (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister [of Health] by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof . . ." By s. 7: "(4) All endowments of a voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies . . . being endowments held immediately before the appointed day, shall on that day be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act free of any trust existing immediately before that day."

A By a deed dated Feb. 5, 1924, the W. council conveyed to trustees a plot of land on trust that there should forthwith be erected thereon a maternity home. The trustees were to have entire and absolute control of the said land and the buildings for the time being thereon and the management, regulation, repair and care thereof. The trustees were further
B given power, inter alia, to build on, let, mortgage, sell, pull down, re-build or alter and otherwise deal with the premises and any erections or buildings for the time being thereon in such manner as they should think fit. They were directed by the deed to apply any moneys arising from any such sale, mortgage or other disposition "either for the general purposes of the maternity home aforesaid or for such other public charitable purpose and in such manner as the trustees" should think fit. By a conveyance
C dated May 4, 1926, the W. council conveyed a further plot of land to the trustees on trusts similar to those contained in the deed of Feb. 5, 1924. By a deed of Sept. 29, 1926, supplemental to the previous deed, J.F. and G.F., as settlors, vested in the trustees certain investments, the settlors being desirous (as was recited) "of endowing the said maternity home"
D in the manner thereafter appearing. The deed of September, 1926, provided that the trustees should out of the income of the endowment in the first place "defray the cost of maintaining the structure and interior of the said maternity home and of any annex or other buildings which may from time to time be erected in connection therewith in good condition and repair and of insuring the same." The trustees were given power
E to apply the income as capital of the endowment for the purpose of making such alterations, improvements and additions to the structure and equipment of the maternity home as they should think fit, and by cl. 7 "the trustees shall if and when they think fit sell the said shares or other the investments for the time being representing the endowment and apply the proceeds of such sale for such other charitable trust and in such manner as they shall think fit." Immediately before July 5, 1948, ("the appointed F day") the trustees were administering the buildings erected on the land as a maternity home, and the endowment funds were being used for the purposes of the home. The question arose whether the trustees' interests rights and liabilities in respect of the maternity home and the endowment funds were transferred to the Ministry of Health on the appointed day.

G HELD: on the true construction of the Act, the words "held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital" in s. 6 (1) and s. 7 (10) referred to the purposes for which the property, interests, or endowments were, in fact, being held immediately before the appointed day, and, therefore, notwithstanding that the deeds of 1924 and 1926 empowered the trustees to divert the property or endowments to other purposes, as they were being
H used on the relevant date for the purposes of the maternity home, they passed to the Minister under s. 6 (1) and s. 7 (4) respectively.

[FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 6 and s. 7, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 339-345.]

ACTION.

The Ministry of Health claimed a declaration that the defendants' interests, rights and liabilities in respect of certain premises at Wellington, Somerset, which the defendants, as trustees, conducted as a maternity home, and all investments forming the endowment of that home, were transferred to the Minister of Health by virtue of the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 (1) and s. 7 (4).

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.), Pearson, K.C., and Walter Gumbel for the Ministry of Health.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Newsom for the defendants, the trustees of the maternity home.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is an action brought by the Ministry of Health against the two defendants as trustees of a maternity home at Wellington, in the county of Somerset, asking for a declaration that the defendants' interests, rights and liabilities in those premises, and in all investments forming the endowment of the Wellington Maternity Home, were transferred to the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 (1) and s. 7 (4), on July 5, 1948, the appointed day under that Act. The facts are not in dispute.

By a deed made on Feb. 5, 1924, between the urban district council for the parish of Wellington, Somerset, of the one part, and certain persons as trustees, of whom the defendants are the two surviving trustees, of the other part, the urban district council conveyed to those trustees a piece of land described in the deed, and delineated on the plan annexed thereto. I shall have to refer in some detail later to the terms of the deed. The trustees in due course erected on the land in question the maternity home which is known as the Wellington Maternity Home. By a subsequent conveyance made on May 4, 1926, between the urban district council and the trustees, a further piece of land was conveyed to the trustees on trusts substantially similar to those to be found in the earlier deed. By a later deed dated Sept. 29, 1926, the defendant, John Howard Fox, and another of the trustees, Gerald Fox, as settlors vested in the trustees certain investments on the trusts declared by the deed, the object being expressed in the recital of the deed to constitute an endowment for the maternity home.

I must now turn to the relevant provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946. The Act is entitled:

"An Act to provide for the establishment of a comprehensive health service for England and Wales, and for purposes connected therewith."

Under s. 1 it is provided that:

"(1) It shall be the duty of the Minister of Health (hereafter in this Act referred to as 'the Minister') to promote the establishment in England and Wales of a comprehensive health service . . ."

Sections 6 and 7 appear under the heading: "Transfer of hospitals to the Minister." Section 6, which is of considerable importance in this case, provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section. (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall also, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all hospitals vested in a local authority immediately before the appointed day, and all property and liabilities held by a local authority, or to which a local authority were subject, immediately before the appointed day, being property and liabilities held or incurred solely for the purposes of those hospitals or any of them or for the purpose of securing accommodation for persons in the area at any hospital not vested in the authority . . . (4) All property transferred to the Minister under this section shall vest in him free of any trust existing immediately before the appointed day . . . (5) Regulations may provide (a) for the apportionment, as between the Minister and the other persons concerned, of interests in premises used partly for the purposes of any hospital to which this section applies and partly for other purposes and, in the case of a leasehold interest, for the severance thereof, and for vesting in the Minister and the other persons concerned the appropriate interests, and for the apportionment of rent payable in respect of any such severed lease . . .”

Section 7 deals with endowments of voluntary hospitals. It provides, inter alia:

“(4) All endowment of a voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies, other than a hospital to which the foregoing provisions of this section apply, being endowments held immediately before the appointed day, shall on that day be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act free of any trust existing immediately before that day . . .

(9) Regulations may provide—(a) for the apportionment of any property held by the governing body of a voluntary hospital to which this section applies partly for the purposes of that hospital and partly for other purposes, being property which would, if it were held solely for the purposes of the hospital, constitute an endowment of that hospital, and for vesting the appropriate shares in the Minister or (in the case of a teaching hospital) the Board of Governors of that hospital, or (in the case of an endowment which would be transferred to a Hospital Management Committee) that Committee, and the other persons concerned . . . (10) In this section the expression ‘endowment,’ in relation to a voluntary hospital, means property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being property of the following descriptions . . .”

Then follow in four sub-paragraphs descriptions of the property in question. Finally, by s. 79 (1), the interpretation section, it is inter alia provided:

“‘the governing body,’ in relation to any voluntary hospital, includes any body, whether corporate or unincorporate, having the control and management of the hospital or any part thereof or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof.”

In approaching the construction of such an Act as this, I have been proffered various and somewhat conflicting invitations. On the one hand, I was urged by the Attorney-General to bear in mind what he described as the overriding object of the Act, and to interpret the relevant sections bearing in mind that overriding object and with a view to assisting in the achievement thereof. On the other hand, I was invited by counsel for the defendants, treating this Act, as an expropriation Act, as indeed it is, to apply the same strict construction to which, it is said, taxing Acts are subjected. I think the true view was that finally urged on me by Mr. Pearson for the plaintiffs, who, in reply, pointed out that there really was little between the two points of view when one remembers the guidance which one is given by the House of Lords—to discover the intention from the language which is used in the Act and from no other source. I, therefore, approach the construction of these sections without any inclination either to struggle to help to achieve what may be the overriding object of the Act in favour of the Crown, on the one hand, or to apply to the language such a strict construction, on the other hand, as may result to the benefit of the subject, and I shall endeavour to interpret the relevant sections merely by the application of the ordinary rules of construction, which are daily applied by this court.

Turning back to s. 6 (1), it is to be observed that there is a number of conditions which must obtain before a voluntary hospital is transferred to and becomes vested in the Minister by virtue of the Act. What is to be transferred is interests in the premises which either formed part of the voluntary hospital or are used for the purposes thereof, and movable property used in connection with such places. Then the nature of the interests which are being dealt with by the sub-section are described. They must be interests held immediately before the appointed day; they must be held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees; they must be held either by that body or by the trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital. The real debate has centred round the phrase "being interests held . . . by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital."

The conflicting views are as follows. On behalf of the Ministry of Health it is urged that the meaning of that phrase is that there are included all interests which were, in fact, immediately before the appointed day, held by the trustees for the purposes of that hospital in which only those trustees were concerned and in which other persons were not concerned, and that, therefore, one need not go further than to ascertain, in cases where no other persons were concerned, as is the fact here, what actually was the position immediately before the appointed day. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the defendants that effect must be given to the employment of the verb "used" and the verb "held" between which there is a contrast. The verb "used" is employed to describe what was being done with the premises or the movable property. The verb "held" is employed to qualify the word "interests." Where, as is the case, that verb is used in conjunction with the words "by trustees" as qualifying "interests," the result must be that the interests are interests held by trustees on trust. Then, when those words are followed by the words "solely for the purposes of that hospital," one has to look at the trusts on which the trustees held the interests in question and see whether those trusts relate solely to the purposes of the hospital, for, it is said, if the trusts were wider than trusts connected with the hospital, the result must be that it cannot be predicated of the interests in question that immediately before the appointed day they were held by trustees solely for the purposes of the hospital.

It appears to me that both those constructions have points which recommend them. There is, therefore, in my view, an ambiguity in the sub-section. Before, therefore, I turn to the relevant documents, I must see whether there are provided in any other part of the Act provisions which indicate or provide a context for the true interpretation of this difficult phrase "held solely." In the next sub-section, sub-s. (2), the Act deals with the case of hospitals vested in a local authority, and it is to be observed that the same language as is employed in the earlier part of sub-s. (1) is not employed in the earlier part of sub-s. (2). The phrase which gives rise to the difficulty in this matter does appear in the later part of sub-s. (2) where it is provided, omitting words irrelevant to the present purpose:

"all property held by a local authority immediately before the appointed day being property held solely for the purposes of those hospitals."

It is pointed out on behalf of the Ministry, and, in my view, pointed out with considerable force, that local authorities are entitled, within very wide limits, to alter the purpose for which they hold property. It would have been possible for local authorities to change the purposes for which they held property used as hospitals. Therefore, it is said that the phrase "held solely" as used in that sub-section cannot have the construction contended for by the plaintiffs under s. 6 (1). As I have said, on the face of it sub-s. (2) is not dealing with exactly the same matter, but there is the same phrase used, and prima facie one expects that a phrase such as that will not have different meanings in different parts of the same Act.

A I turn to sub-s. (5) which I have read. As will have appeared, that deals with apportionment, as between the Minister and other persons concerned, of interests in the premises. So that the condition for the operation of that sub-section is that there must be two sets of persons concerned, the Minister and the other persons concerned. Therefore, it relates to property in regard to which, before the appointed day, two sets of persons were concerned, the governing body of the voluntary hospital or the trustees, as the case may be, on the one hand, and other persons concerned, on the other hand. The interests of the predecessor of the Minister, namely, the governing body or the trustees, must, of course, be interests falling within sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) as the case may be. Therefore, it does not appear to me that sub-s. (5) provides any conclusive guide to the answer to this point.

C I must not leave out of consideration the provisions of s. 7 (9) (a). It is true that s. 7 is dealing with a different subject-matter, namely, endowments of voluntary hospitals, but, here again, I find this phrase "held solely." Paragraph (a) of sub-s. (9) refers to regulations "for the apportionment of any property held by the governing body of a voluntary hospital," and in view of the definition section, I think that phrase is wide enough to include trustees,

". . . to which this section applies partly for the purposes of that hospital and partly for other purposes, being property which would, if it were held solely for the purposes of the hospital, constitute an endowment . . ."

E The contrast there is between purposes of the hospital and "for other purposes" in the case of property which is held by a governing body. The purpose of the regulations is to effect an apportionment, the test applied being to see what would be the position if the property were held solely for the purposes of the hospital, that is, solely for the purposes of the hospital immediately before the appointed day. Finally, in s. 7 (10), one again meets the same phrase "held by . . . trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital."

F
G Reading that series of provisions, I feel driven to the conclusion that, in s. 6 (1), the phrase "held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital" bears the construction for which the Ministry contends, and that one is not directed by the sub-section to pursue the inquiry what were the exact terms of the trust deed or deeds under which the trustees held the property with a view to discovering whether, under those deeds, they had a power to divert the property, or any of it, to other purposes than those which were in operation immediately before the appointed day. In my view, the sense of this series of provisions is that one takes one's stand once and for all on the appointed day and sees for what purpose the property was being held then, and, if the property was then being held for purposes of the hospital and for no other purposes in fact, that is an end of the matter, and property falling within that description passes under the sub-section to the Minister.

H With that construction in mind, I turn to the deed of Feb. 5, 1924. The trusts declared there are to hold the property

"(a) upon trust that the said premises shall form the site for and that there shall forthwith be erected thereon a maternity home [and secondly] the trustees shall have the entire and absolute control of the said land and buildings for the time being thereon, and the management regulation repair and care thereof subject as hereinafter provided with power at their discretion to delegate the said management regulation, repair and care."

By cl. 2 the deed provides:

"It shall be lawful for the trustees and the survivors . . . from time to time to build upon let mortgage sell pull down re-build or alter and otherwise deal with the said premises and any erections or buildings for the time being thereon in such manner in all respects as the trustees or trustee shall think fit."

It will be observed that there are included power to let, power to mortgage, and power to pull down. Clause 3, which is monetary, provides that the trustees must apply and deal with all moneys which arise from any sale, mortgage, or other disposition under the power contained in cl. 2

". . . either for the general purposes of the maternity home aforesaid or for such other public, charitable purpose and in such manner as the trustees or trustee shall think fit," with power to settle and approve any scheme. Then there follow restrictive covenants which, on the view I take of the matter, are not really material. In fact, throughout the history of this trust, the trustees having erected the maternity home, managed and conducted it, and the land and premises were, in fact, being used at the appointed date for the purposes of a maternity home. On the construction which I place on the relevant section, s. 6 (1), therefore, the land and premises in question passed to and vested in the Minister.

I turn now to the other point in the case, that is, the question of the fate of the funds, the subject of the deed of Sept. 29, 1926, to which I have already referred. As emerges from s. 7 (4), the endowments which are there dealt with are endowments of a voluntary hospital to which s. 6 applies, and as emerges from s. 7 (10), the expression "endowment" means property held by the governing body of the hospital or trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital. I find nothing in s. 7 which provides a context which would enable me to interpret the words "held solely for the purposes of that hospital" differently from those words as used in s. 6 (1). Indeed, I have prayed in aid certain of the provisions of s. 7 (9) and (10) to interpret those words in s. 6. It is, in my judgment, proper, unless one is forced to the contrary, to give the same meaning to a word or a phrase throughout an Act of Parliament or other document under construction. Again, the fact emerges—there is no dispute on it—that at the appointed day the funds subject to the deed of Sept. 29, 1926, were being used for the purposes of the hospital and, in my view, solely for the purposes of the hospital. The deed is expressed to be supplemental to the previous deeds dealing with the land and premises, and the recital is that "the settlors are desirous of endowing the said maternity home in manner hereinafter appearing." They are given power to retain the shares in question; then there is a trust that the annual income be applied in perpetuity as provided in the deed. Clause 3 provides that the trustees:

". . . shall out of the income of the endowment in the first place defray the cost of maintaining the structure and interior of the said maternity home and of any annex or other buildings which may from time to time be erected in connection therewith in good condition and repair and of insuring the same," and other activities of management. Clause 4 deals with surplus income, directs the trustees to invest that surplus income, and hold the investments resulting therefrom on the trusts declared concerning the endowment. By cl. 6 they are given power to apply the income as capital of the endowment

". . . for the purpose of making such alterations improvements and additions to the structure and equipment of the maternity home and the erection of an annex or other buildings in connection therewith as the trustees shall from time to time in their absolute discretion think fit."

By cl. 7, which was relied on on behalf of the defendants, the trustees are given what is described as an overriding trust regarding the capital. The clause provides:

A " . . . the trustees shall if and when they think fit sell the said shares or other the investments for the time being representing the endowment and apply the proceeds of such sale for such other charitable trust and in such manner as they shall think fit."

B Clearly, therefore, the trustees, but for the Act, could at any time have deflected the income of these investments away from the maternity home, but, on the construction which I have placed on s. 6 and s. 7, that power is irrelevant because at the appointed day the trustees were devoting the funds and its income towards the maintenance and conduct of the maternity home, and for no other purpose.

C I, therefore, hold that, as in the case of the land and premises under s. 6, so in the case of the funds subject to the deed of Sept. 29, 1926, they vest under the Act, in accordance with the provisions of s. 7. In the result, the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration asked for.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of the trustees to be paid out of the endowment fund.

Re COLLINS (AN INFANT).

E [COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), April 25, 1950.]

Infant—Custody—Orphan—Religious upbringing—Conflict between grandparents—Father's direction as to religion of child—Welfare of child paramount consideration—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 1.

F A boy of six-and-a-half years of age lost his father when he was one year old, and his mother died three years later. The father being a Roman Catholic and the mother a Protestant, the parents had agreed that the children of the marriage should be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, and the boy was baptised in the Roman Catholic church. After the father's death and during most of the remaining years of the mother's life the boy lived with his paternal grandparents, but, shortly before her death, the mother wished that the boy should live with his maternal grandparents, and he had resided with them for two and a half years. G An application by the paternal grandparents for the custody of the boy, so that he could be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, was refused on the ground that it would be contrary to the welfare of the child if he had to leave his present home. On appeal,

H HELD: s. 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, which provides that where the custody or upbringing of an infant is in question the court shall regard the welfare of the infant as the paramount consideration, was not limited to a case where both parents were living, and the former rule of law, whereby a father had the right to choose the religion of his child, did not survive in a case where the parents, or either of them, were dead.

APPLICATION for extension of time to appeal from an interlocutory order of WYNN-PARRY, J., in chambers, made on Dec. 21, 1949, refusing to grant to the applicants, the paternal grandparents of a boy of six-and-a-half years of age, the custody of the child. The facts and the relevant section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

O'Sullivan, K.C., and J. C. B. W. Leonard for the applicants, the paternal grandparents.

C. A. J. Bonner for the respondents, the maternal grandparents.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : This case comes before us by way of appeal from a decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., in chambers on Dec. 21, 1949. A preliminary point has been taken on behalf of the respondents, namely, that the appeal is out of time, the order made being an interlocutory order. That it was such an order seems plain having regard to the decision of this court in Chinchen v. Chinchen (1). Counsel for the applicants have, therefore, asked, first, that the time for appealing may be treated as extended so that we may entertain the appeal out of time.

The case relates to the custody of a boy aged six-and-a-half years, and it is to be expected that those who have brought this dispute before the Court of Appeal feel (without a motive which deserves any kind of criticism) the matter to be one of the utmost importance. Since, however, it is in relation to an infant, I think that on general principles and in the public interest the court should be a little slow to entertain an appeal, since the decision in such cases is so very much a matter for the judge's discretion, and one of great responsibility. No judge can claim to exercise ideal wisdom in these matters, but the jurisdiction he has is that which devolves on him from the sovereign as parens patriae. Parents would not assert that they were never wrong in any decision they made with regard to their own children, but few parents would desire their decisions to be reviewed by other persons. I mention these matters because, although I propose to deal with this case on the preliminary issue, I desire to make it plain that I do so after having heard at considerable length a discussion on the case, which has satisfied me, first, that the learned judge did not in any respect misdirect himself, and, secondly, and as a consequence, that, if we were to go more fully into the matter, there is nothing which would justify this court in interfering with the exercise by the learned judge of his discretion.

This boy lost both his father and his mother. When he was only about a year old, his father lost his life while serving in the Royal Air Force. Shortly afterwards the mother contracted tuberculosis, and she died three years later. The boy had, on both sides of the family, grandparents who have been most assiduous in their efforts for his welfare, and nothing could be said against their devotion to the interests of the child. The matter has arisen primarily because the parent's marriage was a mixed marriage, the father being a member of the Roman Catholic church and the mother a member of the Protestant church. The boy was baptised into the Roman Catholic church, as is the usual practice in such cases, and the mother assented to his being brought up in the Roman

A Catholic faith. After the father's death and during most of the remaining years of the mother's life, the boy lived with the paternal grandparents, the applicants in this case. Shortly before her death, the mother appears to have expressed the wish that the boy should go to her own parents, and he left the home of the paternal grandparents and went to his maternal grandparents, where he still lives, and where he is being brought up in the Protestant faith according to the principles of the Congregationalist denomination. If ever a problem of difficulty
B was a learned judge was put before a judge it is a case like this, where, on the one hand, the paternal grandparents are pressing for the child to return to the Catholic church, and, on the other hand, the maternal grandparents claim to retain him where he now is. No wonder the learned judge said that it was a fine balance, but he came to the conclusion that the right order to make
C was to allow this boy to remain where he was. Although the order makes no express reference to religious upbringing, I think everybody agrees that, so long as he remains where he is, he will not be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith.

D Counsel for the applicants argued that the learned judge misdirected himself, and, therefore, first, we ought to allow this appeal to proceed, and, next, if we did, we should, because of the misdirection, interfere with the exercise of the judge's discretion. Counsel for the applicants put the case in two ways, one more bold than the other. I take the less bold one first. The judge, counsel said, ought to have considered the arrangement between the spouses that the child should be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, the fact that the child had been baptised into the Roman Catholic church, and, finally, the desire of the father that the child should be brought up in his (the father's) own faith. Counsel
E said that those things ought to have been considered, and that the learned judge did not adequately weigh them. The learned judge states, according to a note of the judgment:

"The cases recognise that on the question of religion the court has firmly refused to choose between different religions and pronounce on their respective merits."

F Counsel for the applicants said that the judge went wrong there, because he would not consider the question which of two religions ought to be preferred. I am sure the learned judge did not intend any such thing, as appears from the last words "and pronounce on their respective merits." It has been said many times that a temporal court is not able to decide in any case which religion affords the greater benefit to its adherents. That the judge had to consider the question which religion should, so to speak, prevail in the child's life at the moment, I think is obvious from the whole purport of his decision, and, particularly, by the reference to the "fine balance." It also appears from the note of the judgment that the judge said:

G "I must take into consideration the express wish of the mother that the child shall not be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. She took the active step of sending the child with her sister to her own Congregational church. There is also this circumstance, that the child for two-and-a-half years has been living with his maternal grandparents and has been brought up as one of their family."

H The learned judge said it would be a hard thing to take the child from that home. I am quite satisfied that in stating those matters the learned judge did not exclude from consideration any of the matters which counsel for the applicants has mentioned, and to which I have already referred, but, weighing them all as best he could, the learned judge came to the conclusion that in the interests of the child the right order was that the child should not be disturbed from where he now is. So far, if I am right, for the reasons I have indicated, I cannot think that we should be entitled to interfere with the exercise of that discretion.

I turn to counsel's other point. Historically there is, I think, little doubt that in 1871 a father was treated as having a right, which the law was bound to recognise and enforce (unless he had by misconduct of some kind forfeited the right), to dictate the religion of his child. That this right to dictate was not lost by death appears from Hawksworth v. Hawksworth (2). The hardship of the rule, in the view of the judges, is apparent from some observations of WICKENS V.-C., when he said (6 Ch. App. 540):

" . . . to direct that this ward shall be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith will be to create a barrier between a widowed mother and her only child ; to annul the mother's influence over her daughter on the most important of all subjects, with the almost inevitable effect of weakening it on all others ; to introduce a disturbing element into a union which ought to be as close, as warm, and as absolute as any known to man ; and lastly, to inflict severe pain on both mother and child. But it is clear that no argument which would recognise any right in the widowed mother to bring up her child in a religion different from the father's can be allowed to weigh with me at all."

MELLISH, L.J., however, said (ibid., 544):

" It certainly, to me, is very desirable that the rule of law which regulates the religion in which children of early years should be educated should be clearly laid down and enforced."

I think there is no doubt that that rule persisted until 1925, though it may be that in the interim there was possibly some change of feeling in regard to it. The social philosophy of the times had somewhat altered, and the result was the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, which provides by s. 1:

" Where in any proceeding before any court . . . the custody or upbringing of an infant . . . is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration, and shall not take into consideration whether from any other point of view the claim of the father, or any right at common law possessed by the father, in respect of such custody [or] upbringing . . . is superior to that of the mother, or the claim of the mother is superior to that of the father."

Counsel for the applicants said that that pronouncement did not affect the pre-existing rule, and, particularly, did not mitigate the rule of law to which MELLISH, L.J., referred in Hawksworth v. Hawksworth (2). I cannot agree. It is true that in Re Thain (3), where a father who had been away on service sought to regain the custody of his own child (the mother being dead) from persons who had looked after the child during his absence, the question to be considered concerned the right of a father as against the foster parents. In that connection the first part of s. 1 of the Act of 1925 was relevant, namely, that, in deciding a question concerning the custody of a child, the court is to regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration. Both LORD HANWORTH, M.R., and SARGANT, L.J., said that those words did not alter the law, but stated what had been the practice in the Chancery Court. That being so, the court considered that the only thing to do in the circumstances, now that the father could provide a home and that it was in the best interests of the child that it should be done, was to say that the child should go to his own parent, notwithstanding the inevitable wrench when the child left the home to which it had become used.

In my judgment, the point with which we are concerned did not arise in Re Thain (3), for s. 1 of the Act of 1925 states, first, that the principle of paramount consideration is the welfare of the infant and then goes on to say that the court shall not take into consideration the question whether any common law right of the father prevails over that of the mother or vice versa. Counsel for the applicants said that that only applied when there is a direct issue between father and mother, and in the present case that is not the position, because both father and mother are dead. He asked the court, therefore, to say that, though the second part of the section might take away the application of the older rule when father and mother are living, at any rate when the father is dead that rule comes again into full force and effect. That would seem to me to be a most surprising result, and I think it is ill-founded. For practical purposes this is a case where the two rival religions of father and mother are found to be, on the evidence, in conflict, and the conflict must be solved in the same way as if both parents were alive. Consideration must obviously be given, as counsel for the applicants said, to the fact that both parents at one time agreed on religion, and, pursuant to that agreement, the child was baptised into the Catholic faith.

Changes in religious upbringing are matters not lightly to be regarded. The last of the cases to which counsel for the applicants referred, Re Carroll (4), lends no support for the proposition for which he contended. In that case the problem arose whether the mother of an illegitimate child could recover its custody (and bring it up as she wished, and, in particular, in her own religion) from the particular society with which the child had been lodged and where it had been brought up in a different religion. The issue, therefore, was between the mother of an illegitimate child—and for practical purposes she is the only parent that such a child has—on the one hand, and an institution on the other. In that connection SLESSER, L.J., drew attention to the limitation which may fairly be put on the words of the second part of s. 1 of the Act of 1925. The learned lord justice considered historically the position of the father or mother of a child in reference to religion and referred to a number of early cases. The rule had been that a parent—particularly a father where there were two parents,—had in the ordinary way the legal right to require that the child should be brought up in his faith, and that right was recognised in the terms of s. 4 of the Custody of Children Act, 1891. Then the lord justice said ([1931] 1 K.B. 355):

“ This rule is now modified in any proceedings before the court in consequence of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 . . . so that, to-day, as between father and mother, the court may decide on the basis of the welfare of the infant which religious education it shall be given. This statute, however, in my view, has confined itself to questions as between the rights of father and mother which I have already outlined . . . ”.

That brings me back, therefore, to the point: Is s. 1 of the Act of 1925 to be confined strictly to a case when the issue is between father and mother both living, or does it apply where either the father, or both the father and mother, are dead? In my view, it is impossible to put that limitation on the intention of the words used by Parliament. It seems to me, therefore, that in such a case as this there is to-day no warrant for the paramountcy of the father's religion for which counsel for the applicants contended.

For these reasons, and after having given the very anxious thought which any case of this sort demands, I am satisfied that there is here no misdirection by the learned judge, so that, if we were to go further into the matter, it would be impossible for us to say that his discretion should be interfered with. That being so, I think it is in the best interests of all concerned that we deal with this matter on the technical question of the appeal being out of time, and we should not further consider it.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

LAND REALISATION CO., LTD. v. POST OFFICE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), April 18, 1950.]

Compulsory Purchase—Speedy acquisition of land in urgent cases—Authorisation rendered abortive—Validity of second authorisation—No change of circumstances—Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (c. 49), s. 2 (2), (3)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 37 (2).

The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, s. 2, provides: “(2) Where . . . the Minister . . . is satisfied that it is expedient that he should purchase any land under any enactment mentioned in para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of the foregoing section . . . and the Minister . . . [is] satisfied that it is urgently necessary in the public interest that the Minister . . . should be enabled to obtain possession of the land without delay, the Minister . . . may, in lieu of being authorised to purchase the land in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing section . . . be so authorised . . . by an authorisation in writing given by the Minister . . . under this sub-section . . . (3) At any time not earlier than seven days nor later than three months after the giving of an authorisation under this section the acquiring authority may enter on, and take possession of, the land to which the authorisation relates notwithstanding that the purchase of the land has not been completed.”

By the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 37 (2): “If . . . (b) the Minister [of Town and Country Planning] and the Postmaster-General are satisfied that the acquisition of any . . . land is necessary for the purpose of the Post Office, the Minister of Works or the Postmaster-General . . . may be authorised to purchase that land compulsorily . . .” By s. 37 (4): “The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, shall apply to the compulsory acquisition of land under this section . . .”

In May 1947, the Post Office decided to acquire certain land belonging to the plaintiffs for the purposes of a telephone exchange. On June 22, 1948, having been unable to arrange to purchase the land on a voluntary basis, it gave the plaintiffs notice of its intention to give an authorisation under s. 2 (2). On Sept. 28, 1948, after considering representations made by the plaintiffs, the Minister of Works, on behalf of the Post Office in accordance with the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 37, signed the authorisation. The Post Office did not, however, enter into possession within three months of the authorisation as required by s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1946, but it entered into possession on Jan. 3, 1949, and remained until May 31, 1949. It then relinquished possession, having accepted the plaintiffs' representation that it was a trespasser. On July 13, 1949, the Post Office served a further notice on the plaintiffs in respect of the land in question in terms similar to those of the notice of June 22, 1948, and thereafter the procedure under s. 2 (2) was repeated until, on Aug. 27, 1949, an authorisation identical mutatis mutandis with that of Sept. 28, 1948, was made, and two days later it was served on the plaintiffs. On Oct. 12, 1949, the Post Office re-entered into possession. The plaintiffs claimed, inter alia, a declaration that the authorisation dated Aug. 27, 1949, was invalid.

HELD: providing that the “Minister” within s. 2 was satisfied that the purchase was expedient and that the proposed authorisation was urgently necessary within the meaning of the sub-section, there was nothing in s. 2 (3) to prevent his going through the procedure twice in relation to the same land, although there had been no change of circumstances, and, therefore, the authorisation was valid.

[FOR THE ACQUISITION OF LAND (AUTHORISATION PROCEDURE) ACT, 1946, s. 2, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 3, pp. 1067; 1068.]

ACTION by the plaintiffs, the Land Realisation Co., Ltd., against the defendant, the Post Office, for a declaration that an authorisation made by it on Aug. 27, 1949, under the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, s. 2 (2), was invalid; for possession of the land affected; and for mesne profits or damages in respect of its wrongful occupation. The plaintiffs further claimed damages in respect of the wrongful entry of the defendant on their land, and its depositing chattels and executing works thereon.

Russell, K.C., and Victor Coen for the plaintiffs.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and Newsom for the defendant.

ROMER, J. : This is an action by a company called Land Realisation Co., Ltd., and they are suing the Post Office for certain relief arising out of the fact that the Post Office, in pursuance of certain orders the validity of which the plaintiffs impeach, entered into possession of land which the plaintiffs own at Alfriston, in Sussex. The whole trouble has arisen from the fact that the defendant sought to bring into operation certain powers which, if exercised by it, would result in its becoming entitled to enter into possession of the land, but those powers involve a time limit of three months within which possession must be taken. Although the necessary machinery was brought into operation by the defendant for paving the way to its compulsory acquisition of this land, it overlooked the necessity for entering into possession within three months, and, consequently, as is freely admitted, became a trespasser for a short time. That is the subject-matter of a claim for damages for trespass, and will be referred to chambers for inquiry. The substantial complaint is that the defendant, having deliberately brought this machinery into operation once, proceeded to bring it into operation all over again, and the question is whether the defendant, whose bona fides are not and cannot be assailed, was entitled to act as it did.

To make the position plain it is necessary to refer to one or two provisions of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, as extended by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. Section 1 of the Act of 1946 relates to what one might describe as ordinary compulsory purchase, but s. 2 of the Act deals with temporary powers for speedy acquisition of land in urgent cases, as the marginal note indicates, and it is under that section that the defendant acted. Section 2 (1) refers to a period of five years, beginning with the commencement of the Act, and sub-s. (2) provides:

“Where during the period aforesaid the Minister of Transport is satisfied that it is expedient that he should purchase any land under any enactment mentioned in para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of the foregoing section, or the Board of Trade are satisfied that it is expedient that they should purchase any land under the Distribution of Industry Act, 1945, and the Minister or Board are satisfied that it is urgently necessary in the public interest that the Minister or Board should be enabled to obtain possession of the land without delay, the Minister or Board may, in lieu of being authorised to purchase the land in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing section or of the said Act of 1945, be so authorised, subject to the provisions of sched. III to this Act, by an authorisation in writing given by the Minister or Board under this sub-section.”

Section 2 further provides:

“(3) At any time not earlier than seven days nor later than three months after the giving of an authorisation under this section the acquiring authority may enter on, and take possession of, the land to which the authorisation relates notwithstanding that the purchase of the land has not been completed . . . (5) A power to enter on and take possession of land conferred by an authorisation given under this section may, save as provided in sched.

III to this Act, be exercised without notice to or the consent of any person and without compliance with ss. 84 to 90 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but subject to payment of the like compensation . . ."

Schedule III to the Act provides:

"2. (1) Before an authorisation is given under s. 2 of this Act the acquiring authority must—(a) have published in one or more local newspapers circulating in the locality in which any of the land to which the authorisation relates is situated a notice stating that the confirming authority is about to take into consideration the giving of an authorisation under s. 2 of this Act with respect to land described in the notice, being land consisting of or comprised in the land to which the authorisation relates, and that representations which any person desires to make must be made to the confirming authority in writing within fourteen days from the date of the publication of the notice; and (b) have served on every owner and occupier of any of the land to which the authorisation relates a notice in writing stating that the confirming authority is about to take into consideration the giving of an authorisation as aforesaid, and that representations which any of the persons required to be served desires to make must be made to the confirming authority in writing within fourteen days from the date of the service of the notice on him . . . 3. Before giving an authorisation under s. 2 of this Act the confirming authority shall consider any representations duly made to the authority; and as soon as may be after the authorisation has been given or the decision has been taken to refuse it the confirming authority shall send to any person who has made representations with respect thereto specifying an address for the purposes of this paragraph, notification thereof in a registered letter by post to the address specified."

In accordance with the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 37, the Post Office was made a confirming authority for the purposes of s. 2 of this Act.

In May, 1947, the Post Office was minded to acquire this land at Alfriston for the purposes of a telephone exchange, and negotiations were started with the plaintiffs with a view to acquiring the property. Certain offers were made, but nothing came of those approaches by way of a voluntary agreement, and eventually, on June 22, 1948, a representative of the Ministry of Works wrote to the secretary of the plaintiff company saying that he was directed by the Minister to enclose a notice on behalf of the Post Office in relation to the proposed acquisition of land at Alfriston in accordance with the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The enclosed notice was to this effect:

"Take notice that the Postmaster-General is about to take into consideration the giving of an authorisation under s. 2 (2) of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, as amended by s. 37 (4) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, to purchase compulsorily the land which is described in the schedule hereto being land the acquisition of which, pursuant to s. 37 (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, the Minister of Town and Country Planning and the Postmaster-General are satisfied is necessary for the purposes of the Post Office. The said land is delineated and shown coloured pink on a plan marked TCP/PO/3 and signed on behalf of the Postmaster-General and deposited at the offices of the Hailsham Rural District Council, Cortlandt, Hailsham, Sussex, where it may be seen at all reasonable hours. Any representations regarding the proposed authorisation must be made in writing and addressed to the Ministry of Works, Director of Lands and Accommodation, Romney House, Marsham Street, London, within fourteen days from the date of service of this notice on you."

Certain representations were sent in on behalf of the plaintiffs, but, notwithstanding the views which they advanced, on Sept. 28, 1948, the Minister of Works signed an authorisation, and that authorisation, after referring to the relevant statutory provisions, recites that:

A "The Postmaster-General is satisfied that it is expedient that he should purchase the lands described in the schedule to this authorisation (to which lands the provisions of para. 1 of sched. III to the Act of 1946 do not apply) under s. 37 of the Act of 1947 (being lands which the Minister of Town and Country Planning and the Postmaster-General are satisfied that the acquisition thereof is necessary for the purposes of the Post Office) and that it is urgently necessary in the public interest that he should be enabled to obtain possession of the said lands without delay. And whereas the provisions of para. 2 of sched. III to the Act of 1946 have been complied with. Now, therefore, in pursuance of the powers conferred on him by s. 37 of the Act of 1947 and s. 2 of the Act of 1946, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorised to purchase compulsorily for the purposes of the Post Office the lands described in the schedule to this authorisation."

B Those lands are in fact the lands in Alfriston to which I have referred.
C That authorisation was sent by the Ministry of Works enclosed with a letter dated Oct. 18, and addressed to the solicitors for the plaintiffs, and in that covering letter the writer, on behalf of the Ministry, said:

"I am directed to inform you that it has been decided to proceed with the acquisition of this land and the necessary authorisation for compulsory purchase has now been made."

D Having regard to the requirements of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1946, it was incumbent on the defendant to enter into possession of the land not later than three months after the date of the authorisation, namely, by Dec. 28, 1948, but he did not do so. After certain further representations had been made by the plaintiffs and certain correspondence had passed, to which I need not refer, the Postmaster-General intimated that he was proposing to take possession of this land on Jan. 3, 1949, and that he proceeded to do. It was then drawn to his attention that he was out of time, that he had no right to go on this land by virtue of the authorisation of Sept. 28, 1948, and that he must be regarded as a trespasser. At first he was disposed to dispute that, but eventually he accepted it, and he left the property on May 31, 1949. He then proceeded to put this machinery in motion all over again. On July 13, 1949, a notice was served on the plaintiffs similar to that which was dated June 22, 1948, intimating that the Postmaster-General was taking into consideration whether he should grant the necessary authorisation, and so on, and that was followed by renewed objections by the plaintiffs, and certain correspondence followed on those representations. On Aug. 27, 1949, an authorisation, in precisely the same terms as that of Sept. 28, 1948, and containing the same recitals, was served on the plaintiffs, and on Oct. 12, 1949, the defendant re-entered into possession. On Oct. 27, 1949, the plaintiffs issued their writ, and they claim by their statement of claim a declaration that the authorisation made by the Postmaster-General on Aug. 27, 1949, was invalid, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to possession, mesne profits, or, in the alternative, damages, in respect of wrongful occupation by the defendant from Jan. 3 to May 31, 1949, and from Oct. 12, 1949, until delivery of possession to the plaintiffs, and damages for wrongfully entering the plaintiffs' land and depositing chattels and executing works thereon.

H The Postmaster-General is not concerned to dispute that his original admission was unprotected so far as it rested for its validity on the authorisation of Sept. 28, 1948, and he says that he is prepared to pay damages in respect of any damage that may have resulted to the plaintiffs by reason of his having entered into possession without proper authority. With regard to the authorisation of August, 1949, he says that that was perfectly in order, and he relies on it as establishing a title to possession. The matter came before me last term on the application of the defendant to have the whole case disposed of on a point of law, and attempts were made on both sides to formulate precisely what question of law would determine the whole of the litigation between the parties, apart from the question of damages for trespass. No satisfactory point of law emerged, but the plaintiffs did amend their statement of claim by pleading:

"The defendant did not enter on or take possession of the plaintiffs' said land in accordance with s. 2 (3) of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, or otherwise until more than three months after the said authorisation dated Sept. 28, 1948. Neither on July 13, 1949 (the date of the said purported second notice) nor on Aug. 27, 1949 (the date of the said purported second authorisation), had there been since June 22, 1948 (the date of the said first notice) or since Sept. 28, 1948 (the date of the said first authorisation), any change in the circumstances relevant to the decision of the Postmaster-General to give either of such notices or either of such authorisations."

To that the defendant put in an amended defence as follows:

"The defendant makes no admission with regard to the second sentence of the said paragraph and will object that the allegations in the said sentence are irrelevant and that under s. 2 (2) of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, as amended by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, it is within the exclusive discretion of the Postmaster-General, into whose exercise of such discretion this Honourable Court will not inquire, to determine whether there is any such circumstance or absence of circumstance as alleged in the said second sentence and whether it is relevant to the Postmaster-General's decision referred to in the said second sentence."

Before me, no evidence has been called. The question of damages is to be referred to chambers because, as I understand it, the gentleman who might have given evidence on that matter—the plaintiffs' solicitor—is unfortunately unwell and unable to attend.

Accordingly, the only matter which has been discussed before me is a pure question of law arising on the construction of the legislation to which I have referred, and, more particularly, to s. 2 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1946. Counsel for the plaintiffs pointed out that in the ordinary type—if one may so describe it—of compulsory purchase, there are considerable safeguards, which have become stereotyped, of the interests of the owner of the land affected. In particular, there is, in general, either a public inquiry or a special hearing of objectors, and that is followed by a report which is considered by the Minister who, with all the assistance thus offered to him, arrives at a decision. Counsel says that that is the ordinary form of procedure where a government department desires to acquire compulsorily the property of one of His Majesty's subjects. The other form of compulsory purchase is that provided by s. 2 of this Act of 1946. It is a method of procedure which does not give to the persons affected the safeguards which the ordinary procedure affords, because there is no public inquiry and the only opportunity which a person affected has to make known his views is to submit written representations which can be taken into account, but which may not have the same force as oral representations. Counsel says that this form of acquisition is of such shape and character, as appears from the fact that it was only to last for a period of five years and was confined in its intendment to the acquisition of land in urgent cases, that an exercise of powers under so special an authority should be jealously scrutinised by the court. Counsel pointed out that one of the principal safeguards in the section, which introduces this special power and confers it, is that which requires entry into possession not later than three months after the giving of an authorisation, and he argues that the object of that was, presumably, to protect the owner of property who would know where he stood in the matter and would not be left wondering indefinitely whether his land was to be taken or not. Applying those considerations to the facts of the present case, he said that the Post Office was seeking, in effect, to extend the three months limit which it had by inadvertence overstepped by setting into motion this machinery for the second time. Counsel's arguments went rather further than that in the first instance, because his first proposition, although he said it was not necessary in this case to show it, was that the Post Office cannot use this procedure twice. That view imposes a limitation on the apparent powers of the Minister which I am unable to accept, as it would result, if ever a mistake were made, as one was obviously made in the present case, in immunising thereafter for ever the land which the Minister had desired to obtain. I see no warrant for accepting such a qualification as that. Secondly, it was said that the Minister cannot use this procedure twice unless the circumstances have changed; and, finally, and this is the point which is nearest home, that there is no power in the Minister in substance to extend the period of three months, prescribed by s. 2 (3). It was said that here the Minister was obviously seeking how he could extricate himself from the difficulty which had arisen from the fact that possession was not taken, as it should have been taken, within three months of the first authorisation, and that to rectify the matter he had brought into play this machinery all over again in such a way as to reduce the whole position to something approximating to a farce. From that way of looking at it, counsel for the plaintiffs developed his argument by saying that, if the defendant was right, it could sterilise land for an indefinite period by a series of repeated authorisations so that land-owners might find their land sterilised indefinitely without compensation and not knowing whether they could or could not rightly regard themselves as able to develop the property or to seek to find a purchaser if they wanted to sell. The argument for the plaintiffs is that that is a thing which, on a fair construction of s. 2 of this Act, is not open to the defendant, or to any government department who is a confirming authority, to do. Certain illustrations were then presented to me as to what a government department might do by way of trying to get the best of both worlds, if one may so describe it, by serving authorisations in regard to two plots of land and renewing them as and when their time ran out, and in the meantime deciding which one they really wanted to have, and so on. It is legitimate and, I think, helpful, to make criticisms of that sort, but one has to bear in mind that when the legislature confers powers on a Minister it is conferring powers on a person who, presumably, will use those powers, not only bona fide, but in a responsible spirit and in the true interests of the public and furtherance of the objects for the attainment of which the powers were conferred. I approach this legislation mindful of what might happen if I accept the defendant's argument, though confessing, as I am bound to confess, that I thought that many of the possibilities which were mentioned are extremely unlikely to arise in practice.

The plaintiffs do not contend that they can question the fact that the Postmaster-General was in fact "satisfied," within the meaning of s. 2 (2), and it is well settled that where a statutory provision empowers a minister to do something which he is satisfied is necessary having regard to a certain state of affairs, a statement by him that he is so satisfied will be accepted in these courts. Consequently, I approach the matter on the basis that it cannot be disputed that on Aug. 27, 1949, the Postmaster-General was satisfied in the sense indicated. Unless I can find something which cuts down the prima facie and ordinary meaning expressed in the perfectly simple language of s. 2 (2), I am bound to hold that the conditions precedent for the issue of this authorisation existed. I am invited by the plaintiffs to say that, although it is not necessary, nor, indeed, may it be practicable, to read into sub-s. (1) any express or necessarily implicit language of qualification, nevertheless I cannot accept the argument of the defendant in this case without, in effect, ignoring, the spirit, if not the letter, of sub-s. (3), because, as I have already mentioned, it was put to me that, if that were right, then the government department could extend indefinitely the time limit imposed.

I do not think that there is anything like enough in sub-s. (3) or the requirements of sub-s. (3) to impose any such limitation as is suggested on the powers conferred by sub-s. (2). As I see it, I have only to be satisfied that at the date when the authorisation emanated from the Postmaster-General he was satisfied as to the things regarding which he had to be satisfied before that authorisation could issue. Once it has been established to my satisfaction that those conditions precedent have been fulfilled, it appears to me that the matter is at an end, and none the less so because the effect of the language may be to extend the time in the sense that the Minister, although he has not entirely fallen in line with the time limit imposed by sub-s. (3), is getting his way by having another opportunity of putting himself in order. It is really not extending the time limit. It is starting the machinery in motion again. Representations in writing can be sent in again, and must be considered again. When the second authorisation issues the Minister must be just as satisfied about the issues as he was on the first occasion. Seeing that on the first occasion the Post Office failed to carry into effective operation the implementation of these powers in relation to this land, and that it was prompted to make a second attempt, conforming again with the requirements of the Minister's being satisfied, it seems to me that I should be introducing a limitation on the exercise of his powers which is not only foreign to the language which is used, but which also would appear to be foreign to the conception related to this kind of matter which arises under the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 32 (1).

I have very carefully considered all the arguments which have been addressed to me, and I have done my best to deal with them, but I might sum the whole thing up by saying that I do not think any real point of construction arises here. The language seems to be reasonably plain, and, provided always that the Minister does what he is required to do before the authorisation can issue, the fact that he has tried to acquire the land already is no obstacle to his trying again, even though he tries immediately after the failure of his first endeavour. Accordingly, in my judgment, the second authorisation was valid, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief on the footing that it is void. There will be no declaration that the second authorisation was valid as there is no counterclaim asking for such a declaration. The plaintiffs succeed only to the extent of having an inquiry as to the damages which they sustained by reason of the wrongful occupation of their land by the defendant from Jan. 3, 1949 to May 31, 1949, and for wrongfully entering the land.

Order accordingly. Costs down to the delivery of the defence to be the plaintiffs; costs thereafter to be the defendant's. No order as to costs of the application to set down a point of law. Costs of inquiry as to damages reserved.

R. v. BERMONDSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL. Ex parte LEONARD AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Finnemore, JJ.), April 24, 1950.]

Metropolis—Street trading—Application to designate street—Earlier designating resolution rescinded—No right to apply anew—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947 (c. xlv), s. 16.

By the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947, s. 16 (4): "If it is desired by any persons (not being less than ten in number) residing or trading in a borough that any street in the borough in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed should become a designated street those persons may at any time after . . . Nov. 30 [1947] make application to the borough council for the passing by the borough council of a designating resolution in respect of that street."

On Nov. 27, 1947, the respondent borough council designated S. road as one of the streets in which street trading might take place. In April, 1949, that resolution was rescinded. On Oct. 17, 1949, the applicants, who were street traders, asked the council to consider their application that the street might again be designated for street trading. The council refused to consider the application on the ground that, as a designating resolution had once been passed relating to the street, no further application could be made. On a motion for an order of mandamus to direct the council to consider the application,

HELD: where a designating resolution had been passed by a borough council and subsequently rescinded there was no right under s. 16 (4) of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947, to make an application to re-designate the street in question as a trading street.

[AS TO STREET TRADING IN THE METROPOLIS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., 1950 Supp., Tit. Street and Aerial Traffic; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, 2nd Supp.]

MOTION for an order of mandamus directing Bermondsey Borough Council to determine an application by street traders to designate a street for street trading purposes. The applicants contended that they had the right to make such an application under s. 16 (4) of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

G. G. Baker for the applicants.

Vernon Gattie for the council.

J. P. Ashworth for the Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : In this case counsel for the applicants moves for an order of mandamus addressed to Bermondsey Borough Council and also to the Home Secretary, commanding the council to take into account and consider representations made by certain street traders and to consider whether or not they will designate Southwark Park Road as a designated street within the meaning of s. 16 (1) of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947.

For many years street trading has been carried on from stalls in the Southwark Park Road. By s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1947 it is provided:

"A borough council may from time to time by resolution—(a) designate any street within the borough as a street in respect of which they will entertain applications for the grant of street trading licences; and (b) specify in relation to any designated street within the borough any class or classes of articles or things which or other than which they will not prescribe in any street trading licences granted by them in respect of that street; and may from time to time by subsequent resolution rescind or vary any such resolution . . .”

with a proviso that they are to consult the commissioner of police. By sub-s. (2) (a):

“A borough council shall give public notice of the passing by them of a resolution under the foregoing sub-section by posting a notice in the street to which the resolution relates and in such other manner as they think desirable.”

So that will apply to resolutions designating or resolutions rescinding former resolutions. Sub-section (3) provides:

“A borough council shall as soon as practicable after the passing of this Act take into consideration—(a) the streets prescribed by the street trading licences granted by them and then in force; (b) the number of such licences for the renewal of which applications are likely to be made to them; (c) all other circumstances of the street trading within the borough; and (d) any representations which may be made to them with respect to the matters aforesaid by any recognised organisation representative of street traders within the borough; and shall not later than Nov. 30, 1947, pass such designating resolutions as appear to them to be necessary for the time being for the purposes of this Part of this Act.”

It is clear that Parliament intended by that sub-section that the designation of the streets in which traders would be allowed to trade should be settled at the earliest possible moment. There is no question that before Nov. 30, 1947, the council had designated Southwark Park Road as one of the streets in which street trading might take place. Sub-section (4) provides:

“If it is desired by any persons (not being less than ten in number) residing or trading in a borough that any street in the borough in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed should become a designated street those persons may at any time after the said Nov. 30, make application to the borough council for the passing by the borough council of a designating resolution in respect of that street.”

It is in respect of the right given by that sub-section that this order of mandamus is being sought, because there is no question that the council have said: “We are not going to consider this because Southwark Park Road is a street in respect of which a designating resolution at one time has been passed.”

If the matter stood there, it might be said that, if a designating resolution has been passed and then rescinded, the street must be regarded de novo after the rescission. We look, however, at s. 16 (8) which says:

“Any person aggrieved by a resolution of a borough council passed under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of this section or by a resolution rescinding or varying any such resolution or any designating resolution may within twenty-eight days of the passing of the resolution by which he is aggrieved appeal to the Secretary of State.”

That shows that, if a street which has been designated has that character taken away by a resolution rescinding the resolution by which it was designated, the persons aggrieved may appeal to the Secretary of State. Parliament has limited the time in which the decision of the council can be appealed to the Secretary of State, and it would seem odd if persons who do not appeal within the prescribed period could begin de novo after that time has elapsed. I think that the real answer to the argument of counsel for the applicants is that the words in sub-s. (4) are “in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed,” and are not “in respect of which a designating resolution is not in force.” If it was intended that at any time persons could apply for the designation, or, if I may use the expression, the re-designation, of a street, it seems to me that the appropriate words would be: "If it is desired by any persons that any street in the borough in respect of which a designating resolution is not in force should become a designated street . . ." or simply "If it is desired by any persons that any street in the borough should become a designated street . . .". The words of the sub-section are "in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed." In respect of the street in question here a resolution has been passed, and it has been rescinded. When it was rescinded a right of appeal was given, and of that right the parties did not avail themselves, it may be by misunderstanding or oversight. There must be some finality in this matter, and, taking the section as a whole, I think it was intended that if the council rescind a resolution designating a street, the remedy is by appeal to the Secretary of State brought within the time permitted by s. 16 (8). For these reasons I am of opinion that this application fails.

MORRIS, J. : I have come to the same conclusion. In my judgment, the court has only to consider the meaning of the words to be found in s. 16 (4), "any street in the borough in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed." It seems to me that there is great force in what counsel for the applicants has said—that, on the facts that have given rise to the present application, there were good reasons which actuated the traders when they refrained from appealing within twenty-eight days of the rescinding resolution. I think there is also great force in the submission that it might well be that future residents and future traders in the area would desire to apply in respect of Southwark Park Road, and they would never be people who had had the opportunity to appeal under sub-s. (8). But when those contentions are analysed, they amount to no more than an argument that different words might have been employed in the section from those which were employed. It seems to me, therefore, that the sole function of the court is to decide the construction of the actual words used. Those are different words from such words as "is not in force," or "is not for the time being in force." Is Southwark Park Road, or is it not, a street in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed? A designating resolution was originally passed in respect of Southwark Park Road, and, therefore, the conclusion at which I arrive is that the application fails.

FINNEMORE, J. : I have come to the same conclusion, perhaps a little regretfully, because, in one sense, the construction we feel bound to put on the provisions in this Act does limit somewhat the rights of subjects, but the matter seems to me to be clear.

A borough council is given power under s. 16 to designate certain streets for the purposes of street trading. It is also given power to rescind or vary a resolution to that effect. If a street is not designated, it is open under sub-s. (4) to persons affected to apply to the council that that street should be designated, and, if the council refuses, they then have the right to appeal to the Secretary of State. That applies to the streets described in sub-s. (4) as streets in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed. I think that must mean, has never been passed. There is a further procedure, because the council, if it does designate a street, has power to rescind or vary that resolution, and then persons who are aggrieved by that rescission or variation have rights of appeal similar to those of persons who apply in respect of a street which is not designated. The position, therefore, seems to be that if a street has never been designated, persons affected may apply to the council to have it designated. On refusal, they must appeal within twenty-eight days to the Secretary of State. People who are concerned about the rescinding of a resolution which has designated a street have also a right of appeal within twenty-eight days to the Secretary of State. If people in the second class omit to make their appeal within twenty-eight days, I do not think they are entitled to come under sub-s. (4) and say that because the resolution designating the street has been rescinded it is a street in respect of which a designating resolution has not been passed. I think they are confined to their rights of appeal, and once the twenty-eight days have passed, they cannot take any other step to deal with the position arising out of the rescinding of the resolution. Accordingly, I agree that this application fails.

Application dismissed with costs.

EDWARDS v. NEWLAND (E. BURCHETT, LTD., Third Parties).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), April 21, 24, 1950.]

Bailment—Personal contract—Personal skill and care—Storage of furniture for reward—Damage to premises by bombing—Loss of goods—Reasonable care—Burden of proof.

In 1939 the defendant agreed to store the plaintiff's furniture for reward, but, instead of storing it himself, he arranged, without the plaintiff's knowledge, for its storage by the third parties. In October, 1940, the third parties' premises were severely damaged by a bomb. They immediately notified the defendant and advised him, by a letter dated Oct. 21, 1940, to remove his goods as soon as possible as there was danger of their being damaged. The defendant wrote to the plaintiff with similar advice, but his letter suggested that it was his own premises and not those of third parties that had been bombed. The plaintiff attempted to remove his furniture, but was prevented from doing so by the defendant as his account with the defendant for the storage of the goods had not been paid in full. The third parties took steps to render the premises secure, but there was a period during which, through no fault of the third parties, thefts were possible. In 1945, when the plaintiff required the re-delivery of his furniture from the defendant, some goods were missing. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages from the defendant for the loss of the goods, the defendant denied liability, but joined the third parties, against whom he claimed the amount of any damages for which he might be held liable to the plaintiff.

HELD: (i) a contract to store is a contract of bailment under which the bailor transfers possession to the bailee, and the bailee undertakes to take possession of the goods and exercise reasonable care in looking after them; he can only deal with them in accordance with the authority, express or implied, conferred on him by the bailor; and, therefore, a person who has undertaken to be a bailee for storage, and who never, in fact, acts as such a bailee, but gets someone else to take possession of the goods, is in breach of his contract ab initio.

Per TUCKER, L.J.: if in any case there is authority, express or implied, on the bailee to part with the possession of the goods, the contract ceases to be one purely of bailment. It becomes a complex contract under which the defendant may be under an obligation to the bailor so long as he has custody of the goods and has other obligations placed on him if and when, in accordance with the authority conferred by the bailor, he parts with the possession of the goods.

(ii) in a contract for the storage of furniture, the personal care of the bailee for storage was of the essence of the contract, and, therefore, as the defendant did not look after the goods himself, but gave possession of them to third parties, he was in breach of his contract ab initio, and was liable to the plaintiff in damages for the loss of the goods.

(iii) the third parties were not relieved from their obligations to the defendant by their letter of Oct. 21, 1940, and the onus was on them to show that they had taken all proper measures for the protection of the goods after the premises were bombed and that the goods disappeared without any failure on their part to take reasonable care; as they had given a sufficient explanation of the circumstances in which the goods might have disappeared without any breach of their obligations as bailees, the defendant was not entitled to damages against them.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of HUMPHREYS, J., dated Jan. 17, 1950, in an action claiming damages for the loss of certain furniture which the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant for storage. The defendant denied liability on the ground (inter alia) that he had not agreed to store the furniture himself, but had merely agreed to arrange for its storage, and he cited third parties, to whom he had given possession of the furniture for storage and against whom he claimed any damages for which he might be held liable to the plaintiff. HUMPHREYS, J., found that the defendant had undertaken to store the goods and held him liable in damages to the plaintiff. The learned judge dismissed the defendant's claim against the third parties on the ground that the loss occurred without any failure on their part to take reasonable care. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Eric Sachs, K.C., and Glazebrook for the defendant.

A. H. Ormerod for the plaintiff.

Rees-Davies for the third parties.

TUCKER, L.J.: I will ask SOMERVELL, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendant from a decision of HUMPHREYS, J. Third parties are cited, and HUMPHREYS, J., found the defendant liable to the plaintiff for a certain sum, and found for the third parties in the proceedings as between the defendant and the third parties. The claim set out in the statement of claim alleges:

"In or about May, 1939, the defendant agreed with the plaintiff to store for him for reward the furniture and effects described in an inventory dated Nov. 10, 1944, and to deliver the same to the plaintiff when required."

It then goes on to allege that in December, 1945, when the plaintiff required re-delivery of the goods, certain of the goods which it was alleged had been delivered in 1939 were not re-delivered. Particulars were given, and the value as set out in the particulars amounted to some £320 odd pounds.

The first defence was that the defendant did not agree to store the plaintiff's goods, but agreed with the plaintiff's wife, as the plaintiff's agent, to arrange to store certain goods, and that the defendant made a contract on the plaintiff's behalf with E. Burchett, Ltd., the third parties, that they should store the goods. It is stated in para. 2 of the defence:

"In the said contract the defendant acted as agent for the plaintiff and not otherwise."

On the point whether the defendant contracted as agent for the plaintiff there was a conflict of evidence, and on that point the defendant failed. [His LORDSHIP dealt with the evidence on the point and cited a passage from the judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., in which the learned judge set out the evidence of the plaintiff in the matter. His LORDSHIP continued:] In a later passage in his judgment the learned judge dealt with a letter (to which I shall refer later) and said:

"I am quite satisfied that the plaintiff is right in saying that he had not the faintest idea that the goods had been stored with [the third parties]. He thought they had been stored with [the defendant], with whom he had a contract to that effect."

Those findings were, I think, accepted by counsel for the defendant, and, in any case, it is clear to me that they cannot be disturbed in this court.

The main issue of fact below was: Had the plaintiff proved that all or any of the goods set out in the particulars were deposited in 1939? There was a great deal of evidence about that, and the learned judge found that the plaintiff failed as to some of the goods for which he was claiming and succeeded as to others. The sum claimed was £321. Judgment was given for £84, and that is not challenged here.

With regard to the claim as between the plaintiff and the defendant the learned judge found that the defendant had undertaken to store the goods, and, not having himself stored the goods, he had no defence to the claim. With regard to that the learned judge said:

"The defendant's answer to this claim is: 'I did nothing. I undertook to look after your goods and what I did was to hand them over to somebody else whom you do not know, and said: "Will you look after these goods?"' The defendant may have a very good action against the third parties if they have not looked after the goods, but . . . he has no answer to the plaintiff's claim, which is to the effect: 'You undertook to look after the goods. I cannot bring an action against the third parties. I do not know who they are, except from what you told me. I had no contract with them, therefore I cannot sue them. It is you that I sue, and if you have not looked after my goods and have, in fact, not returned them, then I claim damages'."

A The learned judge says that that is good law and good sense, and there is no real dispute in regard to the facts. Counsel for the defendant challenges the judge's decision that that is good law. He submits that, if A undertakes to store goods, he is not himself undertaking to take charge of them and to take reasonable care of them, but is undertaking that reasonable care will be taken of them by any person to whom he entrusts them. He referred to some cases (none of which, he agreed, dealt with contracts of bailment) where the question was discussed whether the obligation taken, on the face of the contract, by the original party was an obligation which could be performed by a sub-contractor or, in some of the cases, by an assignee. In British Waggon Co. v. Lea & Co. (1), repairs were to be done to certain waggons, and the court decided that the repairs were such that the other party could not say that the contract was at an end because the repairs, in the events which happened, were being done by someone other than the original contracting party. COCKBURN, C.J., delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, said (5 Q.B.D. 153):

D "We entirely concur in the principle on which the decision in Robson v. Drummond (2) rests, namely, that where a person contracts with another to do work or perform service, and it can be inferred that the person employed has been selected with reference to his individual skill, competency, or other personal qualification, the inability or unwillingness of the party so employed to execute the work or perform the service is a sufficient answer to any demand by a stranger to the original contract of the performance of it by the other party, and entitles the latter to treat the contract as at an end, notwithstanding that the person tendered to take the place of the contracting party may be equally well qualified to do the service. Personal performance is in such a case of the essence of the contract, which, consequently, cannot in its absence be enforced against an unwilling party."

F That is the principle and it was considered in Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900), Ltd. (3), the next case to which we were referred. There it was held that the principle did not apply. At the end of his judgment LORD LINDLEY referred to the British Waggon Co. case (1) and said ([1903] A.C. 425):

"In conclusion, I will only add that British Waggon Co. v. Lea (1) was, in my opinion, rightly decided, and is an authority very much in point for the Associated Company."

G We were referred to Davies v. Collins (4), a more recent decision of this court. That case concerned a contract for cleaning a uniform and doing certain small repairs, and the decision turned in the main on the actual wording of a condition of the contract, which, of course, does not assist us here, but, in his judgment, LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 250):

H "Whether or not in any given contract performance can properly be carried out by the employment of a sub-contractor must depend on the proper inference to be drawn from the contract itself, the subject-matter of it, and other material surrounding circumstances."

Counsel for the defendant has pointed out that there is no reported case in which a bailee simpliciter, such as the bailee in this case, who simply contracted to store goods, has been held entitled to take advantage of the limited liability which attaches to such a bailee when he has in fact entrusted the goods to someone else. In my opinion, the submission of counsel for the defendant that the bailee undertakes only that reasonable care will be taken of the goods by any person to whom he entrusts them fails on two grounds which, though related, may to some extent be said to be distinct. I think it fails from the nature of the contract of bailment which we have to consider. A contract to store is a contract of bailment under which the bailor transfers possession to the bailee, and the bailee is undertaking, as it seems to me, to take possession of the goods and exercise reasonable care in looking after them on the principles which have been laid down in the cases. Therefore, a man who has undertaken to be a bailee for storage, and who never, in fact, acts as such a bailee, but gets someone else to take possession of the goods, seems to me to be in breach of his contract ab initio. I think it may also be said that the class of case with which we are dealing, viz., the storage of furniture, comes within the principle stated in the British Waggon Co. case (1), namely, that this is the type of contract in which the personal care of the other contracting party is of the essence of the contract. Storage of furniture is a matter which can be done carefully or not so carefully. It clearly is a type of case in which a person may have a reputation for taking great care. Nor do I think it necessary in a case of this kind for the plaintiff to show that he relied on any special or general reputation of the defendant. The defendant was recommended to the plaintiff's wife, and he was chosen and asked if he would store the furniture, and, as he undertook to do so, I think that was a type of matter which he could not hand over to be performed by a sub-contractor. Therefore, for those reasons, I think the submission fails. I think the learned judge was right in what he said, that, in the circumstances which I have detailed, the defendant had no answer to this claim. I should, perhaps, also refer to this. There is, I think, no dispute that this was a plain contract to store, because, if one turns to para. 3 of the defence, which follows on the paragraph in which the defendant alleges that he acted merely as agent, he says:

"If, contrary to the defendant's contention, he agreed as principal to store the plaintiff's goods . . ."

That is how he puts the alternative defence, and, it seems to me, he did not store the plaintiff's goods. That disposes of that point.

I will now turn to the second point. The learned judge, having held the defendant liable to the plaintiff, held that the third parties were not liable to the defendant, and that decision is also challenged by counsel for the defendant. It is clear that the third parties, vis-a-vis the defendant, were bailees and under a duty to use reasonable care. In considering this part of the case, I must go into the history of what happened. These goods were stored in April, 1939. Then the war broke out and on Oct. 15, 1940, the third parties' premises were bombed. On Oct. 21, 1940, the third parties wrote this letter to the defendant:

"We regret to inform you that our premises have been severely damaged by a bomb. Your effects are so far intact, but owing to the roof being shattered, all goods stored are open to the elements, although we are endeavouring to make it as waterproof as possible. Also, one wall is badly fractured and liable to collapse. We would strongly advise you to remove your goods as soon as possible."

The defendant, having received that letter, wrote to the plaintiff, saying:

"I regret to inform you that the premises where your furniture is stored have been severely damaged by a bomb. Your effects are so far intact, but owing to the roof being shattered, all goods stored are open to the elements, although I am endeavouring to make it as waterproof as possible. Also, one wall is badly fractured and liable to collapse, I would strongly advise you to remove your goods as soon as possible. Enclosed please find account to date and a cheque in settlement will oblige."

As the learned judge pointed out, that was a somewhat curiously worded letter, and it was that letter on which he in part relied in finding against the defendant on the defence put forward of agency, because the defendant was not himself "endeavouring to make it as waterproof as possible." As appears from the next letter of Oct. 30, 1940, the plaintiff's wife, whose husband was on military service, sought to remove the goods, but the defendant had presumably instructed the third parties that the goods were not to be delivered unless and until his (the defendant's) account with the plaintiff was paid in full. I cannot but think that that might have been made more clear to the plaintiff by the letter from the defendant to the plaintiff, but the plaintiff wrote a letter to the defendant in which she said:

"I have learned to-day that the firm with whom I arranged to remove the furniture were refused access to it in view of the account outstanding. I am not able to get in touch with my husband quickly owing to his military duties—so I have filled in one of the cheques he left me for half the amount—I do not like to send the whole until I have seen him. I should be most grateful if you would telephone the removal firm of F. de 'Ath & Sons . . . and arrange for them to re-store. I will come to London as soon as the line is in order again—when I shall be glad if you will tell me when I can call if there was any damage done and will settle the balance of the account. I am most anxious that the furniture should be moved immediately if your are not able to make provision for its safety yourselves."

There does not appear to have been an answer to that letter. In the course of argument the court put to counsel for the defendant a possible point against him which was rather on these lines. Might it not be said, even on his view of the contract, that the defendant could and should have arranged to have the goods re-stored and could have taken proper steps of that kind without sacrificing his lien? On the view I take on the first point, it is unnecessary to consider that. However, there was also an argument, on which it is necessary to express an opinion, with regard to the effect of the letter of Oct. 21, 1940. In the court below there was clearly some argument whether, as a result of the writing of that letter, the third parties ceased to be responsible. That, I think, if those words are given their legal import, is wrong. In my view, they clearly remained liable to take reasonable care in the circumstances. Having regard, however, to the difficulties of staff and all the rest of it, if premises are bombed, the goods may be imperilled either from theft or from weather, although the standard of reasonable care which the law imposes is complied with. That is the view which I take as to the effect of that letter.

Before turning to the evidence, I will refer to the authorities on which counsel for the defendant relied. The first was Brabant & Co. v. King (5), a decision of the Privy Council on an appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland. The headnote is:

"Where the government, being bailees for hire, stored the appellants' explosive goods in sheds near to the water-edge :—Held, that the selection of such a site rendered it incumbent upon them to place the goods at such a level as would in all probability ensure their absolute immunity from the incursion of flood water; that the appellants were entitled to rely on the care and skill of their bailees, and could not be said to have accepted any risks of defective storage with which they had made themselves acquainted."

The Supreme Court held by a majority:

"... that the government were liable for negligence in the manner in which the explosives were dealt with, but that they were not liable for damage caused by any unsuitability in the magazines, as this was known to the plaintiffs and their servants, and that the maxim 'Volenti non fit injuria' applied."

The passage in the judgment of the Privy Council which was relied on by counsel for the defendant is this ([1895] A.C. 640):

"Their lordships can see no reason to doubt that the relation in which the government stood to the appellant company was simply that of bailees for hire. They were therefore under a legal obligation to exercise the same degree of care, towards the preservation of the goods entrusted to them from injury, which might reasonably be expected from a skilled store-keeper, acquainted with the risks to be apprehended either from the character of the storehouse itself or of its locality; and that obligation included, not only the duty of taking all reasonable precautions to obviate these risks, but the duty of taking all proper measures for the protection of the goods when such risks were imminent or had actually occurred."

I accept, I think, the points which counsel for the defendant made on that case. One, perhaps, relates back to the point I have just considered. The mere fact that the defendant was told that the premises had been bombed did not, as from that moment, relieve the third parties of their obligations. I also accept that, when an emergency arises, it is the duty, as is stated here, to take all proper measures for the protection of the goods.

The next case cited was Coldman v. Hill (6), which dealt with an agister of cattle. The cattle were stolen and it was held by the Court of Appeal that reasonable steps were not taken after the theft occurred. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1919] 1 K.B. 454):

"First, what was the defendant's duty? He was a bailee for hire, and it is clear that his duty was not that of an absolute insurer, but was to use towards the preservation of the goods entrusted to him from injury that degree of care which might reasonably be expected from a skilled agister or a reasonable man in respect of his own goods, and that obligation included not only the duty of taking all reasonable precautions to obviate risks of injury, but the duty of taking all proper measures for the protection of the goods when such risks were imminent or had actually occurred."

That was really the same kind of point as in Brabant & Co. v. King (5).

The last case cited on this point was Brook's Wharf & Bull Wharf, Ltd. v. Goodman Brothers (7). In his judgment LORD WRIGHT, M.R. ([1936] 3 All E.R. 702) referred to a statement of the rule given in a dissenting judgment by LORD DUNEDIN in Ballard v. North British Railway Co. (8), in which LORD DUNEDIN said (1923 S.C. 54):

"I think this is a case where the circumstances warrant the view that the fact of the accident is relevant to infer negligence. But what is the next step? I think that, if the defenders can show a way in which the accident may have occurred without negligence, the cogency of the fact of the accident by itself disappears, and the pursuer is left as he began, namely, that he has to show negligence. I need scarcely add that the suggestion of how the accident may have occurred must be a reasonable suggestion."

After citing this passage, LORD WRIGHT, M.R., said ([1936] 3 All E.R. 702):

"I think this is merely stating the same rule as that stated by LORD LOREBURN, L.C., and LORD HALSBURY from another aspect. If the plaintiffs show that they took all reasonable and proper care of the goods, the mere fact that they were, notwithstanding, stolen is not sufficient any longer to make them liable for negligence. Their explanation is, then, that the thieves must have shown ingenuity and daring against which reasonable precautions could not avail. Hence, I think the plaintiffs discharge the burden of proof upon them if they can show that the theft took place notwithstanding that they had taken all reasonable precautions to guard against the danger."

Of course, the circumstances were different here from those in any of those cases, and I think it would be impossible to seek to lay down some formula as to what a defendant bailee, who fails to return some of the goods deposited, has to prove to discharge the onus which the law places on him. It will depend

A on the circumstances. The circumstances here were, as indicated in the letter, that the premises were bombed (I will come back to the relevance of that again later). Also, I think it is a relevant circumstance that there was no checking of these goods by the defendant at any time from when they were deposited in 1939 to the time when they were asked for in 1945, but I do not know whether this was negligence on anyone's part, because it is difficult to get about during
B a war. On this part of the case the main passage in the learned judge's judgment is as follows:

"As between the defendant and the third parties, the position is that the third parties had agreed to use reasonable care and look after the goods which, from their point of view, were the property of the defendant, because it was with him that they agreed to look after the goods, for a reward. The
C evidence is that they did use reasonable care and attention up to Oct. 20, 1940, and on that day something happened for which they were not responsible—the bombing. The third parties took all reasonable precautions, so far as they could, of course. They told the authorities and they did all that could be done physically. They also wrote to every person who had goods deposited with them—the person in this case being, of course, the
D defendant—asking them to remove the goods. I have already stated how the defendant dealt with the matter, but, so far as the third parties were concerned, they had written to the defendant to remove the goods. He did not do it, and, indeed, he prevented it from being done. Therefore, I have to consider the effect of the letter of Oct. 21, 1940, as between the third parties and the defendant. Can I say that, as between them, on and
E after Oct. 15—if that be the date when the premises were bombed—first, that the agreement continued, and that the third parties were careless in looking after the goods of the defendant? They strongly advised the defendant to remove the goods as a result, be it observed, of something which was no fault of their own. Here is enemy action intervening, and the third parties, having suddenly—through no fault of their own—been
F put in a position where they were unable safely to look after the goods, told the defendant so and strongly advised him to remove the goods. The defendant did not remove the goods and I think the true view in law—as, I think, it is the true view in common sense—is that the third parties were no longer liable to do anything more than they could do, i.e., repair, as soon as they could and as well as they could, their damaged premises.
G The evidence is that they did. Therefore, I cannot find that they were liable to the defendant for any damage that may have been done—and, I have no doubt, was done—to the goods, which, as we now know, were the goods of the plaintiff and his wife, while they were in the third parties' custody."

H I should, perhaps, have referred to an earlier passage where the learned judge deals with the possibility of theft during this bombing period:

"I have very little doubt that in all probability some of the goods were taken in those circumstances from the third parties' damaged premises, but I cannot find it, because there is no evidence and never would be any evidence of it."

The point, as it seems to me, which emerged is this. The third parties having failed to re-deliver certain goods, the plaintiff claimed for them.

The third parties must give an explanation which satisfies the court that the goods disappeared without any failure on their part to take reasonable care. The case put is that, there having been this bombing and opportunities for theft (the evidence of which I will consider in a moment), the reasonable and proper inference is that these goods did disappear at that time. The third parties also have to satisfy the court that, that being so, they did not fail to take reasonable care during that time. I think the difficulty which arose in the matter was that in the court below the defendant was not really challenging the evidence given by Mr. Burchett senior, who was in charge of the business to be done, and were not putting to him that he did not take steps which a careful and prudent storer of goods would have taken, and the evidence from that point of view is, perhaps, not altogether satisfactory. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the evidence on the point, and continued:] In my view, if one summarises the evidence with which we have had to deal, it comes to this. Until the bombing and after the repairs it was impossible, or, as the learned judge put it, "practically impossible" for anyone to steal goods without the knowledge of the third parties, and that seems to be the natural inference one would draw. There was a period when, through no fault of the third parties, thefts were possible, but the third parties deposed (and there was no cross-examination to the contrary) that they did all they could to look after their customers' goods, including these goods, in that period. The proper inference, I think, is that the goods disappeared as a result of theft during that period without any breach of the third parties' obligation in the circumstances as bailees. Those, I think, are the reasons given by the learned judge. For those reasons, I think that this appeal fails.

TUCKER, L.J. : I agree. With regard to the first question, namely, the issue between the plaintiff and the defendant whether the defendant, consistently with his contract with the plaintiff, could make a contract with the third parties for the custody of these goods, I think that it is contrary to the very nature of a contract of bailment of the type known as "hire of custody" that the defendant, the so-called bailee, should be entitled to part with the possession of the goods. He received the goods prima facie as a bailee and he can only deal with them in accordance with the authority, express or implied, conferred on him by the bailor. I think that, if in any particular case there is authority, express or implied, on the bailee to part with the possession of the goods, the contract ceases to be one purely of bailment. It becomes a complex contract under which the defendant may be under an obligation to the bailor so long as he has custody of the goods and has other obligations placed on him if and when, in accordance with the authority conferred by the bailor, he parts with the possession of the goods. Therefore, I think that in this case, there being evidence that there was a contract of bailment pure and simple, and it appearing that the defendant never had possession of the goods, but merely arranged with someone else to fetch and store them, he has no answer to a claim for the return of some of the goods which are not forthcoming. I think that that is the view which the defendant himself took of his duty and obligation, and it is clear from the correspondence that he was always at pains to give the impression to the plaintiff that he had charge of the goods himself. Furthermore, I think that there is very much to be said for the proposition that, even if counsel for the defendant is right with regard to the duty on the bailee, the defendant was in great difficulty as from Oct. 21, 1940, when he was advised that the goods were in premises where the roof had been shattered and were in great peril. It was, no doubt, wise of him to pass on this information to the plaintiff, but, I think, even if he was entitled to part with the possession of the goods, he was then under a duty to take active steps to preserve them, and he might perhaps have taken them to his own premises as a temporary measure. He gave no evidence to suggest that that was impossible. He might have made arrangements for the goods to be stored elsewhere. When that point was put to counsel for the defendant, he did not really endeavour to controvert the position with regard to the defendant and the plaintiff, but, he said, if that was the position, then he could and would avail himself of the same argument against the third parties. I think that there may be a difficulty in the circumstances of this case as between the position of the defendant and the third parties when the bombing occurred in October, 1940. The third parties at once notified all their three hundred clients what had happened, but I think it would be difficult to suggest that it was the duty of the third parties, there and then, immediately to find accommodation for a very large quantity of goods for three hundred customers without even waiting for the consent of the customers. That position has to be distinguished from that of the defendant, as in his case the goods of only one customer had become imperilled. The defendant gave no evidence that he had taken any steps to provide for the safety of those goods. However, in view of the facts, I agree that the position with regard to the duty of the bailee was that stated by SOMERVELL, L.J., so I do not think it is necessary to express a final view.

With regard to the second point (the liability of the third parties to the defendant), although I agree that the evidence was rather scanty and was given as a result of leading questions, it would be wrong to say that the learned judge, in all the circumstances (having regard to the fact that there was no serious challenge made to those questions, the questions were not objected to, and there was no cross-examination) was in error in drawing the inference that in the chaotic conditions which prevailed after the bombing the third parties had not failed to discharge the onus which lay on them of showing that they had taken all reasonable care of these goods. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed as against the plaintiff and the third parties.

DENNING, L.J.: The first question is whether a storage contractor is entitled to hand over the goods to another person under a sub-contract. There are many bailments in which the bailee is entitled to make a sub-bailment.

The repairer of a motor car, for instance, can often reasonably send away a part of it to another firm for repairs. A carrier of goods may need to entrust them to another carrier for part of the journey. A hirer may himself often, quite lawfully, sub-hire the goods. It all depends on the circumstances of the particular case. The contract here is a contract for the storage of furniture. In such a case, in my opinion, the personal skill and care of the contractor is of the essence of the contract. Much care and skill is necessary in appointing the men who are to handle the goods, in selecting the place where they are to be stored, in seeing that it is reasonably fire-proof and burglar-proof, and in choosing the caretakers. The owner of the goods is entitled in these respects to the personal care and skill of the contractor. If the contractor employs a sub-contractor, he does it at his own risk because, if the goods are lost whilst in the hands of the sub-contractor, the contractor cannot say that they would have been lost in any event. By breaking his contract, he has prevented any evidence as to what would have happened if he had fulfilled it personally: see the observations of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1919] 1 K.B. 457), in Coldman v. Hill (6) when he referred to Morison, Polexfen & Blair v. Walton (9), a decision of the House of Lords. I agree, therefore, that, by handing over these goods to a sub-contractor, the head-contractor broke his contract, and is liable for the subsequent loss: see Lilley v. Doubleday (10).

The second question is whether the contractor can recover against the sub-contractor. I have had some doubt in the course of the argument whether the sub-contractor really discharged the burden that lay on him. He gave no details of the measures which he took for protection of the goods after the bombing, and I think he ought to have done so. I should be sorry if we said anything today to lessen the burden of proof which lies on a bailee for reward.

The reason why I think that the contractor fails against the sub-contractor is because at the trial the contractor himself did not suggest that the sub-contractor was negligent. In order, as he thought, to escape liability to the owner of the goods, he wished to say that the sub-contractor was careful. He thought that that would mean that he himself would escape liability, but our decision on the first point shows that he was wrong. The contractor is liable to the owner, whether the sub-contractor was negligent or not. The contractor has now discovered his error. He now wishes on the appeal to turn round and say that the sub-contractor was negligent. I think it is too late for him to do that. At the trial, for his own purposes, he did not insist on full details of the protective measures being given by the sub-contractor, and I do not think that he can now complain that the full details were not given. I agree, therefore, that on the second point, also, the appeal fails.

NORMAN v. NORMAN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson and Pearce, JJ.), April 25, 1950.]

Infant—Maintenance—Education or training—Infant aged more than sixteen—Continuation of payments under previous order—Application after cessation of order—Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949 (c. 99), s. 2 (2).

By the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1) : "The power of the court to vary an order made by virtue of s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, shall, notwithstanding anything in that section, include power to vary the order in accordance with the following provisions of this section. (2) If, upon the application of the married woman, it appears to the court that a child for whose maintenance provision is made by the order is or will be engaged in a course of education or training after attaining the age of sixteen years and that it is expedient for that purpose that the payments required by the order should continue, the court may by order direct that those payments shall continue for such period after the child attains that age, not exceeding two years from the date of the order, as may be specified in the order."

On Nov. 11, 1941, the wife was granted an order for the maintenance of herself and her child until he attained the age of sixteen. The child attained that age on Dec. 15, 1949, and the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, came into operation on Dec. 16, 1949. On Jan. 2, 1950, a summons was taken out by the wife under s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1949 for the continuation of payments for the child for the purposes of his education, but the magistrate held that he had no jurisdiction to make an order as the original order had already ceased to exist, and could not, therefore, be "continued." On appeal,

HELD: on the true construction of s. 2 (2) an application for the continuation of payments was not confined to cases where the original order had not expired, and the case must be sent back to the magistrate for consideration on the merits.

APPEAL from an order of the East Ham stipendiary magistrate.

A The wife applied under the provisions of the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, s. 2 (2), to the magistrate for the continuation of payments under a maintenance order made in 1941 in respect of the maintenance of her child, who was now over sixteen years of age. The magistrate held that, as the application was made to him after the original order had ceased to operate because the child had already attained sixteen years, the statute conferred no jurisdiction on him to make the order and he dismissed the application. The wife appealed.

The husband was not represented.

B HODSON, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the East Ham stipendiary magistrate by a wife who applied for an order under s. 2 (2) of the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, continuing the weekly payment made in respect of her child, of whom she had the custody, "from the date of the variation and for such period (within two years) as he may continue to be engaged in a course of education" at a certain school. We have no information on which this court can make an order, but we are asked to send the case back to the stipendiary to deal with the matter on the ground that he wrongly refused jurisdiction.

C The child of whom the wife has the custody attained the age of sixteen years on Dec. 15, 1949, and the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, came into operation on Dec. 16, 1949. On Jan. 2, 1950, the summons was taken out asking for money for the education of the child. Having regard to the wording of the section, the magistrate took the view that the order which had previously been made had ceased and there was nothing which he could continue. The original order was dated Nov. 11, 1941. It was subsequently varied, but the variations are immaterial. It was made in favour of the wife on the ground of the husband's desertion and gave her custody of the child. By a further provision she was to have maintenance for herself and maintenance for the child until the latter attained the age of sixteen, the custody also being limited under the powers conferred by the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5 (b), to the age of sixteen. This child having attained that age, the provision for custody and the provision for maintenance had, on the face of it, come to an end, and the order could only be said to be a subsisting order in so far as it could be enforced, for example, for the purpose of obtaining payment of any arrears due under it before the date when it ran out.

F The wording of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1949 is as follows:

"The power of the court to vary an order made by virtue of s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, shall, notwithstanding anything in that section, include power to vary the order in accordance with the following provisions of this section."

G Before reading the following sub-section I must refer to the Act of 1920. It provides that on the application of a married woman an order which contains a provision committing the custody of a child to the applicant may, in addition to any other provision, include a provision that the husband shall pay to the applicant a weekly sum not exceeding ten shillings for the maintenance of each such child until such child attains the age of sixteen years. Section 2 (2) of the H Act of 1949 provides:

"If, upon the application of the married woman, it appears to the court that a child for whose maintenance provision is made by the order is or will be engaged in a course of education or training after attaining the age of sixteen years and that it is expedient for that purpose that the payments required by the order should continue, the court may by order direct that those payments shall continue for such period after the child attains that age, not exceeding two years from the date of the order, as may be specified in the order."

Sub-section (3) lays down that the period specified may from time to time be extended, but not beyond the date when the child attains the age of twenty-one years. The difficulty felt by the stipendiary was that sub-s. 2 refers to provision being made by the existing order in the present tense and also refers to continuance of that order, and he pointed out that, according to the ordinary use of language, that presupposes that an order which is to be continued under s. 2 (2) is an order which is actually in force. The order in this case was not in force, and it could not be continued because it had already ceased to exist.

It is clear that this statute must be read so as to make sense and to remedy the mischief or fill in the gap in the scheme of things in connection with the maintenance and education of children which already existed. It is impossible to make sense of it if, as counsel for the wife pointed out, one takes such a strict grammatical view as the magistrate took, because it appears from the words, "If... it appears to the court that a child for whose maintenance provision is made by the order is or will be engaged in a course of education or training after attaining the age of sixteen years," that what is contemplated may be a child who has attained the age of sixteen years, so that necessarily the order in his case must have ceased, and, unless the order is treated as being an existing order, it is impossible to make any sense of the section. I think that it is necessary to take the same view of the word "continuing." It may be that in one sense the order has ceased, and it is clumsy to talk about the continuation of something which has ceased, but the order is treated in the first part of the section as being an existing order, which means an order which has not ceased, and once one comes to that conclusion the word "continue" is aptly used to describe the situation which exists with relation to it. I think, therefore, although the wording of this section is a little puzzling, that it is reasonably clear that the construction which the wife asks the court to adopt is the right one, and, therefore, this appeal must be allowed and the case sent back to the stipendiary magistrate for consideration on the merits.

PEARCE, J.: I agree. In Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. v. Asher (1), DENNING, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 164):

"It would certainly save the judges trouble if Acts of Parliament were drafted with divine prescience and perfect clarity. In the absence of it, when a defect appears a judge cannot simply fold his hands and blame the draftsman. He must set to work on the constructive task of finding the intention of Parliament, and he must do this not only from the language of the statute, but also from a consideration of the social conditions which gave rise to it and of the mischief which it was passed to remedy, and then he must supplement the written word so as to give 'force and life' to the intention of the legislature. That was clearly laid down (3 Co. Rep. 7 b) by the resolution of the judges [SIR ROGER MANWOOD, C.B., and the other barons of the Exchequer] in Heydon's Case (2) and it is the safest guide to-day."

I approach this question with that passage in mind. It seems unlikely that Parliament intended that the court should be unable to make a continuation of payments merely because the provision under the order has expired. There seems no real reason for this, and it would obviously lead to hardship. There is no power in the Act by which any relief could be given against such a situation, and it would be a great misfortune if, merely by allowing the existing provision to expire by one day, a mother was thereafter unable to provide education for her child and the child was deprived of the opportunities of education which Parliament clearly intended to bring within its reach. The words of s. 2 (2): "If... it appears to the court that a child for whose maintenance provision is made by the order is or will be engaged in a course of education or training after attaining the age of sixteen years," in my opinion, show that the application need not be made before the time runs out, since where a child is engaged in a course of education after attaining the age of sixteen he or she must be over sixteen, and the provision in the order must have come to an end. It is said against this that the word "continuing" envisages that the provision of the order must still be in existence. In my view, there can be continuance of the order, even after an interruption, without unduly straining the words. It is also said that the words "provision is made" mean that the provision is still in force, but, since the original order, which is in favour of the wife, is still in force, I think it is possible to say that provision is made in the order even though that provision has come to an end. For these reasons I think that the application for continuance is not confined to cases where the provision has not expired, and I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Re A DEBTOR (No. 416 of 1940). Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER (TRUSTEE) v. HUBBARD AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), April 25, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Official receiver succeeding to trusteeship—Onerous property—Right of disclaimer—Statutory period for exercise of right—Extension of time—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 54 (1) (7), s. 109 (4).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 54 (7), provides: "Where, on the release, removal, resignation or death of a trustee in bankruptcy, an official receiver is acting as trustee, he may disclaim any property which might be disclaimed by a trustee under the foregoing provisions, notwithstanding that the time prescribed by this section for such disclaimer has expired, but such power of disclaimer shall be exercisable only within twelve months after the official receiver has become trustee in the circumstances aforesaid, or has become aware of the existence of such property, whichever period may last expire." By s. 109 (4): "Where by this Act, or by general rules, the time for doing any act or thing is limited, the court may extend the time either before or after the expiration thereof, upon such terms, if any, as the court may think fit to impose."

In February, 1941, a debtor was adjudicated bankrupt and a private individual was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. In November, 1943, the trustee was released and the official receiver succeeded to the trusteeship by virtue of s. 93 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The property of the bankrupt included certain leasehold interests of an onerous nature which the original trustee had not disclaimed. In 1946 the official receiver became aware of the existence of the leaseholds, but he failed to disclaim them within the succeeding twelve months. On Jan. 25, 1950, the official receiver wished to relieve the debtor's estate of the burden of the leasehold interests in question, and he applied for an extension of time in which to disclaim them. The registrar refused the application on the ground that, as the official receiver had not exercised his power of disclaimer within the period of twelve months provided in s. 54 (7) of the Act of 1914, there was no power to grant the extension of time asked for. On appeal,

HELD: s. 54 (7) of the Act of 1914 gave the official receiver, succeeding to the trusteeship by virtue of his office, a statutory right to disclaim, which must be exercised within the period of twelve months from one of the two termini indicated in the sub-section, and unless so exercised, there was no power in the court to extend it, either under s. 54 (1), or by reference to general language of s. 109 (4) of the Act.

APPEAL by the official receiver from an order of Mr. Registrar CUNLIFFE, dated Feb. 14, 1950, refusing an application for an extension of time for the purpose of disclaiming certain leasehold properties vested in the debtor at the date of her bankruptcy. B

The registrar was of opinion that, as the official receiver had failed to exercise his power of disclaimer within the period of twelve months allowed by s. 54 (7) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, there was no power to grant the extension of time asked for. It was contended for the official receiver that, in the same way as a trustee in bankruptcy could apply for an extension of time after twelve months from the date of his appointment by virtue of s. 54 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, so the official receiver, on the bankrupt's property being vested in him, could apply for a similar extension under s. 54 (7) of the Act, or, alternatively, if s. 54 (7) was strictly limited to the twelve months' period therein specified, that the court had an overriding power, by the general provisions of s. 109 (4) of the Act, in the exercise of its discretion to extend the time within which such power of disclaimer might be exercised. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. C

Muir Hunter for the official receiver.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar CUNLIFFE in the bankruptcy of the debtor, a Mrs. Gladys Knight. The decision was given on an application on the part of the official receiver for an extension of time within which to disclaim certain leasehold properties vested in the debtor at the date of her bankruptcy. The adjudication was in February, 1941, when a private individual, Mr. Phillips, was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. In November, 1943, that trustee was relieved, and, thereupon, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 93 (5), the official receiver succeeded virtute officii to the trusteeship. During the period when Mr. Phillips had been trustee no notice had been taken of the existence of these leasehold interests. They were of an onerous character, and, had note been taken of their existence and of their nature, it may well have been that the trustee would, in the exercise of his statutory powers under s. 54 (1) of the Act of 1914, have taken steps to disclaim them on behalf of the estate, and, if the statutory period of twelve months within which he could exercise that right had expired, he might then, pursuant to the same sub-section, have applied to the court for an extension of time within which to disclaim. E

The position of the official receiver on such a succession is dealt with by the express provisions of s. 54 (7). The questions which were dealt with by the learned registrar were briefly whether (i) the right to disclaim conferred on an official receiver by sub-s. (7) is, according to the proper construction of that sub-section, limited in point of time strictly to the twelve months' period which is stated in the sub-section; and (ii) assuming that it is by sub-section (7) so limited, whether, by the general provisions of s. 109 (4), an overriding power is given to the court in the exercise of its discretion to extend the time F within which such a right of disclaimer may be exercised. The succession of the official receiver having occurred in November, 1943, the application for a day to be fixed to hear his application to disclaim was made on Jan. 25, 1950. It appears from the judgment of the registrar that in 1946 the official receiver became aware of the existence of these leaseholds and of their onerous nature, but no step was taken until Jan. 25, 1950, to relieve, if he could, the debtor's estate of the burden. The registrar stated at the end of his judgment that, assuming he had a discretion in the matter, he did not think there would be any serious obstacle to its exercise. He observed that no objection had been raised by other persons interested. The position in this court is not quite the same as it was before the learned registrar because the person interested as landlord or reversioner in respect of one, at any rate, of the leases, is now represented, I assume in order to oppose the official receiver's application. In the judgment to which I have already alluded occurs this sentence: "For some reason which does not appear the official receiver did not himself disclaim." It was indicated by counsel for the official receiver that owing to the ramifications of departmental life in the Board of Trade it never would be possible to state how it happened that a statutory right to disclaim was not more expeditiously sought to be exercised. That seems no reason for extending to such an application any powers the court has in its discretion. If the court is asked either by a private citizen or by a department of State to exercise a discretion in his or its favour, prima facie similar considerations ought to be taken into account. If anything, I should have thought the standard of efficiency and prudent conduct lay more heavily on a department of State than on an individual.

I return now to the matter in hand, viz., whether there exists either by the terms of s. 54 (7) itself or by the joint operation of that sub-section and s. 109 (4) of the Act of 1914 any discretion in the court in the circumstances of this case? The registrar came to the conclusion that there did not, and I agree with his conclusions and with the reasons which he had so cogently expressed. Since the matter is one which, apparently, has not previously come before the court I will state my reasons. In a case where a trustee is appointed in the ordinary way, that is, on adjudication, whether that trustee is the official receiver or a private person, s. 54 (1) operates, and provides that in the case of onerous property he may, notwithstanding that he may have tried to sell it or exercised acts of ownership in respect of it,

"...subject to the provisions of this section ... by writing signed by him, at any time within twelve months after the first appointment of a trustee or such extended period as may be allowed by the court, disclaim the property."

Then there is a proviso which gives, in effect, an extended period where the property does not come to the knowledge of such trustee, and again the specific time mentioned has the addition "or such extended period as may be allowed by the court."

I propose first to deal with the section as we now find it and without regard to its history. I can pass over the intervening sub-sections, save to observe that in sub-s. (4) (which deals with the case where a trustee is called on to make up his mind with regard to onerous property) there is also an express reference after the period mentioned of twenty-eight days "or such extended period as may be allowed by the court." We come, therefore, to sub-s. (7), which is as follows:

"Where, on the release, removal, resignation or death of a trustee in bankruptcy, an official receiver is acting as trustee, he may disclaim any property which might be disclaimed by a trustee under the foregoing provisions, notwithstanding that the time prescribed by this section for such disclaimer has expired, but such power of disclaimer shall be exercisable only within twelve months after the official receiver has become trustee in the circumstances aforesaid, or has become aware of the existence of such property, whichever period may last expire."

It is to be noted that this sub-section applies to the case only of the official receiver succeeding to the trusteeship by reason of release, removal, resignation or death. It is a succession regarding which he has no option and which automatically descends on him, and it is his duty in his official capacity to carry out the burden of the trusteeship accordingly.

In each case the question arises: Has the time prescribed by this section for the disclaimer of a particular property under the provisions of the section expired, or has it not? That question ought to be easy to answer, for, exceptional circumstances apart, the period prescribed by sub-s. (1) is twelve months from the first appointment of a trustee, and if those twelve months have expired, and if no application has been made for extension, or if such an application has been made and the time granted by way of extension also has expired, then in each one of those cases it is quite clear that quoad the particular property the time prescribed by the foregoing provision has expired. Prima facie, therefore, the right to disclaim will have gone. I draw attention to the fact that the time begins to run under sub-s. (1) from the first appointment of a trustee, but sub-s. (7) creates plainly for the official receiver's succession in those circumstances a new right. It is a right notwithstanding that the time within which the earlier right may be exercised has passed. It gives him a right to disclaim, but it gives it in terms which seem to me as a matter of English—and I am so far only dealing with this section as we now find it—to state plainly that this right is to be exercised within a specific time, and there is no question of extension of that period. The words are "but such power"—that is the power conferred by this section—"shall be exercisable only within twelve months after the official receiver has become trustee." Then it goes on that, in the event of his becoming aware of the existence of such property, his right shall be exercised within twelve months of that date. The language of sub-s. (7) makes it plain, to my mind, that under that sub-section, unlike sub-s. (1), there is no question of obtaining any extension. It is a strictly limited period. The statute creates and confers a new right, but it strictly limits it in point of time in the way I have stated—perhaps for obvious reasons.

The present appeal is only under sub-s. (7). It was suggested that a possible point which the official receiver might take was that he could say: "I am a trustee, and, therefore, I can apply, though the period for an extension of the statutory right of disclaimer, which is conferred on all trustees by sub-s. (1), has long since passed." That matter is not before us and, therefore, it is not perhaps right for me to express a concluded view on it, but I will indicate that, as at present advised, I do not accept the view suggested. It seems to me, prima facie at any rate, that sub-s. (7) gives an exhaustive statement of the rights as to disclaimer which an official receiver has who succeeds in these circumstances. He has no additional right under sub-s. (1). Had it been intended that he should have such right, I think sub-s. (7) would almost certainly have opened with some such words as: "Without prejudice to any other rights under this section of the Act." That, however, I need not pursue. Counsel for the official receiver founds his argument on this part of the case, as I follow it, on the view that, since the time prescribed by s. 54 for the general exercise under sub-s. (1) was a period which was always liable to be extended, and extended ex post facto, therefore, to make the two things fit, as he would like them to fit together, one ought to assume a general power intended by the section to extend the time also under sub-s. (7). To put it in another way, the only object of stating the twelve months' period in sub-s. (7) was to show that the official receiver without making any application, and notwithstanding that the time under sub-s. (1) had expired, could, during that period, of his own motion disclaim. The argument has the merits of ingenuity, but I cannot accept it. It seems to me that the language of sub-s. (7) in its context is too plain to admit it.

The second part of the argument rests on s. 109 (4). Section 109 is the first of a series of sections which has the cross-heading "Procedure." Sub-section (1) deals with the matter of costs of certain proceedings. Sub-section (2) deals with the adjournment of proceedings by the court, Sub-section (3) deals with amending proceedings by the court, and sub-s. (4) provides:

"Where by this Act, or by general rules, the time for doing any act or thing is limited, the court may extend the time either before or after the expiration thereof, upon such terms, if any, as the court may think fit to impose."

Sub-section (5) deals with taking evidence. It may be taken "either viva voce, or by interrogatories, or upon affidavit," or otherwise. Counsel for the official receiver says that sub-s. (4) is in terms perfectly general, and since s. 54 deals with acts or things which have to be done within a limited time, viz., within twelve months, it follows that the general terms of s. 109 (4) confer, notwithstanding anything else, a power on the court to extend that time. Section 109 deals with purely procedural matters. The right to disclaim is something which I think is not aptly described as purely procedural. That argument, however, of itself, I think, would be insufficient, for in Re Price (1) and Re Baker (2) the corresponding s. 105 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was held to be applicable to the then provisions in regard to disclaimer, though the argument that s. 105 was procedural was, of course, as available then as it is now. It seems to me, however, that there is another answer to counsel's point. The sections in any Act of Parliament must be construed together. In the section with which we are particularly concerned, s. 54, there is a specific power given to the court to extend the time under sub-s. (1) within which an ordinary trustee may disclaim. For reasons which I have already tried to explain, that power of extension is significantly, and I think deliberately, omitted in the case of an official receiver succeeding in accordance with the terms of sub-s. (7). If s. 109 were of general application, then the addition in sub-s. (1) of s. 54 and likewise in sub-s. (4) of a specific power to extend the time would be wholly otiose. I, therefore, construe s. 109 (4) as having to be read subject to the specific provision to the contrary which on a proper construction may be found in other sections of the Act. So, reading s. 54 and s. 109 together, I think s. 109 (4) does not apply to cases which are dealt with within the four corners of s. 54 itself.

There has, however, been a reference to the history of the matter. It would, therefore, be right to see whether the view which I take, and which I hold to be the ordinary and proper meaning of the words now found in the Act of 1914, can be affected by historical considerations. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 55 (1) gave a power for the trustee to disclaim. That sub-section differed, however, in two respects from the present s. 54 (1). First, the time within which a trustee could disclaim onerous property was, instead of twelve months, three months only. Further, there did not appear in s. 55 (1) any right in the court to extend the three months' period. Section 105 of the Act of 1883 was, so far as is relevant, in exactly the same terms as s. 109 of the existing Act. Therefore, looking at those two provisions together, and there being no specific reference to any extension of time in s. 55 (1), it was possible for the court to conclude that the time limited by s. 55 could be extended by the application of the general provisions of s. 104. That I understand to be the effect of Re Baker (2) and Re Price (1) to which the learned registrar referred.

Then came a statutory amendment of the Act of 1883 by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Section 13 of that last-mentioned Act altered in two respects s. 55 (1) of the Act of 1883, and, as a result of the alteration, it took more or less precisely the form which it bears today. First, the period of three months became twelve months, which is the period now found in s. 54 of the Act of 1914. Further, Parliament expressly added a power to the court in s. 55 to extend the statutory period of twelve months, and by so doing must have proceeded on the view that that special power was needed to extend the time, or, at any rate, on the view that, so far as the extension of time to disclaim was concerned, power should be derived from the terms of s. 55 itself, and not from any application of some general provision elsewhere in the Act. The bankruptcy provisions, therefore, in 1890 took that form and remained in that form, so far as is relevant, until the year 1913. During that appreciable period of time in the event of the release, resignation, death or removal of a trustee and the accession to office of the official receiver, no additional powers were given by the Act to the official receiver. It may, therefore, well have been that there was a lacuna which required filling up. However that may be, an amendment to s. 55 of the Act of 1883, as amended by s. 13 of the Act of 1890, was inserted by s. 19 (2) of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, which is now s. 54 (7) of the Act of 1914. Whether or not before that amendment an official receiver succeeding in the circumstances indicated could then have said: "Twelve months have no doubt gone, but I am a trustee and I can apply for an extension," sub-s. (7) made a special provision that from the time he was appointed, or, alternatively, from the time he became aware of the onerous property, without any application he could himself exercise a new right conferred on him of disclaiming. It seems to me that in conferring that new right Parliament was precise in indicating that it was to be exercised—and I can do no better than use the words which Parliament used—only within the twelve months limited by the section.

It seems to me that there is nothing in the history I have stated which alters or affects in any way the ordinary construction and meaning of the various sub-sections to which counsel for the official receiver has referred us. I, therefore, come after that journey to the same goal which I reached by the other route, namely, that s. 54 (7) gives to the official receiver, succeeding in circumstances such as exist here, a statutory right to disclaim, but that right must be exercised within the period of twelve months from one of the two termini indicated, and unless so exercised there is no power in the court to extend it, either under that sub-section or by reference to the general language of s. 109 (4). For these reasons, I agree with the view of the learned registrar and I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. Section 109 (4) gives a general power to extend the time for doing acts, and a disclaimer is an act, but there is a special section, s. 54, dealing specifically with disclaimers, and one sub-section of it deals with the precise type of disclaimer involved in this case. That is a disclaimer by an official receiver who becomes trustee on the release of the original trustee. The ordinary trustee could under s. 54 (1) disclaim within twelve months after his appointment as trustee or such extended time as might be allowed by the court. By contrast with this, sub-s. (7) provides in effect that in the particular case of an official receiver becoming trustee on the release of the original trustee, no extension of the twelve months period shall be allowed. In those circumstances this specific provision (which exactly fits the facts of the present case) must, I think, necessarily displace the more general provisions of s. 109. In my view, the judgment of the learned registrar is unassailable, and the appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree, and I am content to adopt the very clear reasons given by the learned registrar for his conclusion. I should, perhaps, add that, as regards the scope of s. 109 (4) as to extension of time, I prefer to found myself on the construction of s. 54 and on the specific provisions it contains, rather than on the limitation suggested by my Lord of the provisions of s. 109 (4) to purely procedural matters. I think the line between matters purely procedural and matters of substance is one which it might well be difficult to draw. Looking at the matter from that point of view, I think the express reference in s. 54 (1) and also in s. 54 (4) to the extension of time by the court, coupled with the absence of any such reference in sub-s. (7), and the categorical statement in that sub-section to the effect that such power of disclaimer shall be exercisable only within twelve months after the official receiver has become a trustee, really make it abundantly plain that the general power conferred by s. 109 (4) has no application to s. 54 (7). I should add that the language of sub-s. (7) has also this difference from the language of sub-s. (1). Sub-section (1) says that the trustee may, within the period prescribed, disclaim the property. Sub-section (7) confers a special power of disclaimer on the official receiver in the circumstances mentioned, but says that that power shall be exercisable only within the period of twelve months. A power is thus, in terms, created with a limitation on it whereby it endures for twelve months only, and thereafter ceases to be exercisable, or, in other words, ceases to exist. I think the form in which the limitation is put in that respect also bears out the conclusion at which the court has arrived. I entirely agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

FLOCKHART v. ROBERTSON

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Finnemore, JJ.), April 26, 1950.]

E Public Order—Preservation—Prohibition of processions—“Organising” procession—Procession formed spontaneously—Subsequently led and directed by an individual—Public Order Act, 1936 (c. 6), s. 3 (4).

By an order made by the Commissioner of Police for the metropolitan police district in pursuance of the Public Order Act, 1936, s. 3 (3), public processions of a political character were prohibited in the metropolitan police district. A political organisation lawfully organised a political procession in the city of London, where the order did not apply, and, after it had broken up, a large number of participants went to the neighbourhood of Knightsbridge which was within the prohibited area. The appellant, an officer of the organisation, met other officials and about 150 members at Hyde Park Corner, and he walked along the pavement of Piccadilly accompanied by another member and followed by officials and members in loose formation. Delayed by traffic at a side street, those following formed themselves into ranks and subsequently followed the appellant in compact formation. He led them to Piccadilly Circus and into Coventry Street where the police dispersed them. At several points on the way the appellant stopped the procession, giving signals by raising his hand, and he gave a signal for it to go from Piccadilly Circus into Coventry Street. In proceedings against the appellant for having organised a public procession prohibited by the order.

H HELD (FINNEMORE, J., dissenting) : the appellant, having indicated the route taken by the procession after it had been formed spontaneously and having directed it along that route, had “organised the procession and, by virtue of s. 3 (4) of the Public Order Act, 1936, was guilty of an offence under the Commissioner’s order.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bow Street, London, an information was preferred by the respondent, a chief superintendent of the Metropolitan Police, under the Public Order Act, 1936, charging the appellant, assistant secretary to an organisation with political objects, with organising, on Oct. 15, 1949, a public procession in the metropolitan police district, contrary to an order prohibiting such processions made by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis pursuant to s. 3 (3) of the Act. At the hearing on Nov. 15 and 18, 1949, the appellant contended that no procession was proved to have existed, and that, if there were a procession, there was no evidence that he had organised it. The Chief Magistrate found as a fact that a public procession of a political character had come into being spontaneously and without any prior arrangement, that such a procession was illegal under the order, that the appellant marched in front and from time to time gave signals to those behind him, finally leading the procession round Piccadilly Circus and into Coventry Street, and, therefore, to that extent he had organised a procession in contravention of the Public Order Act, 1936, s. 3 (4), and must be convicted. The appellant was fined £10 and ordered to pay £10 10s. 0d. costs.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate before whom the appellant was charged with having on Oct. 15, 1949, at Piccadilly and elsewhere within the metropolitan police district, organised a public procession of a political character contrary to an order then in force prohibiting such processions. The only question involved is whether there was evidence on which the chief magistrate could find that the appellant had organised the procession. The material facts found are that, there having been a procession in the city of London, to which the order did not apply, the people broke up at Temple Bar and a large number of them took themselves to Knightsbridge. The appellant went to Hyde Park Corner and there met some officials of the political movement of which he was a supporter accompanied by about a hundred and fifty members of the organisation. The appellant walked along on the north pavement of Piccadilly in an easterly direction accompanied by another member of the organisation and followed by these officials and members. They were in loose formation and not in ranks. In other words they were going along—I do not want to be uncomplimentary—in the form of a rabble, and not in a compact body. When they reached Down Street some traffic delayed them, and the people following the appellant formed themselves into ranks and got themselves into what is commonly called a procession, and in that formation they followed him. At Arlington Street he was again delayed by traffic and he held up his hand as a signal to those behind him to halt. They obeyed. When the traffic cleared he crossed Arlington Street and the body of people moved forward. He crossed Piccadilly when there was a lull in the traffic followed by the body of persons. At the junction of St. James's Street and Piccadilly he again signalled to those behind him and they halted. About twenty yards before entering Piccadilly Circus the body of persons, but not the appellant himself, began to sing and to shout political slogans. At Piccadilly Circus a police inspector checked the march by holding up his hand and said: "Stop this. Break this up." The appellant held up his hand, the body of persons checked, and the appellant then walked past the inspector and moved into the roadway followed by the body of persons in close formation, still singing and shouting political slogans. After parading once round the circus the appellant gave a direction signal and went into Coventry Street followed by the body of persons. He did not take them into Coventry Street for the purpose of the procession dispersing, but it did disperse in Coventry Street because the police broke it up.

A The question is whether there was evidence that the appellant organised the procession. My first observation is that "organised" is not a term of art. When a procession is organised what happens? A procession is not a mere body of persons; it is a body of persons who are moving along a route. Therefore, the person who organises the route is the person who organises the procession. It seems clear that, at any rate, as from Piccadilly Circus the appellant was organising the route for this procession to follow, and, therefore, I think there was evidence on which the Chief Magistrate could find that the appellant did organise a procession. If a person indicates the route, plans the route, or points out the route by which other persons are to go, I think he is organising a procession. For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal fails.

B MORRIS, J.: I have come to the same conclusion. Counsel for the appellant did not contest that there was a public procession of a political character, but he submitted that it was not shown that the appellant had organised that procession. The Chief Magistrate has found that a public procession of a political character was proved to have come into being spontaneously, and without any prior arrangement, after the body of persons had passed Down Street. When that political procession came into being, it seems to me, on the facts as found, that the appellant, being the senior officer present, placed himself at the head of that public procession of a political character, and that, having done that, he organised that procession. He directed it and it obeyed him. The findings show that on many occasions he gave directions and that on each occasion his directions were followed. It is, in my judgment, not without significance to appreciate what had happened earlier that day. The appellant had organised a public procession which was lawful because it was in the city of London. He issued instruments to the band. He marched at the head of the procession, and gave verbal commands to those taking part. When, therefore, the appellant, being an officer of his organisation, placed himself at the head of the procession which came into being in Piccadilly, he was placing himself at the head of people who had been organised by him earlier in the day, for most of the persons concerned had taken part in the procession in the city of London. There was not a band in Piccadilly, but otherwise the appellant did much the same in Piccadilly as he had done earlier in the day when in command of the lawful public procession which he then organised. Earlier he had marched at the head of the procession; in Piccadilly he marched at the head of it. Earlier he had given verbal commands; in Piccadilly he did not give verbal commands, but he held up his hand as a signal. He gave commands and they were obeyed. It seems to me that on the findings of the Chief Magistrate there were seven separate occasions when the appellant gave a direction which those behind him followed. As counsel for the appellant pointed out in his submission, the act of organising in some circumstances might take a lot of time and might require premeditation. In other circumstances organising might be speedily done. The organising by the appellant of this procession which had come into being required very little time because of the circumstances of the day, because of his relationship to those behind him, and because of their common understanding of his leadership. In my judgment, the facts as found show that what he was doing did amount to organising the procession which had come into being. It by no means would follow that, even though the procession had come into being spontaneously without any prior arrangement, it would continue to be in orderly formation. It might have become disintegrated, but under the direction and leadership of the appellant it continued as a procession in Piccadilly and those who formed part of it obeyed the appellant over and over again. On those facts there was ample evidence on which properly to hold that the appellant organised a public procession. For those reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails.

FINNEMORE, J.: I feel myself bound to come to a contrary opinion. The appellant was convicted of organising a public procession of a political character. What "organise" may mean must depend on the facts of each case. The mere fact that a person takes part in a procession would not of itself be enough. I do not think that the fact that the appellant was the leading person in the procession would by itself be enough, although it might be some evidence to be considered.

The difficulty which I feel arises out of the finding of fact by the learned Chief Magistrate. A number of people, about one hundred and fifty, belonging to a political body, after certain political activities at Hyde Park Corner, proceeded towards Piccadilly Circus. The appellant was in front and there was a number of people in loose formation walking behind him. When they got to Down Street there was traffic in the way, and the appellant, being the leading person, held up his hand, on which the people following him stopped. When they resumed walking along Piccadilly they had closed up together, and the magistrate finds that thereafter they were in an orderly formation. At that time, he finds, they became a public procession of a political character, but he finds that that procession came into being spontaneously and without any prior arrangement. Certainly up to that point, on the evidence, the appellant had not organised this procession in any way, and thereafter, it seems to me, the nature of that procession never alters. It is true that on reaching Arlington Street where there was a traffic block, the appellant again held up his hand and the procession stopped. When they reached St. James's Street the same thing happened again. The procession never broke formation, it was never re-organised, or, as it seems to me, organised at all, apart from the self-organisation at Down Street which the magistrate has found was spontaneous. When they reached Piccadilly Circus a police inspector called on them to break up formation. The appellant walked past the police inspector, and the other people in the procession, still in the same formation, followed him. They marched round Piccadilly Circus once, and then the appellant gave a signal that he was turning into Coventry Street, which he did, and the others followed him into Coventry Street, still in the same formation and still, as it seems to me, the same procession, and it was there finally dispersed by the police.

I think on the finding that, as this procession was formed spontaneously without any prior arrangement after the people had passed Down Street, it is impossible to say that the appellant organised the procession, and I cannot see that anything which happened thereafter justifies one in saying that at some stage after Down Street he organised it. The Chief Magistrate says that, by giving these signals, which were traffic signals, and by leading the column round Piccadilly Circus, to that extent he organised the procession. I do not think that is organising a procession. I think organising a procession means something in the nature of arranging or planning a procession. It is not necessary for the plans to be made long in advance or perhaps in advance at all. There is certainly no need for persons to meet in a back room and make secret plans. The procession could be organised on the spot in the street, but, on the findings here, that did not happen. The procession formed itself spontaneously, and I do not think anything the appellant did thereafter amounted to organising that procession. It is true he walked in front of it, and true he took part in it. It may well be that he disobeyed an order given to him by the police inspector, but I do not think any of these matters constitute the offence or the act of organising a procession. For these reasons I am driven to take a different view from the rest of the court.

CASE STATED by Breconshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Hay an information was preferred by the appellant, chief inspector of food and drugs of the Breconshire County Council, against the respondent, charging him with having, on Oct. 5, 1949, sold to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food, “which was not of the nature or not of the substance or not of the quality of the article demanded, contrary to s. 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938.” At the hearing of the information the respondent contended that the information was bad in law on the ground that it disclosed three separate and distinct offences. The appellant contended that the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3, had the effect of creating one offence only and that the words “nature,” “substance” and “quality” in that section were used incidentally and bore a similar meaning and could not be differentiated. The justices dismissed the information, holding that it was bad for duplicity. The relevant facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Brecon before whom the respondent was summoned for that he “ . . . did sell to the prejudice of the purchaser . . . a certain article of food, to wit, beef sausage, which was not of the nature or not of the substance or not of the quality of the article demanded in that the said beef sausage was 32.6 per cent. deficient in meat, contrary to s. 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938.”

The point taken on behalf of the respondent, to which the justices have given effect, is that this information was bad in that it disclosed three offences, contrary to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 10. Counsel for the appellant has argued that the real offence here is selling to the prejudice of the purchaser and that the other words only show the matters which may be to the prejudice of the purchaser, and he relied particularly on Thomson v. Knights (1). In that case a man had been convicted of being in charge of a motor car while under the influence of drink or a drug and it was sought to say that the information was bad for duplicity because it was one offence to be in charge of a vehicle while under the influence of drink and another offence to be in charge of a vehicle while under the influence of a drug. The court rejected that argument because, they said, the offence was driving in a state of intoxication, and it mattered not whether the toxic condition was induced by drink or a drug. In my opinion, the reasoning of that case does not apply to this case, because I think the defendant is entitled to be told by the prosecution whether they are saying that the article is not of the nature that was demanded or was not of the quality that was demanded.

With regard to the meaning of the word "substance" it is not necessary to give a considered opinion, but I think that the view of the learned author of BELL'S SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS, 12th ed., at p. 94, is probably right—that "substance" would include matters where there had been adulteration of the article. However that may be, I think the prosecution must decide what they are going to allege. If they are in doubt, they can issue more than one information against the respondent, one charging him with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser in that the nature of the article was not what was demanded, and another charging that it was not of the quality which was demanded. That is because the conviction must be drawn up in accordance with, and following, the information so that one can see on what charge the justices convicted. These are different offences in the sense that the constituent facts in the offence would be, or may be, different.

Another matter which I confess influences me to some extent is that the view which the justices took was in accordance with, and was no doubt influenced by, the statement in BELL'S SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS, 12th ed., at p. 94. The note (e) which appears there is this:

"It should usually be possible to decide which of the three words is most appropriate to use in an information and to use that word only. Thus, apples or fish not of the variety or kind asked for, are not of the 'nature' demanded. For articles not containing the proper ingredients or containing some added adulterant, 'substance' is perhaps the most appropriate word to use, although in many instances, 'quality' would also be fitting. If preserved eggs are sold as new laid eggs, the word 'quality' would seem apt. In any event, the summons should not be for selling food 'not of the nature, substance or quality'."

This note has appeared in BELL for a great number of editions. This court would never hesitate to disagree with a statement in a textbook, however authoritative or however long it had existed, if it thought fit. Communis error facit jus is a maxim of very limited application, but, as LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said in Isherwood v. Oldknow (2) (3 M. & S. 396), it is truer to say "communis opinio is evidence of what the law is." If a statement has appeared in a well-known textbook for a great number of years and has never been dissented from by a judicial decision, it would be most unfortunate to throw doubt on it after it had been acted on by justices and their clerks for so long. When one analyses the matter it is clear that the justices came to a right decision. In my judgment, this appeal must be dismissed.

FINNEMORE, J.: I agree.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 27, 28, 1950.]

Will—Legacy—Destruction of object—Gift to hospital—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health after date of will but before death of testatrix—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6, s. 7.

A By her will dated Aug. 9, 1944, a testatrix, who died on Sept. 28, 1948, gave, devised and bequeathed her residuary estate on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the proceeds thereof for the benefit of a hospital, which had as its object the provision of nursing accommodation and medical and surgical aid for L. and district. That work was being carried on at the date of the will and had continued to be carried on ever since. It was argued on behalf of her next-of-kin that, having regard to the fact that, on July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 and s. 7, the hospital and its endowments became vested in the Minister of Health free from the trusts previously affecting them, and that the then governing body of the hospital was dissolved, the hospital had ceased to exist and the gift lapsed.

C HELD: the gift was in substance for the general purposes of the hospital, i.e., the work which was being carried on at the date of the will on the premises referred to; that work was continuing; and, therefore, the gift did not fail, but should be paid and transferred to the hospital management committee to be applied by them (as was conceded) for the purposes of the hospital.

Michael Browne for the third defendant, one of the next-of-kin.

G ROXBURGH, J.: This is a short, and, as I think, though, perhaps, wrongly, a simple point, but it is undoubtedly one of general importance.

H The testatrix, Rosina Emma Morgan, died on Sept. 28, 1948, having made a will dated Aug. 9, 1944. Between the date of her will and the date of her death, namely, on July 5, 1948, the National Health Service Act, 1946, came into operation. By her will she gave, devised and bequeathed her residuary estate on trust for sale, and, after making certain payments thereout, on trust to stand possessed thereof for the benefit of the Liskeard Cottage Hospital.

At the date of her will there was at Liskeard a hospital called the Passmore Edwards Cottage Hospital, which had properties and investments, trustees, a committee of management, and some rules and regulations, and that hospital was, at the date of the will, carrying on its objects which were primarily to provide nursing accommodation and medical and surgical aid for Liskeard and district. There is not the least doubt that that was the institution to which the testatrix referred when she made her will. There is a curious lacuna in the evidence, because what, to my mind, is a fact of vital consequence is nowhere to be found stated therein. It is that that work has always since been, and is still being, carried on on those premises. I regard that as a factor of vital importance, and my judgment proceeds on that footing, and, before the order is drawn up, a supplementary affidavit must be filed to that effect*. Though this is probably an unnecessary precaution, if such an affidavit cannot be filed, the matter will have to be re-argued.

The building in which the hospital work was carried on at the date of the will was, on July 5, 1948, divested from the trustees and was vested in the Minister of Health free from the trusts which previously affected it: see s. 6 of the Act of 1946. Secondly, the hospital's investments were divested from those who formerly held them and vested in the Minister of Health free from the trusts with which they had previously been affected: see s. 7 of the Act of 1946. The governing body of the hospital was dissolved on that date, but a scheme was approved under s. 11 (3) of the Act of 1946 under which the defendants, the Plymouth, South Devon and East Cornwall Hospital Management Committee, were created as a hospital management committee for the purpose of exercising functions with respect to the management and control of a group of hospitals which included this particular hospital. Section 59 of the Act provides that a hospital management committee shall have power to accept, hold and administer any property on trust for purposes relating to hospital services. Counsel for the next-of-kin has submitted that those three admitted circumstances, either singly or in combination, have caused the hospital to cease to exist. If that is so, they did it before the date of the testatrix's death, and, therefore, if that submission be well founded, there would be an intestacy under which the next-of-kin would benefit. In my judgment, however, those factors, important though they are, did not affect the validity of this testamentary disposition.

To solve this question it is necessary to analyse the meaning of a gift which is in a fairly common form. It is not "to" anybody; it is "for the benefit of" the Liskeard Cottage Hospital. What does that really mean? In analysing this gift it is important to bear in mind that there have been much more difficult cases than the present in which the courts have been able to find that a gift such as this did not fail though no work of the nature indicated was being carried on on the premises described at the date of the death of the testatrix. The courts have put an enlarged construction on such gifts as these which makes it necessary to tread more warily than would have been necessary if such cases, which as I say are not the present case, did not exist.

I have had under consideration three analyses of this gift. The first was supplied by counsel for the next-of-kin who said that it was a gift to the trustees for the time being of the Liskeard Cottage Hospital to be held by them as an accretion to the general funds of the hospital. I am satisfied that that analysis ought to be rejected. I see no reason whatever for importing trustees into the analysis of such a gift as this—no reason at all. Counsel for the Ministry of Health has suggested that it is a gift for the general purposes of the hospital, that is to say, a gift for the work which at the date of the will of the testatrix was being carried on on the premises which the testatrix has described. I see no reason to quarrel with that analysis. An alternative form of words has occurred to me which does not, I think, differ in substance from those suggested by counsel for the Ministry of Health. That alternative form would be that the gift is to supplement the funds available for carrying on the work of the Liskeard Cottage Hospital. I do not think I need say whether I prefer counsel's definition to my own, or my own to counsel's, because, whichever be right, the gift will not be defeated. I agree entirely with counsel's submission that the essential feature is the continuity of the activity, and, if the affidavit which * The affidavit was duly filed.

I have indicated as being necessary is filed, that continuity of activity will be proved.

That is not quite the end of the matter because counsel for the Ministry of Health has made an admission or concession of great importance in a matter which would otherwise have caused me a little anxiety. This management committee, as I have indicated, controls and manages more than one hospital. Section 59 plainly empowers such a committee to hold and administer any property on trust for purposes relating to hospital services. There it stops. Counsel concedes that in such a case as this, if that legacy is paid to the hospital management committee, it should be on the terms that it is only available for the work carried on at the hospital described by the testatrix.

The next-of-kin are not interested in the question to whom payment is to be made once it be decided, as I have decided, that the testamentary disposition is valid. The question to whom payment is to be made is one of some importance, and I find no difficulty in ordering payment to be made to the hospital management committee with some such words of qualification as I have indicated. The Ministry of Health, though a party to this summons, does not claim payment to itself, and, therefore, the question would be one between the hospital management committee and the Attorney-General who would, I suppose, if it could not be paid to the hospital management committee, suggest a scheme. As between those last two points of view, as I say, I have no hesitation in ordering payment to the hospital management committee.

Food and Drugs—Milk—Adulteration—Analyst's certificate—Conclusiveness—Analyst not required to be called by defence—Right to produce rebutting evidence—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 81 (1).

On the hearing of informations charging the respondent with having been "in possession for the purpose of sale for human consumption of milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to s. 24 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938," the appellant produced certificates of a public analyst stating that the milk contained a certain percentage of "extraneous water." The respondent did not require the analyst to be called under s. 81 (1) of the Act, but called a veterinary surgeon to give rebutting evidence. The justices accepted that evidence and dismissed the informations. It was contended by the appellant that, as the respondent had not required the analyst to be called as a witness, under s. 81 (1) of the Act, the certificates were conclusive evidence and the respondent could not give evidence to disprove what was in them.

HELD: the certificate of a public analyst was not conclusive where there was a conflict of evidence; s. 81 (1) of the Act of 1938 did not prevent the respondent from calling evidence to disprove what was in the certificate where he had not required the analyst to be called as a witness; and, therefore, the justices were entitled to accept the evidence on behalf of the respondent and to dismiss the informations.

CASE STATED by Warwickshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Coventry four informations were preferred by the appellant, an authorised officer of Warwickshire County Council under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, charging the respondent with having been in possession, for the purpose of sale for human consumption, of milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to s. 24 (1) (c) of the Act. At the hearing before the justices on Dec. 2, 1949, the appellant produced certificates of a public analyst which stated that milk, of which samples had been taken, contained extraneous matter. The respondent did not require the analyst to be called as a witness under s. 81 (1) and s. 81 (3) of the Act, but called a veterinary surgeon to give on his behalf evidence which was to the effect (a) that one of the cows was at the time suffering from mastitis, a disease which would affect adversely the quality of the milk from the cow, and (b) that the cows were suffering from a deficiency in their diet, which tended to reduce the amount of "solids not fat" in their milk. It was contended by the appellant that, as the respondent had not required the analyst to be called as a witness, the certificates were conclusive evidence and the respondent was not entitled to call rebutting evidence. The respondent contended that, under s. 81 (1) of the Act, the certificates were merely prima facie evidence, and that the evidence of the veterinary surgeon was sufficient to rebut the presumption, raised by the statements in the certificates, that water had been added. The justices were of the opinion that s. 81 (1) of the Act meant that an analyst's certificate was prima facie evidence if the other party had not required the analyst to be called and not that it was conclusive evidence in the absence of such a requirement. Accordingly, they admitted the evidence tendered on behalf of the respondent, formed the opinion that that evidence was sufficient to rebut the presumption that water had been added to the milk, and dismissed the informations.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

Winn for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Warwick before whom the respondent was charged in four informations with "... being in possession for the purpose of sale for human consumption of milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to s. 24 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938."

An analyst's certificate was produced in respect of each information, certifying that the milk contained a certain percentage of, as it was called, extraneous water. If it is necessary to decide the point—but I do not think it is in this case—I should be inclined to hold that by the words "extraneous water" the analyst meant "added water," because he finds water in the milk that ought not to be there and water could not get into the churn unless it was added to the milk. The justices, having heard the evidence of a veterinary surgeon on behalf of the respondent, came to the conclusion that no water had been added. The respondent did not require the analyst to be called as a witness, and no application was made by the appellant for an adjournment to enable him to call the analyst.

A It is contended by the appellant that the justices were wrong in coming to this decision because, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 81 (1), they were bound to find in favour of the analyst's certificate unless the respondent required the analyst to be called as a witness. I do not think that is what the sub-section requires. Section 81 (1) says that the certificate of a public analyst

B "... shall be sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein, unless ... the other party requires that the analyst shall be called as a witness."

In other words, either party is entitled to refuse to accept the analyst's certificate produced by the other party and to give evidence to show that the analysis is incorrect. Section 81 (1) does not say that the analyst's certificate is to be conclusive evidence. The effect of the sub-section is that the analyst's certificate

C is not open to objection as evidence of the facts contained therein on the ground that the analyst is not called, and, if it is the only evidence that is given, the justices must act on it and convict.

In Hewitt v. Taylor (1) a court presided over by LINDLEY, L.J., held that the certificate of the analyst was not conclusive where there was a conflict of evidence, i.e., where the defendant called evidence to contradict the evidence of the certificate. As LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1896] 1 Q.B. 289):

D "... the analyst could only say, as a fact, that there was an undue proportion of water in the milk. That it had been added to the milk could only be a matter of opinion; and it seems to me that the respondent had the right to contradict it."

E Hewitt v. Taylor (1) was a decision on the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 21, but there is no material difference in the wording of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 81 (1), except that the express provision in s. 21 of the Act of 1875, that the defendant and his wife could give evidence, is omitted from s. 81 (1) of the Act of 1938, its inclusion being no longer necessary after the passing of

F the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898. In Wade v. Beadle (2) the justices had an analyst's certificate which stated that water had been added to the milk. The farmer and his cowman said in evidence that they had not added water to the milk—not that water had not been added. This court held that in those circumstances the justices were wrong in dismissing the information, because, by s. 24 (1) (c) of the Act of 1938, the legislature had made it an offence to have

G in one's possession, for the purposes of sale for human consumption, milk to which water had been added, and it was not necessary to prove that water had been added by the defendant. If the issue in the present case had been the same as in Wade v. Beadle (2) and the defence had been merely that the respondent did not add water, there would have been no conflict in regard to the facts necessary to constitute the offence and the justices would have been

H bound to accept the analyst's certificate, subject to the question, which counsel for the respondent said he might argue, in regard to the meaning of the word "extraneous." Here, however, evidence was led with a view to showing that water had not been added. The justices, having accepted that evidence and found that there was no added water in the milk, were entitled to come to the conclusion that they did and dismiss the informations. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

MORRIS, J. : I agree.

FINNEMORE, J. : I agree, and have only a few words to add on the point that, unless the respondent gave notice, under s. 81 (1) and s. 81 (3) of the Act, that he wanted the public analyst called as a witness, he could not produce any evidence to rebut what is contained in the certificates. That seems clearly contradictory to the decision in Hewitt v. Taylor (1). Section 81 (1) provides that the certificate of a public analyst shall be sufficient evidence by itself unless the other party requires the analyst to be called as a witness. The sub-section does not say that the certificate is conclusive evidence. It does not say that the respondent cannot call his own evidence and, in fact, disprove what is in the certificate. Here evidence was called. That evidence was to contradict that any water had been added, and not to show, as in Wade v. Beadle (2), that it had not been added by the farmer or one of his people. The veterinary surgeon gave evidence that the deficiency in the milk was due to deficiency in the diet of the cows and to mastitis. On that evidence the justices came to the conclusion that water had not been added, as they were entitled to do. Therefore, I agree with my Lord that the appeal fails.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Jones, J.), April 24, 28, 1950.]

Warranty — Breach — Sale of motor car — Warranty as to condition by dealer to buyer — Car sold by dealer to finance company — Hire-purchase agreement between company and buyer — Action for damages by buyer against dealer.

Acting on representations by motor car dealers that a car was in perfect condition, a purchaser paid a deposit, and, in respect of the balance of the purchase price, entered into a hire-purchase agreement with a finance company to whom the dealers had sold the car under which the car was let to him on hire-purchase terms. He paid all the instalments due under the agreement, and the property in the car passed to him. The car was not in perfect condition and the purchaser was compelled to have considerable repairs done to it. In an action by the purchaser against the dealers for damages for breach of warranty,

HELD: the dealers had given a warranty as to the condition of the car which had induced the purchaser to enter, not into a contract for the sale of the car, but into the hire-purchase agreement; the warranty had been broken; and, accordingly, the dealers were liable for the damage suffered by the purchaser through his paying a larger sum for the car under the hire-purchase agreement than the car was worth and he would have paid if the warranty had not been given.

Case referred to:

(1) Drury v. Victor Buckland, Ltd., [1941] 1 All E.R. 269; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages for breach of warranty.

In January, 1947, the plaintiff agreed to buy a motor car from the defendants, motor car dealers. The car had been advertised to be in perfect condition, and the defendants' sales manager told the plaintiff that it was in perfect condition and was "good for thousands of trouble free miles." The plaintiff decided to buy the car, but, being unable forthwith to pay the defendants the purchase price of £235 5s., he paid a deposit of £40 and entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the United Dominions Trust (Commercial), Ltd., to whom the defendants had sold the car, by which the car was let to him on hire-purchase terms. He paid all the instalments due under the agreement, and the property in the car passed to him. The plaintiff found the car not in satisfactory condition and was obliged to have carried out a number of repairs to it, at a cost of £60 to £70, to put it into a proper roadworthy condition. It was contended for the defendants that the plaintiff had no cause of action against them for breach of warranty since there had been no sale of the car by them to the plaintiff.

Apr. 28. JONES, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found that the defendants by their advertisement and by their sales manager had warranted that the car was in perfect condition, and that the warranty was broken, and continued: Counsel for the defendants contended that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendants for breach of warranty because there was no sale of the car by the defendants to him. I accept his contention that there was no sale of the car by the defendants to the plaintiff. I find that the nature of the transaction was that the car was sold by the defendants to the United Dominions Trust (Commercial), Ltd., and that that company then let it to the plaintiff under a hire-purchase agreement dated Jan. 24, 1947. I was referred by counsel for the defendants to Drury v. Victor Buckland, Ltd. (1) where the facts are very like those in the present case except that no express warranty had been given by the defendants in that case. The plaintiff in that case, who had acquired a machine called an ice-cream maker under a hire-purchase agreement with a finance company, sued the dealer who supplied the machine for damages for breach of the warranty of fitness implied by virtue of s. 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It was held that the plaintiff could not succeed as there was no sale of the ice-cream maker by the dealer to him, the plaintiff having acquired the ice-cream maker under a hire-purchase agreement.

It is, therefore, necessary to consider if the present case can be distinguished from Drury v. Victor Buckland, Ltd. (1). It was essential in order to succeed, that the plaintiff in Drury v. Victor Buckland, Ltd. (1) should prove that the ice-cream maker had been supplied to him under a contract for sale, as it is only in the case of a contract of sale that a warranty as to the quality of fitness of goods for any particular purpose is implied by virtue of s. 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and, as the court held that the contract in that case was one of hire-purchase and not one of sale, the action failed. In the present case the contract entered into by the plaintiff was also one of hire-purchase and not one of sale, but the plaintiff does not rely on the warranty implied by virtue of s. 14 of the Act of 1893 and does not contend that he was induced by the alleged warranty to enter into a contract for sale. The allegation in the statement of claim is that the plaintiff was induced by the alleged warranty to enter into the hire-purchase agreement with the United Dominions Trust (Commercial), Ltd., and, having performed that agreement, the property in the car eventually passed to him. It is further alleged that the warranty was broken in that the car, so far from being in a perfect condition, was in a bad and dangerous condition. It seems to me that the circumstances of this case are distinguishable from those in Drury

v. Victor Buckland, Ltd. (1) and that the decision in that case is not applicable here. I find that the defendants gave a warranty as to the condition of this car; that the plaintiff was induced by the warranty to enter into the hire-purchase agreement; that the warranty was broken; and that the plaintiff suffered damage through the breach as he paid a larger sum under the hire-purchase agreement for the car than it was worth and he would have paid if the warranty had not been given.

HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages (the difference between the value of the car at the date of the hire-purchase agreement and the value it would have had if it had answered to the warranty) at £66 and gave judgment for the plaintiff for that sum.

R. v. LEDGER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Finemore, JJ.), May 2, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Difference between imprisonment and corrective training—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1).

Although a sentence of corrective training is served in prison it differs from a sentence of imprisonment in that it is served in a special prison, or part of a prison, set apart for such training, under different conditions and discipline from those associated with imprisonment, and it ensures that on discharge the prisoner is given help to obtain work. Accordingly, a sentence of corrective training passed in cases properly falling within the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (1), will not be altered on the ground that the court would not have ordered a like term of imprisonment.

[FOR THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, s. 21, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Continuation Vol. 1948, pp. 175, 176.]

APPEAL against a sentence of four years' corrective training passed on the appellant at Lincolnshire quarter sessions on his conviction of larceny.

The appellant in person.

The Crown was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. I think the reason why the judge in chambers gave the appellant leave to appeal against this sentence of corrective training was that he thought that the court would not willingly or knowingly have ordered him to serve a sentence which in practice would be one of four years' imprisonment. When the judge gave leave to appeal we had been unable to get any very clear information as to what was happening to prisoners who were sentenced to corrective training. Corrective training was a new form of punishment introduced by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, the sections of which dealing with corrective training came into force on Apr. 18, 1942 (see S.L., 1949, No. 139). The judges of this court had been somewhat disturbed because they had found out that, when these sentences could first be imposed, accommodation had not been provided in different prisons for corrective training, and, accordingly, it seemed to the court that a sentence of corrective training was in no way different from a sentence of imprisonment.

We have, however, had the advantage recently of receiving information from the Prison Commissioners who attended a meeting at which all the judges in London were present, and I am saying what I say now so that quarter sessions may have the advantage of knowing what we now know. We now know that arrangements have been made, and are, in fact, in force, under which corrective training can be, and is being, given under different conditions from those which prevail in prisons. I do not mean to say, and it would be very undesirable for quarter sessions so to think, that corrective training should be looked on as a sentence which was not in one sense a sentence of imprisonment, because it is. It is served in prisons, and one of the conditions under which it is served is that in the ordinary way the usual one-third remission will be given unless the prisoner grossly misconducts himself. It also has the great advantage that the prisoner will be under the charge of the After-care Association when he is released. It will be their duty to see if they can get him work and give him a helping hand and keep him under observation generally. The prisons which have been set aside for corrective training are two wings at Wormwood Scrubbs, two wings at Liverpool, the whole of Chelmsford, and a wing at Durham, and in the beginning of June there will also be an establishment at Nottingham. The court is satisfied that the discipline and effects of a sentence of corrective training are different from the discipline and effects of a sentence of simple imprisonment.

We can, therefore, understand well that when this matter was before the judge to whom the matter was referred and he dealt with this case and gave leave to appeal before we had had the advantage of hearing the details of this matter from the Prison Commissioners, he thought (as we all did, in fact) that the arrangements for corrective training were what I may call in such a nebulous or rudimentary condition that there was really no difference between corrective training and imprisonment. We are now satisfied that there is a difference, and we think that this case is exactly the sort of case which Parliament intended to be dealt with by a sentence of corrective training. This appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

STAG LINE, LTD. v. BOARD OF TRADE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Oaksey, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), April 27, 28, 1950.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Demurrage—When ship “arrived”—Ship “to proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers”—“Place”—Berth in port.

A charterparty required a vessel to “proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers,” or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there to load a cargo of pitprops. She was ordered to Miramichi, a port in East Canada, and on arrival there, while laying off the berth at Chatham, a place within the port, was told by the agents of the charterers that she would be required to load at Millbank, another place within the port. As there was not then a berth for her, she had to wait for six days. On the question whether the shipowners were entitled to claim demurrage in respect of those six days,

HELD: on construction, the charterparty gave the charterers an express power to nominate the berth at which the vessel should be loaded; the vessel did not become an arrived ship until arriving at a berth so nominated; and, therefore, demurrage for the six days was not payable.

Decision of DEVLIN, J. (ante, p. 516), affirmed.

[AS TO WHEN A SHIP IS DEEMED TO HAVE "ARRIVED," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, pp. 422-427, para. 592; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, pp. 568-572, Nos. 3921-3947.]

APPEAL by the shipowners from an order of DEVLIN, J., made on Feb. 13, 1950, and reported ante, p. 516.

The shipowners, who had chartered a vessel to the Board of Trade, claimed demurrage for six days during which the vessel had to wait for a berth at a place in a port to which the vessel had been ordered to proceed. They claimed that, on the true construction of the charterparty, the charterers' power to nominate the place of discharge extended to the port of discharge only and not to the berth, and, consequently, the vessel became an arrived ship on arrival at the port and demurrage was payable for the delay of six days which occurred after that arrival. DEVLIN, J., held that the vessel did not become an arrived ship until arriving at the berth and demurrage for the six days was not payable. The relevant facts appear in the judgment of LORD OAKSEY.

Mocatta for the shipowners.

E. W. Roskill for the charterers.

LORD OAKSEY: This is an appeal from a judgment of DEVLIN, J., sitting in the Commercial Court, on a claim made by the owners of the Cydonia for the sum of £863 3s. 6d. in respect of demurrage.

The ship, which was chartered by the Board of Trade under a charterparty which has to be construed in this case, arrived at the Canadian port of Miramichi on Aug. 6, 1947. On that day she gave notice of readiness and was ordered by the agents of the charterers to Millbank, which is one of the berths in the port of Miramichi—a port at the mouth of a river which flows into the St. Lawrence. There are in that port four berths, Chatham, Millbank, Newcastle, and one other. When the ship arrived at Miramichi, she lay off the berth at Chatham, which was one of the ordinary places for a ship which was going to load to lie. In those circumstances, the shipowners contend, the ship was an "arrived" ship within the meaning of that expression, and her lay days began as from Aug. 6. Having, however, been ordered to the berth at Millbank, she could not get into that berth since it was full until Aug. 12. In respect of those six days—from Aug. 6 to 12—£863 3s. 6d. is claimed for demurrage. The vessel finished loading on Aug. 15.

The matter turns almost entirely on the construction of the charterparty, and it is common ground that the law in regard to the matter is settled. The principle of it is stated by DEVLIN, J., in his judgment in these words (ante, p. 517):

"... if the berth at which the vessel ultimately has to load or discharge is named in the charterparty ... she is not an arrived ship until she arrives at the berth. If, on the other hand, no berth is named in the charterparty and no power of nomination is expressly given, and she proceeds to the berth ordered by the charterers merely by virtue of the implied right which the charterers have to select the loading berth, then she becomes an arrived ship when she arrives at the port or place named in the charterparty."

The principle being well established, the question is whether under this charterparty the charterers or the shippers had an express power to nominate the berth at which the vessel should be loaded. Clause 1 of the charterparty provides:

"That the said vessel, being tight, staunch and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall ... sail and proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load, always afloat, or safely aground where ships of similar size and draught are accustomed to load aground in safety, from the agents of the said charterers, a full and complete cargo of pitprops not exceeding ten feet lengths, option up to five per cent. maximum thirteen feet. Up to three berths Miramichi district to count as one port."

It is contended on behalf of the charterers that the words "place or places as ordered by the charterers and/or shippers" conferred on them an express power to nominate the berth or berths at which the ship should load. It is contended on behalf of the shipowners that there was no such express power conferred by those words, that the power of the charterers to indicate where the vessel was to load was not that contended for by them, and that they were entitled to the demurrage claimed.

DEVLIN, J., gave two principal reasons for deciding the matter in favour of the charterers. One reason was that the argument of the shipowners necessitated altering the arrangement of certain words in cl. 1 of the charterparty and reading it as though the words were: "... proceed to one or two safe ports, place or places, East Canada or Newfoundland, as ordered by charterers and/or shippers," which would involve the transposition of the words of the clause and disregarding the comma which occurs before the words "place or places as ordered". The other reason, which I think is the main one in his judgment, was that, if it had been the intention of the parties that "places" should mean an alternative to "ports," it would have been very simple to put the words of the clause in such order as to make this clear. I agree with DEVLIN, J. I think that it is important to remember the settled principle of law with reference to the result of having an express power given to the charterers to nominate the berths at which the ship should lie. In the light of that principle the words of cl. 1 are better construed as giving an express power to the charterers. I think that the position of these words in the clause is the crucial matter. As DEVLIN, J., stated what the parties were endeavouring to say was that they might proceed to one or two safe ports in East Canada or Newfoundland, and then, within those ports, the charterers would order the place or places to which the vessel was to go.

The argument on behalf of the shipowners was that the words "as ordered by charterers and/or shippers" appear to qualify the words "one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland" and "place or places." In my view, as COHEN, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, and as counsel for the charterers submitted to us, the power to nominate the ports to which the vessel should go was expressly conferred by cl. 39 on the charterers alone and not on the shippers. That, in my opinion, supports the view that the words "as ordered by charterers and/or shippers" were not intended to apply to the words "one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland." It seems to me also that the words "place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers," in the position they occupy in the clause, must really refer to the berths, or points, or spots, at which the ship could load, because they are not in any way qualified as to their locality, unless they are by the words "place or places" within the ports. They might refer to any port in the world, unless they are a "place," or "places," within the ports that are specified in the phrase which goes before.

It is further argued on behalf of the shipowners that the last words of cl. 1 are significant in their favour, because they say: "Up to three berths Miramichi district to count as one port." Counsel for the shipowners says that that indicates the difference which was intended between the words "place or places" and the word "berths," but I think a good answer to that contention is that the "place" or "places" in which the ship might load would not necessarily be properly described as "berths." They might be spots, or points, or they might be in the open water. Therefore, "place or places" is a generic term which may have been used to indicate the sort of place in which the ship might load—places which are actual loading spots, or points, within a port. For these reasons, I think that the judgment of DEVLIN, J., was right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that, as in regard to other documents, so in regard to a commercial document, one should do as little violence to its wording as one can in order to arrive at a sensible construction of its clauses. I agree with DEVLIN, J., that the construction of the words of cl. 1 of the charterparty, as submitted by counsel for the charterers, is the one which best conforms to the language which the parties to it have chosen to use. Counsel's construction involves only the insertion of an additional comma after the words "and/or shippers," whereas, at the conclusion of his argument in reply, counsel for the shipowners was compelled to admit that the minimum alteration he could make in order that the clause should read in the sense he desired was to transpose the words "East Canada or Newfoundland" to follow the words "proceed to" and to make the clause read: "... proceed to East Canada or Newfoundland one or two safe ports place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers." I do not see any reason for doing that violence to the language of the clause. As my Lord has pointed out, if you merely read the words "place or places as ordered by the charterers and/or shippers" as if they were in brackets the clause would enable the charterers and/or shippers to nominate the actual berth or point at which the loading should take place, and very little violence would have been done to the language of the clause, nor would anything have been omitted which is not covered by some other clause of the charterparty. Counsel for the shipowners argues that to make sense of the clause the words "as ordered by the charterers and/or shippers" must govern the words "one or two safe ports." I think that it is quite unnecessary to make that change, because the question of nominating the actual port or ports is fully covered by cl. 39.

My Lord has dealt with the argument based on the words: "Up to three berths Miramichi district to count as one port," and I do not desire to add anything to what he has said as to that. The only other point to which I wish to refer is in regard to cl. 29, which provides:

"When loading in Newfoundland, ship to give free use of accommodation as on board for carrying measurers and/or workmen between loading places and for two measurers while loading."

Counsel for the shipowners asks us to say that that shows that where the draftsman uses the word "places" he means "ports" and not "berths." I see no reason for so limiting the meaning of those words. We are not dealing here with the question of nomination—all that is provided for in this clause is free accommodation for carrying measurers and/or workmen between such "loading places" (which I should read as "berths") as the ship may visit, in accordance with the directions given under other clauses of the charterparty. It seems to me that there is nothing inconsistent in that clause with the view that the words "place or places as ordered by charterers and/or shippers" in cl. 1 mean the loading points, or loading berths, which the charterers and/or shippers may nominate. For these reasons I think that the charterparty does contain a provision conferring on the charterers the express right to nominate the actual berth, and, if that be its true construction, there is no dispute but that the learned judge's decision was right.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.
